The title of the work is "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kaan." The subject is of course that of Coleridge's poem. When he wrote the music, Mr. Griffes states in the programme book, he was thinking principally of the "stately pleasure-dome," the "sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice," the "miracle of rare device" . . . "The gardens with fountains and 'sunny spots of greenery' are next suggested. From inside come sounds of dancing and revelry which increase to a wild climax and then suddenly break off. There is a return to the original mood suggesting the sacred river and the 'caves of ice.'"

This is the simple programme of the piece. It is a programme simple enough not to bother anyone listening to the music who is fearful that he may be thinking of an oriental dance when the composer means him to think of "caves of ice." The imagination of the composer and the hearer are left quite free. That the composer has real imagination, feeling, and above all a sense of color is clearly shown. That he has less melodic originality at present is also evident. Who has real thematic invention at the age of 30 today? How many great composers have had it at that age? Comparatively few.

Ultra-Modern Music

Nor is Mr. Griffes' orchestration wholly original. He knows his Stravinsky, for example, extremely well. The opening is richly suggestive of the opening of "The Firebird"—the persistent tremolo replacing Stravinsky's figure work in the lower strings, short staccato chords of bassoons and piano—if the ear may be trusted—fixing the impression in the mind. The score is plainly derived from ultra-modern Russia and ultra-modern France. But with a difference. The difference is that of weak imitation and a young tone-painter with a sense of color which is inherent, rather exotic in character, and absolutely fascinating to the listener. In his mind's eye this composer sees a picture which he paints boldly. His orientalism is not a mere arpeggio for an oboe or pounding on the drum. It is the orient conceived by a young modern. And if the thematic contours of this work are not marked by great originality they are marked by life, by definite direction and at least a strong intention of form.

Above all, there is enormous spirit and contagion in the writing. Feeling this spirit of the composer, it is hard to be over-critical of sources of effects. He has, too, some effects of his own—very ingenious and striking developments of hints given him by older composers; and with all this the music is personal, individual in quality of imagination, and indicative of a broad and catholic appreciation of music of many schools.

Is Enjoyable to Hear

We maintain that this is more than enough to start with, and that it is difficult not to enjoy this transitional music of a composer of talent and of astonishing technical resource. Mr. Griffes is a man to watch with care. He is not a mere objectivist and a man of ultra-refinement in his music, like John Alden Carpenter, for example. Nor is he a man possessed of the broadly nationalistic ideals in the music of Henry Gilbert.

But he is a young American, full of spirit and receptivity, astonishingly progressive, as shown by the texture of a score of a man who was musically educated in composition in Germany; he has temperament in great abundance; he loves to write. Hence it gives one great pleasure to think that out of a sparse harvest another important American composer is coming to maturity.

Chausson's Symphony

This piece greatly pleased the audience. The opening work was Chausson's admirable symphony in B-flat, which was given a wonderful performance by Mr. Monteux. The work had never before in Boston been heard to such advantage. Never before had the solemn introduction merged so inevitably into the calmly joyous allegro. Never before had the instrumentation been so beautifully clear and transparent, nor the long flowing lines of the first theme of the allegro been done such justice. Of course, Chausson did not reach his complete development as a composer, even in this, one of his most complete works.

The symphony is principally of German classic mould, and the cyclic form imposed on the already existent mould by Cesar Frank. There is conventional development of motives in the opening movement, battledoring and shuttlecocking of fragments about, ordinary sequences, etc. But the broad, virile stride of this movement, its luminous color; the melancholy of the slow movement, the change to a spirit of hope and thankfulness, so subtly and admirably brought out by Mr. Monteux, and the brilliant finale, of a quality best exemplified by pages of Franck, made a very strong impression and intensified regrets that such a fine and pure musical nature as Chausson's should have met its untimely end.

Mme. Homer, gifted with a contralto voice which does not wear out, a natural simplicity and breadth of style, was heard at her best in familiar music which gave much pleasure to the audience: "Nature's Adoration," Beethoven; "Ombra Mai Fu," otherwise known as "Largo," Handel; "Heart Ever Faithful," Bach; aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," Verdi. She was applauded to the echo.

The concert ended with that extraordinary "Bouree Fantasque" of Chabrier, scintillatingly orchestrated by Mottl. The other music had talent. That piece has genius.

GRIFFES AND HIS MUSIC

Trans. — Nov. 26/19
THE NEW COMPOSER AND HIS NEW PIECE

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Tone-Poem After Coleridge's Verse, for the First Times at the Symphony Concerts of This Week—Backgrounds, Incidental Circumstance and Anticipations

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this week play a new symphonic poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, draws attention to a young American composer who, partly through natural modesty and partly because of his insistent refusal to write in an obviously popular style, has not yet won the reputation that he deserves, and that he is likely to gain in the future. Mr. Griffes was born in Elmira, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1884, and first studied the piano with Miss Mary S. Broughton in his home-town. He was later the pupil of Ernest Jedliczka and Gottfried Galston in Berlin for four years, studying composition also with Philipp Ruefer and Engelbert Humperdinck. After his return to America, he became the teacher of music at the Hackley School for Boys, at Tarrytown, where he has done most of his creative work, besides teaching independently in New York City. Among his compositions already published, or performed in public, are numerous songs and piano pieces; "The Kalin of Koridwen," a dance-drama in two scenes; "Shojo," a Japanese mimodrama; and a chorus, "These Things Shall Be," sung at the New York Community Chorus Festival of 1917. His ballet music has been produced at the Neighborhood Playhouse, as well as by Adolf Bolm and Michio Itow, for whom he has also written minor dances of exotic character. The chief interpreter of his songs has been Mme. Eva Gauthier.

Definitely modern in its technique, yet escaping the imitative emptiness into which so much of this type of American composition has fallen, the music of Mr. Griffes challenges the closest study and analysis. It is not easy material to absorb at a single hearing, but invariably there is the feeling that it is worth hearing again. His first considerable success with an audience was scored recently in New York through a "Poem" for flute and orchestra, introduced by George Barrere and the New York Symphony Society at Aeolian Hall in a Sunday afternoon concert. The new composition is in keeping with the consistent seriousness of his efforts, and may well be considered his most significant contribution thus far to the literature of absolute music.

The words "absolute music" are used with some hesitation, for Mr. Griffes has in the past been definitely programmatic in his creations, and by his own confession he finds it far easier to write with some visual image in his mind, to be put, however vaguely and impressionistically, into audible form. In the case of his new "Poem," also, he admits that he intended to convey more than a merely formal design of melody and harmony, certainly more than the meretricious union between a solo instrument and its accompaniment, for the glorification of the former alone. But he is unable to put his underlying idea into concrete form, and the chances are that his hearers will supply the deficiency in an amusing variety of ways.

To Walter Damrosch, who conducted the orchestra at the initial performance, Mr. Griffes' Poem seems Greek in spirit, distinctly a compliment from one who has himself experimented successfully with the production of Greek drama, and the composition of incidental music for it. To the majority of listeners, however, the predominant mood must inevitably have been Oriental, in the accepted sense, perhaps even African rather than Asiatic. The languorous minor strains which open and close the piece might equally well portray the dawn and evening of a day in the desert, or the introduction and epilogue to a sensuous harem scene, while the intervening dance rhythms could apply to sheiks and whirling dervishes as easily as to houris and experimental sultanias.

Yet one seldom writes for the flute without becoming actively pastoral in spirit, and when all the guesses have been made and all the imaginations strained, it is to a basically pastoral idea that Mr. Griffes must confess, if he is as honest as his music bespeaks him. That he has enveloped his nymphs and satyrs in the gaudier trappings of Scheherazade and her tribe is nobody's business but his own. Mr. Griffes composes naturally and involuntarily in Oriental idiom, quite as the majority of other American composers express their deepest thoughts automatically in ragtime or the melodious ballad form. Practically all of his previous work has been tinged with this exotic coloring, in particular the exceedingly interesting ballet music that he prepared for Adolf Bohn and Michio Itow, and certain strange, elusive songs of Stravinskian flavor.

Whatever pictures and impressions Mr. Griffes's poem may produce in the imagination, the fact remains that it is a remarkably well-wrought composition, dignified and serious in intention, articulate in design, and of a rare fitness for the instrument which it honors. Obviously its creator did not say, "Go to, I will write a piece for the flute." Rather did he work out of his imagination a series of tones which cried aloud for a flute to interpret them.

The instrument is given every opportunity to display its individual properties, yet never is there any suggestion of a straining for effect, or the artificial insertion of mere technique for its own sake. Both in the slow parts, where broad, mellow tones float languidly above the orchestra, and in the rapid, cleverly rhythmized passages, in climatic accelerando, with the whistling treble still piercing the accompanying hubbub, the Poem is admirably suited to the art of George Barrère, and his fine interpretation was exceedingly helpful to the favorable reaction of the entire audience, which overwhelmed both the composer and the performer with applause.

Upon the fly-leaf in the manuscript score of "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" stands as clew to the music a brief quotation from Coleridge's dream-drenched, perhaps opium-drenched, poem, to wit:

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:

And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

The shadow of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the waves;
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the caves.
It was a miracle of rare device,
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

Then follows the tone-poem, a relatively short piece written for the usual orchestra, plus a celesta and piano—"to be blended with the other instruments"—with frequent division of the strings, with occasional use of violin and oboe as solo voices. Mr. Griffes's workmanship is "ultra-modern" in the common and convenient usage of the words, evenuating in music that is an iridescent web through which occasionally pierce or flash—as it seems in a reading of the score—sharp-set and imaginative harmonies, graphic and imaginative modulations, as keen and felicitous contrasts and combinations of instrumental timbres. Mr. Griffes apparently has no taste for the thick-woven luxuriance, melodic, harmonic, instrumental, of the Wagnerian and the Straussian day. For him as for Mr. Loeffler in his later pieces and for Mr. Carpenter, a relatively thin music, ascending from brief motifs, yet of clear and plastic progress, of fine and adroit facture, vivid with color and implication, swimming in atmosphere. Again, so far as the reading eye may gather the quality of the tone-poem, Mr. Griffes is not insistently and definitely oriental in the Russian manner. Rather, such oriental suggestion as the music may convey, is but one thread in a web which would be tapestry, like Coleridge's verse, of fantastic vision. Nor is Mr. Griffes minded to delineative progress through Coleridge's lines after the fashion of pedestrian composers. It is possible to detect in his tone-poem "the mingled measure from the fountain and the caves," the contrasts of "sunny pleasure-dome" with "caves of ice." No print, no diagram, however, is Mr. Griffes drawing in tones. Instead, he is transmuting into them, in his own voice and manner, a vision and an atmosphere. "You will be surprised," said Mr. Toscanini, as the invited audience trooped into the dress-rehearsal of Montemezzi's opera, "The Love of Three Kings" at the Metropolitan. "You will be surprised," Mr. Monteux might as reasonably say to his hearers, when he opens the score next Friday of "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan."

Voice of the Orient: Means of the Occident

C. T. Griffes

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Was Played for the First Times at the Current Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 29, 1919

A NOTABLE NEW PIECE FROM MR. GRIFFES

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" Discloses No Routine or Insignificant Composer — Music of Mind, Imagination, Skill and Individuality — Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" Disappointingly Revived—Chausson's Grave Greek Symphony and Interludes of Song from Mme. Homer

OUR grave and reverend Bostonian composers, for the most part well forward in middle age, rise with dignity from their places in Symphony Hall and bow solemnly to the applauding audience welcoming and rewarding new pieces from their hands. Not so in like circumstance the younger and sprightlier souls that in turn have fetched their music from New York or from Chicago for the Symphony Orchestra to play. Frankly pleased they skip through corridor and ante-room to the stage, smilingly stride it, beam acknowledgement to all and sundry, shake the conductor's hand, receive also his congratulations. So did Mr. Carpenter in a business jacket (as the tailors say) when his symphony was played for the first time in Boston in the spring of 1918; and so yesterday afternoon did Mr. Griffes, likewise in a business jacket, when his tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," was played for the first time anywhere. It was good to hear the listeners applauding warmly the music of a youthful and little-known composer because it had manifestly pleased and impressed them. It was as good to see him honestly pleased by such fortune. Though the Symphony Concerts are public functions in Boston and in New England, they can, on occasion, be agreeably human. They were yesterday—and the oftener the better.

Mr. Griffes's music, moreover, clearly deserved such reward. His tone-poem is a brief piece, since Wagnerian and Straussian lengths are out of the fashion with the younger composers the world over. By the same token, it is also laudably concentrated in a mingled economy and astuteness of means. Following suggestions from Coleridge's prompting verse, "The Pleasure-Dome" falls readily into successive sections—the introduction visualizing, as it were, the site and the prospect.

Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea;

the second division, wherein the dome rises, so to say, upon the tonal ear and eye, set about with garden and fountain, wall and tower, scent-breathing forest and smiling meadow; the third division, wholly of Mr. Griffes's invention, in which the murmur of revelry within rises to festal clang; the end as in wan echo of "the mingled measure from the fountain and the caves," and wan fading of the vision—"a sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice."

Throughout hardly a measure seems to be "filling"; while not a modulation, a progression, a play of harmony or timbre fails to do its office. There are discernible motifs whence the tonal fabric springs; as in the music of Debussy a rhythmic continuity seems to bind the whole together; but there is no "development" in the old fashion for "development's" sake. No more is there any juggling with harmonic and instrumental color as feat of resource and agility which is the newer mode. Mr. Griffes perceives clearly the form in which he would cast his tone-poem, the design which he would unfold, the visions he would summon. With surety, with economy, he chooses and applies his means to those ends. Everywhere the outcome is clear, the impression tense, the atmosphere sustained, the illusion compassed. So to compose is to compose with a mind that discerns, sorts, controls. It is a rare, a precious possession for a composer still in relative youth.

Mr. Griffes also composes with imagination. It is not necessary to have ridden the Arizona deserts at dawn when a gray and misty solitude trembles into iridescence, when sand and summit, cliff and canyon, shimmer into fantastic shapes and color, when the pulse of expectancy seems to beat in the very air, to find in the composer's prelude like insistent quiver of mystery into light, of a void into shewn and substance. Only not in Arizona but in an oriental Xanadu. Mr. Griffes lays the tonal scene. His means are the means of the composers of this, our fortunate day—thin strands, reiterated rhythms, shadowy harmonies, dusky instrumental colors tremulously tinged brighter. No mere mechanics mixes, manipulates them. (Recall the haunting piano part!) The harmonic mists clear; and then rises the "pleasure-dome" in music of firmer line, opener texture, glinting, glamorous, sun-shot and heavy; dream-drenched still. But life stirs in the visioning. Though it be dawn, they feast within the dome. The music opens in oriental interval, beats to oriental rhythm, is languorous or pungent with oriental color. The clang sharpens; the climax pierces. It is as though upon the instant the dome—and the vision—were shattered. "The mingled measure" tinkles ghostly. As into the caves of ice, the music shivers into silence.

Here and there, the tonal revelry has fallen into routine—for half a moment, but the end is tonal magic again. Music of a mind at every turn of the facture, music of imagery at almost every turn of the illusion, music throughout of a talent and a temperament taking their own visioning and expressing way, music unlike that of any other American composer, yet uncommonly vivid in immediate impresson. Mr. Griffes has done well to wait until the mistrustful conductors were ready to accept him. Neither an audience in New York over the "Poem for Flute" nor an audience in Boston over "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" has mistrusted at all.

Another orchestral number of the day has gone so long unplayed at the Symphony Concerts that it sounded almost new—Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," as brief as "The Pleasure-Dome," but, in contrast, somewhat disappointing in outcome. It was human nature—and this was an uncommonly human Symphony Concert—to expect another "España" and to be chilled when no such music emerged. Possibly, had Chabrier himself originally written the Bourree for orchestra, he would have clothed it in like glowing colors and whipped it into like seething rhythms. He, however, was content with it as piano-piece; and not until after his death did his friend, Mottl, the illustrious conductor of Karlsruhe and Munich, so transform it. Mottl was practiced in orchestral resource and device; he had acquired in degree harmonic and instrumental imagination. He did the good job of an expert friend when he scored the Bourree, but perhaps he discovered, as did many a hearer yesterday, that the two motifs whence it springs are no flaming, prancing Spanish measures; that the rhythmic possibilities are limited; that not always was Chabrier's fantasy a devouring fire. As has been said, Mottl did a good job; so also did Mr. Monteux and the orchestra; so originally did Chabrier himself. There are agreeable contrasts between the animated and the wistful divisions of the piece; the dance rhythm pleases, the orchestral voices "sound"—and that is all.

To the Parisian nineties, Mr. Monteux went also for the symphony of the afternoon—Chausson's, first brought into the repertory by Mr. Gericke, restored again to it by Dr. Muck. Chausson was a pupil of Franck; dwelt and worked in a Franckian circle; followed the Franckian formulas as in this very symphony; fell now and then inarticulate when he would speak in tones. No wonder, then, that in various measures he let good Father Franck speak for him. Chausson's composing day was the day in which the Wagnerian tide was sweeping into France and deep in it were swimming some of his compeers. At times in his music-making Chausson groped to find the way. No wonder, again, that at such haltings of his symphony he let Wagnerian procedures clear the path. Admit also that once and again they also left him groping. Agree finally that Mr. Monteux was too heavy-handed in performance; that he obscured outline in too solid, too square-cut masses of tone; that he thickened and shadowed where he might have thinned and illuminated; that an insistent intensity of expression was everywhere his quest. None the less the symphony remained a music of finely chiselled contours, of delicate ornament, of sober and symmetrical progress, a frieze-like music were it not that exaltation often warms and passions it. Throughout it speaks nobly of the composer's soul.

Frieze-like indeed is the introduction gravely carved against a pale, fine-lined, harmonic background, like to a fresco of Puvis de Chavannes. Then warmth enters or less warmth than luminosity; for the succeeding division swims in the clear cool light of autumn sunshine and autumn air. There are zest, exhilaration in the music, but once and again melancholy tinges and shadows it; while always the emotion is akin to a grave and tranquil happiness. If it is joy that Chausson would paint in tones, then he paints with the serenity of classic painters. Again it is as though Chavannes were working in the medium of music. True, when Chausson would make an opera, he sought his subject-matter in romantic Arthurian legend; true, his familiar Poem for violin and orchestra seems clearly a romantic music. Yet the second movement of his symphony, surely the voice of woe, is of the woe that Antigone bore on her young shoulders within her black mantle when she went forth to death condemned.

Here is no music of Wagnerian frenzies, disposed as Mr. Monteux was to play it so; no more is it music of Franckian despair, intimate, personal. Rather it is lofty, solitary, remote, a sorrow-stricken music of Greek tragedy, of the Sophocles of this Antigone. So again with the finale. Overdrive it as Mr. Monteux did, he could not make the end ascend to elation. Rather the choral-like progress halted in sunlit calm, in the seats of the happy immortals. No; the Wagnerian, the Franckian similitudes in Chausson's symphony are relatively accidental. Rather he wrote in the nineties in Paris a symphony that gains the Sophoclean beauty of mood and progress, the Sophoclean symmetry of outline and fineness of detail; the Sophoclean purity of passion. As Chausson wrought in his music, so, in his own time, Puvis de Chauvannes wronged in his success. Years ago, as it now seems, Mr. Gerloke, better known than Mr. Monteux, played Chausson's symphony in such voice and said that from d'Indy he had taken cue. Yesterday in spite of a very different reading the Greek impression persisted.

And there were interludes of song, sure to mar the symmetry of a symphony concert, but sure also to pleasure the audience. Mme. Homer provided them with three pieces she had sung of old at these very concerts—the air from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," universally known as his Largo from which sentimental transcription the singer bore sundry measures into the accompaniment; an air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," from a cantata of Bach; and a soliloquy of the opera house, the Princess Etol's "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." For newer matter she added Beethoven's hymn "The Heavens Are Telling." Beethoven she sang la gely; Handel too amply; Bach haltingly; Verdi with force and thrill of the theatre. Becomingly Mr. Monteux accompanied her. Great was the joy of their hearers. With them Mme. Homer's singing is institutional, even when a hint, at least, of thinness, a suspicion of stridency, a momentary shortness of breath, now and then cross tones that were once richer, if less pliant than they are today. Relentless fleet the years.

H. T. PARKER

MME HOMER SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Globe — Nov. 29/19
New American Composer
Has a Brilliant Introduction

Mme Louise Homer, the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, sang four familiar numbers: "Nature's Adoration," Beethoven; "My Heart Ever Faithful," Bach; "O, Don Fatale," Verdi, and "Ombra Mai Fu," Handel, better known as "Handel's Largo." Her choice of selections gave great pleasure to the numerous concert goers who prefer to hear over and over again numbers they have learned to like, but disappointed the seekers for novelties.

Her singing was not at its best yesterday. Her breathing was often labored and her tones sometimes forced and unsteady. Only for moments did her voice regain its old-time splendor. Her interpretations were workmanlike.

Chausson's Symphony in B flat major was superbly played. Mr Monteux excels any recent conductor the Symphony has had in music of this sort, which calls for fire and expressiveness without sentimental emotionalism. There are moments in this symphony as good as the best of Franck, but its structure is confused rather than intricate and there are too many echoes of the moods of Wagner.

It shows great promise rather than triumphant achievement. The composer's untimely death left him, as far as the larger forms are concerned, still groping, unable to organize his fine musical material into a masterpiece.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," a piano piece orchestrated effectively by his friend Mottl after his death, is an agreeable trifle which has added little to his reputation. Mr Monteux and the orchestra made the most of it, and were well applauded for their pains.

The most significant item on the program was the first performance anywhere of a new piece by an almost unknown American composer, who is beginning of late to acquire a deservedly wide repute. Charles T. Griffes' tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," is not a supreme masterpiece, but it shows genuine originality and power of a sort that entitle its composer to be judged by the same standard as men like Ravel, Rachmaninoff and Stravinsky, not by that usually applied to orchestral works by unfamiliar Americans.

It is never imitative, pedantic, bombastic nor sentimental. Few are the works of American composers which succeed in avoiding all four of these pitfalls, and in calling forth an outburst of genuine applause instead of the routine polite hand-clapping. Mr Griffes was obliged by the insistence of the audience and the friendly compulsion of Mr Monteux to come on the stage and bow his acknowledgements.

The orchestration of this tone poem is often masterly. The piano becomes what it almost never is, an orchestral instrument instead of a more or less superfluous "added attraction." Like Berlioz and Rimsky Korsakoff, Mr Griffes proves the saying that the highest form of art is to conceal art, by gaining his effects in ways which are not immediately obvious to the listener.

Best of all, they are never effects for the sake of effects, but always subordinate to his genuine and individual creative impulse. It is to be hoped that this piece will be repeated during the present season, and others by the same composer added to the active repertory of the orchestra. This concert will be repeated tonight. There are no more Symphony concerts until Dec 19 and 20.

Symphony Hall.

Mme. LOUISE HOMER (Mrs. Sidney Homer) was born at Pittsburgh, Pa. Her maiden name was Beatty. She studied singing in Philadelphia, but her chief vocal teachers were Mr. William L. Whitney of Boston, then a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, and the late Fidèle Koenig of Paris. A student in Boston, she sang in Mr. G. W. Chadwick's choir at the Columbus Avenue Universalist Church. In 1895 she was married to Mr. Sidney Homer, the composer, and the next year she went to Paris, where she studied eighteen months with Koenig and with Paul Lhérier* (for dramatic action).

Her first appearance in Paris was at a symphony concert, when she sang a work composed for her by Antoine Savard. The conductor was Vincent d'Indy. She made her début at Vichy in June, 1898, as Leonora in "La Favorita." She also took the parts of Delilah, the Queen in "Hamlet," Ortrud, and Margared in "Le Roi d'Ys" during the season of three months at Vichy. An operatic season of six months at Angers followed. From Angers she went to Covent Garden, London, where she made her first appearance as Amneris, May 14, 1899. The following winter she was engaged as first contralto of the Monnaie at Brussels, and she was the first to impersonate Mme. de la Haltière in Massenet's "Cendrillon" at that opera-house. She returned to Covent Garden in the spring.

Mme. Homer made her first operatic appearance in America as a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, of New York, at San Francisco, November 14, 1900, as Amneris. She has sung at festivals, in orchestral concerts, and in recitals throughout the country.

She has sung at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston as follows: October 15, 1904 ("Inflammatus et Accensus," from Dvořák's "Stabat Mater"; also as a member of the quartet in "Quis est Homo" from the same work); October 14, 1905 (Liszt's "Loreley" and scene "Just God!" and aria "My Life fades in its Blossom" from Wagner's "Rienzi," Act III., No. 9); October 9, 1909 (Saint-Saëns's "La Fiancée du Timbalier," Liszt's "Loreley," Brahms's "Sapphische Ode," and Schubert's "Allmacht," all with orchestra); April 17, 1914 (Bach, "Erbarme dich" from the "Passion according to Matthew"; Gluck, "Divinités du Styx" from "Alceste"; Verdi, "O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos"); January 19, 1917 (Bach, "Es ist vollbracht," and "My Heart ever Faithful"; Homer, "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to me," "The Song of the Shirt.").

Chavannes wrought in his fire-cores. Years ago, as it now seems, Mr. Gerlicke, better divining than Mr. Monteux, played Chausson's symphony in such voice and said that from d'Indy he had taken cue. Yesterday in spite of a very different reading the Greek impression persisted.

And there were interludes of song, sure to mar the symmetry of a symphony concert, but sure also to pleasure the audience. Mme. Homer provided them with three pieces she had sung of old at these very concerts—the air from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," universally known as his Largo from which sentimental transcription the singer bore sundry measures into the accompaniment; an air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," from a can'tata of Bach; and a soliloquy of the opera house, the Princess Eboli's "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." For newer matter she added Beethoven's hymn "The Heavens Are Telling." Beethoven she sang la gely; Handel too amply; Bach haltingly; Verdi with force and thrill of the theatre. Becoming Mr. Monteux accompanied her. Great was the joy of their hearers. With them Mme. Homer's singing is institutional, even when a hint, at least, of thinness, a suspicion of stridency, a momentary shortness of breath, now and then cross tones that were once richer, if less pliant than they are today. Relentless fleet the years.

H. T. PARKER

MME HOMER SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY 9:45 — Nov. 29/19 New American Composer Has a Brilliant Introduction

Mme Louise Homer, the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, sang four familiar numbers: "Nature's Adoration," Beethoven; "My Heart Ever Faithful," Bach; "O, Don Fatale," Verdi, and "Ombra Mai Fu," Handel, better known as "Handel's Largo." Her choice of selections gave great pleasure to the numerous concert goers who prefer to hear over and over again numbers they have learned to like, but disappointed the seekers for novelties.

Her singing was not at its best yesterday. Her breathing was often labored and her tones sometimes forced and unsteady. Only for moments did her voice regain its old-time splendor. Her interpretations were workmanlike.

Chausson's Symphony in B flat major was superbly played. Mr Monteux excels any recent conductor the Symphony has had in music of this sort, which calls for fire and expressiveness without sentimental emotionalism. There are moments in this symphony as good as the best of Franck, but its structure is confused rather than intricate and there are too many echoes of the moods of Wagner.

It shows great promise rather than triumphant achievement. The composer's untimely death left him, as far as the larger forms are concerned, still groping, unable to organize his fine musical material into a masterpiece.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique," a piano piece orchestrated effectively by his friend Mottl after his death, is an agreeable trifle which has added little to his reputation. Mr Monteux and the orchestra made the most of it, and were well applauded for their pains.

The most significant item on the program was the first performance anywhere of a new piece by an almost unknown American composer, who is beginning of late to acquire a deservedly wide repute. Charles T. Griffes' tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," is not a supreme masterpiece, but it shows genuine originality and power of a sort that entitle its composer to be judged by the same standard as men like Ravel, Rachmaninoff and Stravinsky, not by that usually applied to orchestral works by unfamiliar Americans.

It is never imitative, pedantic, bombastic nor sentimental. Few are the works of American composers which succeed in avoiding all four of these pitfalls, and in calling forth an outburst of genuine applause instead of the routine polite hand-clapping. Mr Griffes was obliged by the insistence of the audience and the friendly compulsion of Mr Monteux to come on the stage and bow his acknowledgements.

The orchestration of this tone poem is often masterly. The piano becomes what it almost never is, an orchestral instrument instead of a more or less superfluous "added attraction." Like Berlioz and Rimsky Korsakoff, Mr Griffes proves the saying that the highest form of art is to conceal art, by gaining his effects in ways which are not immediately obvious to the listener.

Best of all, they are never effects for the sake of effects, but always subordinate to his genuine and individual creative impulse. It is to be hoped that this piece will be repeated during the present season, and others by the same composer added to the active repertory of the orchestra. This concert will be repeated tonight. There are no more Symphony concerts until Dec 19 and 20.

Symphony Hall.

Mme. LOUISE HOMER (Mrs. Sidney Homer) was born at Pittsburgh, Pa. Her maiden name was Beatty. She studied singing in Philadelphia, but her chief vocal teachers were Mr. William L. Whitney of Boston, then a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, and the late Fidèle Koenig of Paris. A student in Boston, she sang in Mr. G. W. Chadwick's choir at the Columbus Avenue Universalist Church. In 1895 she was married to Mr. Sidney Homer, the composer, and the next year she went to Paris, where she studied eighteen months with Koenig and with Paul Lhéris (for dramatic action).

Her first appearance in Paris was at a symphony concert, when she sang a work composed for her by Antoine Savard. The conductor was Vincent d'Indy. She made her début at Vichy in June, 1898, as Leonora in "La Favorita." She also took the parts of Delilah, the Queen in "Hamlet," Ortrud, and Margared in "Le Roi d'Ys" during the season of three months at Vichy. An operatic season of six months at Angers followed. From Angers she went to Covent Garden, London, where she made her first appearance as Amneris, May 14, 1899. The following winter she was engaged as first contralto of the Monnaie at Brussels, and she was the first to impersonate Mme. de la Haltière in Massenet's "Cendrillon" at that opera-house. She returned to Covent Garden in the spring.

Mme. Homer made her first operatic appearance in America as a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, of New York, at San Francisco, November 14, 1900, as Amneris. She has sung at festivals, in orchestral concerts, and in recitals throughout the country.

She has sung at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston as follows: October 15, 1904 ("Inflammatus et Accensus," from Dvořák's "Stabat Mater"; also as a member of the quartet in "Quis est Homo" from the same work); October 14, 1905 (Liszt's "Loreley" and scene "Just God!" and aria "My Life fades in its Blossom" from Wagner's "Rienzi," Act III, No. 9); October 9, 1909 (Saint-Saëns's "La Fiancée du Timbalier," Liszt's "Loreley," Brahms's "Sapphische Ode," and Schubert's "Allmacht," all with orchestra); April 17, 1914 (Bach, "Erbarme dich" from the "Passion according to Matthew"; Gluck, "Divinités du Styx" from "Alceste"; Verdi, "O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos"); January 19, 1917 (Bach, "Es ist vollbracht," and "My Heart ever Faithful"; Homer, "From the Brake the Nightingale," "Sing to me," "The Song of the Shirt").

Mr. Griffes studied the pianoforte with Mary S. Broughton of Elmira. Having been graduated from the Elmira Academy, he went to Berlin, where he studied four years: pianoforte with Ernest Jedliczka and Gottfried Galston; composition with Philipp Rüfer and Engelbert Humperdinck. He gave private lessons in Berlin. Returning to the United States, he became in 1907 the teacher of music at the Hackley School for Boys at Tarrytown, and he gave private lessons in New York.

The list of his compositions includes: "The Kairn of Koridwen," a dance-drama for five wind instruments, celesta, harp, and pianoforte (Neighborhood Playhouse, New York, 1917); "Schojo" Japanese mime-play (performed by Michio Itow at A. Bolm's Ballet Intime, Booth Theatre, New York, 1917); Poem for flute and orchestra (New York Symphony Society, November 16, 1919—Georges Barrère, flutist); a set of orchestral pieces rearranged from pianoforte works (announced for performance this season by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra); a set of Japanese folk-songs harmonized and provided with an accompaniment for miniature orchestra (announced for performance in New York this season); Three Songs for soprano and orchestra, Op. 11 (Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra with Marcia Van Dresser, March 24, 1919); Two Pieces for string quartet (played by the Flonzaley Quartet, season of 1918-19); sonata for pianoforte, Three Tone Images, for voice and pianoforte, Op. 3; Two Rondels for voice and pianoforte, Op. 4; Three Tone Pictures for pianoforte, Op. 5; Three Fantasy Pieces for pianoforte, Op. 6; Roman Sketches for pianoforte, Op. 7; Three Songs, Op. 9; Five Poems of Ancient China and Japan, for voice and pianoforte, Op. 10.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

EIGHTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 19, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, AT 8 P. M.

BALAKIREFF,

SYMPHONIC POEM for Orchestra, "Thamar"
(after a Poem by Michail Lermontoff)

MACDOWELL,

CONCERTO No. 2, in D minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 23
I. Larghetto calmato
II. Presto giocoso
III. Largo; Molto allegro

SCHMITT,

SUITE for Orchestra, "The Tragedy of Salome;"
(after a Poem by Robert d'Humières)

Soloist:

LEO ORNSTEIN

Knabe Pianoforte used

Leo Ornstein, Pianist.

EIGHTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Balakireff, MacDowell and Schmitt Form Program

PLAYERS GIVE BRILLIANT MATINEE

Herald Dec. 20/19
By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 8th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Balakireff, Symphonic Poem "Thamar"; MacDowell, Concerto No. 2, D minor, for piano (Leo Ornstein, pianist); Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome," suite for orchestra.

Two noble dames, Salome and Thamar, in one afternoon! If Messalina and Catherine of Russia had also been portrayed in music, our joy would have been full. No doubt, the poets, novelists, painters, musicians have done Salome a grievous wrong. She was probably a slip of a girl, and her dance not so sensuous as those observed by unprejudiced spectators at balls patronized by "our best people." It is true she came to a sad ending, for she was married twice, had three sons by her second husband, and no doubt died highly respected.

Balakireff's music seems more picturesque and finely contrived when it is used for the superably barbaric Russian ballet than when it is heard in a concert hall. The spectator, engrossed by the sensual and tragic doings on the theatre stage, does not then notice the vain repetitions, weak measures of transitions, the fatiguing tossing of a theme or a fragment of a theme from one solo instrument to another—an annoying trick of Tschaiikowsky's, by the way. These are clearly revealed when the same spectator sits in an orthodox concert hall. Yet when all is said in objection, this "Thamar" as a symphonic poem, written for the concert stage and without any thought of a ballet, is a fascinating work. Perhaps the orgy is the weakest part of it; it surely is inferior to the sections depicting the rushing waters of the Terek and the arrival of the ill-fated guest; far inferior to the magnificent close. Yes, this little man Balakireff, whose appearance seemed mean to Turgeneff, who was as bigoted religiously and as superstitious as Louis XI, had imagination. There was a rich vein of poetry in his soul. Perhaps Queen Tamara haunted him, as visions of fair women disturbed the pious slumbers of St. Anthony in the desert.

The question came up twice yesterday: Does music used for a ballet lose irreparably when it is transferred to the concert hall? Schmitt's "Salome" was written for a mute drama, for pantomime and dancing; Balakireff's "Thamar" was composed as a concert piece; yet we remember the latter as ballet music, and Schmitt's music, ingenious and fantastical as it is, does not come up to d'Humiére's prose poem which it portrays in tones.

The Prelude, the "Dance of Pearls" and "The Enchantments of the Sea," are singularly impressive; after them the thunder and lightning business, Mount Nebo vomiting flames and the "infernal frenzy" of Salome left us cold; without a touch of goose flesh, without the disarrangement of a hair. We were conscious of a mighty pothor on the stage. Perhaps 50 years from now, or even 25, this music will shake the souls of hearers, when the tragedy is enacted as a film-drama high up above the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux and the players, after a most successful trip of a fortnight, gave a remarkable performance of the two compositions, a performance remarkable as a technical display, supremely euphonious, wonderfully elastic. The city may well be proud of this orchestra as it exists today; the city may well be proud of Mr. Monteux. And yet the audience yesterday was sluggish, almost churlish in appreciation of an uncommonly brilliant concert.

This audience, however, recalled Mr. Ornstein several times. He well deserved the tribute, for he played the concerto in a masterly manner. Especially delightful was his reading of the tricky Scherzo, designed originally as material for a symphonic poem, "Beatrice and Benedick." The concerto is a dazzling virtuoso piece. Mr. Joseffy once told us he considered MacDowell's first concerto more individual. Many would have been glad to write the second.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor; Handel, Concerto for organ and orchestra, F major, No. 4 op. 4 (Joseph Bonnet, organist); Liszt, "The Dance in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz).

EXCITING PIECES BY SYMPHONY

"Thamar" and "Tragedy of Salome"—

Ornstein, Soloist

Post — Dec. 20/19

BY OLIN DOWNES

Balakireff's "Thamar," tone poem for orchestra, is inspired by the Russian legend of the Queen, as sinister as she is seductive, who, in her castle which towers over a wild gorge in the Caucasus, lures unwary wanderers to a night of revelry and death. In the morning the waters of the River Terek, "mad with fright," carry away a lifeless body. The Queen, "cruel, cunning, yet divine," prepares to receive her next victim. This tone poem, and other fascinating music, was played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The performance was masterly. The music is irresistible in its barbaric splendor.

EARLY "NEO-RUSSIAN"

This tone poem, "Thamar," while one of the early products of the then "Neo-Russian" school of the '50s and '60s, while surpassed in workmanship, in perfection of form, by later compositions such as the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is the Alpha and Omega of a certain wonderful orientalism which the later-day Russians developed with such picturesqueness and suggestive power.

There are the superb opening pages which portrays the flowing river—pages in which the note of what is strange, fateful, preordained, is struck. There are the maddening dances, through the mazes of which, as one might say, the theme of Thamar herself is heard. There are striking musical metamorphoses of these motives—metamorphoses which anticipate what later Russians than Balakireff were to do with this system of the transformation of motives and melodies, which the Russians had learned Berlioz and Liszt. At the last there is heard again, in a passage which will never grow old, the farewell of Thamar to her victim, and the music of many waters.

Actually Heard First Time

Why all this about a work which has been played before, though at too rare intervals, at these Symphony concerts? Because the music was actually heard for the first time yesterday. Dr. Muck never understood it. Mr. Monteux's reading was a revelation of the colors in the score, a display of supreme musicianship in the choice of tempi, and an accomplishment of temperament and imagination which overcame the reserve of the coolest and most critical listeners.

At last there was the voice of fate in the introduction, as well as the most beautiful and ingenious depiction of the flowing river; at last the dances were impolite and abandoned, furiously sensual in the oriental manner, until at a climax, the orchestra was as a pack of howling beasts; at last the majesty and the fatalism of the conclusion was felt. This is not to say that "Thamar" is a composition wholly without faults. Its faults are principally those of form. There are too many good ideas, without sufficient economy of presentation. There is excess of excitement and sensation. This is typical, perhaps, of the imagination of the Slav whose hide you scratch only to find that directly underneath he is an Oriental. With all this, "Thamar" is intoxicating music, full of fire, color, imagination, genius.

Leo Ornstein's Playing

Then Leo Ornstein, who used to play "Wild Men's Dances," which he had himself composed, and look like a wild man as he played them, gave a very admirable performance of MacDowell's D minor piano concerto. It was as sane a performance—though also highly imaginative—as one would wish to hear. It had proportion, balance, repose, as counter elements to the virtuosity and individuality which this young man of 24 had long before he had reached his 24th year. Mr. Ornstein was modest in demeanor, assured in musical intention, and so much the greater a musician than he had ever appeared before.

It was a great pleasure to listen to him, and to MacDowell's poetic and legendary music. It was a pleasure to applaud an unusual talent which appears to be achieving more and more normal development and thus coming into its own. Mr. Ornstein, by his self-restraint in performance, his careful balance with the orchestra, his elimination of the pettily personal equation, gained a notably and richly deserved triumph.

Schmidt's "Tragedy of Salome"

Finally came the music to "The Tragedy of Salome," for orchestra, after a poem by Robert d'Humiers, by Florent Schmidt, who, sadly enough, was killed while fighting for France in 1915. This music was originally written for "a mute drama in two acts and seven scenes" by Robert d'Humiers, and thus performed at the Theatre des Arts, Paris, Nov. 9, 1907. Later it was arranged as an orchestral suite in two movements, and also as a ballet. The audience was in doubt yesterday as to when it should leave the hall, since the programme did not state that the orchestra was going to play the suite in two movements, and there are seven divisions of the scenes described by d'Humiers. Again Mr. Monteux accomplished wonders with the music. And what strange music it is!

Honor to the great who died for France. Nevertheless, we are now talking of music. Candor compels the acknowledgment that this music is to us as brilliantly written as it is both cerebral and morbid in its character. We do not often employ the latter adjective. Strauss' much discussed music to "Salome" does not seem morbid, but on the contrary, very effective and expressive music to a drama which one may or may not like or approve. But there is a flavor of that which is a little mad and perverse in this score of Schmidt. It could not be otherwise when a composer who set out to write music for the poem of d'Humiers, which is as a feverish, splendid, troubled dream, in which nature itself takes on strange shapes and terrible images, "old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion," and there are lightnings and cataclysms as the evil virgin dances as if "swept about by an infernal frenzy."

It is a splendid score, and one can easily see how exciting it would be with the stage spectacle. It is dramatic music, while the workmanship is that of musical decadence. One is fascinated by this hard-headed, morbid music which one does not like, and this music, which one does not like, one is unable to forget.

MUSIC

Dec. 20/19
Musical Affairs in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Balakireff's "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salomé"—works theatrical in character, if not written primarily for the theater—formed the greater part of the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 19. Between them Leo Ornstein played MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto. Between "Thamar," first performed in 1883-84, and "The Tragedy of Salomé," first performed in 1911, there is not so great a difference in style and method of composition as might be supposed from the difference of 27 years in the dates of their first performances. Of course Schmitt, writing since great improvements in the technic and mechanism of orchestral instruments have been made, is able to evoke many strange and novel orchestral tints impossible to the earlier Balakireff, restricted to the more limited orchestral resources of his day. Yet we find in both works the same theatrical emotionalism, the same exaggerations, the same gorgeous, intense coloring; and who will say that after all Balakireff with his simpler harmonic and melodic scheme does not succeed in making a more direct and vivid appeal to the imagination than Schmitt with all his complexity? The close proximity of these two works on the same program could not fail to make each lose a part of its complete effectiveness.

MacDowell's familiar concerto did not prove a sufficient relief. Mr. Ornstein played his part of the concerto without distinction. The scherzo was taken at so rapid a pace that its outlines were blurred and its rhythm indistinct. The more romantic portions of the first and last movements were played coldly—the brilliant passages with precision and accuracy. The orchestra played with more than its accustomed virtuosity in the "Tragedy of Salomé," and Mr. Monteux, in evident sympathy with the music, conducted with warmth and vigor.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A GLANCE UPON MR. MONTEUX'S PROGRAMMES

Interesting Always, They Also Disclose Two Singularities — Balakirev's Tone-Poem, "Thamar," as Never Before to Bostonian Ears — The Contradictory Matter and Manner of Schmitt's "Salome"—Mr. Ornstein as Master of Touch and Tone with the Piano

SINCE Mr. Fiedler's dimming day no conductor at the Symphony Concerts has assembled such interesting programmes as, thus far, has Mr. Monteux. He shuns the hackneyed pieces that it is conventional to label "thrice-familiar" and polite to salute as "ever-beautiful." He re-discovers and restores to the active repertory numbers long and inconsiderately overlooked. He wanders interestingly into by-paths of the classics, humanly perceiving that a diet of masterpieces may sometimes cloy. He is open-minded toward new music and usually happy in his choices from it. He holds the balance relatively even between ancient, modern and ultra-modern items, tipping it no more than the curious and interested, the young and the ardent, desire toward the composers of a recent or a present day. Catholic by inclination and practice, he chooses impartially among the French, the Germans, the Russian, the Szechs and the Americans, in good time, doubtless, minded to add the young Italians to them. Not one of his first ten programmes—for the course of the tenth is already known—has run in a rut; not one has been overlaid; not one has failed to interest and stimulate most of his hearers.

So far, however, Mr. Monteux's programme-making has disclosed two singularities. For some reason, not easy to detect or surmise, he seems to shun overtures. Through ten pairs of concerts, he has played but one—Beethoven's to the pageant-play of "King Stephen"—unless there be also included the overture that was one of the chosen numbers from Beethoven's ballet of "Prometheus." Like most conductors schooled in the theatre and with a keen sense of effect upon their hearers, Mr. Monteux likes to end a concert with a highly colored, sharply rhythmical music. Many an overture might serve this purpose; yet but once, in "King Stephen," has he chosen such a piece. Few have noticed this singularity; still fewer, probably, have regretted it.

Through the long days of Dr. Muck even into the brief days of Mr. Rabaud, classic and semi-classic overtures were repeated to excess at the Symphony Concerts, often for no other reason than convenience to the conductor in his programme-making. Mr. Monteux is too scrupulous, too ambitious, so to take the easiest way; while he is wise to put by these over-played overtures in relief alike to orchestra and to audience. The one played them often in routine; the other heard them mechanically.

The second singularity of the conductor's programmes is his inclination toward music of the dance. In eight pairs of concerts, he has played six such pieces; at a ninth he will add to them Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"; at a tenth, Debussy's little ballet of "Jeux." Leader for some years of the orchestra of Mr. Diaghilev's ballet, leader, thereafter, of the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Monteux succeeds well with such music, often visualizes it to himself and upon his hearers, displays no more than a natural fondness for it. Already, however, a few are beginning to demur to what they are pleased to call an excess of "dance-pieces" upon the conductor's lists; while, yesterday, in particular, they found serviceable text in a programme that, outside the pianist's concerto, traversed only Balakirev's tone-poem of "Thamar" and Schmitt's Suite from his mimodrama, "Salome's Tragedy," both intrinsically music to dance-rhythms. These mild grumblers forget, however, that nearly all this music of the dance is well-reputed and has proved interesting in performance; while one example of it—the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "The Fire-Bird" passes for a masterpiece of our time.

Doubtless, Balakirev worked at "Thamar" through the seventies without a surmise that thirty-odd years afterward other Russians would be dancing and miming to his symphonic poem in the hot reds of Bakst's setting of a topless tower. As little may the composer have anticipated that French, English, American audiences would some day be listening to his music and, least of all, that many a hearer's background for it would be the visualized action of Mr. Diaghilev's and Mr. Fokine's stage. Even so by far the larger part of "Thamar," as symphonic poem, is music in dance-rhythms—the music of feast and fête to which the Caucasian queen—cruel, lustful, perverted—bids her way-faring and fated lovers of a night. These dances, sharp with oriental rhythms, pungent with oriental harmonies, tingling with oriental iterations, keenly imagined, vividly accomplished, gave shape and color to the music of revelling, penetrate the hearer with illusion, are graphic background alike to the erotic or the fateful measures that once and again still and over-pass them. The tone-poem is not least music of sharply invoking and highly delineative imagination, when it stirs into being as out of mysterious mists, reiterates the fume and rumble of the wild river, uprears Thamar's sombre abode, confused though that be, inevitably, inextricably, with Bakst's red tower unforgettable. Balakirev diminishes not a whit as composer of imagination in the final periods of the doom of the slain lovers, of the re-awakening of Thamar's trapping desires, of the ceaseless obligato of the rushing stream.

Yet intrinsically both the prelude and postlude are mimodrama expressed in tones, while all between is mimodrama expressed in the dance. As such a music, Mr. Monteux played the piece, as though background, action, drama and all within of passion and of fate were unrolling themselves upon an imaginary but visioned stage, as though he would lift the curtain likewise to his hearers. Seldom in two months of Symphony Concerts has he seemed so sensitive to musical line, alert and supple to rhythm, apt in harmonic and instrumental color, just and fine of ear, at once both clear and forceful. What he was fain to do with the inferior orchestra of the Russian Ballet, he could now accomplish with the superior orchestra ready to his hand, ear and imagination. Never before has Balakirev's music sounded with such illusion upon Bostonian ears. The Higginsonian arbiter of the quality of the concerts might well be content with such a performance.

Evidently Schmitt's music of "Salome's Tragedy" baffled the audience. Not in years has a piece at the Symphony Concerts, at beginning, middle or end of a programme, been so meagrely applauded. Until, indeed Mr. Monteux left his place, many a listener hardly knew whether the mimodrama was, or was not, concluded. A few hands clapped perfunctorily, then persistently, until they had recalled the conductor—slender reward for the devoted and fruitful pains he had spent upon the performance, almost supercilious negation of his obvious admiration for the music. Yet, like so many of Schmitt's pieces, as Boston has heard them, this Suite of the theatre somehow failed to come completely off. On frequent occasions in the past, shortcomings of performance have obviously brought such fate upon him. It is still possible to recall good old Dr. Mees and the groping, thin-voiced self-conscious choir of The Cecilia messing timidly about in the barbaric intensities of Schmitt's music, to the forty-sixth Psalm of Israel's fierce and pagan triumph. Fresher still in memory is le bonhomme Rabaud plodding dutifully, laboriously, through the "Open-Air" pieces of last spring. Nor are sundry performances in this town of the ironic "Viennese Rhapsody" or of the moody and salient "Songs for Four Voices" to be remembered for revelation and edification. No; only with this Suite from "Salome's Tragedy" has Schmitt come to true, revealing and enhancing voice in our concert-rooms. Six years ago Dr. Muck was eloquent with it yesterday, Mr. Monteux kept pace with him. Yet again only confused impression and clouded illusion remained.

Possibly there is clew to this double outcome in the two-fold Schmitt that seems to play through much of his music as hereabouts we have come to know it. There is a Schmitt who develops motives with fertility into significance, who directs rhythm, modulation, pace, emphasis to illusory ends who arrests the ear and stirs the imagination with his play of harmonies—a Schmitt who uses all these means to compass atmosphere and suggestion, frequently to gain power, occasionally to summon beauty. This Schmitt wrote more than half of the music to "Salome's Tragedy"—music that evokes the ominous scene by the Dead Sea the baleful lights and winds, the menacing blackness of the stifling night. Music, again, that flutters and flickers with the jewels that drop from the hand of Herodias or that gleams with the white young flesh of Salome glimpsed athwart the dark. Music, once more, that pierces with the insidious longings the perverse fascinations of the princess; music that the lusts of Herod may as quickly sear. By so much this "Tragedy of Salome" is the most artful, the most moving music yet borne hither from the composer's hand.

In contrast another Schmitt, almost seems to have written the final diversions of the mimodrama, when once the balefully echoing, chanting voices of old sins have died across the Dead Sea, when storms of the skies and of the passions break upon the terrace, when Salome dances the dance of the lightnings and of fear. Then does the music become rude-voiced, coarse-fibred, crass, strident, a sound and fury signifying little but the impotence of the composer to find and measure his means, to achieve his ends. Din is seldom illusion, no matter how twenty conventional resources of music may swell it; and din and little else are many a page toward the end of "Salome's Tragedy." Where mimodrama and music should rise highest in horrific suggestion, they fall lowest. The impotence of this end blots out the puissance of the beginning. But was not Salome ever a riddle when once the nineteenth century from Heine to Wilde had called into exotic, erotic, perverted and fantasmal being the child-like daughter of Herodias whom the Evangelists almost ignored, but whose rep'acant—pure or impure work of literary and pictorial imagination—the fond fanatics solemnly and sillily believe to be Biblical!

142

Between the animated exercises of these two interesting ladies and the composers who so signally served them, Mr. Ornstein, new but deserving comer to the Symphony Concerts, played the piano part in the second of MacDowell's youthful and displayful Concertos. He played it first of all, as rare master of touch and tone. Hardly Mr. Hoffman himself can summon a brighter, a more pellucid beauty into the voice of the piano than Mr. Ornstein shed upon the lighter measures. As near to Mr. Hoffman is he in the shadowed beauty that he outpoured, but also chastened, upon the darker, slower-paced, more songful periods. Appropriate loveliness of tone, at once so limpid, edgeless, freely moving, delicately or deeply textured, might, with the piano, hardly further go. Akin were Mr. Ornstein's light fleetness, like to a motion of the air; his darts of rhythm in the intermediate rondo, flashing like quick, keen rays through the music; the rounded voice of his song, when MacDowell condescended to it in a music, designed for brilliance and effect; the cumulating pace, propulsive and plastic, that he lent to the final movement.

If intent listening and eager applause were tokens of understanding and appreciation, the audience knew that it was hearing a pianist who is signal and sensitive master of tone, who can transfigure into bright beauty, into lightly running power the resources of the piano, who can compass these things not only with ease and elegance but with a nervous and imparting grace of the imagination. In spite of symmetry of outline, diversity of contents and supple progress from voice to voice and mood to mood, this Concerto in D minor now sounds only as a slender-bodied, charmingly fancied, brightly adorned music. There is no more for pianist to do than play it with Mr. Ornstein's just understanding, intuitive sympathy and guiding taste and then summon Mr. Ornstein's beauties and felicities of touch and tone, rhythm and modulation—if he can.

H. T. PARKER

SCHMITT'S "SALOME"

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Mimodrama That the Music Originally Clothcd and Enforced—The Russians' Perversion of It—Playwright and Composer's "Argument"—Oriental, Barbaric, Sensual

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the Suite drawn by Florent Schmitt from his music to Robert d'Humièr's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome." Six years ago Dr. Muck set the piece on the programme of two Symphony Concerts, probably for the first times in the United States. He did not repeat it; Mr. Rabaud, of course, ignored it; it was hard to grasp and difficult to recall; therefore it now comes virtually as a new piece to the public of Symphony Hall. Unlike many a living Parisian composer, Schmitt has been slow to make way with American hearers. Once and again the dutiful conductor set forth one or another of his orchestral pieces, which are not few. For half an hour the audience hears Schmitt; then for half a year and more it forgets him. Yet he has clear, individual profile. "He traverses French music today," writes Jean-Aubry in his book about it, "like a wild boar from the Vosges"—Schmitt was born in Lorraine—with the healthy robustness of a sensitive and crabbed nature, disdaining all coteries, dogmas and ready-made religions or organized enthusiasms. . . . He submits to a strong discipline, but desires to accept it from none but himself, and therefore mingles, at his convenience, his recent predilections with the lessons of the past. He is a singular mixture of a passion for independence and an innate respect for rules. His choice tends wholly towards freedom, one might almost say towards anarchy; and his nature inclines him towards submission to principles. Florent Schmitt's originality lies in this rugged conflict fought with ardor. . . . His "Tragedy of Salome," in conception and in realization is a manifestation of his complex art and of all that it contains: once of allurements and of violence, of ruggedness and refinement, of solidity and of rich color."

At the Hands of the Russians

As mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome" has been represented in Paris at the Théâtre des Arts in 1907, when the actor whom we now know as Lou-Tellegen mimed, as Lou van Tel, the part of the Baptist; at the Châtelet in 1912 by the singular and sophisticated Miss Thouhanna and at the Champs-Élysées in 1913 by Mr. Diaghilev's ballet with Miss Karsavina as Salome. As recently as last winter it was revived at the Opéra with the celebrated Ida Rubinstein as the interesting daughter of Herodias. She did not fare well in the part. As produced by Mr. Diaghilev's company, in the days when various bold young Russians rather than the more discreet Fokine determined its ways, Schmitt's mimodrama baffled many a beholder. In Symphony Hall we shall hear his music but see neither the action embroidered upon it nor the settings that framed it. Here, then, is an account of a performance in Paris in the summer of 1913:

Soudelkine's act-drop is beyond comprehension. So also is the scene upon which it rises—a platform enclosed by giant foliage of formal design. Much exuberance is suggested, but exuberance of what is not so clear. In the middle of the stage is a tall column, upon the top of which an object, presumably the Baptist's head, is dimly seen. Behind stands a curious pyramidal staircase. Eight negro slaves are discovered grouped about the column and its burden. Their woolly pates are white, white ostrich plumes are girt about their middles, and round their ankles are clasped what looks suspiciously like white spats. The lime-light streaming on their naked bodies imparts a greenish tinge to the brown flesh, and gives them quite as nasty an appearance as one supposes the designers intended.

To strident music which one feels sure must be expressive of hectic passion and horror, the green and white negroes posture and run about the stage. Their antics are engaging and expressive of whatever the spectator chooses to think. They are joined presently by four executioners, who would do credit to any professional dreamer of nightmares. Like the negroes, these also have spats on their bare legs. They wear very little else, but carry large swords which obviously are meant for dark and bloody deeds. They are tall and lank, grim, sinister. In a business-like manner they divest themselves of the weapons of their office, and eclipse the efforts of the negroes in the game of Here-We-Go-Round-The-Baptist's-Head.

The music now, with relentless importunity, insists upon an impending climax. Negroes and executioners fall beautifully into place, a portion of the backcloth drops swiftly, and Salome is seen standing on the top of the staircase before a dim background of blue and mysterious starlit depth. She is shrouded in the voluminous folds of an immense cloak, and at first sight might be taken, as a witty observer remarked, for Mrs. Grundy come to put a stop to the proceedings. The music now breathes more easily, and Salome slowly comes down the staircase. The robe with which she is covered has an immense train—black with glittering embroidery of gold. As she descends the steps the train drags magnificently behind her. One suffers an uncomfortable anxiety lest it should topple down before its time and sweep its hapless wearer off her feet. But Soudelkine and Romanov have seen to this, and it is not until Salome has reached the stage, and is already advancing across it, that the enormous garment, with proper effect, comes flashingly tumbling after. Salome, with her grotesque retinue circles in solemn procession round the central column, and the train makes the most of its opportunities. Then the negroes leap forward, fastenings are loosened and as the robe falls into her attendants' outstretched arms, Salome steps forward for the dance.

Regard Beardsley's drawings as fashion plates, and the reader will arrive at a very fair idea of Karsavina's appearance as Salome. Her costume is exiguous—disclosing one thigh but not the other; her legs and arms are bare, with a blood-red heart and other devices stencilled on them. A high head-dress surmounts the tiny face of one of Beardsley's women, with blue smudges for eyes and wee vermilion lips. Of Karsavina's dance it is quite impossible to write with any detail. It is devised in the same pseudo-macabre spirit as the rest of the ballet, and is more remarkable as a feat of acrobatic agility and physical endurance than as an artistic performance. One is told that the dance is "at first frantic and insane; then more parod and sorrowful, more remote and ecstatic. It is the expression and avowal of her sensual torment and of her atonement through the very misery of her unsuageable desire." Maybe it is all that; perhaps something more, perhaps a great deal less. For myself, I should have been interested to learn at what point the insanity died down and pride and sorrow took its place. Of ecstasy I could find no real suggestion, though the counterfeit was plausible; and the only remoteness was when the dance unexpectedly ended and the curtain went down.

As Originally Intended

All this was rather a Russian overlay and decoration of the play of d'Humières and the music of Schmitt than the course of the one and the suggestion of the other. What playwright and composer sought to set before the imagination of an audience best appears in their own "argument." Even so, it is lurid enough:

A terrace of Herod's Palace, overlooking the Dead Sea. The mountains of Moab shut in the horizon, rose-colored and russet-hued, dominated by the bulk of Mount Nebo, on which Moses, at the threshold of the Promised Land, saluted Canaan before dying. The sun is sinking. John slowly walks across the terrace and disappears.

Torches light the stage. Cloths and jewels which overflow from a precious coffer sparkle under the glare. Herodias, deep in thought, plunges her hands into the mass, raises on high the necklaces and the veils spangled with gold. Salome, as one fascinated, appears, bends over the chest, adorns herself, and with a childish joy outlines her first dance.

144

Salome has disappeared. Herod, enveloped by the darkness, is lost in thoughts of lust and fear, while the watchful Herodias spies him. Then on the cursed sea mysterious lights flicker and seem to arise from the depths. The buildings of the engulfed Five Cities are dimly revealed beneath the waves. One would say that old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion. It is like a projection on a magic looking-glass of the drama that is playing in the brains of the couple seated there and silent in the night. The music comments on the demoniacal phantasmagoria.

Snatches of ancient orgiac ditties, choked by the rain of bitument and ashes on the terraces of Sodom and Gomorrah, are vaguely breathed. Dance measures, the shivering of stifled cymbals, the clapping of hands, sighs, and laughter that spreads and dies away. Then a voice arises from the abyss.

Herod is overcome. He hearkens. Mists now come up from the sea, enlaced figures assume a shape and mount from the depths, a living cloud from which, as brought forth by the dim dream and the ancient sin, Salome suddenly springs up, irresistible. Far off the thunder rolls. Salome begins to dance. Herod starts to his feet, and Total darkness covers the stage, and the rest of the drama is seen imperfectly by flashes of lightning. There is the lascivious dance, Herod's pursuit, the amorous flight, Salome seized, her veils plucked off by the Tetrarch's hand. For a moment she is nude, but John suddenly appears, steps forward, and covers her with the anchorite's cloak. The furious gesture of Herod is quickly interpreted by Herodias. Her signal delivers John over to the executioner, who leads him away, and soon reappears, holding John's head on a brazen charger.

The triumphant Salome takes the trophy and outlines a step, laden with her funereal burden. Then, as one feeling sudden uneasiness, as if the voice of the beheaded had whispered in her ear, she runs swiftly to the edge of the terrace, and hurls the charger over the battlement into the sea. And the sea turns to the color of blood, and Salome falls in a swoon, while mad terror sweeps away Herod, Herodias, and the executioners in frantic flight.

Salome comes to herself. The head of John appears, stares at her, then disappears. Salome quakes and turns away, in anguish. The head again gazes at her from another part of the stage. Salome wishes to steal away. And the heads, arising, are now everywhere. Salome, terrified, turns about to escape the bloody vision.

As she dances, the storm breaks. A furious wind envelops her. Sulphurous clouds roll about the precipice; the tempest rocks the sea. Pillars of sand rush in the desert places. The tall cypresses writhe tragically, and break in pieces with a crash. The bolt falls, and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mount Nebo vomits flame. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept about by an infernal frenzy.

Schmitt's Music

Schmitt's individuality in "Salome" consists in his ability to blend excellent thematic material (and little enough of it usually) with cogent and penetrating harmonization. The melody, often no more than a phase or two repeated over and over, is always eloquent and distinguished. The harmony taken by itself, is a symphony in its own right, continually varied, continually free and incisive, yet so held together by the logic of its individual voices that it seems inevitable. It seems not written to support the melody any more than the melody is written to decorate the harmony. Yet the two become one as though they were evolved in one and the same creative process, as doubtless they were.

In this purely musical procedure there is abundant use of all sorts of means to sensuous effect, pure chords emphasized solely for their effect on the nerves, varied tempo (there is one passage marked $3\frac{1}{2}$ -4), mysterious pauses and poetic dissonances. Yet no single effect seems to exist by itself each seems to be an evitable part of the symphonic texture. The technical means employed by the composer are of many sorts. There is one chromatic downward passage composed entirely of the chord of repeated major thirds, a device capable of more barbarous effect than any other of the modern French school. When this downward passage later becomes complicated with an upward chromatic line in the bass the effect to the ear is no better than tonal jargon.

In seeking "Oriental color" Schmitt uses the familiar device of the skip of the augmented major second. But he uses it less as a matter of routine than do most composers. Sometimes he prefers subtle harmonic tinctures in a manner somewhat recalling the earlier pieces of Debussy. Here he is equally happy and somehow equally individual. Soft, pure chords, with their delicate crossing harmonies, rest the ear while constantly stimulating the attention.

The wild dance which ends the suite is a remarkable piece of writing. It is not in the least like Strauss's dance in "Salomé," which is a marvel of polyphonic deftness. Schmitt's Salomé is an animal, and has no existence outside her senses. She dances to an insistent 3-8 rhythm, while the orchestra continually sings a scrap of barbaric melody over no less barbaric harmonies. The emotional pressure never subsides. It mounts in its frenzy, now pounding out its fury in huge repeated chords, now striking terror with a savage theme in the bass, always accenting its fierce physical motion above all its music, as though in the mere savagery of motion the Oriental animal wished to give up her soul.

ORNSTEIN SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

9 Globe — Dec. 20/19
Pianist's Performance / Is Extraordinarily Competent

Leo Ornstein, the much discussed Russian-American pianist, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony Concert. In spite of his reputed bent for ultra-modern music, he elected to play an early work of MacDowell, the Second Piano Concerto, which dates from 1885.

His performance showed extraordinary technical competence, but he was too cool and collected to convey much of the limited but genuine wistfulness and glamour in the music to his hearers. The careful artistry of MacDowell is well illustrated by his choice of thoroughly congruous themes for the several movements of this concerto. He emphasizes its essential unity by recurrence in the last movement to the material used in the first.

One wonders how many listeners could divine, even after repeated hearings, anything of the stories supposed to be told by the music of such works as Balakireff's "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome," played yesterday, if they heard them without having read a program. When danced by the Russian Ballet, both pieces are doubtless vivid and engrossing. In the concert hall they sound muddled and groping, because the themes are fragmentary and development is sacrificed to expressiveness.

The texts by Lermontoff and D'Humieres, on which they are based, appeal primarily to the visual imagination of the reader. Neither author motivates or characterizes his personages. He only tries to make you see, hear and even smell strange remote and romantic scenes.

Although it is an experimental fact that music, like poetry, makes many people see pictures, especially people without intellectual interest in music, who go to concerts primarily to bathe in sounds, psychologists also have observed that no two people ever see exactly the same pictures when listening to a given piece of music.

The appeal of the great classics, furthermore, is to the intellect and to the formal imagination of the listener. Bach and Beethoven lose, rather than gain, when danced by a ballet. Wagner's "Tristan" and Debussy's "Pelleas," the most perfect operas yet written, have music which is better able to stand alone in the concert hall than lesser works like the two heard yesterday, simply because it is at bottom far more formal. The fact that tone poems gain power in the danced versions, while absolute music suffers, seems to show that program music rests on an unintelligent confusion of the arts of poetry, drama, music and dance.

The orchestra and its leader gave competent and at times brilliant interpretations of the chosen numbers. The female chorus which assisted in one of the episodes in Schmitt's "Salome" performed a difficult task well.

This program will be repeated tonight. At the next concerts Joseph Bonnet will play Handel's Fourth Concerto for Organ. The other numbers are to be Brahms' First Symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" Waltz.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Did you ever take a Huntington-av car past Symphony Hall Friday noon in Winter and watch your fellow-passengers crane their necks to look at the chilly but cheerful crowd camping on the steps waiting for the 25-cent rush seats at the afternoon Symphony concerts?

"I wouldn't wait in line an hour with the mercury 15 above—not even to get a free box seat for next year's 'World's Series!'" a male passenger declares emphatically.

"Nor I even to be first at the biggest bargain sale ever," answered his feminine companion.

Yet if Kreisler or Melba is announced as soloist, the Symphony line begins to gather by 10 a m for a concert at 2:30. People bundle up in their warmest clothes and bring newspapers to stand on and patiently endure three hours of Winter cold on the bare stone steps of the hall until the doors open at 1:30, and another weary hour inside to hear a concert an hour and a half long.

I said they were patient. Of course it's true they grumble against the management. They want to know why you can't get a ticket of admission in advance, instead of being able to get in for a quarter only on the "pay as you enter" system.

They object because the collector at the door refuses to stop and change $10 bills while the whole line is held up. If you haven't your quarter in your hand as you go in the door you may get yanked out of the line and lose the place you nearly froze to win.

Perhaps the fatal number 505 is reached before the collector has time to attend to your case, or before you can find out which pocket you lost the precious coin out of. Then the doors are shut—and you are "out of luck." There are only 505 seats in the second balcony and no standing room is ever sold at Symphony concerts.

146

Mr. LEO ORNSTEIN, pianist and composer, was born at Kremenchug in Southern Russia on December 11, 1895. As a boy he studied music with his father, a rabbi, who had been a synagogal cantor. In 1902, recommended to the Petrograd Conservatory, he was accepted at the Kiev Imperial School of Music, Vladimir Pulchalski, director; returning home, he studied with local teachers, but in 1904 he went to the Petrograd Conservatory. He studied harmony and theory with Medemi. Talk of a pogrom drove him home, and in 1907 the family came to New York. There he was given a scholarship in the Institute of Musical Art. His pianoforte teacher was Mrs. Bertha Feiring Tapper; he studied composition with Dr. Percy Goetschius and R. H. Woodman. In 1911 he visited European cities with Mrs. Tapper. His first recital in New York was at the New Amsterdam Theatre, on March 5, 1911. He gave concerts elsewhere. In 1913 he found his "true idiom of expression" as a composer, writing his "Dwarf" Suite. In 1913 he again visited Europe. He played in Berlin and in Norway. For a while he taught in Paris. His first recital in London was on March 27, 1914. In 1915 he gave in American cities his four recitals of ultra-modern music. The list of his compositions, which have excited attention by reason of their "revolutionary" nature, is already a long one, embracing orchestral pieces, a pianoforte concerto; sonatas and smaller pieces for violin, pianoforte, violoncello, also, for flute; chamber music, choral works, many piano pieces, and songs. His piano pieces, "March Funèbre" ("Dwarf" Suite) and "À la Chinoise," orchestrated by him, were played at concerts of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra on March 7, 8, 1919. One of his latest works is a pianoforte suite, "Poems of 1917," embodying impressions of the war.

In Boston he has given these recitals:—

1911, November 9. His "Paris Street Scene at Night," Nocturne, and "In the Style of Scarlatti," with Schubert's Sonata in A minor, and pieces by Chopin and Franck.

1915, November 16. His programme included his own Improvista, Impression de la Tamise, Wild Men's Dance; Cyril Scott's sonata; pieces by Ravel, Albeniz-Korngold; his own "The Waltzers" and "The Night," attributed to the composer "Vannin."

1915, December 7. His "Deux Impressions de Notre Dame"; pieces by Korngold, Ravel, Schönberg, Albeniz, Grondahl, Scott.

1916, January 11. His "Dwarf" Suite; pieces by Franck, Scott, Schönberg, Novak, Debussy.

1916, February 9. His Sonatina; Three Burlesques, Two Preludes, "Three Masqueraders," pieces by Debussy, Bach-Busoni, Schumann, Liszt, Ravel, Albeniz, Chopin, Rubinstein.

1916, February 22. His "Impressions de Notre Dame," Wild Men's Dance; pieces by Debussy, Scriabin, Schumann, Leschetitzky, Grieg, Ravel, Albeniz, Chopin, Mendelssohn-Liszt.

1917, March 3. Recital in aid of the Bertha Tapper Club Scholarship. Music by Chopin and Ravel.

1919, November 24. Mrs. McAllister's Musical Morning. His Sonatina, and "Impression of Chinatown"; music by Chopin, Debussy, Liszt.

147

Conquer

anist

(Photograph by Apeda)

Tomorrow in His First and Deserved
ay Orchestra

146

Mr. LEO ORNSTEIN, pianist and composer, was born in chug in Southern Russia on December 11, 1895. As studied music with his father, a rabbi, who had been a cantor. In 1902, recommended to the Petrograd Conservatory, he was accepted at the Kiev Imperial School of Music by Pulchalski, director; returning home, he studied with local harmony and theory with Medemi. Talk of a pogrom at home, and in 1907 the family came to New York. He was given a scholarship in the Institute of Musical Art. His teacher was Mrs. Bertha Feiring Tapper; he studied with Dr. Percy Goetschius and R. H. Woodman. In 1909 he gave European cities with Mrs. Tapper. His first recital was at the New Amsterdam Theatre, on March 5, 1911, and at other concerts elsewhere. In 1913 he found his "true idiom" as a composer, writing his "Dwarf" Suite. In 1913 he toured Europe. He played in Berlin and in Norway. For a time he taught in Paris. His first recital in London was on March 14, 1914. In 1915 he gave in American cities his four ultra-modern music. The list of his compositions, which has excited attention by reason of their "revolutionary" character, already a long one, embracing orchestral pieces, a piano concerto; sonatas and smaller pieces for violin, pianoforte and also, for flute; chamber music, choral works, many piano songs. His piano pieces, "March Funèbre" ("Dwarf") and "A la Chinoise," orchestrated by him, were played at the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra on March 7, 1917. One of his latest works is a pianoforte suite, "Poems of 1917," impressions of the war.

In Boston he has given these recitals:—

1911, November 9. His "Paris Street Scene at Night" and "In the Style of Scarlatti," with Schubert's Sonata and pieces by Chopin and Franck.

1915, November 16. His programme included his "Vista," Impression de la Tamise, Wild Men's Dance; sonata; pieces by Ravel, Albeniz-Korngold; his own "The Night," attributed to the composer "Vannini."

1915, December 7. His "Deux Impressions de la Tamise," pieces by Korngold, Ravel, Schönberg, Albeniz, Gronow.

1916, January 11. His "Dwarf" Suite; pieces by Schönberg, Novak, Debussy.

1916, February 9. His Sonatina; Three Burlesques, "Three Masqueraders," pieces by Debussy, Bach-Busoni, Liszt, Ravel, Albeniz, Chopin, Rubinstein.

1916, February 22. His "Impressions de Notre Dame," Dance; pieces by Debussy, Scriabin, Schumann, Lescop, Ravel, Albeniz, Chopin, Mendelssohn-Liszt.

1917, March 3. Recital in aid of the Bertha Tapper Relief Ship. Music by Chopin and Ravel.

1919, November 24. Mrs. McAllister's Musical Evening. Sonatina, and "Impression of Chinatown"; music by Liszt.

147

He Stoops to Conquer

Leo Ornstein, Pianist

(Photograph by Apeda)

As He Will Be Seen — and Also Heard — Today and Tomorrow in His First and Deserved Appearances With the Symphony Orchestra

MR. ORNSTEIN JUSTIFIES HIMSELF AND A POLICY

Transl. — Dec. 22, 1919
His Promise as Pianist Fulfilled and Youth in Deserved Place at the Symphony Concerts—The Annual Christmas Rite of "The Messiah" Duly Accomplished—Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazunov's "Stenka Razin" in Prospect—Mme. Frijsh and Notable Songs from Musorgsky—Mr. Thibaud and a Rarely Played Piece

ON more scores than one, it was pleasure to see Mr. Ornstein sitting gravely at the piano on the stage of Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, and to hear the public of the Symphony Concerts applauding warmly his playing of MacDowell's Concerto in D-minor—a piece nowadays more displaying the pianist than the composer. By all means a searching and exemplary standard should determine the coming of an "assisting artist" to the Symphony Orchestra at home. The invitation should be kept, as it has long been, a signal honor, awarded only when some protégé was forced unworthily into the concerts and immediately and coldly discovered as such by a practised audience. In double fashion, however, should that standard be applied. It should measure the best of the youthful talents in our concert-rooms and the best of the matured abilities. When both have been sifted, then both should be summoned to Symphony Hall. In the final years of the Higginsonian régime, far too many of the "soloists" were "old stagers" from whom the listeners knew precisely what to expect in personality and performance. Fortunate in those days was the youngster for whom the door was set ajar. Able and interesting as he usually proved himself, it was hard not to believe that he was somebody's protégé. Wisely the new management has sought deserving youth for "soloists," as in other respects it has transfused new blood and young blood into the Symphony Concerts. Last season, for example, it called Mr. Heifetz and Mr. Levitzki; while this season it has already brought Mr. Spalding and Mr. Ornstein. To all four the audiences have returned long and loud applause. Clearly no wish have they, for the most part, that the Symphony Concerts become a "closed shop"—either on the stage or in the auditorium—for the elderly.

The pleasure of Mr. Ornstein's presence and playing ran the higher because a few years ago, "the safe and sane," who are quite as numerous as they should be in the public of Symphony Hall, counted him no more than a passing "freak." In those days, Mr. Ornstein undertook recitals of his own in Boston and divided the programmes between pieces by the ultra-moderns and pieces by himself. His Schönberg and Scott, his Ravel and Korngold were interesting to hear. So, also, however strange, were his own numbers. Mr. Ornstein was then barely out of his teens; in them he had written much music in which he had expressed mood, picture, emotion, impression, the piano, himself, vehemently, outlandishly, extravagantly, but always sincerely, and, as some of us chose to believe, often with imagination, range and individuality, and never with the prudence and the predilections of mediocrity. Moreover, the quality of Mr. Ornstein's ultra-moderns and his own quality as composer were one thing, while the merit and the promise of his playing were quite another. Few who heard him in Boston in the winter of 1915-16, if they had open ears to hear and open minds to judge, could have doubted that he was a pianist even then in rare command of touch and tone, versed in his instrument, sensitive and imaginative with it, as responsive and resourceful with the music in hand. In four short years, he has ripened and deepened his finer instincts, traits, abilities. It was a distinguished pianist in many an attribute that the audience of Friday and Saturday heard and applauded. Mr. Ornstein might well have waved away the nervousness that plainly beset him. For in the ears of all who heard, his promise stood unmistakably fulfilled.

A FEAT FROM MR. MONTEUX IN CAMBRIDGE

Transl. — Dec. 19, 1919
Two Fragments of "Tristan" in Thrilling Performance by Conductor and Orchestra Both — A Gentle Pianist and His Gentle Concerto—Miss Crosby Sings Interesting Songs—A New Symphony from Mr. Converse—Mme. Frijsh in January

ADMITTEDLY the monthly concerts in Cambridge of the Symphony Orchestra are a part of its routine-work; while outside the numbers chosen by the "assisting artists," the programmes usually traverse pieces already heard or soon to be heard in Boston.

Occasionally, however—the "soloists" again aside—something befalls in Sanders Theatre which has not come to pass in Symphony Hall and which may never occur there. Quite unexpectedly, such happening signalized the Symphony Concert of last evening—the third in the current series—on the further side of the Charles. The final item upon Mr. Monteux's list was the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Tristan" to which was joined, as often, the arrangement for orchestra of Isolde's last speech—in the sunset, above her dead lover, in the final clearing of her racked heart and confused world. The conductor had included both pieces in the recent concert in Boston for the Pension Fund of the band and had succeeded but measurably with them. Through the journey of the last fortnight southward and westward he set them on various programmes. The outcome of these repetitions and, doubtless, of a swift flair of the moment in both leader and orchestra, was a more impassioned and impressive performance of both Prelude and Closing Scene than Bostonian ears have heard since the relatively distant days of Mahler and Toscanini in the opera house. For Dr. Muck, it will be readily recalled, was less eloquent with music from "Tristan" than with any other Wagnerian fragment.

The orchestra had hardly sounded the first measures of the Prelude—Isolde's soliloquy of love and fate in the first act—before it was clear that the conductor and his forces were on their mettle. The declamation of the violoncellos might have been the expressive tones of Miss Ternina or Mme. Fremstad. The succeeding nervous suspense before the Prelude turns into music of the desire that is stronger than death or destiny, tingled upon ear and emotions as Mr. Monteux and the wind-choir gave it voice. The transition itself missed no whit of tragic accent. Through the music of desire mounted and mounted the unsated passion, ever renewed, the twined voices of the lovers. Only a little, in rare instants of excess of zeal, did Mr. Monteux blur a strand, while not once did he rein his brass-choir too freely. Since Mr. Toscanini's day the music has not moved in such beauty, thrill, illusion, holding the senses rapt. It fell away and Mr. Monteux passed to Isolde's apostrophe. He missed not one of the tragic voices that it weaves out of the opera into a final web of tonal passion and splendor. At every turn the orchestra, individually and choir by choir, caught his eloquence. The music rose, expanded as in Mahler's radiant intensities; the climax, so hollow at the concert for the Pension Fund, was full-throated to the last inner voice; the end paled into peace. After all, Mr. Monteux can do his feats; has his moments when he is above himself. For near twenty of them he and the orchestra had held their hearers, emotionally, in the hollow of their hands. Not German music, in spite of the American Legion, but genius-music, universal, possibly everlasting.

The concert began with Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony likewise garnered from the programme for the Pension Fund and the recent journeyings. Mr. Monteux has no mind to the music as Slav melodrama, according to the voice of most Russian conductors. No more can he give it the tragic accent which somehow Mr. Nikisch used to impart. Soundly and roundly, obviously and straightforwardly, the Parisian plays it and leaves the rest to the inventor of the squeezed melody of the first movement, the clipped and reluctant waltz of the second, the exuberant quickstep of the third, the desolation of the fourth. And listening ears and answering minds thought—what they thought; judged each according to themselves. It is the very newest fashion to call this tonal self-torture, this tonal self-revelation, this intrinsically personal music of mingled passion and hysteria, "Bolshevistic," though Chaikovsky set it to music-paper twenty-five years ago when the Tsars and "Holy Russia" seemed nearly as unshakable as the wintry stars. So may frightened minds go addled. It is a less recent fashion to call the symphony stale, overrated, outmoded. Praised and played to excess it was in the stirred and unquestioning nineties, when it was the newest, the best-liked of contemporary symphonies. Outmoded it may be, but less than many another piece of Chaikovsky in these days of subtler, sharper ways with tones. Possibly an older verdict is the sanest: The symphony is music of Chaikovsky's opened heart; and its passion of self-revelation is its salvation. The Russian lays bare in tones the very entrails of his spirit. We Anglo-Saxons, as curious a race in our way as the Russians in theirs, find the process exciting in the concert-room.

Between Chaikovsky and Wagner—uneasy, perilous place—stood Mr. George Frederick Boyle of Baltimore, pianist and composer, in a Concerto in D minor heard for the first time in this vicinity. It is a concise, compact, neatly made, wholly unpretentious music. It "exposes" certain motives, as the analysts like to say; it "deals with them"—to quote again the patois of programme-books—in mildly interesting fashion. Mr. Boyle is minded to a gentle harmonic coloring, flowing measures, simple euphonies. Smoothly he coordinates piano and orchestra; wisely he eschews both the rhapsodic and the displayful veins. As composer, as pianist, his hand is light, his touch crisp. Not too deep or exacting are his moods; everywhere he writes a transparent, unemphatic, courteous, almost smiling, music. Like the pianist in and out of Cambridge, it comes, it goes in a polite thirty minutes. H. T. P.

9-1 15

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

NINTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, AT 8 P.M.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68

- I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
 - II. Andante sostenuto
 - III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
 - IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio
-

HANDEL,

CONCERTO for Organ No. 4, in F major, op. 4

- I. Allegro
 - II. Andante
 - III. Adagio; Allegro
-

LISZT.

SECOND EPISODE from Lenau's "Faust".
The Dance in the Village Tavern. (Mephisto Waltz)

Soloist:

JOSEPH BONNET

Joseph Bonnet, Organist

SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS IS PLAYED

'Mephisto' Waltz and Concerto Also on Programme

Post

Dec. 27/19

BY OLIN DOWNES

The heroic symphony of Brahms in C minor opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Joseph Bonnet played the organ in the performance of a Handel concerto in F major for organ and orchestra. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz brought the end of the concert.

WORK A CLASSIC

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the Brahms symphony showed again what a serious and ardent student of classic masterpieces he is, and the Brahms of the C minor symphony is certainly a classic today, romantic as are many pages of this extraordinary work.

A work so extraordinary in its dramatic outbursts, its frequent passages of nobly lyrical feeling, that one wonders what this first symphony would have turned into had Brahms been just a little less reverential in his attitude toward the orchestra of Beethoven and the virtue of symphonic form. In the first place the music, no matter how sympathetic one feels toward it, seems to cry out for richer and more telling instrumentation.

Then as to form: If only there were not so conscious a girding of the loins

There will be no Public Rehearsal and in the finale and so lofty an attitude of goodness in the slow movement. We prefer to this movement the slow movement of the second symphony. It is as deep, as reflective, as Brahmsish as anyone could wish, but it is profoundly and intrinsically Brahms, whereas the slow movement of this first symphony appears to us as Brahms rather deliberately donning the toga of Beethoven. It also appears as if Brahms in place of a scherzo which could be grim, domineering, but lively in pace, was afraid that if in this gray and heroic work he indulged in a scherzo he might by some chance laugh. Perhaps he had in mind a Boston audience when he wrote the movement, for he does not laugh. He goes walking along through the country with a dignified demeanor and an autumnal smile. If there were a little less material in the finale, if the main lines of this great movement were a little less sub-divided in details—details so rich, so important, so intimately related to all the rest—the powerful sweep of the music would be less difficult to maintain.

Shows Understanding

Mr. Monteux, as we have said, shows his depth of understanding of the great symphonic works whenever he touches them. He has a very strong feeling for their proportion, their logic and continuity of thought. Some conductors make a prodigious effect with the introduction of this symphony, then rush madly through the main body of the movement. Mr. Monteux did not exaggerate the characteristics of either section. By admirably chosen tempi he made the entire movement indivisible and also brought out into full relief the lyrical phrases which frequently occur and which are as frequently neglected by conductors. There were new nuances, wholly appropriate to the thought in the slow movement, and beautiful orchestral colors. For us the pace of the third movement was too slow, but there were those who felt that they had heard the right tempo for this movement for the first time in many seasons.

Mr. Bonnet rates the Handel concerto very highly. He certainly played the organ beautifully and with musicianly authority, arousing great enthusiasm by his performance. For the writer the high lights of the concerto are the slow movement and the introduction to the last. He finds the opening very commonplace and pedestrian in the manner of Handel's time. The fugue is brilliant and well made, and the organ sounds bravely. Mr. Bonnet was recalled fully half a dozen times.

Concert next week.

Irreverent by Comparison

Irreverent, if not indelicate, was the pot-house music of Liszt after those eminent worthies, Handel and Brahms, who had preceded him. The "Mephisto" waltz, which Mr. Monteux played with abounding devilry, seemed to stick its tongue in its cheek and make faces at what had gone by. This waltz is pretty "old hat" today. We are no longer alarmed as we listened to music inspired by the scene from Lenau's "Faust," the scene in which Mephistopheles throws Faust into the arms of a black-eyed village wench and fiddles till the very walls totter and turn pale because they cannot join in the dance. Just the same, the opening—Mephistopheles tuning his fiddle—has a flair. Mr. Bedetti's gorgeous tone graced the passage which today is almost maudlin, senile in its sentimentality, its pseudo-amorousness. At such a lover the wench of Lenau would have snapped her fingers. But this one can note and at it marvel: Liszt's amazing mastery of form, his wit, his spirit, his originality in instrumentation, tarnished and tawdry as some of it sounds today, more than half a century after it was conceived. After all, it is the music of a genius.

SYMPHONY CONCERT Trans. Dec. 26, 1919 THE AFTERNOON OF BRAHMS AND BONNET

Mr. Monteux Succeeds Well, in Spite of Occasional Shortcomings, with the German's First and Eloquent Symphony—The Organist Exalts a Concerto by Haendel Already Exalted, and Last Liszt as Devil's Advocate in Devil's Dance

WHEN, at the Symphony Concerts, the new régime of French conductors succeeded the old régime of German, there was ominous shaking of heads among the devotees hereabouts of the music of Brahms. We shall never hear it again, they said one to another lamenting. For in the Teutonic view or the pseudo-Teutonic view—both not unknown in and around concert-halls in these United States—it is unthinkable that a French conductor should, of his own motion, play one, two or three of Brahms's symphonic pieces. If he did so, continued the mourners, striking appropriate attitudes around the bust of the Founder and Sustainer on the easterly side of Symphony Hall, he would yield only to the traditions of the orchestra or to the obvious expectation of its public. None the less, a symphony by Brahms—the pleasurable second—graced one of Mr. Rabaud's programmes last winter, while, yesterday, the more stirring first began the music of the afternoon. Between whiles, it may be recalled, Brahms's second Concerto for piano and orchestra was somehow squeezed into the commemorative concerts a week after the death of Mr. Higginson. By report of kinsfolk and friends he liked the piece. There is not a whit less reason to believe that Mr. Rabaud liked the second symphony and Mr. Monteux the first, though, doubtless, either conductor made his choice with thought of a rounded repertory for a long series of concerts. Neither, it is safe to say, chose his symphony perfunctorily or with uneasy notion of obligation. The deepest-dyed "Brahmsianer" as the Germans say, need have no fear for the future of his favorite composer at the Symphony Concerts, even if that composer's name recur not quite so frequently on programmes as it did in the days of Gericke, Fiedler and Muck. There are others—interesting others—whose names have hardly recurred at all under those dispensations. Mr. Monteux makes diligent and fruitful quest for them.

Moreover, Mr. Rabaud's version of the second symphony and Mr. Monteux's version of the first gave distinct pleasure to open-minded hearers. Mr. Rabaud's in particular, was a notably individualized performance that lent a grace, a charm, a sentiment to the music that many a conductor, more Teutonic, had overlooked. After all, Brahms, light-voiced and seemingly fanciful, was good to hear. In turn, Mr. Monteux's version of the first symphony yesterday, had clear merits and yielded unmistakable satisfactions, even if his was a less individualized "reading" of the music in hand than was Mr. Rabaud's. The relative pace of different conductors with a symphony played at long intervals, is a "pesky" thing to recollect. Possibly, Mr. Monteux took the first movement, especially at the beginning, somewhat more swiftly than Dr. Muck used to do, and with no appreciable gain—indeed with some loss—of eloquence. Possibly also, the Parisian correspondingly stayed the pace of the Andante, but here with audible advantage to the music. Indeed, the longest memory may hardly recall this slow movement played with such loveliness of tone, quiet grace of progress and contrast and suffused melancholy of mood as it was yesterday by Pierre Monteux of Paris and, as it fortunately happens, of other parts of Europe and a fraction of America.

On the other hand, the conductor missed the rhythmic life, the upspringing elasticity, the leaping exuberance with which the joyous finale can be and, in the ears of many of his hearers, has been made to sound. Yet with this reservation and even another over certain harsh tumults of sound in the first movement, Mr. Monteux's "reading" gave recurring pleasure. He caught the streaming progress, the rich harmonic coloring of the very first measures of the symphony; nor did he lack freedom or eloquence with the moody transitions that follow; while especially vivid was he in the return of motifs or melody. The Scherzo moved in the shadowy harmonic mist and at the pensive pace altogether characteristic of Brahms. In the celebrated preluding to the Finale Mr. Monteux gained distinctly more tonal suspense than he did in the like transition in Beethoven's fifth symphony. Over-drive the brass as he sometimes will, thicken as he now and then does outline and coloring, he was steadily graphic and often eloquent with this symphony in C minor. If adroit detailing and a conductor's little characterizing touches upon a cherished music were missing, the larger contours, the opener progress, the ampler eloquence of Brahms stood clear. Moreover, at every turn, the orchestra seconded the leader. The strings were a marvel of soft-textured and luminous tone through the Andante, the wood-winds were of like quality; while the new horn-player, Mr. van den Berg, clearly knows the secrets of Brahms's pet instrumental coloring.

Then ensued what to many a hearer was the event of the day. Once more an organist was "soloist" at the Symphony Concerts, and an organist of no less proved quality and deserved reputation than Mr. Bonnet, virtuoso of strange fortunes in this town of ours. First he played in a church to an audience of fellow-organists and students of the organ. Next he advanced to a Concerto and, possibly, miscellaneous pieces, at a concert for war-charity and found himself cut abruptly short by the relentless fuel-dictator. Then others than organists filled a church to hear him; and now, this season as last, he is in full vogue at the Symphony Concerts. Intent silence while he played, loud applause when he had ended, once more attested the public interest and the public favor. Fortunately, however, were the connoisseurs in the music that Mr. Bonnet finally played—Händel's Concerto in F major (Op. 4, No. 4) in lieu of the announced Concerto in D minor (Op. 7, No. 4). He played it, moreover, with no more than the original accompaniment of strings and oboes that Händel himself put, almost completely, to paper. From him so choosing, so playing, many a listener heard for the first time the pure voice of the organ, unalloyed, unclouded, unforced, sensuously beautiful upon the ear and spiritually beautiful upon the imagination.

Far enough is this Concerto from the bedaubed, bespangled, pseudo-orchestral, altogether displayful stuff that many a modern organist intricately and besottedly writes. Hardly less remote was it from the organ as the sentimentalized instrument of "Meditations," "Adorations" and "Visions," wherein one suspects the late Monsieur Massenet, fresh from "Phais" and "Le Jongleur," as persistent organist. Here in Händel's Concerto was limpid beauty of melodic line, occasional loveliness of sparing ornament, the controlled voice of instrumental song now upswelling but still measured, or else in subdued and pensive glow. The little orchestra wrought its contrasts; the organist wove and colored his patterns; now and again they joined their voices; while once to him alone fell the measures, leading into the Finale, wherein Händel's gentle exaltation rises highest. For here is no music of the bewigged and striding Händel composing pompous Concerti Grossi or ceremonial ode and anthem for the proud and pious nobility and gentry of a Georgian England; but a Händel achieving the spiritual beauty that may dwell in music and that the voice of the organ may impart and intensify. And here also was Mr. Bonnet, for the time no virtuoso-organist, but priest to summon that beauty by the devotion of head and heart, by the skill of unnoted hand and half-hidden foot out of the shrine in which it waited. Yet doing so, he was the more the master-organist. Seldom has the pure voice of music in spirit and in truth been so lifted in Symphony Hall as it was in this organ-concerto of yesterday.

Last, as in certain ceremonies of the medieval church, came the turn of the Devil's Advocate. Needless almost, to say, Liszt was at hand to play the part; while the costume that he wore on this occasion was the familiar music of the orchestral the rustic merry-makers filled the tavern with their clumsy romping. Again there was something uncanny in the air, as well as in the empty fifths of the double-basses. Again the hand and the spirit of the fiend somehow penetrated the music. Once more, the violoncello intoned its sensual measures, thrust into the tonal mass like a bold caress. Once more the oboe touched in the sting of voluptuous delights. Loud in the tuba guffawed Mephistopheles and in the tumult out into the woods Faust swept Lenau's willing girl of the black hair. Music of diabolic as well as sensual beat and tang, if the hearer chooses so to regard it—music that once shocked the blue-eyed fathers of symphony concerts in this town. The diabolic in tones, however, has gone a deal farther since the days of the quavering Dwight, since the days, even, of Liszt himself. Strauss has tried his hand at it and so has a certain Monsieur Ravel—each with no slight success and with no little response from the children of darkness, dwelling in this twentieth century. The "Mephisto Waltz," however, remains a vividly theatrical music and with such pieces Mr. Monteux excels.

H. T. PARKER

156
Dec. The Music of Boston 27, 1919.
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on December 26 with the following program:

Brahms—Symphony No. 1.
Handel—Organ concerto No. 4 in F major.
Liszt—Second episode from Lenau's Faust (Mephisto Waltz).
Joseph Bonnet was the soloist.

Yesterday's performance of the symphony was the first since November 10, 1916 and is was interesting to note its effect after so long an interval. It would seem that one either admires Brahms' music warmly or coldly respects it. Those who are moved by admiration must have felt that admiration increased after yesterday, and those who are moved by respect must have felt their respect, let us hope, not diminished. The playing of the symphony could have aroused nothing but enthusiasm. The whole conception of the piece both on the part of the conductor and the orchestra was clear and the execution well balanced.

The more we hear of Handel's music the more we regret that there are still so many of his compositions which are neglected—arias, orchestral pieces, concertos—a perfect mine of beautiful music awaiting discovery by some musical adventurer. The concerto for the organ was a delight from beginning to end—that is as played by Mr. Bonnet, who gave the needed grace and charm to its flowing eighteenth century phrases. His registration contained many happy effects, especially near the close of the andante, and he displayed throughout the work the qualities of taste and refinement for which he is so justly renowned. Liszt's Mephisto Waltz brought the program to a brilliant close. Little by little we are beginning to realize Liszt's greatness as a composer—perhaps the greatest of the romantic school—and we are gradually coming to see him as a great innovator in harmonic and orchestral coloring, the originator of many of the devices deemed novel by present-day composers. As we are introduced to one so-called novel effect after another in the music of the moderns, it becomes more and more interesting to trace their origins in the music of the great Abbé. The performance was brilliant, rhythmic and poetic and proved Mr. Monteux's fine understanding of Liszt's music, if further proof were needed after his superlatively fine reading of "Les Préludes" earlier in the season.

MR. ELLIS TO RETIRE AS CONCERT MANAGER

Dec. 27, 1919.
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—It has become known that Charles A. Ellis, for many years one of the best known concert managers of the United States, and from 1885 to 1918 manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is planning to retire from business at the end of the current season. Of the artists under his management, two, Fritz Kreisler and Sergei Rachmaninoff, will be under the direction of Charles E. Foley, who has been Mr. Ellis' assistant. It is not yet known who will manage the others, including Geraldine Farrar, Rosita Renard and Arthur Hackett. Mr. Ellis in his long career as a manager has become known as a man of his word and as one with whom artists have liked to be associated. His departure from the field will be regretted.

INSURE MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for the members of the orchestra to the amount of $100,000. The insurance covers the eventual death or total disability of any member, and is entirely distinct from the pension fund, which remains. Herald Dec. 26, 1919.

Philip Greeley Clapp Married

Mr. and Mrs. William Chamberlain announce the marriage in New York city, of their daughter, Gladys Elizabeth, to Philip Greeley Clapp, professor of music at the Iowa State University, where he went last October. Mr. and Mrs. Clapp are to be "at home" after Jan. 15, at 334 South Summit avenue, Iowa City. Trans. — Dec. 30, 1919.

9TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Dec. 27, 1919.
Compositions by Brahms, Handel and Liszt Prominent on the Program

ORGANIST BONNET WINS APPLAUSE

The program of the ninth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux, conductor, the first of which was given yesterday in Symphony Hall, follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1 in C minor; Handel, Concerto in F major No. 4 (organist), Joseph Bonnet; Liszt, "The Dance in the Village Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."

Undeterred by the holidays, the concert patrons were present in full number to enjoy the good, solid, foundational music of Brahms, Handel and Liszt. Joseph Bonnet, a devoted exponent of the older and finer organ music, is to be commended for choosing the Concerto in F major No. 4, which in no part is "lesser" Handel. It was perhaps Handel's genius that made the display in the first movement plausible and impressive, the ornament felicitous in all its elaboration. The Andante, dignified and serene, is wonderfully rich in treasure, and the final Allegro, nobly ushered in, piles up in power by contrapuntal skill to a high flood of joyousness. Complemented by the singing strings about him, Mr. Bonnet's playing was ideal to the purpose—clean, delicate and poised, always regardless of the ensemble. Judging from the many bows he had to make, he must have provided as much pleasure as many a pianist and singer.

Applause also indicated a great satisfaction in the first Symphony of Brahms, always eagerly returned to, which on this occasion had a robust and sonorous performance. In the famous solo passage for the French horn, Mr. Van Den Berg, newly come to the orchestra from Europe, disclosed a smooth and lustrous tone which fully qualifies him to sit with such distinguished virtuosi as Messrs. Longy, Sand, Laurent and Fradkin, who glorified the exquisite episodes allotted to them, and were again well heard in the music of Liszt. The "Mephisto Waltz" cannot compete with certain symphonic poems if only a tune is desired, but the devil described in it is interesting—the more so for his trumpery and sleight-of-hand. As orchestration the piece remains splendid to hear with effects unsurpassed.

The program for the Symphony concerts of Jan. 2 and 3, follows: Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 5 ("Reformation"); Debussy, "Jeux" ("Play"), a danced poem; Glazounoff ("Stenka Razin"), symphonic poem.

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dec. 27, 1919.
Parisian Organist Assists in Handel Concerto

Joseph Bonnet, organist of the Church of Saint Eustache in Paris, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He is well known in Boston from several appearances here in recitals and as soloist at a pair of Symphony concerts last season. A note which he contributed to the program book explains that he has made very few additions and changes in Handel's score of the Concerto in F major, op 4, no 4.

He deserves commendation for thus refraining from introducing the modern "improvements" in the shape of an augmented orchestration and "brilliant" cadenzas which disfigure so many performances of 18th century music nowadays. His technical skill is phenomenal. Few indeed are the organists who can play legato passages deftly and rapidly without blurring a single note, and without lapses into staccato.

His runs are like those of a great pianist bent on perfecting his technique. But the technical problems of organ playing seems to absorb most of his attention. He neglects nuances in his interpretation.

The real feature was the Brahms Symphony in C minor, No. 1. It seems almost incredible that the supposed dullness and crudeness of Brahms should ever have lent point to the jest that the fire escapes in Symphony Hall ought to be labeled "This way out in case of Brahms." Yet the vehement applause which compelled the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment as the end came mainly from the younger portion of the audience, to whom, of course, that composer seems thoroughly comparable to Beethoven, Bach and Wagner, and as surely immortal as any one of the three.

The finale of the symphony, which shows the influence of the symphonic poems of the romantic composers in its comparative freedom of structure, surpasses them all both in perfection of workmanship and in emotional intensity. It needs no literary program or rhapsodic commentary to make it enthralling. It is more powerful, if less perfect, than the other symphonic movement, which is the highest achievement of Brahms, the first one in his Fourth Symphony, a masterpiece of construction.

Mr. Monteux' interpretation showed that he felt strongly and understood perfectly the power of the themes. In development passages, however, he often quickened the tempo and sometimes chopped up the phrases either through nervousness or in a mistaken endeavor for expressiveness.

The true eloquence comes from steady lengthening and broadening of the phrases. The episodes must be subordinated to the total effect of the whole movement. Halt at least of the excellence of Dr. Muck as a conductor of such music was due to his perception of the fact that the variety in great symphonic movements is there only because it really contributes to their essential unity.

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz was brilliantly played. This program will be repeated tonight. At the concerts next week Mendelssohn's forgotten "Reformation" Symphony will be revived, Debussy's "Jeux" will be given for the first time in America, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razin" will be played for the first time at these concerts.

Monteux, Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Action

Mr. JOSEPH BONNET, organist and composer, was born at Bordeaux, on March 17, 1884. His father, organist of the church of Sainte Eulalie, gave him his first music lessons. When he was fourteen years old, Joseph was made organist of the church of Saint Nicolas at Bordeaux, later of the church of Saint Michel. He gave a recital that attracted attention. Entering the Paris Conservatory, he studied the organ with Guilmant. In 1906 (July 6)

he was awarded a first prize for organ playing. First prizes were that year to Messrs. Barié and Vierne. The subject was given by Gigout; the subject for free improvisation

Before Mr. Bonnet was awarded the prize, he was a competition (March 23, 1906) organist of Saint Eustache in order to pursue without interruption his studies in the conservatory he did voluntary service in the army when he was a half year old instead of awaiting the regular age of twenty-one. He soon became known throughout Paris at the concerts of the Société Nationale, the Société Bach, the Société de Musique, and the concerts of Lamoureux and Colonne. Mr. Bonnet was named organist of the Société du Conservatoire. In the season of 1910-11 he gave many recitals at Saint Eustache. He has given recitals in London, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, and his compositions for the organ are many, and he is the first to play at his series of five historical recitals. He played for the first time in this country in the Great Hall of the city of New York, January 30, 1917.

In 1917, Mr. Bonnet gave a recital at the new Old

On January 23, 1918, he played in Symphony Hall, which took place for the benefit of the Edith Wharton

His associates were Mme. Gabrielle Gills, soprano, of the Société des Instruments Anciens. He then played pieces by Beethoven, Grigny, and a concerto by Handel. He gave a recital at Emmanuel Church, March 17, 24, 1918.

He was at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 13, 14, 1918 (Guilmant's Symphony No. 1, D minor, for organ and orchestra.)

parable to Beethoven, Bach and Wagner, and as surely immortal as any one of the three.

The finale of the symphony, which shows the influence of the symphonic poems of the romantic composers in its comparative freedom of structure, surpasses them all both in perfection of workmanship and in emotional intensity. It needs no literary program or rhapsodic commentary to make it enthralling. It is more powerful, if less perfect, than the other symphonic movement, which is the highest achievement of Brahms, the first one in his Fourth Symphony, a masterpiece of construction.

Mr. Monteux' interpretation showed that he felt strongly and understood perfectly the power of the themes. In development passages, however, he often quickened the tempo and sometimes chopped up the phrases either through nervousness or in a mistaken endeavor for expressiveness.

The true eloquence comes from steady lengthening and broadening of the phrases. The episodes must be subordinated to the total effect of the whole movement. Hail at least of the excellence of Dr. Muck as a conductor of such music was due to his perception of the fact that the variety in great symphonic movements is there only because it really contributes to their essential unity.

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz was brilliantly played. This program will be repeated tonight. At the concerts next week Mendelssohn's forgotten "Reformation" Symphony will be revived, Debussy's "Jeux" will be given for the first time in America, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razin" will be played for the first time at these concerts.

Monteux, Head of Bost

Mr. JOSEPH BONNET, organist and composer, was born at Bordeaux, on March 17, 1884. His father, organist of the church of Sainte Eulalie, gave him his first music lessons. When he was fourteen years old, Joseph was made organist of the church of Saint Nicolas at Bordeaux, later of the church of Saint Michel. He gave a recital that attracted attention. Entering the Paris Conservatory, he studied the organ with Guilmant. In 1906 (July 6) he was awarded a first prize for organ playing. First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Barié and Vierende. The subject for a fugue was given by Gigout; the subject for free improvisation by Lavignac. Before Mr. Bonnet was awarded the prize, he was chosen in competition (March 23, 1906) organist of Saint Eustache in Paris. In order to pursue without interruption his studies in the Conservatory he did voluntary service in the army when he was eighteen and a half years old instead of awaiting the regular summons at twenty-one. He soon became known throughout Paris by playing at concerts of the Société Nationale, the Société Bach, the Société Handel, and the concerts of Lamoureux and Colonne. Guilmant died, and Mr. Bonnet was named organist of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. In the season of 1910-11 he gave more than forty recitals at Saint Eustache. He has given recitals in France, England, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, and Germany. His compositions for the organ are many, and he is the editor of compositions played at his series of five historical recitals.

Mr. Bonnet played for the first time in this country in the Great Hall, College of the city of New York, January 30, 1917.

On April 16, 1917, Mr. Bonnet gave a recital at the new Old South Church. On January 23, 1918, he played in Symphony Hall, where a concert took place for the benefit of the Edith Wharton War Charities. His associates were Mme. Gabrielle Gills, soprano, and the Société des Instruments Anciens. He then played pieces by Bach, Clérambault, Grigny, and a concerto by Handel. He gave recitals at the Emmanuel Church, March 17, 24, 1918.

He played here at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 13, 14, 1918 (Guilmant's Symphony No. 1, D minor, for organ and orchestra.)

160

10-1

161

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 2, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, AT 8 P.M.

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, "Reformation," op. 107

I. Andante: Allegro con fuoco

II. Allegro vivace

III. Andante; Andante con moto; Allegro vivace; Allegro
maestoso

DEBUSSY,

A DANCED PLAY, "Jeux," (Play)

(First performance in America)

GLAZOUNOFF.

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Stenka Razin," op. 13

[First time at these Concerts]

Philip Hale. Not a Composer, but Probably the Most Authoritative Music Critic of the Country.
(Photograph by Bachrach.)

10TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Work Has First Place on Program

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" ANOTHER FEATURE

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." "Jeux" was performed probably for the first time in this country. Glazounoff's tone-poem, first performed here at one of Mr. Lang's "Chickering Production Concerts" in 1904, was heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert.

Mendelssohn's symphony was new to the great majority of the audience. The first performance in America was at a Handel and Haydn concert in 1868, the year that the score was published. Mendelssohn evidently did not think much of his work, for he did not wish it published during his lifetime, nor did he like to hear of performances. The Harvard Musical Association played the Symphony in 1868 and in later years gave three performances of the Scherzo. There were at least two performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the last was in 1886, if we are not mistaken. The Scherzo was played here twice by Theodore Thomas's orchestra.

The reason for this neglect is not far to seek: The music is for the most part perfunctory and deadly dull. The only measures of interest in the first movement are those of the "Dresden Amen," used years afterward by Wagner in "Parsifal." The Scherzo shines by contrast with the other movements; it is suave, graceful, eminently Mendelssohnian in its scherzo character. The andante is as sentimental as the most sentimental of the "Songs Without Words." The treatment of Luther's choral, "A Safe Stronghold," is not impressive, and the finale with its pedestrian counterpoint might have been written by some English doctor of music for his oratorio "Jeroboam" or "Keren-happuch." Mr. Monteux and his merry men did their best to make the dry bones live, but only the Scherzo gave pleasure. Still it was worth while to revive the symphony, if only to show what arid music could be written by a composer of certain romantic and charming works.

Debussy's music was sadly in need of the stage effects and the miming of the dancers. It was written for a singular ballet. The composer, it is said, was greatly harassed by the demands of Nijinsky. Here again a filmed representation of the ballet displayed yesterday might have "explained" and emphasized the music, but the audience would probably have strained eyes, not ears. As a concert work, "Jeux" interests by its orchestral tints and demi-tints; its instrumental combinations and contrasts; and at times harmonic progressions, unusual even in Debussy's other compositions, arrest attention; but away from the theatre, "Jeux" cannot be ranked with earlier music by Debussy. There is a paucity of ideas; the suggestion that a composer was endeavoring to imitate Debussy and succeeded only in aping certain mannerisms, certain tricks of idiom. Mr. Monteux, who had conducted the ballet in Paris and London, no doubt yesterday again saw the stage, Nijinsky and the two young women. To him this music had significance. The performance was brilliant.

Glazounoff wrote his "Stenka Razin" when he was 20 years old; when he was romantic; when he was imbued with national spirit; when Balakireff and Rimsky-Korsakoff had hope of him as a successor. Crude as "Stenka Razin" is in certain respects, it is to be preferred to the academic works of Glazounoff, who became Germanized, and wrote with fatal fluency and painful scholasticism. The wildness and audacity of the opening descriptive of the Volga, with the use of the barge-men's song; the oriental coloring of the section portraying the adored but ill-fated princess; these console one for measures of artless padding, measures in which Glazounoff merely treads water (in the marvellous Volga) and for the comparative tameness of Stenka's music, tame in spite of the strenuous endeavor. And so "Stenka Razin" is today a work that gave rich promise not to be fulfilled. It is said that a few years ago this music was used for a ballet in Russia. How was the scenario arranged? Was the dancing all on Stenka's boat?

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 16, 17, is as follows: Stojowski, Symphony in D minor, op. 21 (first time in Boston), Songs with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"; Schumann, "Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less" and "Leave Me in His Arms Endearing"; Schubert, "Erlking"; Wagner, Funeral march and Immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." Margaret Matzenauer will be the singer.

Philip Hale. Not a Composer, but Probably the Most Authoritative Music Critic of the Country.
(Photograph by Bachrach.)

10TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Work Has First Place on Program

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"
ANOTHER FEATURE

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." "Jeux" was performed probably for the first time in this country. Glazounoff's tone-poem, first performed here at one of Mr. Lang's "Chickering Production Concerts" in 1904, was heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert.

Mendelssohn's symphony was new to the great majority of the audience. The first performance in America was at a Handel and Haydn concert in 1863, the year that the score was published. Mendelssohn evidently did not think much of his work, for he did not wish it published during his lifetime, nor did he like to hear of performances. The Harvard Musical Association played the Symphony in 1868 and in later years gave three performances of the Scherzo. There were at least two performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the last was in 1886, if we are not mistaken. The Scherzo was played here twice by Theodore Thomas's orchestra.

The reason for this neglect is not far to seek: The music is for the most part perfunctory and deadly dull. The only measures of interest in the first movement are those of the "Dresden Amen," used years afterward by Wagner in "Parsifal." The Scherzo shines by contrast with the other movements; it is suave, graceful, eminently Mendelssohnian in its scherzo character. The andante is as sentimental as the most sentimental of the "Songs Without Words." The treatment of Luther's choral, "A Safe Stronghold," is not impressive, and the finale with its pedestrian counterpoint might have been written by some English doctor of music for his oratorio "Jeroboam" or "Keren-Happuch." Mr. Monteux and his merry men did their best to make the dry bones live, but only the Scherzo gave pleasure. Still it was worth while to revive the symphony, if only to show what arid music could be written by a composer of certain romantic and charming works.

Debussy's music was sadly in need of the stage effects and the miming of the dancers. It was written for a singular ballet. The composer, it is said, was greatly harassed by the demands of Nijinsky. Here again a filmed representation of the ballet displayed yesterday might have "explained" and emphasized the music, but the audience would probably have strained eyes, not ears. As a concert work, "Jeux" interests by its orchestral tints and demi-tints; its instrumental combinations and contrasts; and at times harmonic progressions, unusual even in Debussy's other compositions, arrest attention; but away from the theatre, "Jeux" cannot be ranked with earlier music by Debussy. There is a paucity of ideas; the suggestion that a composer was endeavoring to imitate Debussy and succeeded only in aping certain mannerisms, certain tricks of idiom. Mr. Monteux, who had conducted the ballet in Paris and London, no doubt yesterday again saw the stage, Nijinsky and the two young women. To him this music had significance. The performance was brilliant.

Glazounoff wrote his "Stenka Razin" when he was 20 years old; when he was romantic; when he was imbued with national spirit; when Balakireff and Rimsky-Korsakoff had hope of him as a successor. Crude as "Stenka Razin" is in certain respects, it is to be preferred to the academic works of Glazounoff, who became Germanized, and wrote with fatal fluency and painful scholasticism. The wildness and audacity of the opening descriptive of the Volga, with the use of the barge-men's song; the oriental coloring of the section portraying the adored but ill-fated princess; these console one for measures of artless padding, measures in which Glazounoff merely treads water (in the marvellous Volga) and for the comparative tameness of Stenka's music, tame in spite of the strenuous endeavor. And so "Stenka Razin" is today a work that gave rich promise not to be fulfilled. It is said that a few years ago this music was used for a ballet in Russia. How was the scenario arranged? Was the dancing all on Stenka's boat?

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 16, 17, is as follows: Stojowski, Symphony in D minor, op. 21 (first time in Boston), Songs with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"; Schumann, "Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less" and "Leave Me in His Arms Endearing"; Schubert, "Erking"; Wagner, Funeral march and Immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." Margaret Matzenauer will be the singer.

Feature of Symphony Slav Poem

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Mendelssohn. Reformation Symphony. D minor Debussy. "Jeux." A Ballet.

Glazounoff. "Stenka Razine." Symphonic Poem

WHOLLY orchestral and the first half very tame. What on earth was in M. Monteux's mind when he resuscitated the very watery Reformation Symphony? Mendelssohn himself, after directing it a single time, never tried it again. Habeneck rehearsed it in Paris and laid it aside without a performance. It was a made-to-order work, without any inspiration. Written to celebrate the 300th anniversary of the establishment of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, in 1530, but not performed until two years later because of political agitation in Germany. It was about as dead, after its single performance, as Mendelssohn's opera, "Camacho's Wedding," which, by the way, was resuscitated in Boston, for one single and very boring performance.

The first movement presents two themes in conflict, portraying Catholic and Protestant, and one might apply to the Reformation Symphony the sarcasm which Saphir pointed at "The Huguenots"—"The Catholics and Protestants kill each other in it, and the Jews make music to it!" We have infinitely greater tumults in modern music. It is merely a very feeble imitation of the combative style of the Heroic symphony, the Protestant theme being the well-known "Dresden Amen." But the scherzo is better. In fact, it is the only part of the work worth preserving and we could have forgiven M. Monteux if he had played this movement only.

Mendelssohn was the prince of scherzo writers and there is a geniality here that makes it worth while, although it is not nearly so fine as the Scotch Symphony scherzo. It is in the conventional song-form with trio shape and the three-quarter rhythm which Beethoven established for the earliest forms of this movement.

There is no regular slow movement in this symphony unless we take the little, diluted song-form which follows the scherzo as a movement, which it is not.

The finale presents a very carefully prepared lesson in counterpoint. It has much fugal work on a very clear subject, which is derived from the great Lutheran chorale—"A Strong Castle Is Our Lord." Now this chorale was the very embodiment of the Reformation, its actual war-cry, and it was very fitting that Mendelssohn should bring it in. But it was not fitting that, to make a gradual crescendo, he should begin the finale by tootling this grand theme on the flute alone! When Wagner used it in the Kaiser March he thundered it out on trombones.

Mendelssohn loved the flute and even tried to imitate its ancient use in "Oh Be Gracious, Ye Immortals," in "St. Paul," but certainly he never made a more unfitting use of it than in the beginning of this finale. The counterpoint which follows is correct but uninspired, and the whole work shows that Mendelssohn could not rise to the height of his subject. Let the symphony rest.

We get something of the highest class of dance music in almost every one of M. Monteux's programs. This is nothing to complain of; on the contrary, it gives spice and variety to the concerts. "Jeux" was written as a ballet for M. Diaghileff and its action was devised by M. Nijinski. Thus it was given in Paris. But it was also given there as a concert selection, as it was on this occasion, although it requires more or imagination to follow its meaning in this guise.

Like much of Debussy's music, it juggles with rhythm and gives more of suggestion than of worked-out ideas. But we can imagine a degree of fitness to this setting of a tennis flirtation to music; we can fancy the bounding of the balls over the hedge, and the youth carrying out the difficult task of making love simultaneously to two maidens is pictured with appropriately tangled rhythms. The sub-division of the strings suggests a Gallic "Waldesweben." The percussive instruments are often employed, however, to accent rhythms that might otherwise be difficult to follow. In short this is more comprehensible than the composer's picture of the sea or of the unhappy faun. It runs the gamut from languor to frenzy and its picture of "Amore a tre" is sufficiently amorous. It is sometimes more emphatic and powerful than one expects of Debussy, but what would a tennis game be without a racket! It was very calmly received by the audience.

Much the best work of the concert was its last number, Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine." Two of its three themes were in fine contrast to each other, the brief barbaric one which pictures Stenka himself, and the tender, languishing one which portrays the Persian princess. But better than these is the Volga boatmen's song, a theme which has in it all the simplicity, sadness, yet strength of Old Russia. Its weird monotony permeates the entire work and it gives a sombre dignity to the whole symphonic poem that is indescribably characteristic. It is Russian to the core.

Stenka battles with the river, and the contest is well portrayed, and the Volga and its mighty theme win the victory and the princess besides. Even the kettledrums had a mighty share in developing the Volga theme, and at the end the whole of the boatmen's song rang out in a fierce climax, as if the river had swept everything before it. The work was a glorification of the mighty Volga, rather than of the puny mortals upon it.

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" AT THE SYMPHONY

Ballet "Poem" Given First American Performance

Orchestral Music by Mendelssohn and Glazounoff Revived

All three numbers of yesterday's Symphony Concert were new to nearly every one in the audience, though Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony is a revival, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" was composed in 1885, and first played in Boston in 1904.

Debussy's "Jeux," which is his arrangement for concert performance of music written for a danced "poem" given by the Russian Ballet in Paris and London in 1913, was first played in Paris in 1914. The audience yesterday found it so very novel that only a few youthful enthusiasts ventured to applaud the first American performance, despite the supposed vogue of Debussy in Boston.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra deserved a round of applause for an unusually brilliant performance of the extremely difficult music even from those who found it only a disagreeable noise. Mr. Monteux, who conducted the original performances of the ballet, consulted frequently with the composer and is thus in a position to give an authoritative reading. The vehemence of the "saving remnant," much of it in the second balcony "rush seats," compelled him to bow repeatedly, and possibly persuaded him that the pains spent on preparation were not wasted after all.

Shows Mastery of Technique

It is impossible to judge such music as "Jeux" finally from a single hearing. Debussy here as always uses the orchestra as a single instrument whose technique he has mastered. In "Jeux" it would be as absurd to separate his orchestra into "strings, woodwind, brass and percussion" for purposes of analysis as it would be to divide the keyboard of a modern pianoforte into four sections in order to talk about piano style.

He writes for orchestra as effectively as he writes for piano, always securing precisely the effect he desires with the greatest possible economy of means. He has a similar mastery of the technique of composition. For example, he knows how to weave rhythms into a well-developed climax. In "Jeux" he seems to have substituted this rhythmic development for the orthodox thematic development. The themes are fragmentary, and not melodic at all according to received notions of melody, which are, of course, based on precedent rather than on any scientific principle.

Technical skill, however great, will not make a masterpiece, but there is genuine imaginative power and emotional intensity back of the skill displayed in "Jeux." The piece is more daringly dissonant than Stravinsky's "Firebird," played at a recent concert. It proves that Debussy went on developing as a composer up to his very last years. The reputed sterility of his later works may prove, as has been the case with Beethoven, to be in the imagination of the critics, not in that of the composer.

Glazounoff's Poem

Glazounoff's symphonic poem, written at the age of 20, is the work of a phenomenally able pupil of Rimsky Korsakoff. It shows the influence of that teacher strongly, except in the orchestration, which has little of his superb skill. An audience which has finally learned to love his "Scheherezade" received his pupil's work with considerable applause.

Mendelssohn's symphony, which he tried vainly to suppress, is, except for the pretty scherzo and part of the treatment of Luther's Hymn, totally unworthy of the composer of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Elijah."

Mme. Matzenauer will sing songs by Brahms, Schubert and Schumann, besides the final scene from Wagner's "The Dusk of the Gods," at the next concerts, Jan 16 and 17. The symphony will be Stojowski's in D minor.

TENNIS AS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Debussy's Ballet Is Heard—Three Novel- ties on List

BY OLIN DOWNES

Should the sporting editor of the Post have attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and reported the matter in his own inimitable style? A leading feature of the programme was Debussy's music for the ballet "Jeux" ("Play"), which was mimed on the stage in Paris, May 15, 1913, by dancers in tennis costume. But Mr. Monteux did not conduct with a racquet, therefore the present scribe takes up his accustomed pen.

FOR FIRST TIME HERE

This music of Debussy was played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Monteux conducted the premiere of the stage work in Paris, when the famous Nijinsky was the man tennis player and the two girls were Mmes. Karsova and Schollar. The game as mimed on the Paris stage was a cute if not exactly open-air and sportsmanlike affair, and Mr. Nijinsky is held responsible—he has a waggish disposition—for the statement to the press that "All Sorts (apologies to Mr. Newton Newton!) is the ballet—'tis a broad vista, The Dance of Rockefeller at Golf." The mounted ballet in a polo game and the rhythmic swivel, side-step and swat of the "Ballet du box." But it would take another Wagner to compose the music for an affair of gorgeous Amazons in the crunch and scrap and rough and tumble of the "Ballet de Fureur du Football."

O well! Tennis is not the strangest thing to have inspired musical composers. Richard Strauss wrote of a flock of baa-ing sheep in his "Don Quixote," and in another place in the same work of a windmill, and in "Salome" of the dropping of blood and in "Electric" of the lashing of whips and other elevating things.

Unlike Debussy

Debussy has lightly suggested the click of the racquets, the soft impact and bounce of the tennis balls, and there are passages of playful fancy and humor in the music. The opening and close are poetic. The situation on the stage was a game of tennis, as evening fell, which developed into a scene of coquetry and love between the man and the two girls. At the last "a tennis ball falls at their feet; surprised and frightened, they go bounding away, and disappear in the depths of the nocturnal park."

First impressions of a first performance may well be discounted, so far as accuracy and conclusiveness are concerned. But first impressions are what a reviewer is expected to write down, and sometimes these first impressions are fully as reliable and much more vivid than later ones. Be it said here, then, that this music of Debussy, as a whole, seems forced, unoriginal, without very much organic quality and about as far-fetched as the artificial and sophisticated scenario of the ballet for which it was written.

Borrows From Stravinsky

And, furthermore, this is no longer the actual Debussy. This is Debussylized Stravinsky. The score is redolent of the Stravinsky of the exquisite music for the ballet, "The Firebird," and the willingness with which Debussy has here helped himself to Stravinsky's instrumental scheme and to a number of the pet harmonic mannerisms of the celebrated Russian appears merely another proof of the waning creative powers of the Frenchman in the last years of his career, when his invention was getting more and more feeble, as his workmanship increased in ingenuity and dexterity. The day may come when a tennis game will appear poetic and legendary and inspire music of like quality. But the impression given by yesterday's performance was that of a composer extremely skilled in orchestral usage desperately in need of new ideas.

Of course there were Debussyites, for whom anything and everything the man wrote is incredibly wonderful, who applauded obstinately.

The "Reformation"

There were two other novelties on the programme. We use the word "novelty" intentionally when speaking of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony, not heard in many years in Boston, and composed in 1829. To the generation present yesterday the symphony proved a novelty and a bore. Its points of interest are the execrable facility with which Mendelssohn, a youth of 20, penned this sonorous work, and the use of certain Lutheran themes, as the "Dresden Amen," which Wagner employed so significantly in "Parsifal," written years later than the "Reformation" symphony, and the theme of the Lutheran choral, "Ein feste Burg." The use of the "Dresden Amen" is striking in this: It recurs three times in the first movement, twice in the introduction and once again toward the end of the movement; it has always the same instrumentation—the violins—and the impression on the ear—we do not know the score—is that it reappears in the same key.

"Ein feste burg," employed by so many composers, is intoned in the last movement as a melodic phrase without harmony, then with more and more of the wind instruments added, as the voices first of a choir, then of a congregation, might take up such a melody. And the rest is glib Mendelssohnism. The scherzo is especially characteristic in the most conventional manner. But it is only just to the composer to say that Mendelssohn himself did not care to have this symphony published nor to discuss it. It was published after his death as a posthumous work.

Interesting Tone Poem

By far the most interesting music of the programme was Glazounoff's early symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," after the story of the dreaded pirate of the 17th century in Russia, a terror to the countryside, who, sailing on the Volga, saw one day that capture by pursuers was inevitable. Seated in splendor on the deck of his vessel was his mistress, a captive Persian princess. She had told her companions of a dream that Stenka was killed, that she was drowned in the Volga.

And this dream came true. The pursuers of the Czar came nearer. The chieftain said to his comrades, "Never, during all my 30 years of my going up and down Mother Volga, have I made her a gift. Today I shall give her what is in my eyes the most precious of earthly treasures." He threw the princess into the Volga, and with his followers rushed on the soldiers of the Czar.

Full of Color and Force

The celebrated folk-song of the Volga boatmen predominates in this work. There is a savage phrase for Stenka Razin, and a seductive melody, gorgeously instrumentated, for the princess. There is the thought of the flowing Volga, of approaching conflict. The princess tells her tale. At the end the Volga theme is chanted wildly by instruments of brass through orchestral tumult.

The music is full of color and force. This is not a mature work. Themes are developed in a fragmentary way, form is none too clear, the musical thought is not enchainé. Although themes are repeated they do not lead, inevitably, one into another. And yet the music has real force, imagination, fantasy, and it should be often heard. It has the true creative quality; it is of Russian imagination, and is incomparably superior in these characteristics to later and much more highly polished compositions which Glazounoff turned out in older and more polite days. The reason for this is that even in art, where so much attention must be paid to beauty and durability of workmanship, the vision and the intention of a creative nature hold first place, and questions of technic and even of esthetics are secondary.

UNANTICIPATED PLEASURES FROM

MENDELSSOHN

Jan. 5, 1920
The Resurrection of His "Reformation Symphony" Proves No Rattling of Dry Bones—Mr. Heifetz Outdoes Himself in Bach's Chaconne and Then Takes Refuge Into Routine — Miss Baird as Expert Young Pianist—Ysaye and Elman to Be Heard Together

BOTH to lay and expert listeners at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" distinctly belied expectations. Scarcely a hearer, unless he were uncommonly ripe in years and retentive of memory, could have had any clear recollection of the music. It was three and thirty years since it had been played in Boston; not by one chance in a thousand, nowadays, was the persistent wanderer of concert halls likely to have heard it, either in Europe or in America. Nearly everyone, moreover, who dared to anticipate the performance gave the symphony a bad name. Mendelssohn himself had never really liked it, had withheld it from publication through his life. Picked from his papers in the sixties, it had then been played merely as a curiosity, quickly falling from "active" repertoires. The very biographers and commentators were shy of it. Never had Mr. Monteux made so futile a resurrection. So forth and so onward. Yet at both concerts, from the sophisticated and exacting of Saturday evening no less than from the easygoing and incurious of Friday afternoon, more applause answered Mendelssohn of the "Reformation Symphony" than rewarded Debussy for "Jeux" or Glazounov for "Stenka Razin."

Needless, almost, to say, this "Reformation Symphony" is no perennial masterpiece like Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; while, outside the Scherzo there is no place in it for the grace of fancy and of handiwork that keeps his overtures of Scottish seas and Scottish Islands still pleasurable. Yet, in the comparisons of memory, while the "Scotch" and the "Italian" symphonies may at moments rise higher, they wither not less often, in the ears of 1920, into contrapuntal and fugal dryness. There is agreeable suggestion of stately ceremony, without a hint of pomposity, in the slow movement at the beginning of the "Reformation Symphony." The ensuing Allegro played as warmly and vividly as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played it, still strikes dramatic fire. In fact, it was hard to recall Mendelssohn so ardent in tonal conflict, so vigorous of tonal tumult, so minded to catch the hearer into the full-voiced march of his music. His Lutherans have clearly gone crusading, with the soft "Amen" of Dresden—and of "Parsifal"—to bless them; and more than a whiff of their fire touches the composer. The Scherzo is charming, alike in the play of melodies and rhythms, in the brightening harmonies, in the pretty strokes of instrumental color. Not until he enters upon the Finale and his Lutherans seem to begin a footless promenade of the streets of Augsburg, does Mendelssohn become dry, mechanical, empty. About and about to a pedestrian fugato march his whilom crusaders—and no fruitless use of "Ein Feste Burg" and no pompous "Maestoso" will save them from futility. The legend is that Mendelssohn buried the "Reformation Symphony," dreading comparison with the Meyerbeer of "The Huguenots." But only in this Finale does Felix of Berlin drop to the level of Jacob of Paris. Once more Mr. Monteux has not rattled dry bones in vain. Rather he set tonal flesh and blood upon them. H.T.P.

MUSIC

Music by the Boston Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its tenth program on January 2. The following pieces were played:

Mendelssohn.... "Reformation" Symphony
Debussy.... "Jeux" (play) a danced poem
Glazounoff..... "Stenka Razine"

Debussy's piece was played for the first time in Boston. Glazounoff's symphonic poem was played for the first time at these concerts.

It is the present fashion to turn symphonic poems into ballets and ballets into symphonic poems. It is a matter of opinion whether or not the music does not suffer in either case. Still, the symphonic work transferred to the theater is the less likely of the two to lose in effectiveness. Designed without thought of pantomime, scenery, or dramatic action, the addition of these elements, while tending to distract the attention from the purely musical side of the composition, never wholly mars its beauty or clouds its meaning. On the contrary, music primarily designed to accompany and comment upon a stage scene or picture tends to lose in effectiveness when transported to the concert room. Phrases and motives which most aptly intensify and illustrate a dramatic situation are not necessarily suitable to stand on their own merits as pure music. Whereas the symphonic poem creates a mood and then allows the listener to supply the detail of the dramatic action according to the dictates of his imagination, the music of the theater is only one of the many elements which unite to produce this effect. Many passages from Wagner operas are an apparent exception and for this reason many have declared that Wagner was greater as a symphonist than as a dramatic composer. It is possible, however, that the situations to which the selections customarily played in our concert rooms serve as a commentary, are so familiar to the average concert goer that he unconsciously supplies the atmosphere of the theater from the storehouse of his past impressions.

Debussy's "Jeux" would seem to be a case in point. The scenario which it is designed to accompany is not in itself of striking character, and the music suffers from this lack of definite mood. It is fanciful; it contains many novel effects of color; it bears the imprint of a master of harmonic and orchestral resources and undoubtedly in conjunction with the stage action it elucidates the somewhat slender plot of the ballet. As music pure and simple, however, it is difficult to catch its meaning. Of striking themes there are none, and in it we fail to perceive the Debussy of "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," of the "Sea Pieces."

The performance was a remarkably fine one. Such music must be played with the delicacy and clarity of Mozart. Mr. Monteux undoubtedly excels in such music and is able to impart his enthusiasm for it to the orchestra.

Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" is a welcome addition to the repertory. The orchestration is brilliant and there are several impressive climaxes.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony was heard again after many years of neglect. While it in no way compares with the "Scotch" or "Italian" symphonies, it proved a welcome change. The scherzo still has the power to charm. The finale is sonorous even in these days of imposing orchestral masses. Some speak slightly of Mendelssohn's music, yet there are few composers who have equaled it in fineness of workmanship, in exquisite sense of proportion, or elegance of style. It was not in Mendelssohn's power to express the deeper emotions, yet in grace and fancy there are few to compare with him.

Although not quite half of the Symphony concerts have as yet been given, and it is as yet too soon to form any just estimate of Mr. Monteux as a conductor, it is yet possible to take note of certain characteristics of his work. When Mr. Monteux came last year to conduct a few concerts at the beginning of the season, he found the orchestra in a low state of efficiency. During those few weeks he succeeded in reorganizing the orchestra and in restoring many of its past virtues. The public immediately realized that he was expert in all matters pertaining to orchestral technic, but it did not have time to judge of his capacities as an interpreter and program-maker.

At the present time, however, it is a pleasure to note the steady progress which the orchestra has made under his skillful leadership and the interesting character and variety of his programs. Mr. Monteux is apparently interested in the music of all schools. In the course of the past 10 programs we have heard music of all styles presented with unfailing care and sympathy. We have heard several novelties, yet the old and tried has not been neglected. Mr. Monteux shuns the spectacular. He is modest and unassuming, yet, as the concerts have succeeded one another, the power of his quiet but whole-hearted devotion to a high artistic ideal is being felt more and more. The remaining concerts of the season will be looked forward to with all the greater pleasure because of the feeling of confidence and respect which his sincerity of purpose has inspired.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BALLET-MUSIC AND A PERPLEXED AUDIENCE

With the Best Will in the World, Debussy's "Jeux" Puzzles It, Like Similar Pieces of the Season—A Piece, None the Less, of Rare and Subtle Quality, with Many a Mark of the Composer's Later Years—Sensuous Charm and Sophisticated Workmanship—The Contrasts of "Stenka Razine"

ABOLD, brave man within his quiet bearing and gentle speech, Mr. Monteux dares to ask of his hearers imagination and, in the case of Debussy's "Jeux," an imagination particularly difficult for them to summon. The Bostonian public, in or out of the Symphony Concerts, is not familiar with the ballet as the Russians of Mr. Diaghilev have long cultivated it. Their pictorial fantasies and graphic mimodramas it knows only by the scant fruition of fifteen performances nearly four years ago and now fast receding in even retentive memories. It may yet recall enough of the action that Fokine and Bakst set to a patchwork of music from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," to find the recollection troublesome when that glowing and impassioned Symphonic Suite is played in the concert-hall as the composer put it to paper. A few minds may still visualize the personages and the progress of "The Fire-Bird" in the theatre, when the sound of Stravinsky's music from Mr. Monteux and the orchestra blows into thin flame this or that smouldering memory. A few more, perhaps, may set Bakst's tower of molten red, Mr. Bolm's figure of the fated wayfarer, as pale and sombre as some spectre of old ballad, the barbaric garb and the barbaric dances of Tamar's train, as background to Balakirev's tone-poem, heard as symphonic piece. There, recollection of a visible stage, aglow with color, alive with action, halts as necessary handmaid to the ballet-music played at the Symphony Concerts since Mr. Monteux took command of them. Dukas's "Peri," which he included in his programmes of 1918, has never been set upon the stage in America and none too often represented in Paris. Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," more recently played at Symphony Hall, is unknown to the American theatre; while Debussy's "Jeux," heard yesterday at the Symphony Concert, vanished from the repertory of the Russian Ballet itself after no more than six or eight performances divided between Paris and London.

170

With these three pieces, the sympathetic hearer, unless he has stumbled upon them in some European journey, must set sparks to his imagination from no better flint and steel than prefatory "arguments," printed description, and chance photographs and drawings. At best, there are no very brisk kindling in comparison with memories of actual and graphic performance; while to many a willing imagination they are quite cold and lifeless. As practised conductor of ballet and opera, long in the service of the Russians themselves, Mr. Monteux possesses this visualizing faculty. By the same token, he may forget how relatively rare it is among his hearers. It is quite true that, more or less remotely, Dukas anticipated the performance of "The Peri," Stravinsky the performance of "The Fire-Bird," and Debussy, the performance of "Jeux" as symphonic pieces in the concert-hall. It is as true, however, that when they were designing, moulding and coloring their music, they were at work upon it as music of theatre to clothe, sustain and enhance a visible and illusory action, to be within a decorative and atmospheric frame. Exactly as the composer of an opera in the modern sense of the word must write many a page in order to "get on" with the dramatic narrative, so the composer of a ballet or a mimo-drama, again in the current fashion, must put more or less notes to music-paper merely to point the details of a pre-determined action.

Such measures, often brief, but not always few, are sure to sound empty and meaningless in the concert-hall. In "Jeux" the empty garden by night. A few measures are not many; but they are also easily recognizable; while for the moment they jolt the hearer out of the atmosphere and out of the illusion it is no questioning the beauty of the music summing, out even of its progress and continuity as a symphonic web. Moreover, winding and unwinding, ever parting and these passages, aside, there is no questioning, of a sudden coalesce into a fewing the fact that music for a ballet or measures of sustained, diaphanous, ex-music for a mimodrama, unless it be prettily decorated, elementary dance-tunes, shimmering arabesques of harmony, swim-as in Chalkovsky's "Nut-Cracker," is little more than half itself unless it is accompanied by the action and framed by the settings for which it was written. Tone-ball, which never was and never could be poem or no tone-poem, imagination or no tennis-ball, falls into the garden from imagination in the hearer, the analogy of nowhere. At the end, a similar ball similar play of the spoken word holds good. A larly descends. One mime carries a piece for the theatre is a piece within the theatre and puts it by, as Jean de Rezzké theatre or otherwise only its diminished self. For no other No. Debussy's music is concerned with reason, "The Peri," "Salome's Tragedy," in the sensuous impulses, the amorous play, measure "The Fire-Bird" and now "Jeux" the little piques and the little coquetties have all failed as symphonic pieces to impress, perhaps to interest, the average hearer in Symphony Hall. It is mere irritation to call him dull and stupid; often indeed he has tried his best to visualize the action that the music should clothe. It is rank injustice to lay blame upon Mr. Monteux, since in such music he excels even his usually able self. The fate of such ventures, unless they be made upon an audience to which the visualization of the ballet or the mimodrama has become second nature, is intrinsic in the ventures themselves. Even the most eloquent fragments of Wagner's music-dramas suffer when they are wrenched from operative foreground, background and actuality and played detachedly in the concert-hall. How ill, then, may the less familiar, the more intricate, the more subtly delineative music for the theatre of Dukas, Stravinsky and Debussy bear such transfer!

The interest and the pleasure of "Jeux," in performance as a tone-poem of the concert-room was, therefore, an interest and a pleasure for the sophisticated, the studious and the curious. They deserve their inning at the Symphony Concerts, no less than do those who prefer more transparent and elementary satisfactions from the music they hear. These connoisseurs were amply and finely rewarded; not a few will return this evening to hear "Jeux" anew; and in such response Mr. Monteux may well find compensation for the pains he spent in preparation of the performance, for the hopes he cherished of it. Through no shortcoming of conductor or orchestra, who indeed surpassed themselves with the music, did Debussy's ballet remain "Caviare to the general." Rather, to semi-prepared, readily responsive and finely sensitive hearers, it gave immediate and keen delight. There is no mistaking, for example, the loveliness of the music that, at the beginning and again at the end, evokes the solitude, the mystery, of the empty garden by night. A few measures—such is Debussy's economy and concentration of means—weave atmosphere and atmosphere of fantasy. Again, there is no questioning the beauty of the music when Debussy's threads of motifs, ever winding and unwinding, ever parting and twining, of a sudden coalesce into a fewing the fact that music for a ballet or measures of sustained, diaphanous, ex-music for a mimodrama, unless it be prettily decorated, elementary dance-tunes, shimmering arabesques of harmony, swim-as in Chalkovsky's "Nut-Cracker," is little more than half itself unless it is accompanied by the action and framed by the settings for which it was written. Tone-ball, which never was and never could be poem or no tone-poem, imagination or no tennis-ball, falls into the garden from imagination in the hearer, the analogy of nowhere. At the end, a similar ball similar play of the spoken word holds good. A larly descends. One mime carries a piece for the theatre is a piece within the theatre and puts it by, as Jean de Rezzké theatre or otherwise only its diminished self. For no other No. Debussy's music is concerned with reason, "The Peri," "Salome's Tragedy," in the sensuous impulses, the amorous play, measure "The Fire-Bird" and now "Jeux" the little piques and the little coquetties have all failed as symphonic pieces to im-

10-1
In the intoxication of a fair midsummer night and of their own wanton promptings. The music when it sounds like a mere succession of harmonic, instrumental rhythmic points, is tremulous with these youthful and sensuous quiverings. When it spins itself into the finest of tonal threads, it seems to undulate to these amorous impulses. When, for a moment, it sustains itself in clearly melodic measures, it is warm and bright with this playful passion. As some will have it, Debussy is minded here and there to mock these youthful amorists. Possibly, though these ironies are easy to detect, except when he gently mocks the pique of one or the other pouting girl.

Much more easy for the practised ear to discover is the intricacy and the sophistication of the music. Hardly anywhere else, even in these later pieces, has Debussy so divided and sub-divided both his motives and his orchestra, so delicately and dexterously interwoven his melodies and counter-melodies, been so light and adroit of harmonic and instrumental stroke, fanciful of arabesque, subtle of rhythmic suggestion. If in his younger days he wrote music in iridescent stream, now he writes a music that seems all gleaming, titillating points. Yet, by these means, he gains, even in the concert-room, not merely illusion of time, place and personages, but of the very impulses stirring from instant to instant in them. He has written in "Jeux" not only a music of subtle and shimmering fantasy, but also a music of penetrating sensuous charm and at instants of warm sensuous beauty. The keener the charm and the brighter the beauty because at moments it is bitter-sweet. Rarely, and only rarely, has he fallen into the temptation of such a score, which is to write music for eye on the engraved page rather than for ear in the concert-hall.

The contrasting piece, as the movie programmes like to say—contrasting, besides, in more senses than one was Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin," written in the days in which ancient Russian legend kindled his imagination and o'd Russian folk melody stimulated his invention. In tones, he would retell the tale of the brigand, who sailed the Volga and strode its bank pillaging and harrying alike on land and water. In time came the day of reckoning, when the troops of the Czar pressed upon Razin and his outlaws. Upon the Volga, the mighty Volga, he bethought himself, he had long flourished, yet had he bestowed nothing upon the river. Into the stream forthwith he cast his fair Persian m'stress. As though the might of the river renewed their might, his men then and there beat back the threatening millions of "law and order." A pleasant, a pliant, a characteristically Russian tale, of which, however, Glazunov has made less in his music than there was reason to expect, alike from the promise of the material and the curious repute of the tone-poem itself. Thereon, it is the custom to say, the listener may hear the youthful, the imaginative, the vitalizing Glazunov before he came o'd, academical and shrunk into quasi-Teutonic grooves.

113
171

Yet, somehow, the music of "Stenka Razin" is impressive and alive only when the composer, like the brigand of his tonal tale, has to do with the Volga. There is a motive for the pirate—"short, savage, bizarre," according to the programme-book; yet in actual hearing by no means arresting to the ear, and scarcely more significant when on occasion it flashes and flails through tumultuous measures. There is motif, likewise, for the hapless Persian princess—a motif that becomes a melody dipped in oriental harmonies, beating to oriental rhythms, yet not quite stirring the imagination, even under elaborate "working," as do Rimsky-Korsakov's magical eastern measures. There is also a motif of the Volga—no other than the folk-tune, rising, falling, swelling, vanishing, of the drudging, trudging boatmen. It seizes the ear, penetrates the admiration, enkindles Glazunov, dominates the tone-poem. Again and again it recurs, and at each return it bourgeons into music pictorial of the great and glowing river or voice and image of its might. True Glazunov is prone to repeat his pictures and to reiterate his imagery. But with the one he is vivid and with the other he is eloquent. Not to the glory of Stenka Razin but to the glory of the Volga runs his tone-poem, and to his own glory in the day when he could still write the music of a fired composer and not of thoughtful pedagogue.

H. T. PARKER

Dr. Karl Muck, who was forced to leave America and the Boston Symphony, is now being made of a great deal in Berlin. He declares to his German admirers that he "was hounded by ignorant American officials on the ground that his innocent musical scores contained a code of communication." He is toasted and cheered on all public occasions.

Thursday evening, Jan. 15, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the fourth of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. The first violoncellist, Mr. Bedetti, will be heard in a Concerto.

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Ballet as Tone-Poem for the First Times in America—The Fracas Over It Six Years Ago in Paris—The Composer's Music Versus Nijinsky's Action—A Deli-

When the fracas over it was at height, the defenders of the music against the "choreography" declared that it would readily gain and maintain place as a tone-poem for the concert-hall. In fact, it has seldom been heard anywhere since the summer of 1913, in which Mr. Monteux, with Debussy at hand for suggestion and also approval, first produced it.

The Original Fracas

After the first performance of "Jeux" in Paris, Monsieur Lalo, reviewer for Le Temps, returned to his desk in a fury

"Jeux"—The Triple Kiss

phony Concerts, here in Boston, Dr. Muck played in two suites substantially the whole of Ravel's setting of "Daphnis and Chloe"; while in the autumn of 1918 Mr. Monteux played in toto and as a symphonic piece, Dukas's "Peri." At the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next he will do likewise by Debussy's "Jeux," for the first hearings of the "poème dansé" on this side of the Atlantic.

merely exacts an arbitrary system of his own. Willfully he chooses ugliness and freakishness instead of the demanded, the desired, beauty. Why, in Heaven's name, has he been permitted to impose on Debussy's subtle, delicate, fluid music this geometrical, stifling, heavy-handed 'choreography'? At moments, by sheer instinct, he and Miss Karsavina and Miss Schollar escape their 'system' and dance charmingly, but few in a short piece are these returns to common sense."

A month later in London, the reviewer for The Times was only a little less severe:

Every one knows by now that Debussy and Nijinsky between them have concocted a "tennis ballet." There was little need in reality to be so precise about the game, for the tennis (such as it is) is entirely irrelevant. It has not even conditioned the convention in which the movements are conceived and carried out. They seem rather to be designed by a freshly invented convention

The reduction for piano, however, specifies the "choreography" in recurring annotation above the staves. It follows herewith, printed continuously as an "argument":

The curtain rises on the empty garden. . . . A tennis-ball falls on the stage. . . . A youth in tennis-clothes, racquet in hand, crosses the stage with a spring and vanishes. . . . At the back, on the left, appear two girls, inquiringly, apprehensively. For a moment they seem to be seeking no more than a secluded spot for confidences. . . . One dances by herself. . . . In turn the other dances.

"Jeux"—Discoveries

Nijinsky's Action

Perhaps by intention of Debussy, the orchestral score of "Jeux" gives no hint of the action devised by Nijinsky. It is in fact, as straightforwardly engraved as though it were a tone-poem self-contained.

Debussy, an innovator in musical and harmonic inventions, shows a corresponding faculty for clothing his ideas in new orchestral garb. Whether, as in other respects, he was quick to fertilize a hint from the Neo-Russians or from his French contemporaries, notably the "Monsieur" Massenet of irreverent Parisian youth, his

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Ballet as Tone-Poem for the First Times in America—The Fracas Over It Six Years Ago in Paris—The Composer's Music Versus Nijinsky's Action—A Delicate, Subtle, Fluid Score in His Super-Sensitive Manner

NO sooner had Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet gained a footing in Paris, say ten years ago, than he proposed to various French composers that they undertake pieces for it. One and another—Ravel, Dukas, Hahn, Debussy—accepted the invitation. It opened a new field to them; it tempted their imaginations alike with the prospect of composition and of performance; while, for the time, no form of music was so much the fashion, so much "in the air," so much acclaimed in present estate and future promise as the ballet, the mimodrama, the "poème dansé." Receiving their commissions, Ravel set to "Daphnis and Chloe"; Dukas to "The Peri"; Hahn to "The Blue God," and Debussy to "Jeux," officially translated "Playtime." In due course, the Russian Ballet produced "Daphnis and Chloe" whereupon Ravel and Diaghilev quarrelled bitterly over the use or the disuse of an invisible chorus. Dukas, quarrelling likewise with the director, repented his bargain and other hands ultimately set "The Peri" on the stage. "The Blue God" was mimed and danced—and Hahn and Diaghilev kept the peace. "Jeux" was tranquilly produced; but forthwith a furious hubbub arose over a "choreography" devised and enforced by Nijinsky, but declared by the partisans of Debussy to be wholly at odds with the music. To the discordant tune of this controversy, "Jeux" was represented for a few times in Paris and in London in the summer of 1913 and thereafter quietly dropped from the repertory of the ballet.

None of these pieces has yet been set on the stage in the United States, though the Russians at their second visit promised "Daphnis and Chloe" and "The Blue God." Hahn's music, such as it is, remains unknown to American ears; but at the Symphony Concerts, here in Boston, Dr. Muck played in two suites substantially the whole of Ravel's setting of "Daphnis and Chloe"; while in the autumn of 1918 Mr. Monteux played in toto and as a symphonic piece, Dukas's "Peri." At the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next he will do likewise by Debussy's "Jeux," for the first hearings of the "poème dansé" on this side of the Atlantic.

When the fracas over it was at height, the defenders of the music against the "choreography" declared that it would readily gain and maintain place as a tone-poem for the concert-hall. In fact, it has seldom been heard anywhere since the summer of 1913, in which Mr. Monteux, with Debussy at hand for suggestion and also approval, first produced it.

The Original Fracas

After the first performance of "Jeux" in Paris, Monsieur Lalo, reviewer for Le Temps, returned to his desk in a fury and wrote: "The action of 'Jeux' is altogether simple. By night into a garden lighted by electric lamps, come a youth and two maidens dressed for tennis. The youth flirts with one of the girls, while the other looks on pouting. He then flirts with the second damsel, while the first pouts in her turn. Finally he flirts with them both, and all three, stretched on the turf, exchange a sort of triple kiss. Of sudden in bounds a tennis ball that scares them away. . . . Of Debussy's music I regret that I can tell you next to nothing. It is difficult to hear it; it is well-nigh impossible to heed it. In itself, it is economical, adroit, elastic, flowing, evanescent, fine-fibred, discreetly woven. It has, however, pleased the Russian Ballet to join it to a heavy and freakish background and to clothe it in a rude 'choreography.' Under this double burden Debussy lies stricken and suffocated. The setting and the action are so exasperating, so brutally freakish that they overwhelm the attention and the music passes almost unnoted."

"Choreography by Monsieur Nijinsky; setting by Monsieur Bakst"—and both are in shrieking discord with Debussy's clear intent. Following the precedent of his version of "The Afternoon of a Faun" Nijinsky imposes on the three youngsters—himself and Mes. Karsavina and Schollar—stiff and mechanical poses, angular and wizened gestures, geometrical of line, rude, jerky, wilfully begun, as arbitrarily checked or broken, derived obviously from primitive Grecian vase-painting. In "The Afternoon of a Faun" such miming was far enough from Debussy's music as Mallarmé's verse; but it had a measure of justification in the archaic suggestion of faun and nymphs. In "Jeux" it is without excuse. What have these rigid posturings, these sharpened silhouettes, this mincing play of arm and hand to do with the flirtation which is the beginning and the end of Nijinsky's action? In spite of his partisans, he 'stylizes' nothing; merely exacts an arbitrary system of his own. Wilfully he chooses ugliness and freakishness instead of the demanded, the desired, beauty. Why, in Heaven's name, has he been permitted to impose on Debussy's subtle, delicate, fluid music this geometrical, stifling, heavy-handed 'choreography'? At moments, by sheer instinct, he and Miss Karsavina and Miss Schollar escape their 'system' and dance charmingly, but few in a short piece are these returns to common sense."

A month later in London, the reviewer for The Times was only a little less severe:

Every one knows by now that Debussy and Nijinsky between them have concocted a "tennis ballet." There was little need in reality to be so precise about the game, for the tennis (such as it is) is entirely irrelevant. It has not even conditioned the convention in which the movements are conceived and carried out. They seem rather to be designed

The reduction for piano, however, specifies the "choreography" in recurring annotation above the staves. It follows herewith, printed continuously as an "argument":

The curtain rises on the empty garden. . . . A tennis-ball falls on the stage. . . . A youth in tennis-clothes, racquet in hand, crosses the stage with a spring and vanishes. . . . At the back, on the left, appear two girls, inquiringly, apprehensively. For a moment they seem to be seeking no more than a secluded spot for confinement. One dances by herself. . . . the other dances. . . .

Nijinsky's Action

Perhaps by intention of Debussy, the orchestral score of "Jeux" gives no hint of the action devised by Nijinsky. It is in fact, as straightforwardly engraved as though it were a tone-poem self-contained.

Debussy, an innovator in musical and harmonic inventions, shows a corresponding faculty for clothing his ideas in new orchestral garb. Whether, as in other respects, he was quick to fertilize a hint from the Neo-Russians or from his French contemporaries, notably the "Monsieur" Massenet of irreverent Parisian youth, his

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Ballet as Tone-Poem for the First Times in America—The Fracas Over It Six Years Ago in Paris—The Composer's Music Versus Nijinsky's Action—A Deli-

phony Concerts, here in Boston, Dr. Muck played in two suites substantially the whole of Ravel's setting of "Daphnis and Chloe"; while in the autumn of 1918 Mr. Monteux played in toto and as a symphonic piece, Dukas's "Perl." At the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next he will do likewise by Debussy's "Jeux," for the first hearings of the "poème dansé" on this side of the Atlantic.

When the fracas over it was at height, the defenders of the music against the "choreography" declared that it would readily gain and maintain place as a tone-poem for the concert-hall. In fact, it has seldom been heard anywhere since the summer of 1913, in which Mr. Monteux, with Debussy at hand for suggestion and also approval, first produced it.

The Original Fracas

After the first performance of "Jeux" in Paris, Monsieur Lalo, reviewer for Le Temps, returned to his desk in a fury

merely exacts an arbitrary system of his own. Willfully he chooses ugliness and freakishness instead of the demanded, the desired, beauty. Why, in Heaven's name, has he been permitted to impose on Debussy's subtle, delicate, fluid music this geometrical, stifling, heavy-handed "choreography"? At moments, by sheer instinct, he and Miss Karsavina and Miss Schollar escape their 'system' and dance charmingly, but few in a short piece are these returns to common sense."

A month later in London, the reviewer for The Times was only a little less severe:

Every one knows by now that Debussy and Nijinsky between them have concocted a "tennis ballet." There was little need in reality to be so precise about the game, for the tennis (such as it is) is entirely irrelevant. It has not even conditioned the convention in which the movements are conceived and carried out. They seem rather to be designed by a freshly invented convention which aims at expression neither by naturalistic movements nor by movements based on pictorial symbols. Some of the symbolism is plastic and here and there are some beautiful poses—notably one of Nijinsky when he turns his head on one side and tightens the muscles of the neck—but it is confused through being broken into by leaps and bounds and certain swirling movements which seem to have been transferred from the old familiar ballets in the repertory. Some of the new language in which the ideas are expressed is beautiful and eloquent and is really expressive, but it covers only a very small field. It expresses timidity and virgin coyness, for instance, and bashful joy and in the very last moment fear at some unexpected and inexplicable intrusion (when the second tennis ball is thrown over the hedge), but it is like a language in which the speaker is restricted to a portion of the alphabet. Many ideas cannot be properly expressed at all from the want of letters to form the words in the speaker's mind, or else old letters have to be used in new senses and the result is confusion.

Perhaps Nijinsky will some day discover and learn the whole alphabet of which at present he has acquired only the partial use; at present his results are too tentative, and, though we may admire him for attempting to strike out into new paths by inventing fresh conventions, we cannot be insensible to the ludicrousness and the ugliness of much of what he has designed. . . . One longed to be able to unbuckle the limbs of the dancers and set them free from the rigid ties by which they were bound. Their faces, too, were rigid, for it is part of the convention that they should express no emotion, and this made one want to have them covered with masks. It was tantalizing to see the faces of Nijinsky, Karsavina, and Schollar with all the humanity drawn out of them. The whole thing, in fact, was unsatisfactory aesthetically because hampering restrictions were placed by an arbitrary convention without bringing any compensating powers of expression.

Nijinsky's Action

Perhaps by intention of Debussy, the orchestral score of "Jeux" gives no hint of the action devised by Nijinsky. It is in fact, as straightforwardly engraved as though it were a tone-poem self-contained.

The reduction for piano, however, specifies the "choreography" in recurring annotation above the staves. It follows herewith, printed continuously as an "argument":

The curtain rises on the empty garden. . . . A tennis-ball falls on the stage. . . . A youth in tennis-clothes, racquet in hand, crosses the stage with a spring and vanishes. . . . At the back, on the left, appear two girls, inquiringly, apprehensively. For a moment they seem to be seeking no more than a secluded spot for confidences. . . . One dances by herself.

. . . In turn the other dances. The girls stop, perturbed by the rustle of leaves pushed aside. . . . The youth is seen at the back trying to screen himself. He watches the movements of the girls. He draws near and stands in front of them. . . . They are ready to run away, but he detains and invites them. . . . He begins to dance. The first girl runs toward him. They dance together. . . . He asks a kiss. She eludes him. He asks again; once more she turns away. . . . then rejoins him consenting. . . . Pettishly, jealously, the second girl watches these amorous ecstasies and mocks them in ironic dance.

The youth begins to heed the girl's dance inquiringly, interestedly. Soon he forsakes the first girl, unable to resist the desire to dance with the second. . . . "It is thus we dance." [The first figure of the much-applauded waltz.] The second girl repeats the figure. "Don't make fun of us." . . . And they dance together. . . . The dance becomes more caressing. The girl runs away and hides in the shrubbery. The youth follows her. In a moment they return with the boy in chase of the girl. Again they dance together. . . . In their excitement and preoccupation with each other they have not noticed the mood of the other girl. She has hidden her face in her hands and is ready to run away. Her friend tries vainly to detain her. She will not hear a word. The second girl finally takes her in her arms. Presently the youth intervenes, gently parting them. "Look around. The beauty of the night, the joy of the light bid us yield to our fancies." Forthwith all three dance together. . . . With an eager movement the boy draws their heads together and a triple kiss fuses their amorous intoxication. . . . A tennis ball falls at their feet. Surprised, alarmed, they spring away and vanish into the depths of the garden. . . .

There remains a word about the music, as the orchestral score discloses it. Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill has written it as hereunder:

And Last the Music

Debussy, an innovator in musical and harmonic inventions, shows a corresponding faculty for clothing his ideas in new orchestral garb. Whether, as in other respects, he was quick to fertilize a hint from the Neo-Russians or from his French contemporaries, notably the "Monsieur" Massenet of irreverent Parisian youth, his orchestral works show a progressive mastery in subtilizing the resources of the orchestra. From "The Afternoon of a Faun" through the "Nocturnes," "Pelleas and Mélisande," "The Sea" and finally the "Images," he was continually exploring new tonal synonyms for delicacy, fresh shadings of evanescent poetry, and impalpable suggestions of "atmosphere." There are numerous anecdotes of his tireless experiments in orchestration after music was in rehearsal, to the annoyance of conductors and the confusion of copyists. Often apparently satisfied, he would meditate re-scorings up to the last possible moment. Thus Mr. Rabaud introduced into his performances of the "Nocturnes" in Boston last season revisions, which materially improved the effect of many details to the sensitive ear.

"Jeux," irrespective of its musical charm, is one of the most felicitous, if possibly the latest, instance of Debussy's orchestral finesse. Studied in a piano version, the music comes upon occasion perilously near to slightness, to use no more derogatory an epithet. But ballet-masters require a "practical" version for rehearsal, and thus it is only from the orchestral score that one can gain an adequate idea of the musical as well as the orchestral value of this piece. For Debussy has added innumerable arabesques and counter-melodies of expressive importance. He has clarified "voice-leading" which are at best only barely indicated, and sometimes are hardly sketched. He has intensified the rhythms, through the judicious employment of instruments of percussion, and furthermore has often continued and coordinated them in a manner that adds immeasurably to the architectural "lines" of the piece itself. Thus the piano version is perforce the sketch, and the orchestral score the finished picture.

To the well-nigh conventional list of instruments which the modernist French composer deems essential to obtain variety and refinement of orchestral color, Debussy only adds a second piccolo, which, with the first, can obtain soft, acute effects impossible to the flutes, and a third clarinet. The more tractable sarrusophone replaces the more cumbersome contra-bassoon. The half-dozen instruments of percussion, used deftly, though with economy, are all as familiar as the two harps and celesta. But the strings are subdivided to an unwonted extent, sometimes merely in the interests of delicacy, sometimes to secure sensitive complexities, which would otherwise be too concrete and baffling for dramatic illusion.

But against this background of normal equipment Debussy has made excursions into novelty which are unusual even in his career of exploration, and patient experiment. If the scenario of "Jeux" comes dangerously near the ridiculous, and if the material of the music comes close to Debussy's limit as concerns exiguousness, the disposition of his orchestral resources helps to heighten poetic and dramatic illusion to an extraordinary degree. After the tennis ball bounds on the stage, the gestures of the apprehensive and curious young girls is mirrored in the light and ethereal strings, with the background of wind chords. When the young man who sought the tennis ball, curious in his turn, parts the branches of the bushes to watch the young girls' dance, the shimmer of highly sub-divided strings brings a graphic illusion in orchestral tone. The embrace of the young man and a girl brings a moment of intensity and coloristic sonority, only equalled by the graphic irony of the choice of instruments in the following passage in which the second girl exhibits jealousy and mocks the dance of the others. Again when he first girl hurt in turn, tries to flee, her chagrin and injured vanity find subtle equivalent in the shrinking music given to a few desks of violins, violas and violoncellos in alternation with wind instruments. These are only a few tangible episodes in a work replete with imaginative touches in coloristic detail.

The mutual reconciliation of the two girls and the young man and their final dance brings a gradual increasing massing of instruments still relatively subtle, but so adroitly handled that the final climax gains additional force. To point this out in detail would necessitate a departure into technical explanation which would inevitably be tedious and possibly fruitless. After the flight of all his characters, Debussy rings down his dramatic and orchestral curtain by recalling the misty and vague prelude with which he began, embellished with some appropriately impressionistic figures in the strings against woodwind chords. Whatever discussion may arise as to the music, there can hardly be two opinions as to the supremely successful manner in which Debussy has set his music in the orchestra. Color, poetry, subtilized emotion and rhythm are there with a mastery which he has never exceeded.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

ELEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 16, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, AT 8 P. M.

STOJOWSKI,

SYMPHONY in D minor, op. 21

- I. Andante; Allegro moderato
- II. Andante
- III. Scherzo: Molto vivace
- IV. Finale; Allegro con fuoco ma non vivace
(First time in Boston)

SONGS with Orchestra

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| a) BRAHMS, | "Ever lighter grows my slumber" |
| b) SCHUMANN, | Bride's Song, No. 1, "Mother, can I love thee the less?" |
| c) SCHUMANN, | Bride's Song, No. 2, "Leave me in his arms endearing." |
| d) SCHUBERT. | "Erl-King" |

(English version of texts by H. E. Krehbiel)
(Orchestration of songs by Leopold Stokowski)

WAGNER,

EXCERPTS from "The Dusk of the Gods"

- a) Funeral Music
- b) Immolation Scene. (with Soprano)

Soloist:

MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

174

orchestral works show a progressive mastery in subtilizing the resources of the orchestra. From "The Afternoon of a Faun" through the "Nocturnes," "Pélleas and Mélisande," "The Sea" and finally the "Images," he was continually exploring new tonal synonyms for delicacy, fresh shadings of evanescent poetry, and impalpable suggestions of "atmosphere." There are numerous anecdotes of his tireless experiments in orchestration after music was in rehearsal, to the annoyance of conductors and the confusion of copyists. Often apparently satisfied, he would meditate re-scorings up to the last possible moment. Thus Mr. Rabaud introduced into his performances of the "Nocturnes" in Boston last season revisions, which materially improved the effect of many details to the sensitive ear.

"Jeux," irrespective of its musical charm, is one of the most felicitous, if possibly the latest, instance of Debussy's orchestral finesse. Studied in a piano version, the music comes upon occasion perilously near to slightness, to use no more derogatory an epithet. But ballet-masters require a "practical" version for rehearsal, and thus it is only from the orchestral score that one can gain an adequate idea of the musical as well as the orchestral value of this piece. For Debussy has added innumerable arabesques and counter-melodies of expressive importance. He has clarified "voice-leading," which are at best only barely indicated, and sometimes are hardly sketched. He has intensified the rhythms, through the judicious employment of instruments of percussion, and furthermore has often continued and coordinated them in a manner that adds immeasurably to the architectural "lines" of the piece itself. Thus the piano version is perforce the sketch, and the orchestral score the finished picture.

To the well-nigh conventional list of instruments which the modernist French composer deems essential to obtain variety and refinement of orchestral color, Debussy only adds a second piccolo, which, with the first, can obtain soft, acute effects impossible to the flutes, and a third clarinet. The more tractable sarrusophone replaces the more cumbersome contra-bassoon. The half-dozen instruments of percussion, used deftly, though with economy, are all as familiar as the two harps and celesta. But the strings are subdivided to an unwonted extent, sometimes merely in the interests of delicacy, sometimes to secure sensitive complexities, which would otherwise be too concrete and baffling for dramatic illusion.

But against this background of normal equipment Debussy has made excursions into novelty which are unusual even in his career of exploration, and patient experiment. If the scenario of "Jeux" comes dangerously near the ridiculous, and if the material of the music comes close to Debussy's limit as concerns exiguousness, the disposition of his orchestral resources helps to heighten poetic and dramatic illusion to an extraordinary degree. After the tennis ball bounds on the stage, the gestures of the apprehensive and curious young girls is mirrored in the light and ethereal strings, with the background of wind chords. When the young man who sought the tennis ball, curious in his turn, parts the branches of the bushes to watch the young girls' dance, the shimmer of highly sub-divided strings brings a graphic illusion in orchestral tone. The embrace of the young man and a girl brings a moment of intensity and coloristic sonority, only equalled by the graphic irony of the choice of instruments in the following passage in which the second girl exhibits jealousy and mocks the dance of the others. Again when he first girl hurt in turn, tries to flee, her chagrin and injured vanity find subtle equivalent in the shrinking music given to a few desks of violins, violas and violoncellos in alternation with wind instruments. These are only a few tangible episodes in a work replete with imaginative touches in coloristic detail.

The mutual reconciliation of the two girls and the young man and their final dance brings a gradual increasing massing of instruments still relatively subtle, but so skilfully handled that the final climax gains additional force. To point this out in detail would necessitate a departure into technical explanation which would inevitably be tedious and possibly fruitless. After the flight of all his characters, Debussy rings down his dramatic and orchestral curtain by recalling the misty and vague prelude with which he began, embellished with some appropriately impressionistic figures in the strings against woodwind chords. Whatever discussion may arise as to the music, there can hardly be two opinions as to the supremely successful manner in which Debussy has set his music in the orchestra. Color, poetry, subtilized emotion and rhythm are there with a mastery which he has never exceeded.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

ELEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 16, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, AT 8 P. M.

STOJOWSKI,

SYMPHONY in D minor, op. 21

- I. Andante; Allegro moderato
- II. Andante
- III. Scherzo: Molto vivace
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco ma non vivace
(First time in Boston)

SONGS with Orchestra

- a) BRAHMS, "Ever lighter grows my slumber"
- b) SCHUMANN, Bride's Song, No. 1, "Mother, can I love thee the less?"
- c) SCHUMANN, Bride's Song, No. 2, "Leave me in his arms endearing."
- d) SCHUBERT, "Erl-King"

(English version of texts by H. E. Krehbiel)
(Orchestration of songs by Leopold Stokowski)

WAGNER,

EXCERPTS from "The Dusk of the Gods"

- a) Funeral Music
- b) Immolation Scene. (with Soprano)

Soloist:

MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

MARGARETE MATZENAUER

Phenomenal Prima-Donna Soprano
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

11TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Jan. 7, 1920

Paderewski Prize Piece by Stojowski Introduced to Boston

KREISLER SOLOIST FOR NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Stojowski, symphony in D minor (first time in Boston), songs with orchestra; Brahms, Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber; Schumann bride's songs—Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less; Leave Me in His Arms Endearing; Schubert, Erlking, Wagner; Siegfried's funeral music; Bruennhilde's immolation scene.

Mr. Stojowski's name has long been known in Boston. He and Mr. Hess played his violin sonata 10 years ago; he and Mr. Schroeder played the violoncello sonata. His symphonic rhapsody for piano and orchestra was heard at the Boston Opera House seven years ago, when he was the pianist. A vocal composition of his was performed by the Boston Singing Club in 1906. His piano concerto was played by Mr. Paderewski at a Symphony concert in March, 1916.

But Mr. Stojowski was first known here as a pianist. He played with the Kneisel quartet in 1906, and in the same year gave a piano recital.

The symphony performed yesterday took some 29 years ago a prize in a composition founded by Mr. Paderewski for Polish composers. It is the work of a serious, high minded musician, but, with the exception of the Scherzo, it shows labor rather than inspiration. The opening of the first movement arrests attention and in this movement as in the finale there is some salient thematic material. It is in the development of this material that a paucity of invention is disclosed. The Scherzo is charming throughout, pleasingly fantastical, and deftly orchestrated, in which respect it is in strong contrast to the other movements. The Symphony was finely played; the performance of the difficult Scherzo was remarkably clear, light and graceful. Boston should be proud of its orchestra which has just returned from a trip, having won the enthusiastic praise of critics and audiences. And Boston may well be proud of Mr. Monteux, who has brought this orchestra to its high state of proficiency, whose interpretations of classic and romantic music are most eloquent.

Mme. Matzenauer, who for some time has been lustily proclaiming her undying devotion to the American flag—"the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light"—chose for her first appearance here at a Symphony concert songs by three Germans and one Austrian. Fortunately she sang them in English, translations made for her by Mr. Krehbiel. She sang the songs of Brahms, Schumann and Schubert with an orchestral accompaniment invented by Mr. Stokowski of Philadelphia. Berlioz years ago orchestrated the accompaniment of the "Erlking," and it is said that he had some skill in writing for an orchestra. Singers have been hitherto contented with his "Erlking." Liszt, also, orchestrated Schubert's accompaniment and he, too, had some talent in this field.

The songs of Brahms and of Schumann, being of a more intimate nature, are more effective in a small hall with the accompaniment of a piano. Mme. Matzenauer, with her beautiful voice, sang them expressively. She chose the ventriloquistic reading of the "Erlking" so that at the end one unavoidably thought of Mr. Fred Stone with his phrase of praise, "Very Good, Eddie."

Mr. Stokowski, after the performance of his symphony, was called upon the stage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will comprise Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B Flat, No. 2, and Brahms's Violin Concerto. Mr. Kreisler will be the violinist.

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Post — Jan. 17/20
Mme. Matzenauer Is Eloquent in Wagner Numbers

BY OLIN DOWNES

There is but one Richard Wagner. Exigencies of the war, the atrocious conduct of a Prussian government, necessarily made silent for a while, in concert halls, the great voice which was always raised, during Wagner's life-time, against Prussianism. But yesterday afternoon Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, put on his programme the music of Siegfried's death and the scene of Brunhilde's Immolation from Wagner's "The Twilight of the Gods," and the effect was little short of sublime.

It would not have been what it was lacking the presence of Margaret Matzenauer, a superb woman, a supremely dramatic singer, to deliver the lines of Brunhilde's sacrifice and atonement. In truth, it has been many years since this music has been sung in so grand a spirit, by an artist with a voice of such phenomenal capacities, a voice nobly equal to the task Wagner has set his soprano in this famous scene. The rehearing of this music, the inspired manner in which it was sung, made one of the most memorable moments of many seasons of Boston Symphony concerts.

IS A GREAT ARTIST

Mme. Matzenauer has long been known as the possessor of a voice of astonishing range, which has made it possible for her to sing both contralto and soprano roles in opera. In addition to its range—and the circumstance is indeed rare good fortune—the voice has the most uncommon resources of color and sonority throughout its registers. And finally Mme. Matzenauer has developed remarkably as a mistress of song and as an emotional interpreter until today she stands as one of the greatest operatic artists of this generation.

She is essentially of the operatic stage. Standards of concert deportment as established in cold roast Boston do not particularly commend her spontaneous gestures, though these gestures are always interpretive of the music and in the picture. Even when she sang songs of Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, she was an artist of the stage, albeit one who had carefully studied the art of song, the power of restraint and the finest shades of vocal interpretation. There are singers who bawl out the confidences of Schumann's bride-to-be as if they were soap-box orators on the Common.

Schumann's Bride's Songs

Mme. Matzenauer gave the two "Bride's Songs" the simplicity, the tenderness, the intimate appeal so characteristic of a certain side of the genius of Schumann, as well as of the subject. She gave voice to the bitter melancholy of Brahms' "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber" with a discretion and poignant simplicity which made the end of the song especially unforgettable.

We personally liked least her singing of Schubert's "Erl-King." Not that it lacked intelligence, or failed to follow approved standards of interpretation. That was just the trouble, we get tired to death of hearing these imitations of the little boy's voice and the father's voice and the voice of the Erl-King. We would like to see more suggestion and less realism in the interpretation of this romantic song. We would like to have something left to the imagination of the hearer.

Looked the Part

It was in the music from "Die Gotterdammerung" that Mme. Matzenauer reached her full height and gave an overwhelming performance. It is not entirely irrelevant in this place to remark that since her last Boston appearances some seasons ago she has eaten and grown thin, or something of the sort, and has emerged from the process a very impressive and eloquent figure on the stage—in physique, the type of artist which Wagner would have acclaimed for his heroine. She stood the part, she looked it as she sang it, and she put the grandeur and the noble pathos of the music into her tones. That glorious voice surged through or over the most tumultuous effects of the orchestra which was hymning the downfall of old gods, the rebirth of the world, the all-consuming triumph of love. Mighty music! Mr. Monteux conducted with all enthusiasm and sympathy, and he had a wondrous voice, and a woman who could sing, to crown his efforts.

Composer Brought Out

In retrospect of this concert, one recalls the first performance in Boston of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor, an ambitious work which won the Paderewski prize in a contest presided over by Arthur Nikisch. This symphony was also applauded to the echo, and the composer was brought out on the platform by Mr. Monteux.

It will seem crabbed and opinionated, in the face of the tremendous enthusiasm shown yesterday, for a mere humble reviewer to state that in his own honest and deliberate opinion the Stojowski symphony is one of the most conventional and unimportant works he has heard for some time. But that is the case, and the work of a reviewer of music calls for such frankness of statement.

Little Individuality

We think this symphony of little value, because in the first place the themes themselves have little force or individuality. The first theme of the first movement, it is true, has a certain rhythmic force which is helpful in its development. But it is mock vigor. The thing does not ring very true. The second theme is sugary and banal. There are yards and yards of development of the kind that hardworking German composers have turned out by the ton for 50 years.

The orchestration is full and sonorous, but it has little variety of color: it is orchestration in chunks. One chunk of instruments is used here, another there. Nearly everything is kept going most of the time. It sounds perfectly well. That is, it sounds sonorously, brilliantly, euphoniously as you will. But that is not necessarily enough to make original orchestration or original music. An orchestra is such a marvelous thing anyway that the composer with a few stock tricks up his sleeve can make it sound positively magical to the ears. It requires more than all that to make a great symphony.

Second Movement Best

The second movement of this symphony seems to us the best, because we think that Mr. Stojowski has a melodic vein, which is not very virile, but is sweetly if somewhat innocuously melodious, and he has here written a kind of a song without words which is scarcely of symphonic calibre as regards the nature of the musical thought, while on the other hand it is pretty and pleasing. The scherzo is pretty, too. The finale is filled to the brim with outworn symphonic formulas.

As a glib talker often makes on first acquaintance an excellent impression which does not last, so we think that this symphony, applauded yesterday with the most genuine and spontaneous enthusiasm, representing a personal triumph which must have been—and may it continue to be—gratifying in the highest degree to the composer—will not hold a distinguished place in the symphonic repertory.

Matzenauer in Fine Voice at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Stojowski, Symphony in D minor.
Songs with Orchestra.
Soloist, Mme. Matzenauer.
Wagner, Death March and Finale from "Goetterdaemmerung."

FOR once the program had a Teutonic cast, since the songs by Mme. Matzenauer were by Schubert, Schumann and Franz, but the new Stojowski symphony gave Polish to the concert.

There were several commendable points in the new symphony. First, it is not so prolix as some modern works. Most of the recent symphonists take an extraordinary time to unfold their tale. Secondly, although Mr. Stojowski uses a very large orchestra, including English horn, bass clarinet, harp, bells, triangle and cymbals, he employs these in ever-changing combinations and seldom hurls all his forces at the auditor at once.

Also the composer does not deal in the complicated juggleries of rhythms which puzzle the auditor in almost every large modern orchestral work. But there is not a great amount of melodic charm in the new symphony.

Mr. Stojowski evidently prefers skill to direct emotion. There is constant figuration and the strings are given florid figures enough to cause them to thoroughly earn their salary. The work begins strikingly enough with a weird phase upon bass clarinet (afterwards becoming a theme), in the deepest depths, echoed upon English horn, but it speedily works up from this simplicity to some very forcible climaxes and the ending of the finale gives fortissimo trills leading up to a cymbal clash.

At a first hearing we found the Scherzo much the best movement, having many good effects of orchestral coloring and considerable piquancy in its very rapid measures.

That the work does not lean much to the lighter vein may be judged by the subtle distinction made in the tempo mark of the finale—"Allegro Con Fuoco, ma non Vivace"—a difference that amounts to an instruction to the conductor.

The Andante seemed the least powerful movement of the four. The transferences of thematic material from the first movement through the later parts of the symphony gave a certain continuity to the work, but few of these themes are likely to linger in the memory except the broad chief theme of the finale and the Queen-Mab-like one of the charming Scherzo. The composer was brought forward by Mr. Monteux, in response to continuous applause, three times at the end of the work on Friday afternoon.

Mme. Matzenauer with her broad and dramatic voice made much of the two Brides-songs by Schumann and of Brahms, "Ever lighter grows my clumber," but won her chief triumph in the "Erl-king." Yet we always prefer Schubert's ballad given by a male voice, for which he intended it. The German language being temporarily under an eclipse (although our chief version of the Scriptures is founded directly upon it) causes these songs to be heard in a rather diluted form.

We recall one of the crimes of translation in connection with the English version of the "Erl-King," published by Augener of London, where "the pale willows that danced to the Moan" are seen in the midst of a rain storm, and where the sentences of the father and the child are transferred, with the result that the child sings in deep tones—"Oh, father, look yonder, look yonder," he says, and the father pipes back in a high treble, "My son, upon what dost thou fearfully gaze?" And we could cite a dozen almost equally flagrant faults in changing songs from their original language.

Mr. Krehbiel's translations, however, were far above the average. But every translation is more or less a dilution, especially in the vocal masterpieces, where words and music are closely wedded, as for example in the finale of the great trilogy, which ended the concert.

Wagner's great funeral music at the death of Siegfried, which rehearses in guiding figures the chief points of the hero's life, and the magnificent solo with which the trilogy ends were unjust to Mr. Stejowski, for they shrivelled up his symphony. The present writer will forever recall hearing this finale sung at Villa Wahnfried with Stavenhagen at the piano and Materna giving the vocal part.

On this occasion Mme. Matzenauer approached even that memorable vocal performance. The orchestral reading did not rival some of the previous performances in America, for we have had even the greatest Wagnerian conductors in this country as far back as Thomas and Seidl and Muck and Toscanini have reached high-water mark in recent times.

There was an evident lack of authority and of subtleties of shading in the "Immolation Scene," although M. Monteux read the Siegfried Funeral music very effectively. But what with the noble breadth of Mme. Matzenauer and the grandeur of the musical thoughts here interwoven the scene made a powerful climax to the concert, and instead of rushing for trolley cars the audience remained to give vent to the most hearty and prolonged applause; therefore, the reviewer need not become hypercritical.

MATZENAUER SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Globe — Jan. 17, 1920

She Scores a Success in Program of Masterpieces

Wagner and Stojowski Pieces Complete the Program

Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, her first appearance here with the orchestra. Her numbers were the same she has already sung with orchestras in New York and Philadelphia during the current season: four familiar German songs, with English words by H. E. Krehbiel, and orchestrated accompaniments by Leopold Stokowski; and the final scene from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods." She is to be thanked for choosing these masterpieces instead of second rate novelties.

Her "Brunnhilde" must be of admirable dramatic intensity and vocal opulence, to judge by her singing in the "Immolation" scene. The power of Wagner's music is so great that his operas are "fool proof," provided the singers have voice enough to make themselves heard above the orchestral climaxes. But Mme. Matzenauer brought out the often ignored intrinsic force and beauty of the voice part and aided Mr. Monteux in making the performance of this excerpt a memorable one.

With the lyrics by Brahms and Schumann she was less successful. She stressed the dramatic significance of the words and so missed much of the serene beauty of the music. Her singing of Schubert's "Erl-king" was appropriately vivid.

Mr. Monteux missed, at times, repose in the Siegfried funeral music. He made the rhythm jerky and the entrances of the several motives ejaculatory. Dr. Muck, who was exceptionally successful with this music, used to make the rhythm steady and almost ponderous in its inevitability and the motives solemn and massive.

Only so can this excerpt seem unified and complete in itself in the concert hall. Mr. Monteux failed to convey the impression of inexhaustible reserve force behind the music which one always got from Dr. Muck's interpretation of it.

The remaining item was the Symphony in D minor, op. 21, by Sigismund Stojowski, the Polish composer and pianist, now resident in New York, played for the first time in Boston, though it is more than 20 years old. The pretty scherzo gave the audience especial pleasure, and the composer was led out by Mr. Monteux to acknowledge the applause at the end.

The themes are never banal, partly, one felt, because they are so fragmentary and so sedulously developed. But the work never attains the "grand manner," the power in repose, of the great models which its construction carefully follows. It is a little above the average of what has been dubbed "conductor's music," the work of a talented musician with considerable knowledge, taste and imaginative power, who lacks the indefinable something called genius.

Fritz Kreisler will play the Brahms violin concerto at the concerts next week, and Mr. Monteux will give his promised revival of D'Indy's Second Symphony.

STOJOWSKI SYMPHONY PLAYED IN BOSTON

Globe — Jan. 17, 1920

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on January 16, with a program made up as follows:

Stojowski—Symphony in D minor op. 21. Songs by Brahms, Schumann, and Schubert.

Wagner—Excerpts from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist.

Stojowski's symphony was performed for the first time in Boston. Its first performance in its final version was in 1901. Yet it cannot be considered a youthful work. The fire, the dash and audacity of youth are strangely absent. The composer, educated for the most part at the Paris Conservatoire, seems to have assimilated few of the characteristics of the French school. A pupil of Delibes, who was a master of orchestration, he seems to have caught little of the delicacy of style and coloring of his teacher. It is remarkable that surrounded during the formative years by French influences he should have been so little moved by them, and no more does this symphony betray his nationality. In short, despite its seriousness of purpose, its careful working out, its learning, it is often dull. The scherzo and certain pages of the andante alone have charm.

Mme. Matzenauer sang with rare feeling and emotional power. Known chiefly as an operatic singer, it was an unexpected pleasure to find her so expert as an interpreter of "Lieder." The songs were given with great effect, yet she never resorted to the methods and tricks of the operatic stage. Such a dignified, restrained style is appropriate to a symphony concert and those who often justly argue that the presence of a soloist is a disturbing element at these concerts must have felt that their arguments have little force where such singing is concerned. The funeral music and the final scene from "The Dusk of the Gods" have been heard to better advantage. A certain thinness in the brass, a general uncertainty of attack were to be noticed, yet the performance of the symphony was brilliant, particularly the scherzo, which was beautifully colored and rhythmical.

The Figure That Matches the Song

Margaret Matzenauer

(Photograph by Georg)

At Last Received Into the Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT Trans. — Jan. 17, 1920 GERMAN SONGS AND FRAGMENTS OF WAGNER

Brahms, Schumann and Schubert to English Texts and in the Beauty of Mme. Matzenauer's Tones—Siegfried's Death-Music Strangely Still and Pale, but Brynhild's Monologue Carried to High Eloquence—Also Mr. Stojowski's Symphony

It is not necessary to return to Mr. Stojowski's symphony which began the Symphony Concert of yesterday and which was heartily applauded, as all sonorous music is, by the audience of Friday afternoon. A second hearing did not materially alter the impressions received from the first performance at Cambridge on Thursday and already recorded in these columns. Again Mr. Monteux spared no pains with the piece and if it still sounded tiresomely heavy handed and thick voiced he was blameless for such tedium. For most listeners, moreover, the interest of the concert sprang from the second half of the programme divided between four classic German songs sung with orchestra by Mme. Matzenauer and two fragments of Wagner's opera, "The Gloaming of the Gods"—the orchestral interlude that recalls and glorifies the dead Siegfried and Brynhild's long last speech before she mounts her pyre.

For the first time since the end of the late war, classic German songs were sung at a Symphony Concert, though classic German symphonies, overtures and tone-poems have been steadily played at them. For the first time, likewise, since the end of the war excerpts from an opera by Wagner—preludes aside—appeared on a programme of the Symphony Orchestra. For a fortnight these pieces had been announced, but no voice of intolerance had protested with either conductor or manager; while to actual performance the audience returned no signs but those of pleasure. Fewer than usual were the departures that familiarly intersperse the final items of a Symphony Concert; while at the end of Brynhild's monologue, nearly the whole listening company, plainly stirred by the conductor's and the singer's eloquence, lingered to applaud them. If the music of the dead Siegfried was less clapped, there was reason in a strangely colorless and passionless performance.

As for the classic German songs, which were warmly received, there is not a reason why they should not be sung at Symphony Concerts, so long as classic German symphonic pieces stand firm in the active repertory. As little is there reason for the "banning" of the operatic music of a German composer who set his last note to paper nearly forty years ago. His share in what the unforgetting and the unforgetting like to call "German guilt" seems negligible. Reason, however, is one thing and prejudice and petulance are others. Yet of these human infirmities there was not the smallest sign in the demeanor of the audience of yesterday. Rather, it seemed well and wisely content that Mr. Monteux—man and musician of open and liberal mind, if there ever was one, an honor thereby to his race and his profession—had restored the Symphony Concerts to the catholicity that these twenty years has not been the least of their glories. Thanks to him, thanks to the trustees of the orchestra, the hateful bigotries and malevolences of the hour have not penetrated the Symphony Concerts. There a liberal art, as the old phrase was, is still cultivated liberally; there the pleasure of the making and the hearing of music still runs free. As freely, the few who would deny the concerts such liberty and catholicity may quit them.

Of course Mme. Matzenauer sang her songs of Brahms, Schumann and Schubert and declaimed her monologue out of Wagner in English. She used for that purpose translations made at her instance last summer by Mr. Krehblel, reviewer in opera house and concert-hall for The New York Tribune, versed in both languages, skilled to mate the accents of new texts to the ordained accents of the music. In these "odd jobs," so to say, he has done no less laudable work than in his translation of the whole "book" of "Parsifal" for the imminent reproduction of that opera at the Metropolitan. His English verse pleases the mind, the taste, the ear; it conveys the course, substance and spirit of the German text into a new tongue; it mates all three closely to the music; it is heedful of the serviceable rhetoric of opera house and concert hall; it is at opposite pole from the bathetic and ridiculous "English versions" that sprawl between staves of song or snigger down the columns of an "opera-book."

Now, if these things can be done by one man for a few German texts, they can be done by other men, more or less ably, for many more. Our song-recitals are the poorer for lack of the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, Brahms and Wolf. The current formula of old airs, "French group," "Russian group," "Anglo-American group" has become as persistent, tedious, barren, as were some of the superfluorous German prescriptions and proscriptions of the past. It is high time that classic and contemporary German song in its best estate returned to our concert-halls. It may most advisedly and desirably do so in such translations of texts as Mme. Matzenauer commissioned of Mr. Krehbiel, as other singers, as publishers of music, should make speed to command of him and other hands as fit. It is high time, also, that the music of Wagner should come back to the concert-hall, as it has in "stricken France," and to the opera house, as it has in much-enduring England. Again, for the purposes of song, such translations as Mr. Krehbiel's open the easy path of wisdom. As soon challenge his American loyalties as question his devotion to the arts of music.

Called for the first time to the Symphony Concerts, Mme. Matzenauer, far more slender than of old, grave of face, sombre of glance, not without a dark beauty richly set in the coloring of her gown, was a quietly impressive figure. Once and again in Schumann's "bride-songs" from the songbook, "Myrthen," she betrayed the singing-actress in claspings of the hands, in upturnings of the head; but in Brynhild's monologue, though her whole being plainly stirred to the intensities of the music, she held herself within firm control. Using but half-voice in Brahms's song of the introspections and the longings of the dying girl—"Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"—she sang with a strange, dark beauty of tone, in texture like to the pile of some thick, warm, velvet, steadily sustained and moulded to the contours of the music, as steadily pulsing with low rhythmic beat. With Mr. Stokowski's half simple, half subtle instrumentation to aid, with Mr. Monteux alert and adept with it, the gentle loveliness, the tender sentiment of Brahms's song have seldom stood clearer. Akin in measure are Schumann's songs of the longing, eager bride to the tremulous mother, questioning ever so little, doubting—but rather for herself than for her daughter. Yet underneath glows the rhapsodic note. With like beauty of tone, discretion of means, fineness of feeling for music, text and the art of song, Mme. Matzenauer sang them. As life and work through recent years have mellowed her, so she has refined upon herself. As such artist, who designs and measures her own intensity of song, who hears and guides her own beauty and significance of tone, she sang Schubert's "Erl-King." She was no singing-actress mistakenly inflating a ballad into a tragedy upon the stage of a theatre. Rather, she was the narrator, whose voice takes color, whose accents gain emotion from the progress of the tale in tones. Astutely she preserved the musical unity of the song, differentiated the voices that are strands of illusion within it. As truly keyed to Schubert was Mr. Stokowski's orchestral part. Not once did he storm or rant.

So Mme. Matzenauer passed to Brynhild's monologue and to a larger manner of music-drama and the opera house. Stately, almost imperious, yet how rich of tone, how spacious of phrase and period, was her declamation of the Valkyr's commands to the folk. The eye visioned the abstracted figure; the ear heard the voice accustomed to bid its will. To Brynhild, looking upon the dead Siegfried, visioning the high gods, reading the runes of destiny, Mme. Matzenauer brought a dusky beauty of tone, a sombre beauty of eloquence that sunk deep into hearing mind and imagination. In these measures, austere and plangent, Wagner wrote no rhetoric of the theatre, Mr. Shaw to the contrary notwithstanding. His voice, like Mme. Matzenauer's, was the voice of tragedy illumined. Rhetoric there is and rhetoric of the theatre in Brynhild's final apostrophe to Siegfried, but through it Mme. Matzenauer swept in tones of dark and mounting fire. Hardly at all did these acquired tones miss fullness or lose intensity of utterance. Not within long memory has singing-actress in or out of the opera house declaimed Brynhild's monologue with such sustained beauty of song, with such depth and height of tragic passion. With reason, Mme. Matzenauer's hearers lingered to release in applause their answering emotion.

Little less well fared Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with their part in this final scene from "The Gloaming of the Gods." In their tones glowed the harmonic and the instrumental vesture of the music; in their accents spoke the passion or the rhetoric; out of Wagner's close-twined texture the significant, the imaging, the compelling motifs stood clear; apt throughout was Mr. Monteux's adjustment of the symphonic current to the singing voice. Best of all, there was no moment of musical and emotional descent, no suggestion of anti-climax, when Brynhild's tones are stilled; firmly, largely, the orchestra swept forward and upward to the end.

"Das Ewig-Weibliche
Zieht uns hinan."

The more the wonder, then, that Mr. Monteux, keen-minded, imaginative and practised operatic conductor, with such an orchestra as now answers to his will, should have fallen short of the tonal splendors, the heroic exaltation, the retrospective sweep, the might and majesty of sound that fill the glorification of the dead Siegfried. As it seemed, his pace was too slow; his hand too light, almost timid; his accents too gentle; his colorings too pale; his meagre climaxes without breadth and clangor. Out of such performance barely rose Siegfried, the fated Volsung and Siegfried the hero, smiting with his sword. Only the chords of doom in the death motif crashed black and harsh. Measure to measure Mr. Monteux knitted the music, yet hardly once did he drive it forward in irresistible voice of mingled woe and glory. The great thrill was become a little thrill; yet not the less are these pages the music of genius.

H. T. PARKER

The Symphony Orchestra to Journey Again—"The Flonzaleys" to Play a New Quartet by Mr. Gregory Mason—The Impending Visit of the New York Chamber Music Society—Sunday Concerts at the Copley

NEXT Sunday the Symphony Orchestra will depart on a new journey to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, Brooklyn and, finally, to Springfield and Hartford, whence the band returns on Tuesday morning, Jan. 13. At several of these concerts Mr. de Gorgoza will be the "assisting singer"; while in Hartford, Mr. Ornstein, the pianist, will play with the orchestra. As the programmes stand, New York and other cities will hear Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazunov's "Stenka Razin" from the concerts this week in Boston, along with two pieces that Mr. Monteux is still reserving for the public of Symphony Hall—the prelude to "Parsifal," Wagner's music-drama, and the overture to Gluck's opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis." Otherwise these "out-of-town" programmes traverse Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Brahms's symphony in C minor, Chausson's symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"; and, for a single performance in Washington, even Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony.

Every seat for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, has been taken by the youth of the schools to whom the tickets were first proffered. It is, therefore, useless for "outsiders" to make application for them. Already the management of the orchestra is arranging a second and similar concert for the afternoon of Thursday, Feb. 26. Evidently a good and much-needed work well begun.

Mr. Fradkin and the Apollo Club

Those who have an ear or an eye for orchestral detail may note the occasional passages which fall to Mr. Fradkin in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts; but in the fifteen months that he has been with us as concert master of the orchestra there has been little opportunity to hear him as a soloist in the accepted meaning of the word. Last evening, however, he appeared in that capacity at the second concert of the Apollo Club in Jordan Hall. The pieces he chose to play were of the sort commonly used for incidental numbers on such a programme—a brilliant but empty set of variations by Tartini, retouched by Mr. Kreisler; a pleasant muted Berceuse by de Grassi; a sprightly Tambourin by the once celebrated and now almost forgotten Gossec, and on his second appearance the "Gypsy Airs" of Sarasate, long beloved of virtuoso violinists. What impresses most in Mr. Fradkin's playing is its absolute competence, rather than any striking individuality. Perhaps for that reason he shines more in his place in the orchestra than as a formal soloist, although his vivid performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto last year is a thing to be remembered. In the "Gypsy Airs" last evening he had ample opportunity to display his technique, and the tricky passages were handled with seeming ease. But neither this music nor his other numbers could reveal his finer qualities, as do the interspersed solos of the Narrator in "Scheherazade" or the measures in the "Afternoon of a Faun," in which the voice of his violin runs as a silver strand through the orchestral web.

For the rest, the singing of the club brought familiar virtues and wonted pleasures for those who delight in such music. The programme contained the usual inconsequential short pieces; two excerpts from Gounod's masses—one an arrangement of the familiar Sanctus, and Dudley Buck's pleasing ballad of King Olaf's Christmas. Four members of the club—Mr. Cummings, Mr. Harlow, Mr. Kidder and Mr. Sircom—sang the incidental solos. The able Mr. Luker is now restored as accompanist, and Mr. Mollenhauer, to whom the present excellence of the club is largely due, was again at his post. Mr. George L. Osgood, once conductor of the Bolyston Club and prominent here as a singer and teacher, has returned to Boston after an absence of twenty-five years in Europe. As tribute to him, his "In Picardy," one of the best liked of all such pieces, was added to the programme. As it happens, it was originally written for the Apollo Club.

Trans. Jan. 14, 1920 W. S. S.

186

Mme. MARGARETE MATZENAUER was born at Temesvár, Hungary, on June 1, 1881. Her father was a conductor at the Opera House. She studied singing with Mme. Neuendorff (in Graz), Antonia Mielke, and Franz Emerich (in Berlin). She made her first operatic appearance in "Oberon" as Puck at Strasbourg in 1901, having been at this opera house for three years. She was a member of the Munich Court Opera Company until 1911. In 1902 she was married to Ernest Preuse, a singing teacher in Munich with whom she had studied. A disagreement with him—she was divorced in 1911—led to her leaving Munich. She sang yearly in Wagner festival performances in Munich; at Bayreuth in 1911 (Waltraute, Flosshilde, and First Norn). She was engaged in 1911 for the Metropolitan Opera House. Her first appearance there was on the opening night of the season of 1911-12 (November 13, 1911), when she appeared as Amneris. Her répertoire includes contralto and dramatic soprano rôles. In 1912 she sang at Buenos Aires.

In Boston she took the (first time in this country) parts of Brangäne (February 23, 1912) and Isolde (November 29, December 1, 1913) at the Boston Opera House. In April, 1918, she was heard there as Fides and Amneris.

She has sung with the Handel and Haydn Society (Verdi's

In June, 1912, she married the Italian tenor Edoardo Ferrari-Fontana, from whom she was divorced in 1917.

She has sung in concert March 28, 1915 (with Mr. Gabrilowitsch), February 14, 1916 (Copley-Plaza Morning Musicale), April 7, 1918.

EMMA HOSFORD

384 COMMONWEALTH AVE.

TEACHER OF SINGING
COACHING IN SONGS

Mrs. HALL McALLISTER

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

'CELLO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

11-13

187

A New Symphony in the Fashion Before the Last at Cambridge—Gluck and Liszt as Well, and Mr. Bedetti in Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello—The Pleasures of Bach from Mr. Pattison—Miss Brard in a Recital of Her Own—A Visit from the Philharmonic Society—Programmes in Prospect

Jan. 16, 1920

LIKE dutiful children in the old story-books, the audience at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge is wont to be grateful for that which it receives in pieces and performance. If Mr. Monteux chooses to set before it music that he has lately played on the other bank of the Charles, it hears it gladly. If, instead, he assembles numbers that he will utilize on the morrow in Symphony Hall, it seems as well pleased. If the "direction" of the concerts despatches to Sanders Theatre an interesting "soloist," say like Miss Janacopulos of last November, it answers eagerly; if on the other hand, it is exposed to less tested and stimulating abilities, it is resignedly polite. From the standpoint of both conductor and manager, an ideal audience to which to minister—and therefore an audience deserving compensations. In measure it received them last evening when but one of the chosen pieces—Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—was of recent performance in Symphony Hall; when another—Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"—has not yet been heard across the Charles; and when a third—Mr. Stojowski's symphony in D minor, announced for today in Boston—was played for the first time hereabouts with the pleasantly excited composer—exactly the bearded, loose-clothed, loose-jointed, nervous figure of many a "portrait of an artist"—listening intently and smilingly receiving many plaudits. As though all this were not enough, Mr. Bedetti, the masterful first violoncellist of the orchestra, was "soloist" with it for the first time at home; while his choice of piece fell upon the seldom heard concerto of Schumann. As Symphony Concerts in Cambridge go, decidedly an interesting evening.

Yet in the vernacular of this New England, Mr. Stojowski's symphony seemed "no great shakes." It dates from 1900, there or thereabouts; it has been played—once—in various cities of Europe from Paris unto Warsaw; it is not unknown in New York: the Scherzo, according to the learned compiler of the programme-book, has even enjoyed at Mr. Nikisch's concerts a vogue

the less with all deficient and aspiring Stojowski. Europe at the end of beginning of this pre-courtonal energy and herever the composer full modern orchestra to see and to hear k. Strenuous are his progressions; firm. Thick flow his hard are his instruments. palette-knife or thumb, Mr. Stojowski or anes, lays on his colore. bus energy, he weaves music, keeps it in as vious motion; sets in ploys his instrumental jowski with the hollow arinet, as freshly and may. In particular, e bestows whatever fan in his spirit, whatever p his fingers. Light- ed shall it be, teeming y suspensions and syn- with jets of harmonic plor, piquant with swift, lation. Such a scherzo written with appreci- pple resource.

rvous energy of these nists" of the late nine- t years of the new cent- sy, even when it did no h about," was ofteneat The mold into which ined these energies was odox symphonic form, by the unexpected ap- or future motifs in suc- ng divisions of the mu- hat each movement re- nventional states of mu- nd expression—the slow eluding; the abrupt and the Adagio or Andante ductory measures; the d Scherzo; the emphatic, argely mounting Finale. ividuality, as routine as motifs whence the mu- a his manipulation and ser depended much; upon k textures and far-flung ded yet more. Exactly of twenty years ago is Like his concerto for edetti shares awlessly he H. T. P.

Monteux were as guest," did symphony with of Agamem- sacrifice by the to Troy by a maid and for Gluck uses stra of 1774; parent harmo- d thin instru- to us a for- the Parisians he composer's Yet there in entury and a missive Iphi- perhaps the surely are the legend, with and many a or the libret- would Liszt's s neither dia- voice and illu- Stojowski's Monteux has to perfection ould that Mr. he proposed, less than the umann's con- all the can- bello—perhaps Rich upon lustrous or of the An- hat, the more h the cellist r the intelli- artistry with red and guid- a concerto a rchestra and be played by mettle. But of the be- uration, the e finale—are composer's It is of rec- Schumann's rybody done edetti shares awlessly he H. T. P.

Steinway Pianoforte used

186

Mme. MARGARETE MATZENAUER was born at Temesvár, Hungary, on June 1, 1881. Her father was a conductor at the Opera House. She studied singing with Mme. Neuendorff (in Graz), Antonia Mielke, and Franz Emerich (in Berlin). She made her first operatic appearance in "Oberon" as Puck at Strasbourg in 1901, having been at this opera house for three years. She was a member of the Munich Court Opera Company until 1911. In 1902 she was married to Ernest Preuse, a singing teacher in Munich with whom she had studied. A disagreement with him—she was divorced in 1911—led to her leaving Munich. She sang yearly in Wagner festival performances in Munich; at Bayreuth in 1911 (Waltraute, Flosshilde, and First Norn). She was engaged in 1911 for the Metropolitan Opera House. Her first appearance there was on the opening night of the season of 1911-12 (November 13, 1911), when she appeared as Amneris. Her repertoire includes contralto and dramatic soprano.

SANDERS THEATRE . . . CAMBRIDGE

FOURTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, January 15, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

JEAN BEDETTI

'CELLO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

11-13

A New Symphony in the Fashion Before the Last at Cambridge—Gluck and Liszt as Well, and Mr. Bedetti in Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello—The Pleasures of Bach from Mr. Pattison—Miss Brard in a Recital of Her Own—A Visit from the Philharmonic Society—Programmes in Prospect

Jan. 16, 1920

LIKE dutiful children in the old story-books, the audience at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge is wont to be grateful for that which it receives in pieces and performance. If Mr. Monteux chooses to set before it music that he has lately played on the other bank of the Charles, it hears it gladly. If, instead, he assembles numbers that he will utilize on the morrow in Symphony Hall, it seems as well pleased. If the "direction" of the concert's despatches to Sanders Theatre an interesting "soloist," say like Miss Janacopulos of last November, it answers eagerly; if on the other hand, it is exposed to less tested and stimulating abilities, it is resignedly polite. From the standpoint of both conductor and manager, an ideal audience to which to minister—and therefore an audience deserving compensations. In measure it received them last evening when but one of the chosen pieces—Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—was of recent performance in Symphony Hall; when another—Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"—has not yet been heard across the Charles; and when a third—Mr. Stojowski's symphony in D minor, announced for today in Boston—was played for the first time hereabouts with the pleasantly excited composer—exactly the bearded, loose-clothed, loose-jointed, nervous figure of many a "portrait of an artist"—listening intently and smilingly receiving many plaudits. As though all this were not enough, Mr. Bedetti, the masterful first violoncellist of the orchestra, was "soloist" with it for the first time at home; while his choice of piece fell upon the seldom heard concerto of Schumann. As Symphony Concerts in Cambridge go, decidedly an interesting evening.

Yet in the vernacular of this New England, Mr. Stojowski's symphony seemed "no great shakes." It dates from 1900, there or thereabouts; it has been played—once—in various cities of Europe from Paris unto Warsaw; it is not unknown in New York: the Scherzo, according to the learned compiler of the programme-book, has even enjoyed at Mr. Nikisch's concerts a vogue

the less with all defent and aspiring Sto-
of this sort were writ-Europe at the end of
beginning of this pre-court tonal energy and herever the composer
full modern orchestra
es to see and to hear
k. Stronuous are his his progressions; firm-
s. Thick flow his hard are his instruments.
alette-knife or thumb,
Mr. Stojowski or ans, lays on his colorspus energy, he weaves
music, keeps it in as vuous motion; sets in ploys his instrumental Stojowski with the hollow
Marinet, as freshly and
may. In particular,
e bestows whatever fan-
in his spirit, whatever p his fingers. Lighted shall it be, teeming
y suspensions and syn-
with jets of harmonic
plor, piquant with swift lation. Such a scherzo written with appreci-
pple resource.
rvous energy of these nists" of the late nine-
t years of the new cent-
sy, even when it did no
h about," was oftenest
The mold into which
ined these energies was odox symphonic form,
by the unexpected apr future motifs in sucng divisions of the mu-hat each movement re-nventional states of mu-
nd expression—the slow
cluding; the abrupt and
the Adagio or Andante
ductory measures; the d Scherzo; the emphatic, argely mounting Finale.
viduality, as routine as motifs whence the mu-
his manipulation and ser depended much; upon k textures and far-flung ded yet more. Exactly of twenty years ago is Like his concerto for ich Mr. Paderewski and ept at Symphony Hall, er nor worse than the
id. Only, to ears of Jan-written in the nother sort of id of energy,
ickness, flights of power—are Monteux were a guest," did ymphony with
of Agamem-
sacrifice by the
to Troy by a maid and for Gluck uses
stra of 1774;
arent harmo-thin instru-to us a for-the Parisians
he composer's
Yet there in entury and a missive Iphi-
perhaps the surely are the legend, with and many a
or the libret-would Liszt's
s neither dia-
oice and illu-
Stojowski's
Monteux has to perfection
uld that Mr.
he proposed,
less than the umann's con-
all the cancello—perhaps Rich upon lustrous or
of the An-er, the more
h the 'cellist
r the Intelli-
artistry with red and guid-
a concerto a chestra and
be played by mettle. But of the beguration, the e finale—are composer's
It is of rec-Schumann's
ybody done bedetti shares awlessly he
H. T. P.

Steinway Pianoforte used

186

Mme. MARGARETE MATZENAUER was born at Temesvár, Hungary, on June 1, 1881. Her father was a conductor at the Opera House. She studied singing with Mme. Neuendorff (in Graz), Antonia Mielke, and Franz Emerich (in Berlin). She made her first operatic appearance in "Oberon" as Puck at Strasbourg in 1901, having been at this opera house for three years. She was a member of the Munich Court Opera Company until 1911. In 1902 she was married to Ernest Preuse, a singing teacher in Munich with whom she had studied. A disagreement with him—she was divorced in 1911—led to her leaving Munich. She sang yearly in Wagner festival performances in Munich; at Bayreuth in 1911 (Waltraute, Flosshilde, and First Norn). She was engaged in 1911 for the Metropolitan Opera House. Her first appearance there was on the opening night of the season of 1911-12 (November 13, 1911), when she appeared as Amneris. Her repertoire includes contralto and dramatic soprano.

SANDERS THEATRE . . . CAMBRIDGE

FOURTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, January 15, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

JEAN BEDETTI

'CELLO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

11-13

A New Symphony in the Fashion Before the Last at Cambridge—Gluck and Liszt as Well, and Mr. Bedetti in Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello—The Pleasures of Bach from Mr. Pattison—Miss Brard in a Recital of Her Own—A Visit from the Philharmonic Society—Programmes in Prospect

Jan. 16, 1920

LIKE dutiful children in the old story-books, the audience at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge is wont to be grateful for that which it receives in pieces and performance. If Mr. Monteux chooses to set before it music that he has lately played on the other bank of the Charles, it hears it gladly. If, instead, he assembles numbers that he will utilize on the morrow in Symphony Hall, it seems as well pleased. If the "direction" of the concerts' despatches to Sanders Theatre an interesting "soloist," say like Miss Janacopulos of last November, it answers eagerly; if on the other hand, it is exposed to less tested and stimulating abilities, it is resignedly polite. From the standpoint of both conductor and manager, an ideal audience to which to minister—and therefore an audience deserving compensations. In measure it received them last evening when but one of the chosen pieces—Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—was of recent performance in Symphony Hall; when another—Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"—has not yet been heard across the Charles; and when a third—Mr. Stojowski's symphony in D minor, announced for today in Boston—was played for the first time hereabouts with the pleasantly excited composer—exactly the bearded, loose-clothed, loose-jointed, nervous figure of many a "portrait of an artist"—listening intently and smilingly receiving many plaudits. As though all this were not enough, Mr. Bedetti, the masterful first violoncellist of the orchestra, was "soloist" with it for the first time at home; while his choice of piece fell upon the seldom heard concerto of Schumann. As Symphony Concerts in Cambridge go, decidedly an interesting evening.

Yet in the vernacular of this New England, Mr. Stojowski's symphony seemed "no great shakes." It dates from 1900, there or thereabouts; it has been played once—in various cities of Europe from Paris unto Warsaw; it is not unknown in New York: the Scherzo, according to the learned compiler of the programme-book, has even enjoyed at Mr. Nikisch's concerts a vogue

the less with all def-
ent and aspiring Sto-
of this sort were writ-Europe at the end of
beginning of this pre-
court tonal energy and herever the composer
full modern orchestra
kes to see and to hear
k. Strenuous are his his progressions; firm-
s. Thick flow his hard are his instruments
palette-knife or thumb,
Mr. Stojowski or an-
s, lays on his colors.
ous energy, he weaves
music, keeps it in as vous motion; sets in ploys his instrumental Stojowski with the hollow
arinet, as freshly and
may. In particular,
bestows whatever fan-
in his spirit, whatever
p his fingers. Lighted shall it be, teeming
y suspensions and syn-
with jets of harmonic
olor, piquant with swift lation. Such a scherzo
written with appreci-
pple resource.
rvous energy of these
nists" of the late nine-
t years of the new cent-
sy, even when it did no
h about," was oftenest
The mold into which
ined these energies was
odox symphonic form,
by the unexpected ap-
or future motifs in suc-ing divisions of the mu-hat each movement re-
nventional states of mu-
nd expression—the slow
cluding; the abrupt and
the Adagio or Andante
ductory measures; the
l Scherzo; the emphatic,
argely mounting Finale.
viduality, as routine as motifs whence the mu-
his manipulation and
ser depended much; upon
k textures and far-flung ided yet more. Exactly of twenty years ago is Like his concerto for ich Mr. Paderewski and wept at Symphony Hall, er nor worse than the
id. Only, to ears of Jan-
Steinway Pianoforte used

written in the nother sort of
id of energy,
ckness, flights
of power—are Monteux were is guest," did ymphony with
of Agamem-
sacrifice by the
to Troy by a maid and for Gluck uses
stra of 1774;
parent harmo-d thin instru-
to us a for-the Parisians
he composer's
Yet there in entury and a missive Iphi-
perhaps the surely are the legend, with
and many a
or the libret-would Liszt's
s neither dia-
oice and illu-
Stojowski's
Monteux has to perfection
uld that Mr.
he proposed,
less than the umann's con-
all the cancello—perhaps Rich upon lustrous or
of the An-er, the more
h the 'cellist
r the intelli-
artistry with red and guid-
a concerto a chestra and
be played by mettle. But of the beguration, the he finale—are composer's
It is of rec-Schumann's
ybody done edetti shares awlessly he
H. T. P.

186

Mme. MARGARETE MATZENAUER was born at Temesvár, Hungary, on June 1, 1881. Her father was a conductor at the Opera House. She studied singing with Mme. Neuendorff (in Graz), Antonia Mielke, and Franz Emerich (in Berlin). She made her first operatic appearance in "Oberon" as Puck at Strasbourg in 1901, having been at this opera house for three years. She was a member of the Munich Court Opera Company until 1911. In 1902 she was married to Ernest Preuse, a singing teacher in Munich with whom she had studied. A disagreement with him—she was divorced in 1911—led to her leaving Munich. She sang yearly in Wagner festival performances in Munich; at Bayreuth in 1911 (Waltraute, Flosshilde, and First Norn). She was engaged in 1911 for the Metropolitan Opera House. Her first appearance there was on the opening night of the season of 1911-12 (November 13, 1911), when she appeared as Amneris. Her repertoire includes contralto and dramatic soprano.

SANDERS THEATRE . . . CAMBRIDGE

FOURTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, January 15, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

JEAN BEDETTI

'CELLO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

21, 22, 23 and 24 at the U.S. the interest of the campaign

"NO RESERVATION!"

Cast More Votes in College Than Did Advocates of A

New York, Jan. 16—Uncertainty has received more single proposition voted on college referendum on Nations but not as many accorded to Plans 3 and 4 provide for the former on the basis majority proposals and compromise between them. More than 100,000 votes counted, cast by the students of 475 colleges and these 46,259 were cast reserved ratification and ratification by compromise. Maining vote was divided supporters of the Lodge. 11,690 voters who did not ratify in any form.

On request from Washington college treaty referee which is tabulating the telegraphed the results to the Lodge and Senator Hiram. The final vote will probably be tonight.

WENT TO SYMPHONY

Hundreds of People Had Postponement of Lecture

It was late in the day when the management of the lecture learned that Sir Oliver, unable to reach Boston, had postponed his lecture. The result was that persons who had bought tickets for the lecture learned of the postponement only when they had reached the tendants stationed in the hall. The postponement was a disappointment to the coming group. The postponement was a disappointment to the coming group. The postponement was a disappointment to the coming group.

11-13

of its own. None the less with all deference to the diligent and aspiring Stojowski, symphonies of this sort were written by the sheaf in Europe at the end of the nineties, at the beginning of this previous century. They court tonal energy and tonal volume. Wherever the composer may, he employs a full modern orchestra and, as it seems, likes to see and to hear it at energetic work. Strenuous are his rhythms; vigorous, his progressions; firm-lined, his modulations. Thick flow his harmonies; ample-voiced are his instruments. Full tilt, as with palette-knife or thumb, the composer, be it Mr. Stojowski or another of the species, lays on his colors. With tireless, nervous energy, he weaves a full-fibred web of music, keeps it in as unflagging and nervous motion; sets in sharp contrast, deploys his instrumental voices, like Mr. Stojowski with the hollow tones of the bass-clarinets, as freshly and individually as he may. In particular, upon the Scherzo, he bestows whatever fancies may be stirring in his spirit, whatever dexterities may tip his fingers. Light-paced, light-rhythmed shall it be, teeming with apt and tricky suspensions and syncopations, bright with jets of harmonic and instrumental color, piquant with swift, apt turns of modulation. Such a scherzo Mr. Stojowski has written with appreciable fancy, with supple resource.

So runs the nervous energy of these secondary "symphonists" of the late nineties and the earliest years of the new century; for that energy, even when it did no more than "thrash about," was oftenest their mutual trait. The mold into which they cast and confined these energies was usually the orthodox symphonic form, slightly liberalized by the unexpected appearance of past or future motifs in succeeding or presaging divisions of the music. The moods that each movement reflected were the conventional states of music-making mind and expression—the slow and deep-voiced preluding; the abrupt and turbulent Allegro; the Adagio or Andante like to the introductory measures; the glinting and gleeful Scherzo; the emphatic, broad-measured, largely mounting Finale. As lacking in individuality, as routine as the form were the motifs whence the music sprang. Upon his manipulation and coloring the composer depended much; upon his big voice, thick textures and far-flung energies he depended yet more. Exactly such a symphony of twenty years ago is Mr. Stojowski's. Like his concerto for piano through which Mr. Paderewski and Dr. Muck once swept at Symphony Hall, it is neither better nor worse than the average of its kind. Only, to ears of Jan-

Steinway Pianoforte used

187 written in the another sort of ad of energy, leanness, flights of power—are Monteux were is guest," did symphony with of Agamem-

Gluck uses tra of 1774; parent harmo- d thin instru- to us a for- the Parisians he composer's Yet there in entury and a missive Iphiperhaps the surely are the legend, with and many a or the libret- would Liszt's s neither dia- voice and illu-

Stojowski's Monteux has to perfection uld that Mr. he proposed, less than the umann's con- all the can- cello—perhaps

Rich upon lustrous or of the An- er, the more h the 'cellist r the intelli- artistry with red and guid-a concerto a orchestra and be played by mettle. But of the be- guration, the he finale—are composer's It is of rec- Schumann's ybody done edetti shares awlessly he

H. T. P.

And Mr. Bedetti chose Schumann's concerto, least seldom played of all the canonized concertos for violoncello—perhaps for that very reason chose it. Rich upon the ear, warm with fancy, lustrous or deep of voice flows the song of the Andante—the richer, the warmer, the more glowing for the tone in which the 'cellist released and enhanced it, for the intelligence, the sensibility, the artistry with which at every turn he measured and guided it. Call so much of the concerto a Canzone for violoncello and orchestra and it deserves to endure and to be played by a musician of Mr. Bedetti's mettle. But the rest—the "passage-work" of the beginning, the cadenza, the figuration, the trippings hither and yon of the finale—are hear to the dryest bones of composer's jugglery and virtuoso's skill. It is of record that the dutiful Clara, Schumann's wife, admired them. Has anybody done so since? Yet perhaps Mr. Bedetti shares his admiration. Anyhow, flawlessly he played them.

H. T. P.

Newcomer Who Has Proved His Worth

an Bedetti

(Photograph by Horner)

First Violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWELFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 8 P. M.

D'INDY,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 2, op., 57

- I. Extrême lent; Très vif
- II. Modérément lent
- III. Modéré; Très animé
- IV. Introduction; Fugue, et Finale

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in D major, for Violin, op. 61.

- I. Allegro ma non troppo
- II. Larghetto
- III. Rondo

Soloist:

FRITZ KREISLER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Newcomer Who Has Proved His Worth

an Bedetti (Photograph by Horner)

First Violoncelist of the Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWELFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 8 P.M.

D'INDY,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57

- I. Extrême lent; Très vif
- II. Modérément lent
- III. Modéré; Très animé
- IV. Introduction; Fugue, et Finale

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in D major, for Violin, op. 61.

- I. Allegro ma non troppo
- II. Larghetto
- III. Rondo

Soloist:

FRITZ KREISLER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

REVIVE D'INDY'S SYMPHONY NO. 2

Monteux and Orchestra Brilliantly Give the Composer's Masterpiece

ENGAGE CONDUCTOR FOR TWO YEARS MORE

Herald Jan. 24, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, Symphony No. 2 in B flat major; Beethoven, Violin Concerto.

Vincent d'Indy's Symphony, one of the greatest achievements in symphonic music since the death of Beethoven, had not been performed at these concerts since December 1909. Hardly appreciated at first when it was produced by Mr. Gericke in 1905 and played at the end of that year under the direction of the visiting composer, its beauty, nobility, spirituality, consummate workmanship vitalized by the faith, sincerity and humanity of the composer, were at last recognized in 1909, and so fully that a second performance was given "by request" in that season. Ten years have gone by; the Symphony is still a great work, great in the breadth of conception, in the richness of dramatic material, in the wealth of interesting detail, in the masterly instrumentation.

The performance yesterday was an inspiring one. It will probably be even more elastic this evening, for the Symphony is extremely treacherous in the matter of entrances and in other ways; but the performance yesterday was one in which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra may well take pride; one that would have delighted the composer, a man not easily pleased.

Mr. d'Indy in a letter to a friend writes that he has not been idle since the composition of his third Symphony, "De Bello Gallico," which was performed here last October. He has composed a symphonic suite picturing the ocean seen from various shores and under various skies; the incidental music for a drama; piano pieces and French canticles. He hopes to revisit this country next fall.

Mr. Kreisler played Beethoven's Concerto. He had already played it three times at Symphony concerts in Boston. During the last six years this concerto was played five times. It has been performed 18 times at these concerts. Is it not time to shelve it for a few seasons at least?

It would have been gracious, tactful at least, if Mr. Kreisler had chosen a concerto by Lalo or Saint-Saens, as a tribute to France, the country to which he owes so much; for, as a boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory, and at the age of 12 he received a first prize; and after his first visit to the United States in 1888, he returned to Paris for further study. But gratitude is rarely displayed even by applauded virtuosos; tact has not been for the last six years the distinguishing characteristic of Germans and Austrians at home or abroad. It may here be remarked that on the forthcoming trip of the orchestra Mr. Kreisler will play a concerto by Viotti.

The trustees of the orchestra, the members of the orchestra, and the city of Boston may well be congratulated on the re-appointment of Mr. Monteux for a term of two years. Under his leadership the orchestra, containing new members, has now remarkable technical proficiency. The personnel is brilliant; witness the ensemble yesterday: the solo passages for oboe, clarinet, bassoon, violin, viola, and especially the playing of the small trumpet by Mr. Mager. The strings sing as they have not sung since the rule of Mr. Gericke. Performances are now characterized, not only by euphony, a fine sense of proportion, dash, grandeur, but by an imaginative, poetic spirit. For Mr. Monteux is an interpreter as well as a drill-master; an interpreter of Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Wagner; also fortunate in his readings of the later romantic, also the ultra-modern school. That his musical taste and sympathies are catholic, his programs show. He has given warm encouragement to deserving American composers. As a man, high minded, modest, genuine, he has won the respect of all. No merchant trafficks in his heart. Unlike certain conductors, he is not a poseur. Under his direction the technical and aesthetic future of the orchestra is secure. A change at the beginning of next season would have been fatal to the morale of the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Converse, Symphony in C-minor; Schumann, Concerto for violoncello (Jean Bedetti); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter." Mr. Converse's symphony will be performed for the first time.

KREISLER HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reception Unparalleled in Recent Years

967 Jan. 24, 1920
No soloist at the Symphony concerts in recent years has ever received an ovation comparable to that given Kreisler yesterday afternoon when he came out to play the solo part in Beethoven's Concerto. The orchestra and Mr. Monteux were as demonstrative as the audience. There was prolonged applause in the single pause during the concerto, and at the end of the concert, instead of hurrying away, as usual, everyone stayed to recall Kreisler again and again. The unusual demonstration over Rachmaninoff earlier in the season was far surpassed.

Kreisler has played this concerto here several times. His performance yesterday surpassed his own previous efforts as well as those of all the others heard at these concerts in Beethoven's familiar music. There were those beforehand who regretted that Kreisler altered his original intention of playing the Brahms concerto, because "the Beethoven is played to death," as the malcontents put it.

But the Beethoven is still the finest of all concertos, and most people never tire of such music played as it was yesterday. The glories of piece and soloist are too familiar to need detailed praise. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra did their part unusually well. Those who heard it will remember this performance when they come to judge others. It set an almost unattainable standard of dignity and beauty.

D'Indy's Second Symphony, the other item on yesterday's program, has not been heard here for 10 years. It far surpasses his new symphony inspired by the war, played here for the first time this season. It contains many passages of genuine nobility and beauty, but there is too much scholarship and too little genius in it.

One felt in following the lengthy analysis printed in the program that D'Indy had written an admirable illustration for his "Course in Composition" rather than continued the succession of masterpieces which still stop with Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

He has avoided the defects of Beethoven, conventional padding, lack of unity in the work as a whole, and so on. But he is a sort of critic turned composer. His judgment is excellent, his imagination limited, his erudition enormous.

Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor, op. 129, at the concerts next week. The other numbers are a new symphony by Mr. Converse, to be played for the first time anywhere, and Rimsky Korsakoff's not too familiar overture, "The Russian Easter."

KREISLER HEARD AT HIS BEST

Post Jan. 24, 1920
Great Violinist in Rare Mood Playing With Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two notable works, given equally notable performances, made the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall and will play again in the same hall this evening. These works were Vincent d'Indy's 2d symphony in B flat, and Beethoven's violin concerto, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist.

15-YEAR RETROSPECT

It is easy to recall the impression which the wasterwork of d'Indy made when it was first performed in Boston by Wilhelm Gericke in 1905. It then seemed the last word in cacaphony and pedantry of the fussy and futile kind. No words were too hard for it. There was practically no applause when the performance came to an end, and reviewers who refused to be hurried into an adverse opinion on an important and unfamiliar composition were rated as partisans of d'Indy and the modern French school who do not admit that any music from these sources could be poor, bad.

For there seemed at that time no possible question of the fact that this was ugly, inept music.

Its Beauties Displayed

And what was the reception of the symphony yesterday? It was applauded to the echo. Thanks to the musical evolution of 15 years the music seemed crystal clear, in many places of sensuous beauty, full of force, fire, and noble feeling. Much was due, without doubt, to Mr. Monteux's reading. Hitherto the symphony had been heard in Boston as played by German conductors, who gave earnest and well-meant readings of a score which it is probable that they only half understood. They showed the bones of the thing, the structure, the skeleton which underlay the beautiful form, but it is now obvious that the elements of rich beauty and feeling which are so strong in this music were but presented to the hearer.

Therefore it is only to merest justice to Mr. Monteux to say that while the understanding of the audience had grown greatly in 15 years, the performance was also, in many respects and beyond doubt or peradventure, a revelation of much which had not been audible before.

A Stupendous Work

One wonders, indeed, if there has been any other great symphony to compare with this one since the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms and Franck. In the hurried mental survey of an hour or two there are no works in this form of today to match this vast and heroic structure of d'Indy. A part of the greatness of the symphony is its logical descent from the works of the other men. A work like Debussy's "Nocturnes" or "L'Après midi d'un Faun" opens a new land, a new era, to us. A symphony like the second symphony of d'Indy is a thing preordained by the labors and achievements of many men, great and small, rather than of one, however unique and unassailable the position in art of that one may be. It has the unity, too, thanks to its structure and workmanship, of one supremely clear, luminous, lofty thought, and the development of thought, which seems as inevitable today as some process of nature, goes hand in hand with the spiritual purpose of a master.

Kreisler's Greatest Performance

Perhaps it was the sympathetic mood established by d'Indy's symphony, perhaps it was the greeting given Mr. Kreisler by the audience, a greeting which meant profound sympathy with a man and artist unreasonably and unjustly persecuted of late, which put the violinist particularly in the vein. At any rate, he gave what impressed the writer as one of the greatest performances of his career, one which put the interpreter at the right hand of the composer, which made even the rather trivial finale of the concerto a thing to marvel at and cherish in the memory.

Of a performance by Mr. Kreisler when he is at his greatest it is futile to speak in detail. The audience was deeply moved.

A feature of this performance was the superb cadenza composed by Mr. Kreisler himself, of which the highest possible praise is that it was worthy of and wholly congruous with the rest of the concerto. Long after Mr. Kreisler had finished the audience remained in the hall applauding and calling him back to the stage. This was a memorable concert because of the music, the orchestra, the conductor and the musician-virtuoso.

MUSIC

Jan. 24, 1920
The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the twelfth concert of the present season on January 23. The program was:

D'Indy—Symphony in B flat major No. 2, op. 57.

Beethoven—Concerto for the violin, op. 61. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

D'Indy's symphony has not been played here for a little over 10 years. That a work of such beauty and significance should have been neglected for so long seems a pity. Again Mr. Monteux has given us the opportunity of acquainting ourselves with a work worthy to be ranked with the greatest masterpieces of symphonic literature. He recently performed a like service for us with Chausson's symphony. May he continue in like manner, for our education in modern music, outside Strauss and other Germans, has been sadly neglected. D'Indy's symphony is another evidence of the many-sidedness of the French school. It is of an emotional depth and expressiveness not always found in Saint-Saëns, Debussy, and others among the master Frenchmen, yet it is truly Gallic in its clarity and the logical working-out of its ideas. In this symphony d'Indy seems less restrained, less austere than in many of his other compositions; he seems to show us more of his real self. From the mysterious opening measures, through the moving pages of the adagio, to the sonorous finale, this symphony is one long line of beauty. The orchestration, always brilliant, seems to grow logically from the melodic and harmonic ideas which it clothes, never obstructing their free expression, never meretriciously attracting their attention to itself. A composer rarely climbs to such heights, to such freedom and aptness of expression. The greatness of the work inspired a great rendition of it. The orchestra has seldom played with such abandon and beauty of tone.

Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Beethoven concerto was a fitting aftermath. Only a great master in a great masterpiece could have followed such a piece. The accompaniment to the concerto was uncommonly well played. The pianissimos were of the greatest delicacy and a perfect accord reigned between soloist, conductor, and orchestra.

MONTEUX AS PERMANENT CONDUCTOR

Post Jan. 24, 1920
Symphony Trustees

Engage Him For Two Years

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. In Boston, the audiences invariably fill Symphony Hall and manifestly enjoy the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the special concerts as well.

SUCCESS IN OTHER CITIES

In those cities of New England, the near South and the West which the orchestra has visited a crowded patronage has expressed the same high enthusiasm both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programmes.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra. He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 as the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

MONTEUX AS CONDUCTOR THROUGH

Trans. 1922 Jan. 28, 1920
For Two Seasons More the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Renew His Appointment — The Flonzaleys in High Feather Through an Interesting Programme—Mr. Casals and Mme. Sunde-lius at Lengths — Items, Incidents and Prospects

BY arrangement newly concluded between Mr. Monteux and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, he will continue as conductor of the band for at least two seasons more—through the spring of 1922. Since no Toscanini, no Mengelberg, no Nikisch may be summoned to Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux amply deserves such reappointment, the sense of good work appreciated that it brings, the scope and security for the future that it assures. It is well, moreover, for the reorganized orchestra that an established conductor should lead it through three consecutive years. Admittedly Mr. Rabaud was no more than a conscientious locum tenens, coming hither for a season, departing hence when it was done. Through the past four months, however, Mr. Monteux has lead the band and ordered the concerts as though they were to be his for a term, and now his desire and his ambition are justly fulfilled. The more confidently and diligently can he go forward to fuse the orchestra into a sensitive, responsive, wide-ranging and manifold instrument—player to player, men to conductor, and both to the music undertaken. Not a few of the glories of the Symphony Concerts in Dr. Muck's time were due to year upon year of intimacy between a permanent conductor and a permanent orchestra. Mr. Monteux, and in measure his forces, will now be such. Already he and they have come to understand each other; of late he has refined upon them with happy outcome. For both, for the standards of the concerts, for the pleasure of the audiences, the future stretches wide and promising.

By many a title, besides, Mr. Monteux deserves his present reward. No conductor of the Symphony Concerts, it is safe to say, has made more interesting and stimulating programmes. None has shown a more liberal, a more catholic mind or has striven more to widen his own and his hearers' acquaintance with symphonic music. Of nothing has he made an overshadowing cult—no not even of his cherished dance-pieces; to nothing has he shown a seated dislike. Better still, while he has not overlooked the classics and, indeed, has often sought among them for neglected pieces, he has shown a clear and grateful tendency to lift his programmes out of the easy rut of "standard numbers" and to give them modern and contemporary voice. "The ancients were the ancients," said wise little Agnes in one of Molière's comedies, "but we are persons of today." By like token, the classics are the classics, but the music for 1920 is the music of our own generations. It is not too much to say that more than any conductor before him, Mr. Monteux has modernized the Symphony Concerts, while at home and abroad audiences have responded gladly. As for quality of performance, there are some who still mistrust him. It is for them to think backward and contrast the heavy-handed Monteux, too strenuous of voice in the concerts of last autumn, with the plastic and luminous Monteux of Debussy's "Jeux," of Balakirev's "Thamar," of the middle movements of Brahms's symphony in C minor on more recent programmes. They should recall also the graphic, the dramatizing Monteux of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," of the final scene of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." The new conductor, the permanent conductor, as he now is, of the Symphony Concerts, does not stand still.

Mr. FRITZ KREISLER

SYMPHONY CONCERT

KREISLER AND D'INDY DIVIDE A PROGRAMME

Trans. Jan. 24/20
Again the Violinist Repeats Beethoven's Hackneyed Concerto in Super-Refined Performance — The Parisian's Masterpiece of Modern Symphonies Played with Signal Eloquence — The Heights and Depths of a Marvellous Music

THROUGH forty-five minutes of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, Mr. Kreisler played the solo part in Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra. He was playing it for the seventh time "at these concerts;" while other violinists, choosing the piece and winning the conductor's sanction for it, have played it so often that it has come almost to annual repetition at Symphony Hall. As memory recalls the last ten years of the Symphony Concerts, no other number has been heard so frequently—not even the symphonic masterpieces of Beethoven himself or the high-placed modern symphonies, say of Franck or Brahms. Now, in the ordinary course of a season, the public of the Symphony Orchestra hears only three or at most four Concertos for violin. Bach and Mozart wrote them; Mendelssohn, Bruch, Goldmark, Dvorák, Brahms, Chaikovsky wrote them; so also did Saint-Saëns, Lalo, Weingartner, Elgar—to say nothing of many a minor composer. Some of these Concertos have not been played for years at Symphony Hall; not a few have never been played there; yet nearly all of them have recognized place in the "standard repertory" of violinists.

Why, then, should one-third of all the music for violin and orchestra that Bostonians hear in a season at the Symphony Concerts be Beethoven's Concerto? It is no "master-work," like some of his symphonies and overtures. It is merely an agreeable, displayful, melodious and ornamental piece written to oblige a friend who happened to be a virtuoso of the violin.

The orchestral interludes are admittedly old-fashioned and tedious; not a little of the "passage-work" in the first movement owes what little interest it may kindle to the tone and the skill of the playing violinist; by his rhythmic verve the nearly endless returns of the motifs in the final rondo afford what entertainment they may. The Concerto, however, is altogether "grateful" to virtuosos; to them it is a test-piece "enskyed and sainted"; it is their custom to assume that it is equally "grateful" to any and all hearers; whereas an appreciable number of them at symphony concerts, not only in this town but elsewhere, are frankly and justly weary of it. Yet still the violinists insist. Mr. Kreisler proposed it to Mr. Monteux for the programme of yesterday and today. The conductor wisely and firmly preferred the Concerto of Brahms not lately played in Boston, unheard here from Mr. Kreisler since 1905, undertaken by him only a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Kreisler assented—and pined for his flesh-pots of Egypt; dissented—and finally prevailed. Now it is his custom to profess a lofty loyalty to the art that he practises; while beyond peradventure no violinist of the hour enjoys greater prestige with American audiences. Whatever Concerto he elected to revive or produce the public of Symphony Hall would hear gladly. And for the seventh and the eighth times in Boston he plays this hackneyed piece by Beethoven and for near the sixtieth time, perhaps for more than the sixtieth, it stands on a programme of the Symphony Orchestra!

Of course Mr. Kreisler played the solo-part with superlative elegance of delicately shaded and adroitly propelled tone, with exquisite niceties of inflection, transition and euphony to the orchestral voices, with every refinement and subtlety of his present manner. Of course also, the sensitive and observant Monteux took cue from him with the orchestra. Much of the music is neither more nor less than embroidery, as through the middle movement, and Mr. Kreisler laid it upon the ear like the finest-lined and the most transparent lace-work in tones. Not a little more of it, like the arabesques of the first division, he chiselled as a goldsmith of the Renaissance adorning a cup for cardinal or prince, as a cutter of cameos achieving a brooch of ideal fineness and softness of contour for some loved courtesan of old Athens or pagan Alexandria. The rhythms of sun-kissed dust flying in the air could hardly be lighter than Mr. Kreisler's in the returns of that relentless rondo. It is hard to believe that the tone of the violin may be reduced to a finer thread than he spun and yet hold unbroken and audible; that it may wear softer silken lustres; that it may be more suavely and artfully inflected by touch upon bow and fret light as the fall of a hair. The most perfect of miniature-painting in tones was Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Concerto; refinement upon super-refinement may not farther go; while the music—for the violinist has astute sense of style—well bears such treatment. As the audience at his coming had applauded him in long and high rapture, so it listened and renewed its plaudits. Let only a few unrepentant, unredeemable outlaws confess to each other in their holes and corners that they were equally bored by both piece and performance. Once upon a time, there was a little boy who hid himself behind a bush in the garden and loudly repeated low, vulgar words because he was so sick of super-refinement.

The other half of the concert—a very different and much more exhilarating matter—fell to Mr. d'Indy's second symphony, unheard "at these concerts" since 1909, when it was played four times in a single season under Mr. Fiedler. Mr. Monteux was evidently on his mettle with the music and had kindled the orchestra to equal zest. Sedulous and warm-spirited on the part of both had obviously been the preparation, with outcome in a performance scaling no mean heights of beauty and of power, mingling large eloquence and sensitive detail, as luminous of progress as it was exalted of voice. From first measure to last Mr. d'Indy writes a lucid music; the tonal tracery upon the main stem of the symphony stands as clear as the carvings upon a Gothic cathedral in bright air and light. Throughout, Mr. Monteux shared and sustained this lucidity. From first measure to last Mr. d'Indy writes a manifold but a steadily expanding, deepening, cumulative music, until the germs of motifs in the darkling introduction have swelled into the triumphal chant of the end. Throughout, Mr. Monteux, perceived, felt, achieved this progress.

Mr. d'Indy has enriched the symphony with many passages of lovely or of pungent detail; he has lavished upon it—his masterpiece in symphonic music—his imaginative invention, his spontaneous or meditated resource with harmonic color, his vivid play of instrumental voices. He has woven these decorative periods into the very body of his great tapestry in tones; he has laid this texture upon it. As he wrote in these things, so Mr. Monteux and many an individual virtuoso or choir of the orchestra gave voice and spirit to what were otherwise but notes upon the page. Mr. d'Indy has infused a proud and direct intensity into the music, whether it speaks low and soft or high and full. The conductor so deepened so sharpened the orchestral tones. The symphony summons and sustains a superb fervor of mood and exaltation of emotion. From the outset Mr. Monteux compassed them; to the close he sustained them. Not before in Boston has he seemed a conductor of such high attributes of mind and spirit or his controlling and quickening hand answered so plastically thereto. The orchestra, laid under manifold exaction, could hardly have been a more ready and responsive instrument. Tonal splendor, a heat of the mind, a passion of the spirit, went hand in hand through the performance.

For the student of the score, hour after hour upon the piano or the work-table, for the listener in the concert-hall of acute ear and prenatally carrying and discriminating mind, are the wondrous germination, evolution, interplay and repetition of the motifs, primary and secondary, wherewith Mr. d'Indy develops his symphony; the marvellous use, to unify and advance the music, of what the elder pedagogues and analysts would have called merely transitional and incidental figures. For the study, likewise, and for a dimly discerning few in the concert-hall is the masterly workmanship, say, of the fugue of the finale, of the introduction to the first movement of the fantastically rhythmized Scherzo. In no music-making of our time, not even in Strauss's tone-poems, is there such exhibition of intellectual resource and prowess, of craftsmanship of the mind as well as of the hand. Again for the keenly sensitive ear, for the finely touched fancy behind is much of the beauty and the suggestion of Mr. d'Indy's harmonic and instrumental coloring—his imagination, for example, with harps so that their voice shall seem as both sound and light, the pulsing depths of tone that he draws from the darker strings, the backgrounds, sombre with tonal shadow or quivering with tonal luminosity that he weaves. Of such, also are modulations and progressions like to darts of imagination upon the thrilled senses. As quick and deep of impression are the wielding of tonal masses that fills the close of the symphony or the tossing of tonal tumults that ends the first movement or—at the other extreme—such beauty as that which clothes the song of the viola at the outset of the third division. Possibly, too, only those whose minds are both logical and architectural may know to the full the expanding unity of design, the unwavering justice of proportion in which the symphony unfolds and ascends from the first pregnant measure to the final period fulfilled.

Yet even those who do but listen casually in the concert-hall must, unless their minds are as impenetrable as stones and their emotions as shallow as a puddle, feel something of the might and magnificence, the fervor and exaltation, the dramatic progress, the spiritual fire of this masterpiece among the symphonies of our time. For what is it in the manifold and pervading conflict of two sharply characterized and differentiated motifs than the eternal conflict between the principle of light and the principle of darkness? Out of the sombre introduction rumbles the motif which is relatively formless, black and evil. A flute leaps and the second, brighter, warmer, sharper-set motif springs into being. Thenceforth the music, with a few pauses as in breathless repose, is the far-flung battle of the two motifs and the forces, sombre or radiant, that they engender until at last light conquers and smothers darkness in the majestic sweep of the finale. The conflict is tumultuous in the first movement, as of action; more contemplative in the second, as of meditation, rising into resolute glow; ardent, almost fantastic, in the third, as with a kind of gayety of the mind; conducted with the whole forces of the intellect and the spirit through the fourth.

Behold, then, a symphony that is a veritable marvel of structure and progress, that teems with beauties of texture and of voice, that is manifold and exhaustless of substance, that is alive with spiritual impulse and warm with noble fervors; that into a drama in tones embodies the everlasting conflict between light and darkness in the soul of man and by faith, which is faculty of both the intellect and the imagination, bears it to full-throated victory. . . . It was the fashion of the seventies and the eighties to salute the first symphony of Brahms as the tenth in the great line that halted at the ninth of Beethoven. The truer tenth, by twenty titles, is this second symphony of Vincent d'Indy. As some with a faith like to his would believe, our children and our children's children will sit in admiration before it.

H. T. PARKER

Another Triumph Scored By Kreisler

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

D'Indy, Symphony in B-flat. No. 2.

Beethoven, Violin Concerto.

Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

IT has been a Kreisler week. On Sunday last, the violinist drew out the largest audience that has ever crowded Symphony Hall, and practically played two programs, for the number of his encores formed a recital in themselves.

On that occasion the Bach G-minor sonata, for violin alone, was the high-water mark, but at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, a still higher level was attained with Beethoven's violin concerto. Brahms' concerto had been announced, but in deference to the artist's wish it was changed to Beethoven's, and the change was a wise one, for the Brahms work, in spite of its high development, is not nearly as inspired a composition as the single violin concerto of Beethoven.

The first movement of the Beethoven work is something leonine in its grandeur and few can interpret its majestic power. The reviewer has two great memories of this composition, one as it was given by Wieniawski, and the other Ysaye's interpretation when he was at his best. To these there will now be added a third—Mr. Kreisler's performance of Friday afternoon.

We always think the treatment of the four ponderous strokes of the chief figure in this a finer development than the four-noted similar figure of the fifth symphony, but it depends much upon the breadth of the solo artist. It was impossible to imagine a loftier treatment of the first movement (the gem of the work) than it received on this occasion, and the expressive tenderness of the slow movement made its due contrast.

The final movement falls off a little, as the concluding rondo does in more than one Beethoven concerto, but it was given with so much of heartiness and vigor that it fairly rivalled the first two movements (which it intrinsically does not), and it led to a furor of recognition from the great audience at its close. The cadenza of the first movement was a great display of virtuosity, but there were much greater things than technical display in this memorable performance.

Yet the construction of that cadenza must not go unrecorded; it was one of the finest specimens of technical development, and was a credit to the composer, Mr. Kreisler himself. The wildly enthusiastic reception given to Mr. Kreisler when he appeared, the applause between the movements and the dozen recalls at the end proved that Boston does not disapprove of this great artist.

D'Indy's second symphony belongs to the masterpieces, even though Boston has not heard it for ten years. It is too learned ever to become a popular work, but it would decidedly grow upon the musical auditor with repeated hearing. It brings unusual instruments into the foreground (the viola and the bass clarinet, for example) and it gives the rhythmic complexities which this master delights in.

It transfers figures from movement to movement, the introduction to the final fugue being, like Brahms' summing-up in his first symphony, a recapitulation of many preceding figures, and the fugue itself is derived from the second movement. Wonderful learning is in this finale, and the whole work shows a great contrapuntist born a little too late, for D'Indy would have been most at home in the Palestrina-Di Lasso epoch.

The first movement has all the bitterness and asceticism of which D'Indy is such a master; it seems rather made for study than for enjoyment, but it is worth studying. The second movement seems rather long for its message. In the brief third movement the chief figure is first cousin to our well-known nursery figure, "Three Blind Mice," which it treats at considerable length.

We have already intimated that the finale is brimful of contrapuntal skill, but it ends with a rousing climax chiefly upon the brasses which must appeal to every auditor. We like the first and last movements best, but why so much bitterness and why seek out such awkward, unattractive and unmanageable figures? D'Indy and Reger do this as a habit.

The work was played in a manner that does credit to M. Monteux and his orchestra. It is full of difficulties, all of which were bravely surmounted, and the intricate figure treatment was made clear to the auditor in a most careful manner. The final climax was superbly powerful. Decidedly M. Monteux is growing and his work with the orchestra is beginning to show good results.

Mr. Grisez, of old the first clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra and later in service in the French army, is now practising his calling in New York. He will soon be heard with the Letz Quartet in Brahms' quintet for clarinet and strings.

Symphony Hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Fritz Kreisler.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

200

Mr. FRITZ KREISLER was born at Vienna, February 2, 1875. He began to play the violin when he was four years old, and two years later he played a concerto by Rode at a concert in which Patti sang. A pupil of Hellmesberger, he took the first prize at the Vienna Conservatory when he was ten years old. Then he went to the Paris Conservatory, studied under Massart, and in 1887 received, with Miss Gauthier and Messrs. Wondra, Pellenc, Rinuccini, the first prize for violin playing. He played at a Padeloup concert, then he went a-journeying. He appeared for the first time in Boston, November 9, 1888, in Music Hall, with Mr. Rosenthal, the pianist. "Master" Kreisler then played Mendelssohn's Concerto. Walter Damrosch led the orchestra. The boy in company with Mr. Rosenthal gave recitals in Bumstead Hall, December 17, 18, 19. He returned to Paris, studied again with Massart and with Godard and Delibes. He lived for two years in Italy, went home and did military service, and reappeared as a virtuoso in German cities in 1899. He again visited the United States in 1900, and gave his first recital in Boston, December 18, in Steinert Hall.

He has played in Boston at Symphony concerts:—

- 1901, February 9, Beethoven's Concerto.
- 1902, February 15, Spohr's Concerto in A minor.
- 1905, March 11, Brahms's Concerto.
- 1907, November 30, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.
- 1910, April 9, Tschaikowsky's Concerto.
- 1912, November 23, Beethoven's Concerto.
- 1913, November 29, Mozart's Concerto in D major, No. 4, and Viotti's Concerto in A minor, No. 22.
- 1915, January 2, Mendelssohn's Concerto.
- 1915, November 26, Beethoven's Concerto.
- 1916, October 20, Schelling's Concerto (first time in Boston).

TWO MUSICIANS TO MARRY

Betrothal of Miss Hazel Newell L'Africain to Julius Theodorowicz of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Notable

Mr. and Mrs. E. N. L'Africain of Medford announce the engagement of their daughter, Hazel Newell, to Julius Theodorowicz, the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Theodorowicz came from Poland about twenty years ago to join the Symphony Orchestra, and has played here ever since. Miss L'Africain is a prominent cellist, and a member of the American String Quartet. Her father is band master of the 101st Infantry Band.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

THIRTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 30, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, AT 8 P. M.

CONVERSE,

SYMPHONY in C minor

- I. Adagio misterioso; Allegro moderato; Allegro appassionato
- II. Adagio tranquillo molto e rubato
- III. Allegro vivace scherzando
- IV. Allegro maestoso molto con fuoco e marziale

SCHUMANN,

CONCERTO for Violoncello with Orchestral accompaniment, in A minor, op. 129

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Andante
- III. Molto vivace

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF,

OVERTURE on Themes of the Russian Church, "La Grand Paque Russe." ("The Russian Easter,") op. 36

Soloist:

JEAN BEDETTI

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mr. FRITZ KREISLER was born at Vienna, February 2, 1875. He began to play the violin when he was four years old, and two years later he played a concerto by Rode at a concert in which Patti sang. A pupil of Hellmesberger, he took the first prize at the Vienna Conservatory when he was ten years old. Then he went to the Paris Conservatory, studied under Massart, and in 1887 received, with Miss Gauthier and Messrs. Wondra, Pellenc, Rinuccini, the first prize for violin playing. He played at a Padeloup concert, then he went a-journeying. He appeared for the first time in Boston, November 9, 1888, in Music Hall, with Mr. Rosenthal, the pianist. "Master" Kreisler then played Mendelssohn's Concerto. Walter Damrosch led the orchestra. The boy in company with Mr. Rosenthal gave recitals in Bumstead Hall, December 17, 18, 19. He returned to Paris, studied again with Massart and with Godard and Delibes. He lived for two years in Italy, went home and did military service, and reappeared as a virtuoso in German cities in 1899. He again visited the United States in 1900, and gave his first recital in Boston, December 18, in Steinert Hall.

He has played in Boston at Symphony concerts:—

- 1901, February 9, Beethoven's Concerto.
- 1902, February 15, Spohr's Concerto in A minor.
- 1905, March 11, Brahms's Concerto.
- 1907, November 30, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.
- 1910, April 9, Tschaikowsky's Concerto.
- 1912, November 23, Beethoven's Concerto.
- 1913, November 29, Mozart's Concerto in D major, No. 4, and Viotti's Concerto in A minor, No. 22.
- 1915, January 2, Mendelssohn's Concerto.
- 1915, November 26, Beethoven's Concerto.
- 1916, October 20, Schelling's Concerto (first time in Boston).

TWO MUSICIANS TO MARRY

Betrothal of Miss Hazel Newell L'Africain to Julius Theodorowicz of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Notable

Mr. and Mrs. E. N. L'Africain of Medford announce the engagement of their daughter, Hazel Newell, to Julius Theodorowicz, the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Theodorowicz came from Poland about twenty years ago to join the Symphony Orchestra, and has played here ever since. Miss L'Africain is a prominent 'cellist, and a member of the American String Quartet. Her father is band master of the 101st Infantry Band.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

THIRTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 30, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, AT 8 P. M.

CONVERSE,

SYMPHONY in C minor

- I. Adagio misterioso; Allegro moderato; Allegro appassionato
- II. Adagio tranquillo molto e rubato
- III. Allegro vivace scherzando
- IV. Allegro maestoso molto con fuoco e marziale

SCHUMANN,

CONCERTO for Violoncello with Orchestral accompaniment, in A minor, op. 129

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Andante
- III. Molto vivace

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF,

OVERTURE on Themes of the Russian Church, "La Grand Paque Russe." ("The Russian Easter,") op. 36

Soloist:

JEAN BEDETTI

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Frederick S. Converse

CONVERSE LIMNS WAR MOODS IN MUSIC

Symphony in C Minor Given First Time in Public
—New Composition by an American Warmly Applauded

The chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was the first performance in public of the Symphony in C minor by F. S. Converse, completed last month at his home in Westwood and begun last August at Lake Sunapee, N. H. The composer explains in a note printed in the program book that although the work has no "program," "there is an expression of moods and emotions, which I think reflects something of the feelings that we have all been through during the stress of the last few years.

"I had in mind the experiences of the young men and women of our land during the trials of the war. The two main themes of the first movement, suggesting the high resolve of the youths and the tenderer feminine traits of the maidens, the wives and mothers, move through the whole work, like characters through the varied situations of a drama.

"The point of view is subjective and human, rather than impersonal and epic. I have used the symphonic form because it suited my needs of expression, not from my especial desire to write a conventional symphony. The large modern orchestra is used."

Fine Orchestral Technique

These quotations sufficiently explain the scope and intention of the new work, and suggest comparisons with "Wellington's Victory" by Beethoven, Tschai-kowsky's "1812 Overture," Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" and D'Indy's "Brief Symphony on the War in France," recently played here, not forgetting Debussy's "Berceuse Heroique," dedicated to King Albert of Belgium.

Mr Converse avoids the error made by some of his predecessors in literal echoing of the tumult and shouting of warfare. Like Beethoven in the "Pastoral" Symphony, he is concerned chiefly with the depiction of moods. There were many subtle touches which proved his fine orchestral technique and ingenuity in thematic development. The result is one of the best of American compositions. It was warmly applauded by yesterday's audience.

The scherzo with its sparkling theme and cleverly interwoven rhythms is a genuine triumph. Mr Converse excels in such music. The slow movement, as Mr Converse says, is "a sort of nocturne, quiet and tranquil as a moonlit night by some still lake." The first movement and finale alternate adroitly between martial flourishes of trumpets and gentler, more serious, more feminine passages.

These contrasts add attractiveness to the work and give it the variety without which, proverbially, there can be no unity. There is little doubt that this symphony will soon be heard in many other cities, and applauded for its many merits.

Solo From Schumann

Jen Bedetti, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo part in Schumann's Concerto in A minor with the skill and taste which have been evident in the numerous solo passages he has played in various works this season.

He surpasses any of his recent predecessors and adds strength to one of the most salient portions of the orchestra. The concerto is rather too long for the value of the musical material it contains, but well adapted to the purpose of allowing the soloist to display his technique.

The other number was Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," based on the music of the Russian Church, of the sort sung here by the Russian Cathedral Choir of New York two years ago. It has not been played here since 1897, and is far inferior to "Scheherezade" and "Antar," though not without interest, especially for the student of orchestration.

There are no more Symphony concerts until Feb 13 and 14, as the orchestra goes on tour after tonight.

CONVERSE'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Post ——— Jan. 31/20

First Hearing of Work

—Bedetti a First
Rank Artist

BY OLIN DOWNES

F. S. Converse's Symphony in C minor was played for the first time at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. On this occasion Jean Bedetti, the new first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, made his first appearance at these concerts as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," brought the programme to an end.

ON WAR EXPERIENCES

Mr. Converse states in the programme book that he took to the symphony form as his vehicle of expression, not because he had determined to write a symphony, but simply because this form seemed the most fitting vehicle for the natural and logical expression of his ideas. The symphony, which was completed in 1919, has no detailed programme, but there is the thought of "the experiences" of the young men and women of our land during the trials of the war—the thought of high resolve, of farewells, of the triumphant return and reunion.

The opening movement is spirited, with motives stern and tender, with three introductory chords which occur significantly in the course of the work.

There is a slow movement in the character of a nocturne, a portrayal, perhaps, of moonshine and flowing waters; a gay scherzo; a finale which is energetic, martial, with reminiscences of themes of earlier movements.

Two Distinct Elements

The curious thing is that on a first hearing this symphony resolves itself into two divisions of elements—the first and fourth movements, and the second and third. In the first and fourth movements Mr. Converse is symphonic in thought as well as in method. In the two middle movements, which are much simpler, he is simple and melodious, and not to our mind, symphonic—this though the outward dictates of the form of the symphony are followed. Nor do the two middle movements seem especially related, despite such thematic affiliations as there may be with the other two movements. And what have they, necessarily, to do with the war?

The audience enjoyed these movements with reason. The slow movement is a simple song without words. There are long, melodious phrases, and pretty accompaniments. The scherzo is for us trivial and wholly beneath the symphonic ideal, and also rather too short for just proportion with the other movements. This may be said: The composer dares to use well-known chords, and musical phrases of orthodox divisions and cadences, without pretence or affectation. His sincerity is felt, his thought is readily grasped. But for us this is not symphonic music, and we do not have the feeling of continuity of thought running through the four movements of the work.

Large Masses of Tone

The other two movements are very vigorous in feeling, admirably put together, with a sure hand in the development of the themes and with very brilliant and pleasing instrumentation. Perhaps too many instruments are used too much of the time, but the tonal canvass is itself large, and large masses of tone are not disproportionate to its measurements. But on initial acquaintance with this symphony we do not find the distinction of themes and the closely welded development, the long sustained musical breath of, for example, Mr. Converse's tone poem after Whitman, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

The work, with all its sincerity, straightforwardness and practiced workmanship, does not remove the scepticism we entertain of any music inspired by the recent war. We believe that substantial musical results of the war will not be seen for perhaps another generation.

Bedetti a First Rank Artist

Mr. Bedetti proved himself an extraordinary artist. In all respects he is an addition to the Symphony Orchestra of which that organization may well feel proud.

The Schumann concerto is not in itself a strong work, but Mr. Bedetti gave so artistic and so intimate a performance of this music, he played it with such consummate technical skill, such fine molding of every phrase and such genuinely Schumannish sentiment, that one was glad instead of sorry to have listened to it, from beginning to end, once more. The conception of the interpreter was an orchestral conception, a conception of the work as a whole, and not the conception of a soloist who was every moment seeking a chance for individual display.

Even today, when players should know better, how often the sensation obtains of a player who performs his solo as brilliantly as possible, resting for a little while during which the orchestra makes a noise to distract the audience, and then going at it again, with renewed bounce and vigor. But Mr. Bedetti was conveying the musical thought of the composer, whether in singing passages to which he gave the utmost richness and variety of tone color, or in tracing fleet arabesques about a melody given to the instruments of the orchestra.

His technical resources seemed to be endless. There was no difficulty, however unwieldy the occasional passage for solo instrument, which he did not completely and masterfully surmount, and every talent of the performer was modestly subordinated to the message of the music. Mr. Bedetti was recalled with a warmth most emphatically deserved. He took his place as one of the most gifted 'cellists who have been associated with this orchestra.

Russian Easter Music

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" is a typical musical sketch of a Russian scene. It echoes the antiphonal chants, the churchly ceremonies and festivities of the Russian Christmastide. There is not very much real musical development of the old model chants of the Greek church, but simply tone-painting of the most gorgeous kind—tone painting as it were, in reds and blues and golds of the interior of a cathedral during Easter services, and a close with the ringing of bells, which echoes jubilantly the outbursts of the choir and the popular rejoicing.

The orchestral performances of the afternoon were of the highest quality, and Mr. Converse's symphony, in particular, was received with much enthusiasm.

PLAY SYMPHONY INSPIRED BY WAR

Herald Jan. 31, 1920
Converse's Work Portrays Emotions Evolved by Titanic Conflict

SHUDDER OF NATURE IN MYSTIC OPENING

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Converse, Symphony in C minor (first performance); Schumann, Violoncello Concerto (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter."

Mr. Converse's symphony, composed during the summer and fall of 1919, was inspired by the great war; it expresses moods and emotion due to the terrible struggle. Mr. Converse says there is no program, but he has told what he had in mind. Even if he had said merely that the war had urged him to composition, a hearer of the music might easily shape a program for himself that probably would not be wholly foreign to Mr. Converse's thoughts. He would find in the two chief themes of the first movement, the heroic resolve of men and the tender solicitude of women, loving and anxious; he would trace the employment of these themes. In the Finale he would note the unmistakably martial character, the fanfares of victory, the tumultuous rejoicing, the ecstatic reunions. For this Finale the familiar lines of Schiller describing the return of troops in triumph might serve as a motto. And in the solemn section of this Finale, he would recognize the remembrance of those that perished nobly for an ideal.

Yet those portions of the Symphony that appeal especially to one hearing it for the first time are not indissolubly associated with the thought of war. We refer to the second movement, a Nocturne of rare beauty, in which a poetic mood is maintained throughout, and the light-hearted Scherzo, a spontaneous expression of gaiety, with contrasting measures of a fateful nature. To these movements must be added the mysterious opening of the Symphony, which are as a shudder of nature foreseeing the impending cataclysm. These pages seem to us the most noteworthy. Mr. Converse may well be proud of them.

In the first movement the expression of heroism, of the spasm and shudder of war, of the world's turmoil, is more convincing than the theme given to woman. This theme has a homely character—we use the word "homely" in its old sense, it has warmth, but it does not make an irresistible appeal; it is dangerously near the commonplace. So, too, in the finale there are pages that are conventionally triumphal, though the composer has avoided the vulgarity that often taints musical jubilation. It is not an easy thing to be strikingly jubilant even with a full modern orchestra. It is easy to be merely noisy. Mr. Converse has shunned this pitfall. It was given to Beethoven with a comparatively small orchestra, an orchestra that a young composer today would despise, to voice the frantic joy of a liberated people in his overture to "Egmont."

One finds in this symphony a curious mixture of ultra-modern musical thought—witness the opening measures of the symphony and those of the nocturne—and that which is orthodox and of long standing. One also finds in the first movement and in the finale a lack of condensation, a too great amplification of rhetorical expression, so many climaxes that the effect of the one great climax is anticipated or at least lessened.

The performance was a brilliant one; carefully prepared, carefully considered, conducted and played appreciatively and sympathetically.

Mr. Bedetti did not choose for his first appearance as soloist at a Symphony concert a work in which he could win easy success. Schumann's concerto is seldom performed; when it is played it is for the sake of the romantically dreamy and lovely andante. Mr. Bedetti, it is needless to say, played this andante most poetically; but he did more than this; by his technical skill, his unfailing accuracy, his beautiful tonal quality, his phrasing, his fine differentiation, he made the other portions of the concerto interesting; perhaps it is not extravagant to say, engrossing. Even the passage-work, inherently dry, was vitalized by his skill, tone and taste.

Rimsky-Korsakov's overture had not been performed at a Symphony concert since 1897, the year that "Scheherazade" introduced this composer to a Symphony audience. Yesterday the performance of this subtly and gorgeously orchestrated overture revealed again the great talent—he was a genius in orchestration —of this man of Oriental feeling, a disciple of Berlioz and Liszt. How infinitely varied are the repetitions of the liturgical theme! Here are repetitions of which one does not weary.

This concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 13-14 is as follows: Schumann, Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (Rhenish); Carpenter, Concertino for piano and orchestra (first time here); Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, a Parisian pianist, now sojourning in New York, will play in Boston for the first time.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RUSSIAN REVIVAL AND AMERICAN

"NOVELTY"

Trans. — Jan. 31, 1920

Mr. Monteux Deservingly Resurrects a

Churchly Overture of Rimsky-Korsakov

—The Intermezzo of Mr. Bedetti as Rare

Violoncellist—Mr. Converse's New Symphony of War-Time Moods — Clear

Merits, Obvious Shortcomings and Notably American Voice

FOR the first time in many a week an overture stood, yesterday afternoon, on the programme of the Symphony Concert—an overture, moreover, unheard in Boston for twenty-two years, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter." The names of few composers seem more familiar in the repertory of the orchestra; yet as a curious table in the indefatigable programme-book disclosed, not a measure of his music was played at its concerts until they had been established fifteen years. It was the catholic and energetic Paur who then led him into Symphony Hall with the glowing suite, "Scheherazade," so well liked that heard first in April, it was repeated in the following October. In the ensuing twenty years, not only "Scheherazade," but also "Antar," the "Spanish Caprice" and the overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar" have all passed into the active repertory of the band; while twice it has played the tone-poem of "Sadko" and the underworld of the waters. Somehow until Mr. Monteux resurrected it, the overture of the Russian Easter has been overlooked from the distant day in which Mr. Paur first set it in a programme. It deserved the conductor's pains and the audience's interest and applause; it hinted also that equally pleasurable discoveries might be possible in the neglected music of Rimsky-Korsakov. A month ago, for example, Mr. Bodanzky and his New Symphony Orchestra played in New York the suite that the Russian arranged from his opera of old legend, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan." The three tone-pictures are indeed no "Scheherazade," but the first in which the Tsar goes forth to war, is a spirited and colorful music; the second, in which the Tsaritsa sails the sea in the cask in which she and her suspected babe were imprisoned, is plaintive and pleasing; while the third, of the wondrous enchanted isle on which she is cast and whither the Tsar comes to rescue her, is bravely fantastic with Rimsky's magic of imagination and of voice. Evidently score and parts are obtainable in this country. They even await Mr. Monteux's hand.

Verses from the Psalm, "Let God Arise, Let His Enemies Be Scattered"; verses from the gospel of Mark, wherein "Mary Magdalen and Mary, the mother of James and Salome" come to the empty tomb of Jesus; and sundry pious "ejaculations" (to borrow George Herbert's word) of the composer himself, preface the Easter overture; while the title specifies the motifs as drawn from the liturgy of the Greek church. The music begins in finely drawn, shadowy preluding as of a holy mystery. The single voice of the violin, familiar device of Rimsky, bears it into measures of more churchly accent; the trombones, grave and stately, sound the liturgical note. The ready violin leads the orchestra out of darkness into light. There is hint of the joy of the festival; the rejoicing of folk, as well of priests, sounds. Upon music very like an Easter hymn Rimsky-Korsakov lavishes his rhythmic verve, his glow of harmonic and instrumental color. Out of scanty motifs he makes much; the churchly voices recur; the voices of a gladdened world absorb them. No masterpiece is this overture, but music good to hear for a richness of imagination, a warmth of mood flowering into a like richness and warmth of expression. As usual, by instinct, by practice, Rimsky seeks motion, color, heat. Not for him the bare austerities, the piercing simplicities of the evangelist, albeit he quotes him:

And entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; and they were affrighted. And he saith unto them: Be not affrighted; ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified. He is risen.

Of the composers of Rimsky-Korsakov's generation only a d'Indy—and not even he in more sophisticated moods—could set music to these words that should be like unto them.

The middle piece of the day was Schumann's Concerto for violoncello, with Mr. Bedetti of the orchestra to play the solo part, as a fortnight ago at Cambridge. For one reason only the cellists do well to perpetuate a piece that otherwise would be as rarely heard as that other music of Schumann's clouding years, the Fantasia for violin, once revived by Mr. Kreisler and more recently by Mr. Thibaud. That reason is the undiminishing beauty of the slow division—the Andante in which Schumann rises to a sustained loveliness of song that is not invention but inspiration, that distills for the instant the purest essence of music, that turns to water the listening ear, mind and heart. In the "literature" of the violoncello, cursorily recalled, there is nothing to match it in beauty of ordered sound or charm of pensive melancholy. Played as it was by Mr. Bedetti, it is the singing voice of the violoncello idealized almost beyond composer's or virtuoso's vision. For it the usually tedious "passage-work" of the first division, the no less tedious figuration and ornament of the third are relatively easy to endure. Moreover, Mr. Bedetti's playing steadily lightened, at moments almost dispelled, this tedium. Only by Mr. Casals and Miss Harrison has the violoncello been so played in Boston in recent years—with such technical ease and surety, lightness and elasticity of bow and fingers, rich, transparent, unforced tone, such freedom from every trick of displayful or sentimental exaggeration, such taste, sensibility and intelligence of musician as well as virtuoso. When Mr. Monteux persuaded Mr. Bedetti, his friend, into the Symphony Orchestra, it gained one of the rare violoncellists of this present day.

Mr. Converse's new symphony filled the rest of the concert. The more the pity that it did not also fill the second balcony, usually tenanted to the last chair, and that the applause, both in the intervals and at the end, was not more hearty and less labored. Since the days of "The Mystic Trumpeter," his tone-poem of 1905, he has written no such interesting music—no music, indeed, that seems so clearly the outcome of upspringing creative impulse rather than of deliberating will and musicianly calculation. As it seemed at a single hearing, there were obvious shortcomings, but shortcomings, for the most part, that resolute revision and self-criticism might remove. Possibly, for example, the tumults of the first movement are long-drawn until they tend to become prolix, monotonous. Shortened, sharpened, they might be more impressive. So, too, with the martial and triumphant music of the Finale. It gets under way slowly; at moments it halts as though it were becoming unwieldy of progress; once and again it sounds too thick-voiced. More concision, more clarity might speed it—and as the Scherzo proved, Mr. Converse can be both succinct and vivid in tones. Again, as in many a measure in the slow movement, he can use readily and imaginatively the harmonic and instrumental devices for coloring and atmosphere that it is the custom to call ultra-modern. At the same time he is prone, as by a sort of composing habit, to the thick tonal texture of the musical generation rooted in Liszt and Wagner and flowering in Strauss. A minor outcome is a certain contradiction of style as tonal paragraph succeeds tonal paragraph; a major outcome are occasional measures repeating trite formulas of romantic music and so inviting exclaim. It is not wise for a composer of Mr. Converse's stature to be too eclectic—better his own chosen manner. In a symphony in which he has much to say that is interesting and spontaneous, he has no need to pad—to linger, as it were, until he gains his second creative wind.

To set down these reservations and suggestions is not to diminish the clear merit, the quickening interest of the symphony. With reason, students of form will admire the fertility and the skill with which, by interplay, repetition, and transformation of motifs, Mr. Converse keeps his music in unified expansion upon itself; while even the casual listener will feel the sustained unfolding of his large design. With seeming ease he manipulates the exacting symphonic form, yet he conditions it steadily to his more imaginative and emotional purposes. In turn, students of modulation, harmonic texture and instrumental color will take keen pleasure in the misty measures of the beginning, in which the music as from spiritual contemplation flames into lusty vigor; in the soft and silvery lustres, the gentle undulation, of not a little of the slow movement; in the quick and novel turns of the beginning and the end of the Scherzo. For the merely curious ear there is atmosphere in the introductory Adagio; illusion, besides, in the whole slow movement, outside a few superfluous measures wherein it drops for the instant into commonplace; while the Scherzo stings with high musical spirits at once robust and fanciful. If Mr. Converse would shorten the tumults of the first movement, they would seem less rhetorical. Did he lighten the progress of the Finale, it would swell more surely into idealized and late march of victory.

Above all, Mr. Converse has written an American music—a music that does speak in tones the American spirit, through the late war, especially as it shone out of those who voluntarily gave their bodies, their substance, their every personal service to the cause in which they believed. (Not for a horde of "draftees" is the high voice of music.) Nay, some of the very shortcomings of the symphony make it the more expressive of the war-time moods of this democracy of ours. Imagine Sibelius, for example, setting to pages, as Mr. Converse does in the first movement, that should be both grim and ardent with the resolution of war time. How bare would be the texture, austere the progress, sharp the modulations, economical the means, of the Finn's music! Thereby he would release a wholly individual, an irremovably self-centred temperament. In contrast, Mr. Converse in his thick-fibred, full voiced, reiterative, insistent periods, speaks the American mood in those first months of preparation.

Or imagine Liszt, who dearly loved an "Allegro molto con fuoco e marziale" as Mr. Converse labels his Finale, writing such a music of conflict touched with exaltation, of victory almost mute with elation. It would reek of the theatre; the eye of the imagination would see the procession advancing upon the stage from the wings as it does in the "triumph" of Tasso, in the apotheosis of Mazeppa. Mr. Converse, in a Finale in which emotion struggles into expression and sometimes remains inarticulate, but not a whit less genuine, is transfusing into tones, feelingly, graphically, an American mood at the end of the war. There is not a trace of sensuous passion in his music through the slow movement of the communing and parting lovers in the night; the substance and the coloring of the motif of the stirred maiden in the first movement, are idealized, yielding not a hint of "sex." Yet how clear through it and through the "Adagio Tranquillo" runs the tender sentiment that in the arts—and presumably the hearts—of most Americans is the substitute for passion. Again, how altogether American are the lusty high spirits, the hearty and changeful play, the momentary lapse into more subdued mood, of the Scherzo. Play it in London, in Paris, in Munich, in Vienna and twenty listeners, who know our temperament and ways would say under their breaths: "What a very American thing!"

Not so long ago, Mr. Carpenter, for another American composer, wrote a symphony that seemed to some hearers to speak with a certain American spirit. It was a finely spun, artfully contrived music; here it courted a capricious gayety; there it gained a bright exaltation; throughout it ran in changeful mood that would not avow too much or too deeply; from beginning to end, it set forth, so to say, cultivated emotions. If Mr. Carpenter's symphony mirrored an American spirit, it was the spirit of the American aristocracy which may take such title not from "wealth and position," but from clear trait and way, code and conduct. In contrast, Mr. Converse's symphony robust of voice, firm, full, even thick, warm of sentiment, lusty of spirit, obvious of mood, inarticulate now and then, over insistent here and there, commonplace on occasion and also unashamed, is veritable music of an American democracy—as tones may reflect and, perchance idealize it.

H. T. PARKER

Jan. The Music of Boston 31, 1920 Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The years of war through which the world has been passing are beginning now to be reflected in the creative works from those who minister to us through the arts. Such a work is the new symphony in C minor by Frederick S. Converse, which had its first presentation at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 30. It is a grave and thoughtful work and a first hearing impresses one that it is the best thing that has thus far come from Mr. Converse's pen. The weight of the war years hung heavy over him as he wrote it, and even in the scherzo-like third movement there is little lightness of touch, although the ending is clever. There is a duet for 'cello and solo violin with a quiet background of accompaniment in the second movement, which is very lovely. The last movement seems the most closely knit of the four, though the whole symphony is a scholarly piece of work.

Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, left his place to play the Schumann concerto and received the warmest of applause, and deservedly, for his playing. His intonation is impeccable, and he has a flair for the right nuance that betokens the true artist. He is a rare addition to the orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture concluded the program.

What would the members of the Cecilia of a generation ago have said if they could have seen their society today giving a concert of a semi-private nature to the friends of the members, and those friends so lukewarm over the performance as to demand not a single encore? Time was when musical Boston looked to the Cecilia concerts for the inspiration of good singing and for the stimulus of new works. Nowadays musical Boston has not the opportunity of receiving what the Cecilia has to give, for on the analogy of big business, a close corporation has been formed, and the public, as usual in such cases, is the loser. At the concert of January 29 the program wended its way from a Bach chorale through old English, old French, modern English, American, modern French (d'Indy), up to a glorious finish of those Modern Russian works. Ernest Mitchell, the organist of Trinity Church, who is the conductor this year, showed much discrimination in handling the voices, and the singers responded with alertness. Mr. Mitchell has a fine ear for the right blend, and a firm hand to draw a clear and steady pianissimo from his chorus. For the delectation of singers and audience Mr. Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted the concert with short violin numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra laid a firm foundation stone for future audiences on January 29, when it gave a concert solely for children. Some 2500 youngsters, filling the capacity of the hall, paid strict attention to the music that was played them, liked it all, were especially pleased with the more obvious things, and clamored for more when the concert was over. Most of them heard this orchestra for the first time. Many of them had had no previous acquaintance with the kind of music set forth. All of them liked it well enough to cease their chatter when the conductor rapped on his desk and to settle down into close attention. The program was made up of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' "Sylvia" ballet. For the sake of musical missionary work it is to be hoped that these concerts may be made a permanent thing in Boston. One other is scheduled for this season, on February 26.

Mr. JEAN BEDETTI, violoncellist, was born at Lyons, France, on December 18, 1883. At the Lyons Conservatory of Music he took violoncello lessons of his father. He made his first appearance in public at a theatre in Lyons when he was eleven years old, and played Davidoff's concerto. He studied at the Paris Conservatory, where he was awarded a second prize in 1901, and a first prize in 1902, when a first prize was awarded also to Mlle. Clément. Mr. Bedetti's teacher was Jules Loeb.* Mlle. Clément, a pupil of Cros Sainte-Ange, was named first. This action on the part of the jury was severely censured by leading critics. Having played in chamber-music clubs, Mr. Bedetti became the first violoncellist of the Or-

JEAN BEDETTI
Leading Cellist of the Orchestra

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FOURTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUMANN, SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish." op. 97
I. Vivace
II. Moderato assai
III. Allegro non troppo
IV. Maestoso; Vivace

CARPENTER, CONCERTINO for Pianoforte and Orchestra
I. Allegro con moto
II. Lento grazioso
III. Allegro risoluto
(First time in Boston)

GOLDMARK, OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13

Soloist:

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte used.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mr. JEAN BEDETTI, violoncellist, was born at Lyons, France, on December 18, 1883. At the Lyons Conservatory of Music he took violoncello lessons of his father. He made his first appearance in public at a theatre in Lyons when he was eleven years old, and played Davidoff's concerto. He studied at the Paris Conservatory, where he was awarded a second prize in 1901, and a first prize in 1902, when a first prize was awarded also to Mlle. Clément. Mr. Bedetti's teacher was Jules Loeb.* Mlle. Clément, a pupil of Cros Sainte-Ange, was named first. This action on the part of the jury was severely censured by leading critics. Having played in chamber-music clubs, Mr. Bedetti became the first violoncellist of the Opéra Comique.

JEAN BEDETTI
Leading 'Cellist of the Orchestra

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FOURTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8 P.M.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish."
op. 97

- I. Vivace
- II. Moderato assai
- III. Allegro non troppo
- IV. Maestoso; Vivace

CARPENTER,

CONCERTINO for Pianoforte and Orchestra

- I. Allegro con moto
 - II. Lento grazioso
 - III. Allegro risoluto
- (First time in Boston)

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13

Soloist:

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte used.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

226 210

Mr. JEAN BEDETTI, violoncellist, was born at Lyons, France, on December 18, 1883. At the Lyons Conservatory of Music he took violoncello lessons of his father. He made his first appearance in public at a theatre in Lyons when he was eleven years old, and played Davidoff's concerto. He studied at the Paris Conservatory, where he was awarded a second prize in 1901, and a first prize in 1902, when a first prize was awarded also to Mlle. Clément. Mr. Bedetti's teacher was Jules Loeb.* Mlle. Clément, a pupil of Cros Sainte-Ange, was named first. This action on the part of the jury was severely censured by leading critics. Having played in chamber-music clubs, Mr. Bedetti became the first violoncellist of the Opéra-Comique orchestra in 1904. In 1908 he was appointed first violoncellist of the Colonne Orchestra, playing in turn under Messrs. Colonne, Pierné, and Monteux. He has given recitals in French cities, also in England, Belgium, Spain, and Switzerland. Called to the colors in the French mobilization of August 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for eighteen months. Since his arrival in Boston he has played at club and subscription concerts; as at Miss Terry's concert, at the Copley-Plaza, January 19, 1920.

* Jules Léopold Loeb was born at Strasbourg, May 13, 1852. Studying at the Paris Conservatory, he took a first prize in 1872. He became a member of the Opéra orchestra in 1873, and was afterwards the solo violoncellist at the Opéra and at the Conservatory concerts. He was a member of The Marsick Quartet and of Philipp's Society of Wind Instruments and Strings. In 1900 he was appointed Professor at the Paris Conservatory.

Investigating arrests
J. G. Brown, who was one of the leaders in the Seattle strike and has been in the field for some time aiding in the organizing of steel workers, is investigating all arrests of strikers by state and local police. He said today that more than 150 union men are now locked up in jails in Allegheny county.
Following up the vote of confidence given Secretary Foster yesterday by the National Steel Workers' committee, union headquarters today gave out a letter said to have been written by Judge Samuel Alschuler of the United States court of appeals for the seventh circuit bearing on Mr. Foster's alleged Huntington avenue on Sept. 25. 7

JEAN BEDETTI
Leading 'Cellist of the Orchestra

14 - 1

213
211

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FOURTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8 P.M.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish."
op. 97

- I. Vivace
- II. Moderato assai
- III. Allegro non troppo
- IV. Maestoso; Vivace

CARPENTER,

CONCERTINO for Pianoforte and Orchestra

- I. Allegro con moto
- II. Lento grazioso
- III. Allegro risoluto
(First time in Boston)

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13

Soloist:

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte used.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Robert Schmidt, pianist, soloist this week with the Boston Symphony.

SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb. 14, 1920

Introduces Pianist Schmitz, Who Plays Carpen-ter's Concertino

ORCHESTRA'S MUSIC STIRS VIVID IMAGERY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave its 14th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony, E flat major, No. 3; Carpenter, concertino for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the pianist, played for the first time in this city.

This was an unusually interesting concert. Although the symphony and the overture have been heard here many times, the nature of the performance gave new life to the former, while Goldmark's overture, now over a half-century old, is as fresh and modern as if it were dated 1919.

To us the symphony known as the "Rhenish" is not so romantically beautiful and dramatic as the one in D minor, not so essentially peculiar to Schumann, yet in the "Rhenish" there is the third movement, which reminds one of Schumann, the composer of the piano pieces, the songs, and pages of the piano concerto; and there is the sturdy, vigorous first movement. Perhaps Mr. Apthorp was right in finding the scherzo's chief theme a version of a Rhine wine song of which the tune and the words are well suited to the "ponderous joviality" of the drinkers; but neither the scherzo nor the so-called "cathedral" movement, nor the finale are of the greater Schumann, who, when fully inspired and most poetic, was a dreamer of miniature works for the piano and of music that is worthy of Heine's verses; that is, with the exception already noted, the D minor symphony; in this he is most appealing when he is least symphonic.

There has been a mass of so-called oriental music written since Goldmark's overture was first performed, but the majority of the composers give one the impression of writing in an idiom not natural to them; as if they had said: "Come now, see how Oriental I can be!" As French writers after Galland introduced "The Thousand Nights and a Night," wrote countless Arabian and Persian tales which are dull reading. Felicien David and Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote music as if they were of the East. There is the suggestion of the Orient in Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet music, and in some of his songs. But Goldmark in this overture and in his opera, "The Queen of Sheba," caught and held the spirit of the East, the sensuousness, the gorgeousness, and in the Prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," he revealed to us the mystery and the monotony of the Desert as well as the splendor of Balkis, from whom Menelik of Abyssinia, boasted descent by reason of her visit to King Solomon. In the "Sakuntala" overture there is the thought of tropic heat, lush vegetation about calm pools and bubbling springs, swooning sensuousness, the barbaric chase. The overture was superbly played. No wonder that for once there was no mad rush for the doors during the closing measures. No wonder that appreciation was shown in enthusiastic, prolonged applause.

It was the original plan to have both Cesar Franck's "Djinns" and Mr. Carpenter's Concertino on the program to introduce Mr. Schmitz, the pianist. It was found that thus the concert would be too long. Mr. Schmitz, a pianist of the first rank, is a modest man as he is a most accomplished musician and virtuoso. The Concertino is not a work that an arrogant pianist, eager for applause, would choose, for the piano is used by Mr. Carpenter as an orchestral instrument. Nevertheless, there was opportunity for Mr. Schmitz to display a singularly beautiful and liquid touch, a strength that is in contrast with his delicate, sensitive appearance, compelling brilliance and exquisite phrasing.

The Concertino itself is a highly fantastical composition, abounding in surprises that come chiefly from unusual employment and combinations of instruments; with melodic ideas that are now charming and now exciting; with exotic coloring; with dance tunes that narrowly escape being commonplace, but are saved by rhythmic piquancy and unexpected orchestration. The work as a whole is episodic, but not the less entertaining for that. Mr. Carpenter's devotion to pulsatile instruments is well known here. Never shall we forget the curved bodies of the busy, energetic xylophone players in the "Adventures of a Perambulator." In the Concertino there is, Mirabile Dictu! no xylophone, but drums, cymbals, tambourine, cas-tanets, Glockenspiel. In his next orchestral work Mr. Carpenter should experiment with the marimba, and other African instruments so dear to our Percy Grainger.

The composer, Mr. Schmitz, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra—the performance was a dazzling one—were loudly applauded. Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," will be performed here by the Chicago Opera Association with "The Elixir of Love" on Saturday, March 6.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); H. F. Gilbert, "The Dance in Place Congo"; Symphonic poem (after George W. Cable) of ballet based on this work was performed here by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

NEW PIANO CONCERTO FANTASTIC

Carpenter's Work by the Symphony—Schmitz Soloist

Post Feb. 14/20
BY OLIN DOWNES

A novel and very interesting feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was the first performance in this city of John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino for piano and orchestra," with E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, who then made his Boston debut as soloist with the orchestra.

The audience gave this music an extremely enthusiastic reception and the composer, with conductor and pianist, bowed from the stage.

FANTASTIC AND WHIMSICAL

This "Concerto" has no explanation or programme, but is evidently a very personal expression with the composer. It might be called, instead of a small concerto, a much magnified Humoresque for piano and orchestra. The music is fantastic, humorous, whimsical, full of temperament and very poetic in the mood of the second movement, and in other episodes. One would say that Mr. Carpenter had thought without making talk about it, of treating in his own way themes of Negro origin or derivation. But there are no themes taken bodily from Negro sources, though the mystical song of the second movement is strongly in the manner of a Negro spiritual.

It is a strange work. The most impressive melodic material is the song in the slow movement, introduced with a dark chord as prelude, and having a mood singularly meditative and melancholy. Then there is the very effective cadence at the end of the phrase—a simple, major cadence of a haunting simplicity and eloquence. The first movement is in the manner of a scherzo, although entirely unconventional in effect, and probably also in form, its structure not being easy to grasp at a first hearing because of the constant rhythmical surprises, the flashing orchestration and the novel treatment the composer gave his ideas. But the humor, vigor and flexibility, if the word may be used, of mood is a keynote to much of the composition.

Audacious and Electrifying

It was refreshing, and more, it was very exhilarating, to listen to an American who has absorbed Mr. Carpenter's amazing knowledge of musical technic without becoming pedantic, without taking himself too seriously. The nervous, electrical character of the opening movement and finale, the audacity, the flash of the instrumentation, the freedom and sureness of the writing and the manner in which formalism is thrown to the winds make this score, to our mind, one of the most interesting and individual Mr. Carpenter has produced. One would rather wait for better acquaintance with the music before weighing the inherent worth of its thematic material, but the handling of this material is electrifying.

The last movement of the "concertino," a title the composer must have bestowed with a tongue in his cheek, is fully as capricious, and more fantastical, headlong in its energy, its abrupt explosions of force and wild, whirling rhythms than the first part. All of the music, as we have said, is very evidently in accordance with certain things imagined by the composer, who has given us no explanation of his imaginings. As a result there is no logical musical explanation of such a wanton silliness as the tinkling waltz tune which appears in this last movement—the one episode which seems hard to accept, whether intended as humorous, sardonic or anything else. The effect yesterday was that of a rather flat joke. But the composition as a whole is gripping in its virtuosity, its swiftness and certainty of workmanship, its spontaneity of manner.

Mr. Schmitz's Virtuosity

As much more could be written of the performance, which was one of breathtaking mastery, Mr. Schmitz proved himself a super-pianist in mastering any and all difficulties, in showing his complete orchestral understanding of the music, in expressing himself on the piano with a virtuosity as unbridled and yet under control as certain as the virtuosity of the composer.

Nor must the extremely difficult task of Mr. Monteux be forgotten. Indeed, it is hard to think what would have become of that composition, without the conductor, without the pianist, without such an orchestra. And one complete rehearsal had done the business.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony

Mr. Monteux's conception of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony was extremely sympathetic to the thought of the composer, save that the orchestra used yesterday is too big for this intimate and romantic music. Double wind and brass do not go with Schumann, even the Schumann of lusty, pulsing youth of the first movement of the Rhenish Symphony. The symphony is of unequal value. The movements which tell today are the first; the second—the "Ländler," and the fourth the cathedral scene. The slow movement, misleadingly given in one place the Italian designation of "Allegro non troppo," which is not the equivalent of the German "Nicht schnell," given in the programme notes, is tame and sugar-sweet today, and the finale conventional. This is the weakest of the Schumann symphonies, though interesting.

But the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala," is a bewitching fairy tale in music. It was given all of its gorgeous coloring, its oriental languor, its triumphal apotheosis of faithful love, by Mr. Monteux.

Feb. The Music of Boston 14.1920

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert of February 13 played for the first time in Boston, John Alden Carpenter's concertino for pianoforte and orchestra. Nobody hearing this music need despair of American composition. It has been pointed out before in these columns that Mr. Carpenter stands indisputably in the first rank of American writers of music, and a hearing of this latest composition only strengthens this opinion. In addition to knowing how to say what he wants, a faculty shared with many another, he has something to say, which distinguishes him from many. The concertino is not a big work, the large orchestra is employed for the sake of color rather than volume, and the piano is treated as one of the orchestral instruments. Thus it differs from a concerto. The ideas set forth are clever and at times brilliant. In handling his instruments Mr. Carpenter seeks for oddity of expression sometimes, but never exceeds the bounds of good taste or descends to the bizarre. He quite apparently thinks in terms of orchestral color, and this color depends largely on the percussion instruments. The composition is distinctly American, for it portrays the restless, lively, progressive and joyous traits supposed to be the resultant of the many factors of the country's life. The audience took most kindly to Mr. Carpenter's work and gave the composer many recalls. The piano part was played by E. Robert Schmitz, a Frenchman now living in New York, who thoroughly effaced himself and kept an eye always on the conductor. His tone is of great beauty and his playing indicated the true artist. For the rest of the program Mr. Monteux led his men through Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

The length of this Programme is one hour and fifty minutes.

CARPENTER'S MUSIC ON SYMPHONY LIST

George — Feb. 14/20
New Concertino Given With Mr Schmitz at the Piano

Schumann and Goldmark Also Figure
in the Program

E. Robert Schmidt, the Parisian pianist of Alsatian lineage, now resident in New York, made his first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon as soloist at the Symphony concert. He played the piano part in John Alden Carpenter's new concertino and shared the applause with the composer. Mr Schmitz is at present giving a course of lecture recitals in New York, with the purpose of comparing modern music with both classical and romantic music. He might make use of Carpenter's concertino in such a comparison of the work of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries. It has the restless rhythm, the piquant harmonies, and the enlarged and subdivided orchestra which are characteristic of the music of the last 20 years. It lacks the graceful artifices of Mozart and the luscious melodies of Schumann.

This concertino, however, is based upon American popular music to a considerable extent. The first movement gets its syncopated rhythms from rag-time, but subtilises and interweaves them. The slow movement derives melodically from negro folk music. There are scattered through the whole work reminders of old-fashioned waltz tunes, of the "Blues," and, in short, of the whole range of American popular music.

If we are ever to have an American school of serious music it must thus bridge the gap which has separated "high-brow" and "popular" compositions here. All really great compositions in the past have had distinctly traceable, if often apparently remote, connections with the popular music of their country.

Even the austere masses of Palestrina are the culmination of a tendency which started from medieval street songs. Mr Carpenter is not trying to be austere, but he may be initiating a tradition that will lead to future works in the "grand manner." Meanwhile we can be thankful for a very agreeable and original composition in lighter vein. Mr Schmitz plays with remarkable technical skill and with feeling for the spirit of the music. He will be heard again with pleasure.

The Schumann "Rhenish" Symphony was given an unusually fine performance. Mr Monteux excels his predecessors with Schumann, largely because he makes the symphonies take on a lyric grace, despite their turgid orchestration. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the few major works achieved by a comparatively minor composer. Despite some banal harmonies, it wears better than much of Beethoven and Wagner, though it is of course far below their best work. It, too, was eloquently played and gladly listened to.

New Pieces and Old at the Symphony
Concert—Musicians to Be Heard in Boston Next Week and in Weeks to Come—Their Programmes—Operas and Singers from Chicago

Trans. — Feb. 14, 1920
The fourteenth Symphony Concert of the current season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where it will be repeated this evening. Mr. Monteux conducted, still showing the effects of a passing illness that earlier in the week nearly disabled him. Inclement weather slightly reduced the usual numbers of the audience, which, throughout the afternoon, gave many signs of pleasure. It warmly recalled the conductor at the end of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and lingered at the close of the concert to applaud Goldmark's overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala," pleased, with reason, by both music and performance. In particular, however, Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra stirred the listening company. Twice and thrice after it had heard the music it summoned him to the stage, sometimes with, sometimes without, the assisting pianist, a newcomer, Mr. Schmitz. (His light, bright touch suited the music; he had been sensitive to its caprice of rhythm, modulation, mood and course.) It is hard to remember when a composer has been so eagerly and insistently applauded at the Symphony Concerts. The symphony, which began the concert, and the overture, which ended it, are, of course, repertory pieces of long standing, of which the present shortage of paper forbids more than record. Suffice it that after nearly seventy years Schumann's music still keeps songful warmth; while Goldmark's, so fresh does it sound, might date from 1915 instead of 1865. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra achieved hardly more than a faithful and literal performance of the symphony. From the overture they conveyed the richness of tonal beauty, the ardor of dramatic narrative that Goldmark with equal imagination and resource joined together.

Mr. Carpenter's Concertino is shorter than most concertos, classic or modern; it eschews the more academic prescriptions of the chosen form; it is often music of light touch and playful fancy. Therefore, perhaps, he designated it by the diminutive. None the less, it is no trifle. The Concertino runs in the three orthodox movements—Allegro, slow division, Allegro again—and the composer is ingenious in the interweaving and the recalling of motives to maintain continuity and unity. He uses, besides, a full orchestra of these days and, again in the fashion of the time, joins the piano to it much often than he sets the solo instrument apart as a semi-isolated voice. Needless, almost, to say with Mr. Carpenter's other symphonic music in mind, the Concertino abounds in vivid harmonic and instrumental color, usually light, shimmering, sportive; now and then fuller-bodied but still glamorous, rarely shadowed and darkling. His symphony, as became the graver purpose, was rich in harmonic and instrumental imagination; the Concertino, of intimate mood and playful progress, is bright with instrumental and harmonic fancy—the gaiety, the fantasy of the composing spirit, rather than the delineative humor of the suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." Piquant, in particular are some of the accentuating touches of the instruments of percussion upon the notes of the piano, while there is keen tang in some of its euphonies with choirs or isolated voices of the orchestra. Again, needless almost to say, the Concertino is an exceedingly supple and variable music—not with the modulation that is restlessness, but with the modulation that is impulsiveness of mood and liveliness of fancy.

Above all, the spirit of playful fantasy, in which Mr. Carpenter seemingly conceived and wrote the music, expresses itself in the frequent shiftings of the rhythm. There, above all else, is the music variable, now as American as syncopation may make it; again lightly oriental; and yet again fanciful with Mr. Carpenter's own rhythmic invention. Throughout, the Concertino is capricious, even volatile; yet there is no mistaking the fantastical high spirits of the first movement; the gentler vein of more intimate and deeper confidences in the second; the return to bright fervors in the finale. Concertos for piano and orchestra may be many things as many composers have written them, as many listeners hear them. Some are plodding and dull; others orthodox and routine; others still ornate and displayful; and others yet again of sober beauty and manifold power. Here at last is a Concertino content to be light, fanciful, gay, sportive. An American has written it in American high spirits.

LOUIS C. ELSON IS DEAD AT 71

Adv. — Feb. 15, 1920
Noted Musical Critic Had Been With the Advertiser for 37 Years

Louis C. Elson, professor of the theory of music at the New England Conservatory of Music, musical critic on the Boston Advertiser since 1883, and one of the leading musical authorities in America, died suddenly last night at his home, No. 811 Beacon street.

Mr. Elson literally "died in harness." He conducted his last class at the Conservatory yesterday morning. He was writing a few hours before his death, and his last criticism was that on the Symphony concert which appears in the Advertiser today.

Louis C. Elson was born in Boston, April 17, 1848. Much of his early musical education was obtained from his mother, a musical amateur of more than local note. His subsequent training was under both American and European masters, including August Kreissman and Carl Glogner-Castell of Leipzig.

His career as a critic of music in the daily press began with the Boston Courier, in 1880. Three years later he transferred his allegiance to the Advertiser, and has been a constant contributor to this newspaper ever since.

He has composed a number of songs, operettas and works for the piano, but it was as critic and commentator that he was best known throughout the country.

The books he himself considered his greatest works were "Shakespeare in Music," and "The National Music of America." These works were widely copied and commended in London, Berlin and other musical centres.

Mr. Elson is survived by his wife, a brother, Alfred W. Elson, and one son, Arthur Elson.

American Work in Symphony Concert

Adv. Feb. 15, 1920

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Schumann. Third Symphony. E flat.
Carpenter. Concertino. Piano and orchestra.
Soloist, E. Robert Schmitz.
Goldmark. "Sakuntala" overture.

If we are to have Schumann's Rhenish Symphony on our programs we might as well let down the bars to all German music, for there is no symphonic work so thoroughly Teutonic as this outcome of Schumann's dwelling in the beautiful Rhineland. It is a graphic picture of phases of the Rhine folk-life, and one cannot but rejoice with these last rays of sunlight which shone upon the life that was so soon to go down in darkness and mental alienation.

If we do not find that M. Monteux interpreted everything that lay in this symphony we hasten to add that we do not believe that any one but a Rhinelander could portray all the "Innigkeit" and "Gemuetlichkeit" that is in this composition. The first movement is the exultant Schumann, and no one could be more triumphant than he upon occasion. A little less of tumult and more of breadth could have been exhibited here. The second movement might have been a beer-song (and of decidedly more than one-half-of-one-per-cent.) such simple jollity does it exhibit. The fourth movement (an extra one added to the regular symphonic four) was very well read. Here we get the pomp and majesty of a religious service in Cologne cathedral, and although Schumann was not generally effective in orchestral scoring he does manage to get trombone effects that are masterly, giving the semblance of great diapason pipes of the organ. He has done equally well with trombones at the end of the Larghetto of his first symphony. M. Monteux also made much of the contrast between this and the finale, and in the last movement one could hear the gossiping, chattering crowd pouring out of the church and filling the square with the generality that once existed there, a geniality that Prussia never knew. We are heartily glad that M. Monteux senses the glory that is in Schumann, even if he is not to the manner born. The symphony is as German as "Liberty Cabbage!"

Then came Carpenter's new Concertino. We have become distrustful of modern composers when they use diminutives. Ravel gives us a Sonatina longer than some Beethoven sonatas, and Korngold writes a Sinfonietta for tremendous orchestra and at tremendous length. But here the composer keeps his promise. Although he writes for a very large orchestra, with contrabassoon, trombones and tuba, and with cymbals, bass drum, tambourine, castagnettes and all the blacksmith shop, yet the movements are in the simplest forms with some homogeneity obtained by bringing back the first theme as coda at the end.

There is much antiphonal work between the piano and the orchestra which is interestingly developed. The composer himself defines it as a conversation between the piano and orchestra. The gradual intertwining of the two forces is done in a masterly manner. There is real geniality in the work, nothing crabbed, ascetic or strained, which is unusual in an American work in the classic forms. Some touches of orchestration are beautiful, notably the violoncello and other string passages of the second movement.

The work is pigment from beginning to end, and its finale work up to a fiery climax with piccolo shrieks and much percussive work.

There is a great amount of chord and active work (wrist and forearm action) for the pianist, and Mr. Schmitz gave this with excellent effect. Altogether the work received an artistic reading from pianist, conductor and orchestra, the bravura of the finale being especially effective. We found the first movement the best written part of the concertino, but the entire composition was worthy of its enthusiastic reception. Mr. Schmitz, M. Monteux and Mr. Carpenter were all called forth and greatly applauded.

Goldmark's sensuous overture of "Sakuntala" ended the concert with much effect. Here M. Monteux and the orchestra shone forth at their best and there was a melodic and harmonic beauty that was all the more delightful from the fact that we so seldom get these qualities in the works of moderns. We cannot help longing for a few more Goldmarks in spite of the fact that this composer cannot be ranked with the uncomfortably great modern masters.

DEATH TAKES LOUIS C. ELSON

Globe

Feb. 15, 1920.

Noted Music Critic and Teacher Passes Away at Age of 71 After Brief Illness

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Louis C. Elson, lecturer and teacher of music at the New England Conservatory of Music, died last night at his home, 811 Beacon st., after a few days' illness.

Mr Elson was born in Boston in 1848. His mother was a musical amateur of considerable ability and he received his earliest instruction in music from her. Subsequently he studied both with American and European teachers. August Hamann of Boston taught him piano, August Kreissman, one of the foremost singers of German Lieders, was his first vocal instructor, and Carl Gloggnier-Castelli of Leipsic instructed him in composition.

Mr Elson had composed much in the smaller forms, songs, operettas and piano works. He had conducted choruses and musical festivals. But his chief work had been in teaching, lecturing and musical literature.

Long at New England Conservatory

He became head of the department of musical theory in the New England Conservatory of Music in 1882 and continued in that position until his death. His musical lectures have been heard in all parts of the country. He had lectured at Tulane University in New Orleans, Vassar, University of Pennsylvania, Harvard, Cornell and other colleges. He was twice called to deliver series of lectures before the Lowell Institute. He had also appeared before the Contemporary Club of Philadelphia, had given a series of public lectures with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and had addressed the Cincinnati College of Music, Miss Porter's Farmington Academy, and many lyceum courses and Chautauquas.

His literary work began on the Vox Humana, a Boston journal devoted to organ music. Subsequently he became editor of the Musical Herald. He was correspondent and editorial writer of Music and Drama, of the Musical Courier and other musical papers. He was also musical editor of the Boston Advertiser and Boston correspondent of "Die Musik" of Berlin and Revue Musicale, Paris. In 1883-4 he was European correspondent of the Boston Transcript.

He was a frequent contributor to the Atlantic Monthly, the Quarterly Review, The Etude, The Musician and numerous other magazines. He was the author of the essay on "Music," a condensed history, in the Encyclopaedia Americana.

Published Many Books

The first of his books was published about 20 years ago. This was his "Curiosities of Music," which has been liberally quoted by London writers. His second volume was "The History of German Song," which became a textbook under Prof White in Cornell, and was partially reproduced in several German periodicals. This won him the close friendship of Robert Franz. A couple of musical textbooks ("The Theory of Music" and "The Realm of Music") followed.

Soon after this Mr Elson published his "National Music of America and Its Sources," which gave, for the first time, a full account of the history and origin of all of our chief National songs. This is still the chief work on this subject. "European Reminiscences," a popular rather than a musical work; "Great Composers," "Famous Composers and Their Works" (new series) are others of his books.

"Shakespeare in Music," which has been printed both in America and England, is the largest work in existence on this particular subject and has received the hearty recommendation of Dowden, Henry A. Clapp and other Shakesperians on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr Elson had directed large choruses in Trinity Church in the New England Conservatory, and in the musical festival which took place in Boston in 1886. He had published a volume of "Songs for Children, three operettas, a number of songs, and a few piano sketches.

But it was as a critic and commentator that Mr Elson was best known throughout the country.

Mr Elson is survived by his wife, a brother, Alfred W. Elson, and one son, Arthur Elson.

Mr. E. ROBERT SCHMITZ was born in Paris, February 8, 1889, of French parents. The father was of an Alsatian family. Mr. Schmitz studied the pianoforte at the Paris Conservatory under the late Louis Diémer. In 1908 he was awarded a first accessit; in 1909, the second prize; in 1910, the first prize for pianoforte playing. He gave concerts in Belgium and in Germany in 1910-11. Having played accompaniments for Mmes. Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mysz-Gmeiner, and others, in 1912 he gave recitals of ultra-modern music in Paris. He founded and conducted in Paris the Association des Concerts Schmitz. He thus brought out orchestral and choral works by Milhaud, P. Le Flem, O. Klemperer, and others. In 1913 he was the first to play Schönberg's music for the "S. M. I." Active as pianist and conductor, associated in his concerts with leading composers and musicians, he joined the French colors August 19, 1914, and served for three years and two months. He was wounded slightly, but, gassed severely, was in a hospital for seven months. After the armistice he came to the United States. At Chicago he taught for a few months, and played in orchestral concerts. Going to New York, where he now lives, he gave his first recital there on April 17, 1919, when he played music by Franck, Chabrier, Magnard, Saint-Saëns, Aubert, Ravel ("Le Tombeau de Couperin"), and Debussy. He gave another recital on December 6, 1919, when his programme consisted of French, German, Italian, and Spanish composers. On January 1, 1920, he gave a recital with Comments. Music compared and its Relation to the Modern Spirit of Modern Romantic Music

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

The much discussed French pianist, E. Robert Schmitz, will make his first appearance in Boston, when he plays Carpentier's concertino with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Mr. Schmitz's European career has been extensive and distinctive as well. As a pupil of Diémer and a winner of the first prize at the Paris Conservatory, he gave recitals in each musical metropolis, making his mark as a bold and discerning pioneer of new music. A versatile musician and a thorough artist, he founded and conducts his own symphony Orchestra in Paris, consorted closely with such men as Debussy, Saint-Saëns and D'Indy, and figured prominently upon certain memorable programmes of the Schola Cantorum. Joining his country's army in 1914, he fought actively in the fiercest campaigns of the war, with an anti-aircraft battery. Honorably discharged by Premier Clemenceau, he came to this country and took up his abode in Chicago, where his concerts became immediately popular. In New York he was received with enthusiasm as a brilliant musician, and as a devoted exponent of the works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel and Magnard. He has further announced a series of lecture-recitals to be given there.

an, and Spanish of four "Recitals Spirit of Modern Romantic Music

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in G minor. (Köchel 550)

I. Allegro molto

II. Andante

III. Menuetto; Trio

IV. Finale: Allegro assai

LALO,

SPANISH SYMPHONY for Violin and Orchestra
op. 21

I. Allegro non troppo

II. Scherzando; Allegro molto

IV. Andante

V. Rondo: Allegro

GILBERT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Dance in Place Congo"

(First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

FREDRIC FRADKIN

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mr. E. ROBERT SCHMITZ was born in Paris, February 8, 1889, of French parents. The father was of an Alsatian family. Mr. Schmitz studied the pianoforte at the Paris Conservatory under the late Louis Diémer. In 1908 he was awarded a first accessit; in 1909, the second prize; in 1910, the first prize for pianoforte playing. He gave concerts in Belgium and in Germany in 1910-11. Having played accompaniments for Mmes. Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mys-Gmeiner, and others, in 1912 he gave recitals of ultra-modern music in Paris. He founded and conducted in Paris the Association des Concerts Schmitz. He thus brought out orchestral and choral works by Milhaud, P. Le Flem, O. Klemperer, and others. In 1913 he was the first to play Schönberg's music for the "S. M. I." Active as pianist and conductor, associated in his concerts with leading composers and musicians, he joined the French colors August 19, 1914, and served for three years and two months. He was wounded slightly, but, gassed severely, was in a hospital for seven months. After the armistice he came to the United States. At Chicago he taught for a few months, and played in orchestral concerts. Going to New York, where he now lives, he gave his first recital there on April 17, 1919, when he played music by Franck, Chabrier, Mag-nard, Saint-Saëns, Aubert, Ravel ("Le Tombeau de Couperin"), and Debussy. He gave another recital on December 6, 1919, when his programme c

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

On J The much discussed French pianist, E. Robert Schmitz, will make his first appearance in Boston, when he plays Carpenter's concertino with the Boston
Symphony Orchestra this week. Mr.
Music compared Schmitz's European career has been exand its Relation: tensive and distinctive as well. As a pupil of Diémer and a winner of the first prize at the Paris Conservatory, he gave recitals in each musical metropolis, making his mark as a bold and discerning pioneer of new music. A versatile musician and a thorough artist, he founded and conducts his own symphony Orchestra in Paris, consorted closely with such men as Debussy, Saint-Saëns and D'Indy, and figured prominently upon certain memorable programmes of the Schola Cantorum.
Joining his country's army in 1914, he fought actively in the fiercest campaigns of the war, with an anti-aircraft battery. Honorably discharged by Premier Clemenceau, he came to this country and took up his abode in Chicago, where his concerts became immediately popular. In New York he was received with enthusiasm as a brilliant musician, and as a devoted exponent of the works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel and Magnard. He has further announced a series of lecture-recitals to be given there.

an, and Spanish of four "Recitals
Spirit of Modern Romantic Music

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in G minor. (Köchel 550)

- I. Allegro molto
- II. Andante
- III. Menuetto; Trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro assai

LALO,

SPANISH SYMPHONY for Violin and Orchestra
op. 21

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Scherzando; Allegro molto
- IV. Andante
- V. Rondo: Allegro

GILBERT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Dance in Place Congo"
(First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

FREDRIC FRADKIN

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mr. E. ROBERT SCHMITZ was born in Paris, February 8, 1889, of French parents. The father was of an Alsatian family. Mr. Schmitz studied the pianoforte at the Paris Conservatory under the late Louis Diémer. In 1908 he was awarded a first accessit; in 1909, the second prize; in 1910, the first prize for pianoforte playing. He gave concerts in Belgium and in Germany in 1910-11. Having played accompaniments for Mmes. Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mys-Gmeiner, and others, in 1912 he gave recitals of ultra-modern music in Paris. He founded and conducted in Paris the Association des Concerts Schmitz. He thus brought out orchestral and choral works by Milhaud, P. Le Flem, O. Klemperer, and others. In 1913 he was the first to play Schönberg's music for the "S. M. I." Active as pianist and conductor, associated in his concerts with leading composers and musicians, he joined the French colors August 19, 1914, and served for three years and two months. He was wounded slightly, but, gassed severely, was in a hospital for seven months. After the armistice he came to the United States. At Chicago he taught for a few months, and played in orchestral concerts. Going to New York, where he now lives, he gave his first recital there on April 17, 1919, when he played music by Franck, Chabrier, Mag-nard, Saint-Saëns, Aubert, Ravel ("Le Tombeau de Couperin"), and Debussy. He gave another recital on December 6, 1919, when his programme comprised music by French, Russian, and Spanish composers. On January 22, 1920, he gave the first of four "Recitals with Comments." The general subject was: "The Spirit of Modern Music compared with the Spirit of Classical and Romantic Music and its Relations with the other Fine Arts."

fully for fear you'll think she just
The girl has shown them to you. The girl

Saint-Saëns and D'Indy, and figured prominently upon certain memorable programmes of the Schola Cantorum. Joining his country's army in 1914, he fought actively in the fiercest campaigns of the war, with an anti-aircraft battery. Honorably discharged by Premier Clemenceau, he came to this country and took up his abode in Chicago, where his concerts became immediately popular. In New York he was received with enthusiasm as a brilliant musician, and as a devoted exponent of the works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel and Magnard. He has further announced a series of lecture-recitals to be given there.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in G minor. (Köchel 550)

I. Allegro molto

II. Andante

III. Menuetto; Trio

IV. Finale: Allegro assai

LALO,

SPANISH SYMPHONY for Violin and Orchestra
op. 21

I. Allegro non troppo

II. Scherzando; Allegro molto

IV; Andante

V. Rondo: Allegro

GILBERT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Dance in Place Congo"

(First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

FREDRIC FRADKIN

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Henry F. Gilbert
(Photo by Baehrach.)

SYMPHONY GIVES 15TH CONCERT

Herald Feb. 21, 1920
Fradkin Brilliant Violin
Soloist for Lalo's Spanish Symphony

ORCHESTRA PLAYS PIECE BY GILBERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave its 15th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fradkin was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra; Gilbert, "The Dance in Place Congo" (first time at these concerts).

The performance of Mozart's symphony was a beautiful one; beautiful in its clarity, its euphony, its unfailing regard for proportion. Some years ago, a prominent writer about music, a wild-eyed worshipper of Liszt and Wagner, published the statement that this symphony is interesting only in a historical sense. His idols would have been the first to laugh at him. There are few things in art that are perfect. The G minor symphony is one of them. Its apparent simplicity is an adorable triumph of supreme art.

Too often this music is played in a perfunctory manner, as if the conductor had said to himself: "We should play at least one symphony by Mozart each season. Let's see—what did we play last year? The one in E flat major. O yes. Well, we'll play the one in G minor. You all know it but we'll run through it for form's sake," and he yawns during the rehearsal, impatient to put some thunderous modern work on his rack, so that he can show the audience what he can do. The French have long been famous for their interpretation of music by Mozart and Haydn, as Habeneck's performance of Beethoven's 9th symphony excited the wonder and praise of Wagner when he heard the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory.

Mr. Fradkin gave a brilliant interpretation of Lalo's fascinating "Spanish" Symphony, a performance that was also sensuous. Furthermore there was the capriciousness, the elegance demanded by the music. Technically and aesthetically, the interpretation was a fine one. It was thoroughly appreciated by the great audience. Applause in this instance was not perfunctory, courteous, respectful; it was enthusiastic.

Mr. Gilbert, inspired by a magazine article of George W. Cable, wrote a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," over 12 years ago. Discouraged by indifferent or ignorant conductors, he used this music for a ballet, which was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in March, 1918, and performed here by the Metropolitan company in April. The music was heard yesterday as the composer wished it to be heard; but yesterday, as two years ago, he was unfortunate in this respect: his composition when played here as a ballet followed Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," yesterday it followed music by Lalo. Now, the Russian and the Frenchman were masters of orchestration. Mr. Gilbert, indisputable as his native talent is, has yet to learn the value of economy of means. The orchestration of "Dance in Place Congo" is thick. The temptation to use all the instruments at his disposal was not always resisted by him. For this reason, and possibly for other reasons, the poem, although it made a more marked impression than when it served the purposes of a ballet, did not firmly hold the attention throughout. The opening episode is powerful; there is the true tragic note with the thought of barbaric feeling. The Bamboula theme is announced with the splendid and fitting vulgarity. The lyrical episode has charming measures, but from here until the dramatic ending there are pages that are of comparative little significance. It is easy to say that this or that composition is too long. Sometimes the mental and physical state of the hearer prompts the reproach; but as a rule the fault is in the composer's unwillingness or inability to say much in a few pages. Over-elaboration is always ruinous. Garrulity is tiresome in art as in life. The desire to be explicit, circumstantial in narration, often lessens the immediate effect and forbids remembrance.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for putting this symphonic poem on the program. Music does not deserve to be heard at a Symphony concert, simply because it was written by an American. If the music has importance, it should be heard even if the composer happens to be an American. What Mr. Gilbert writes is certainly worthy of serious consideration.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, Symphony in G. major (B. & H. No. 13); Debussy, "The Blessed Damosel" (Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto; female chorus trained by Mr. Townsend); Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

GILBERT'S 'DANCE' BY SYMPHONY

Wildly Barbaric and Sensuous—Fradkin
as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Mozart's G minor symphony, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, and Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," performed for the first time as a symphonic poem.

The same composition was performed in New York and in Boston as a ballet by the Metropolitan Opera Company, March 23 and April 26, 1918.

BETTER IN CONCERT FORM

When this music was performed as ballet the stage spectacle was not congruous with Mr. Gilbert's original conception of the music. Moreover, an operatic orchestra in a theatre pit does not sound as a symphony orchestra on the stage. Most important of all, the better the music the more likely it is to gain and not lose if each hearer is allowed to imagine its meanings for himself. For these reasons, the ballet was far less impressive than the symphonic poem, unhampered by any stage scene, played yesterday.

The music as heard yesterday made a fresh and a very deep impression. It is wildly imaginative, barbaric, vulgar, tropical, sensuous. The last pages surpass the music of any other American we know in originality and imagination. Nietzsche would have called them

"Mediterranean." The music is here strangely eerie and fateful. The slaves in New Orleans of the '40s have danced their wildest; they leap and fall to the ground with foaming lips; they exult or strive furiously for the favors of the women; and at last, like the knell of fate itself, their frenzy is interrupted by the tolling of the 9 o'clock bell to quarters, the reminder of another day of pain and toil. And there are sounds in the orchestra like the shuffling of feet, and mournful echoes of motives derived from actual songs and yells of the Creoles of a day past; there is the shudder of the night in the music, there is an orchestral cry of inarticulate rage and despair.

Work of Ten Years

This symphonic poem was not composed in one single period of the composer's development. Its composition covered roughly a period of 10 years. Measures which Mr. Gilbert wrote in for practical exigencies of the ballet have happily been eliminated, but anyone who has carefully and thoughtfully watched his style will be interested to observe the difference in thought, manner, harmonic texture, between the opening and the superb pages at the end.

But the work has enormous energy and continuity of thought throughout. The orchestration, it is true, still impresses one as being thick, over-heavy. Yet this does not serve to conceal the great originality of many instrumental effects, the power and breadth of the brush strokes with which strong, sometimes harsh, sometimes very beautiful colors are put on the canvas. The recklessness of mood does not distract the composer from true principles of symphonic development. There are uneven passages, there are passages experimental, or unconsciously imitative—even in this score by an American bent on discarding outworn musical formulas of Europe—of music of other and older schools. We think especially of the fugal manner in which the dance theme is developed after the love music. The contrast between this rather old-fashioned and conventional start with the reckless abandon, the wanton barbarousness of pages, which quickly follow, is naive, yet it makes its mark, because of its imperious energy of the composer's imagination, which holds complete sway from the first note to the last, and evokes from Creole folk-tunes, a score which stands alone in its color, its romantic and emotional qualities, among American compositions.

"In Triumphant Vulgarity"

It goes without saying that some were shocked by the theme of the Bam-boula—we quote Mr. Gilbert's note in the programme book—"ripped out in all its triumphant vulgarity by the full orchestra"; by the unrefined humor of the glockenspiel in the witty theme that follows, by the drunken song of trumpets in fifths as the revel works up to its climax. But we think many will agree with us, that despite instrumentation undoubtedly inclining to be thick and heavy, and because of its surge of elemental human impulse, its mighty songs of the soil, this work is the most significant, the most triumphant vindication of his talent and his artistic attitude that Mr. Gilbert has yet achieved.

Furthermore, while it is easy to realize the orchestral heaviness in many places, it is also easy to recall superbly dramatic and gorgeous effects. Think of the use of the harps, of certain percussion instruments. There are audacious and savagely brilliant combinations not found in the textbooks. The orchestration needs, in our opinion, some clarification, and partly because it is almost too full of good ideas. There are too many effects at the same time. They frequently muddle the sound and get in each other's way. There are strokes of instrumental genius by a composer with a native imagination if not invariably a native skill in the employment of orchestral instruments.

At the end of this performance the audience, loth to leave the hall, kept applauding until Mr. Gilbert appeared on the stage.

Mr. Fradkin's Playing

Mr. Fradkin played a concerto which is charming and original from beginning to end with technical exuberance and with fine taste, polish, feeling for the style of the music. After all, are there many better violin concertos? This music is piquant to the last detail; melodious, transparent and fascinating in its rhythms. Had the music been duller, such a performance as Mr. Fradkin's would have stirred the audience to well-merited applause.

Last, but not least, in reversing the order of discussion from the order of the items of the programme, let it be said that Mr. Monteux's performance of the Mozart symphony was of the highest artistic quality, admirable in phrasing, in the transparency of the orchestral tone; above all, in the prodigious spirit and glow of Mozart's wondrous music.

Feb. The Music of Boston 2/1/1920

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The fifteenth symphony concert was given on February 20. The program was as follows:

Mozart. Symphony in G minor.
Lalo. Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, Fredric Fradkin, soloist.
Gilbert. "The Dance in Place Congo." (First time at these concerts.)

This program covered a wide range of emotions and style. The distance between the grace and refinement of Mozart's Symphony and the rough and tumble symphonic poem by Gilbert is far and Lalo's Spanish Symphony hardly served as an adequate connecting link. The program, however, was an excellent medium for a display of versatility on the part of Mr. Monteux, who conducted throughout the afternoon with unusual authority. Each piece, widely differing from its neighbors on the program, was given its proper atmosphere and coloring. Three distinct styles were represented and admirably contrasted. This ability to differentiate sharply between various styles and schools of composition is one of Mr. Monteux's most outstanding characteristics. It has given the symphony concerts of this season a varied and interesting character. In former times every piece was given a Teutonic tinge. This was tiresome. We now hear the music of many schools played in as many different ways. Mozart is difficult to play well. The slightest uncertainty of ensemble is immediately apparent. The strings played with exceptional beauty of tone. The phrases of the Andante were sung by the first violins as by one player. The wood-wind and horns played with delicacy and grace particularly in the trio of the minuet. In short, the symphony was beautifully played, a fact fortunately realized by the audience, which gave evident signs of delight and pleasure. Mr. Fradkin gave unexpected proof of virtuosity. His performance of Mendelssohn's concerto last season, while well enough in a negative way, was hardly one to excite enthusiasm. His playing of the Lalo symphony, however, revealed a virtuoso of the first rank. It was full of style, fanciful without becoming sentimental, impassioned in the true Spanish manner. His tone was rich and full, his passage-work clear and brilliant. The orchestra accompanied with great flexibility.

Henry Gilbert is America's most "national" composer. His music is as distinctively American as that of Rimsky-Korsakow is distinctively Russian. We may not admire Mr. Gilbert's music but we must admit that it is sincere, that it is the consistent expression of his devotion to an ideal, a devotion which has never wavered throughout his long career. "The Dance in Place Congo" is a good example of his art. It contains his qualities and defects in profusion. The crude, though brilliant, orchestral coloring, the tiresome repetitions, the needless barbarities, the technical shortcomings are all present. But we also hear the poet, trying to make himself heard above the din of the bass drum, the imaginative, fanciful musician attempting to express his emotions, albeit with limited technical resources. To be more specific, the plan of this symphonic poem is poetically conceived. The details are in many cases weakly carried out. For example, the phrase representing the "tragic and poignant cry of rage and revolt of an entire race against the restraining bonds of slavery" can hardly be said to be arresting. The "Bamboula" theme, occurring for the first time with a realistic orchestration quite necessary to the general scheme of the composition, need hardly have been repeated with so little change. The lyric episode seems too long, its repetitions are fatiguing. Yet it must be admitted that the work as a whole produces a brilliant effect. There is much that rings true, much that is distinctive.

SYMPHONY CONCERT Trans. — Feb. 21, 1920. AGAIN THE PROGRAMME RANGES WIDELY

From Mozart Classic to the Gilbert of "The Dance in Place Congo"—The American's Uneven Music—Mr. Monteux and Mozart—Between, Mr. Fradkin as Rare Violinist in Lalo's Spanish Symphony

DISSENSIONS and rumors of dissensions may disturb the inner peace of the Symphony Orchestra; but outwardly its concerts run tranquil course, as they will to the end of the current season and, doubtless, through many seasons more. After thirty-nine years it is an institution not readily shaken by spring storms, even though for the hour they blow somewhat more heavily than usual. The same band sat upon the stage of Symphony Hall as has sat there since the middle of last October; the same conductor led it; the same audience applauded them as they made way through a programme—classic symphony, modern concerto, novel miscellaneous piece—like to a hundred others in the annals of the orchestra. The playing of Mozart's symphony fell not much below and rose not much above reasonable expectations. Mr. Fradkin, in the solo part of the concert-master's annual concerto, disclosed anticipated qualities in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." As usual with novel numbers on a Friday afternoon, the audience was uncertain whether to applaud heartily or only courteously Mr. Gilbert's tone-poem, "The Dance in Place Congo." Enough, however, persisted in its clapping to call the composer to the stage; while through the rest of the concert, and especially for the violinist, the applause had been uncommonly long and hearty. By every evidence that a concert may give, goodwill abounded from one end to the other of Symphony Hall. Bessed are institutions; they persist; they reassure the apprehensive.

Mr. Monteux's Mozart is no remarkable Mozart; but the audience was plainly pleased to listen to a composer whom it had not hitherto heard in the course of the season and in whom it found quick delight. With wisdom the conductor had somewhat reduced the number of the heavier and the darker strings, with discernment he had balanced string and wind choirs, so that here and there the music gained appreciably in Mozartian fluidity of movement and elasticity of accent. It would have gained more had Mr. Monteux's own hand been lighter and more supple. He kept the course of each movement quite clear, with each detail of modulation, emphasis, progress in becoming place. He missed none of the obvious shadings, the transparently contrasting moods—the bright energies of the first Allegro; the tremulous melancholy of the Andante; the shadows and lights of the Minuet; the fitfulness of the Finale. The orchestra gave him back warm, pliant, songful tone.

In a word, the listener heard Mozart's symphony in G minor played straightforwardly, lucidly, understandingly, pleasantly. He also heard that symphony played with little of the finer sensibility, the pervading elegance, the intuitive felicities that are the distinctions of a performance of Mozart's music. With the best will, the clearest head, the readiest hand a conductor may not attain them by the taking of thought and pains. Either he gains them by a sort of divination or they altogether evade him. If he possesses such divination, then does this music of Mozart run in endless undulation and play of light and shade; then does it sound most simple where it is most complex; then does it seem the perfection of fluidity and sensibility; while loveliness shimmers out of detail after detail and charm permeates and crowns the whole. Then also do the modulation of pace, the distribution of accent, the variations of rhythm seem like intuitions of the instant; while the orchestra is as deft as it is sure of stroke and as limpid as it is exquisite of tone. The spirit of Mozart sings, lives, illudes in such rare performance; the letter of Mozart still delights in performances that are no more than faithful, intelligent and skilful. Into this second category falls Mr. Monteux's version of the symphony in G minor.

Mr. Gilbert's tone-poem better suited the abilities of the conductor, came nearer to unclouded and undiminished performance. It was written as a symphonic piece for the concert-hall; but before it had been played as such, the composer designed an action for the music and it was heard as ballet-pantomime at the hands of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York and Boston in the spring of 1918. The action was laboriously devised; it was not too plausibly or pictorially brought to actual being on the stage; it seemed rather to obscure and obstruct the music than to be illumined and sped by it. The outcome clearly suggested that the music would make keener and deeper impression played by itself in the conditions for which the composer originally proposed it. Yesterday it was so played possibly for the first time in a concert-hall. It was more amply and vividly disclosed, but even so, it fell short of the other pieces of Mr. Gilbert heard at the Symphony Concerts—his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," his Prelude to Synge's tragedy of Irish fisher-folk, "Riders to the Sea." The overture flashed with lively rhythms, bubbled with animated motifs as animatedly developed and contrasted. The prelude prevailed by illusion of sombre atmosphere, by dramatic force of utterance.

Now, in "The Dance in Place Congo," Mr. Gilbert would, as it were, alternate and in measure unite his two voices prompted by Mr. Cable's description (in a half-forgotten article in a magazine of the eighties) of the revels of slaves and half-castes on Sunday afternoons in an obscure corner of Creole New Orleans. The composer begins graphically and dramatically enough. He writes a rude, sombre, oppressed music gradually rising first into bitter wail, then into wild shriek of resentment and revolt. It is background, he tells his hearers in a lengthy and vivid programme note—background of slavery out of which the dance proper—or rather improper—shall rise, into which it shall descend. It does so vanish at the sound of the booming bell that calls the slaves to quarters. The dance shivers itself away; the ensuing rhythms are as the patter of departing feet, irregular, more and more faint. The mood, the voice of brooding resentment and angry revolt return. Again Mr. Gilbert has written graphically, dramatically; again his musical invention, his musical means serve his imaginative ends. At beginning and at end of the tone-poem he gains the wildness, the rudeness, the fierceness of voice that he sought.

Between lie the dance and certain supplements to it and it is there, as it seemed two years ago in the Opera House, as it seemed yesterday in Symphony Hall, that Mr. Gilbert falls short of his design. In his programme-note he lavishes printed description upon this dance as has Mr. Cable before him. "Uncouth preluding" is to herald it. The orchestra then "rips it out in all its triumphant vulgarity." There should be "frantic leaps, frenzy, wild and terrible delights." It rises to "ecstasy," to "madness," to "fury." Unfortunately, however, the actual music fails to work any such illusion. In fact, Mr. Gilbert can make no more of this Bamboula than a monotonous, long drawn, distinctly ordinary dance of blacks. There is little wildness in it, as little sensual tang; no lascivious frenzy; no barbaric fury. He makes what play he may with rhythm; but he is dull and bare of harmonic and instrumental color. There are rhythmic vigor, rhythmic reiteration and no more. The ear and the imagination listen equally unilluded and unmoved. The workmanship seems even clumsy. It betters when there

Georges Longy

(Photograph by Horner)

First Oboe-Player of the Symphony Orchestra—Founder and Director of the Boston Musical Association is gentler interlude as though some pair had cut away for a moment of quiet from the circle of dancers. The music is appropriate if not imaginative; warm, if it is opaque. There is rude force in the return of the Bamboula; but not until the bell booms is Mr. Gilbert the graphic, the dramatizing composer that he can be. His prelude and postlude thrill; all between merely sounds.

Mr. Gilbert would be the last to deny his own aggressive temperament. Yet is he not needlessly truculent in that same programme-note which he obviously designs as persuasion to his hearers? "Here was an American subject," he cries; "presented in vivid style by an American author; full of dramatic and colorful suggestion." And again: "I desired to present upon the stage of the opera house an authentic piece of American art, one having its origin in an American happening, its inspiration in the creation of an American author, its music by an American composer. . . ." It is quite true that "The Dance in Place Congo" is such an American music; but there is no very obvious reason why Mr. Cable's article might not have kindled an imaginative composer of any race, had he chanced upon it, to characterizing and vivid composition or why the Bamboula itself might not have laid spell upon him. In fact, it did upon Gottschalk in the forties, and he was half-English and half-Creole, and upon Coleridge-Taylor in our own time, in whom was mixed English and negro blood. Moreover, there is music as distinctively American as Mr. Gilbert's which has no such origins as he seems to believe essential. He has surely heard Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," and he could hardly have missed the intrinsically American humor and sentiment blended in the music. He may have heard Mr. Converse's recent symphony and noted the American quality pervading it. In the fantasy, the caprice, the brilliancy of Mr. Carpenter's Concertino at the Symphony Concerts last week, it is easy to feel a distinctively American note. If Mr. Gilbert would only believe it, there is an American voice in symphonic music, an American spirit no less, which are not all dependent upon negro tunes or upon what he calls, apropos his American Dances, "the twists in use in popular music." American composers can look in their hearts, as well in Place Congo, and write.

Between symphony and symphonic poem, Mr. Fradkin had his inning. Once more, as in his concerto last year, as in many a solo passage in the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts, he was violinist who has at finger tips every refinement of his instrument, who plays with an unfailing musical sensibility. His tone is silken, supple, lustrous. It bends to every modulation, every inflection of the piece in hand; it answers quickly to every beat of rhythm; it spins transition: it is artful in light, shade and gradient. It is warm in figures, plastic in ornament, penetrating in instrumental song. Mr. Fradkin respects the clear will of the composer; yet by the manner in which he paces, colors, emphasizes the music, displays a clear individuality of his own. His choice lighted upon a concert-piece that set these qualities in high relief and that deserved performance no less for its own deserts and for the satisfactions it yields. Not as often as it might does the public of the Symphony Concerts hear this "Spanish Symphony" of Lalo. Whenever it does it renews its pleasure in the light, bright flow of the music, the freshness with which it is invented, the skill with which it is conducted, the fancy and piquancy of the harmonic and instrumental dress, the unemphasized, unconventional yet pungent Spanish flavor that from the rhythms seems to infiltrate the whole. A miniature among concertos for violin—say beside Brahms's or Chalkovsky's—this "Spanish Symphony" may be, but it excels them all in exquisiteness of filagree and fantasy.

H. T. PARKER

LOVING TRIBUTE PAID TO MEMORY OF LOUIS C. ELSON

The invaluable services of Louis C. Elson in the field of music were emphasized yesterday afternoon at the memorial services in his honor at Jordan Hall, which were attended by a large representation of pupils and alumni of the New England Conservatory of Music, of the faculty of which Mr. Elson had been a member for the last 46 years. G. W. Chadwick, director of the conservatory, conducted these exercises. Resolutions upon the death of Mr. Elson, referring to his demise as the "passing of an illustrious figure in the world of music," were read by Wallace Goodrich, chairman of the committee which drew them up.

S. W. Cole, a member of the faculty of the conservatory, referred to Mr. Elson's work in music extension in the Boston public schools as one of the many splendid achievements which must be set down to his credit, while F. Addison Porter characterized him as a true teacher, eager for real and permanent results. "Mr. Elson taught how to enjoy and how to understand music," he said, "and his students all loved and venerated him." Mr. Porter read a poem upon Mr. Elson's death, which had been written for the occasion by Mrs. Porter.

Prof. Edwin L. Gardner of the New England Conservatory of Music Alumni Association declared that the death of Mr. Elson is an irreparable loss, but declared that his influence will long remain, even though his actual presence is denied. H. M. Dunham gave some reminiscences of Mr. Elson's early days at the conservatory, saying that his pupils owe him an eternal debt of gratitude.

GILBERT'S WORK IN SYMPHONY

Adv. — Feb. 22/20
"Place Congo," Music for
Connoisseur, Bewilders
Audience

By E. F. HARKINS.

"America first!" might have served as the password at the Symphony concerts of last night and Friday afternoon.

An American composer, Henry Franklin Belknap Gilbert, born in Somerville and now living in Cambridge, gave the racy modern touch to a program led by one of the three immortal Mozart symphonies, the one in G minor. Mr. Gilbert was represented by a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," suggested by George W. Cable's article of the same title, reminiscent of ante-bellum days in New Orleans. "The Place Congo was a no-count open space at the fag-end of New Orleans," according to the composer. "The slaves were given liberty to meet there and enjoy themselves once a week, and it is one of their rude but picturesque gatherings which Cable tells of in his article." The composition was once submitted to Dr. Muck, who, according to report, "referred to it contemptuously as 'nig-gah music.'" So the composer took the music back and turned it into a ballet, which was performed here two years ago by the Metropolitan Opera Company dancers. It was a novelty, therefore, only to those who take their musical fare exclusively at the Symphony table.

The music is assuredly "rude and picturesque," with a strong flavor of the bamboula, a dance that came from the West Indies—brutal, bizarre music, that threw the slaves into a frenzy of excitement. New Orleans stopped the Place Congo dances long, long ago. Mr. Gilbert's work reflects his praiseworthy enthusiasm over American subjects; also his skill and imagination; but "Place Congo" is music for the connoisseur. The audience found it not only grotesque and bizarre, but exotic, bewildering. Place Congo and the levee are far removed from the old Suwanee plantation. The New Orleans of this tone picture is as strange a place as Timbuctoo. Mr. Montoux conducted con amore, and Mr. Gilbert came forth to bow to the fitful applause.

Frederic Fradkin, concert-master of the orchestra, and native American, played the solo part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Of his artistry, Bostonians may well be proud. His full-fledged technic made light of bristling difficulties; his tone, though not large, was always round and pure, and after the first few nervous moments he played with the zest of the true virtuoso. He did well to shake hands with Mr. Montoux and thank him for the splendid assistance of the orchestra. The audience recalled him several times, paying warm tribute to his admirable efforts.

The crowning feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mozart's brilliant and beautiful symphony. It was worthy of the palm-iest days of the orchestra. Truly Mozartian! Never was an ovation more richly deserved.

GILBERT'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

4 cable — Feb. 21/20
"Dance in the Place Congo"

Found Interesting

Concert Master Fradkin Scores as
Soloist in Lalo's Music

"The Dance in the Place Congo," by Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge, was the most interesting item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. It was suggested by an article in an old number of a magazine, by George W. Cable, which Mr. Gilbert discovered when casting about for a distinctively American subject for a symphonic poem. The Place Congo is an open square in the outskirts of New Orleans, where the slaves used to gather to dance and sing on Sunday afternoons.

Mr. Gilbert's music was first heard in Boston at a ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. In his opinion, and in that of many others, the Metropolitan forces, with excellent intentions, did not altogether do the work justice. Mr. Montoux, who conducted the Metropolitan performances, showed again yesterday that he is not the ideal leader for such music. All the outbursts sounded calculated. It was like an academically trained musician trying to play ragtime in a dance hall and unable to play it spontaneously, as though Schumann and Debussy had never lived.

This regrettable sophistication is, however, not confined to Mr. Montoux. Mr. Gilbert himself has made the error of introducing a free fantasia on two dominant motives derived from the folk dance, the "Bamboula," something obviously derived from the practices of classic composers and not inherent in the nature of the negro folk tunes he is using as his themes.

The modern Russians, in using folk music as the melodic basis of their works, usually eschews anything which savors of the development sections of classic symphonies, because many folk tunes can only be "developed" by main strength.

In the introductory section, which returns at the close of the symphonic poem, however, Mr. Gilbert has struck a truer balance between civilized and primitive music, and written some very moving and eloquent pages. His treatment of the "Bamboula," when he announced it as a theme, is equally commendable. But it is always a mistake to try to paint the lily, or to introduce modern improvements into primitive folk tunes.

Mr. Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was very successful as soloist in Lalo's familiar "Spanish Symphony." His tone and technic show steady improvement. He is not content with being a good orchestra player, but vies with some success with many much-exploited virtuosos.

The first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony is unquestionably "allegro molto," and was so played yesterday. Dr. Muck used to make it an allegretto, with an artistic success, which warranted the liberty taken. It can, moreover, be argued that Mozart meant by "allegro" to indicate the mood rather than the speed of the music.

The other three movements came nearer the superb standard set by Muck in this music, but paradoxically enough it was the Teutonic version which used to be delicate and graceful where the Gallic version seemed clumsy and heavy handed. The gradations of accent lacked subtlety yesterday. In playing Mozart, "toujours le nuance" is one's best motto.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 2.30 P. M.

for composition in its ballet form was accepted for Emil Mollenhauer. He was born in the city of Howard and studied composition and orchestration for three years with Edward MacDowell. About 1892 he went into business and

Mr. FREDERIC FRADKIN was born of Russian parents in Troy, N.Y., on April 2, 1892. At the age of five he began the study of the violin with Henry Schradieck. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1905 Mr. Fradkin went to Paris, where his teachers at first were Guillaume Antoine Roemy, called Rémy, and José Silvestre de los Dolores White, commonly known as Joseph White. In 1907 he entered the Paris Conservatory as a pupil of Narcisse Augustin Lefort, and in 1909 he was awarded a first prize for violin-playing. First prizes were also awarded that year to Miss Roussel, Miss Fidide, Messrs. Astruc and Krettly. The jury in Mr. Fradkin's case was unanimous. His first engagement was as concert-master and soloist for the orchestra at Royan led by J. Pennequin. In the following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist at Monte Carlo. Having studied at Brussels with Ysaye, he returned to the United States, and on February 19, 1911, played Mendelssohn's Concerto at a concert of the Philharmonic Society led by Gustav Mahler. In the spring of that year he went to London, where he played. In 1912 he was engaged as concert-master and soloist of the Vienna Concert Society. He came back to the United States in the fall of 1914 to be the concert-master and soloist of the Russian Orchestra of New York. In 1916-17 he was concert-master and soloist of the Russian Ballet Orchestra. In August, 1918, he was engaged as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On February 14, 1919, he played Mendelssohn's Concerto at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

GILBERT'S WORK IN SYMPHONY

Advs. Feb. 22/1920
"Place Congo," Music for
Connoisseur, Bewilders
Audience

By E. F. HARKINS.

"America first!" might have served as the password at the Symphony concerts of last night and Friday afternoon.

An American composer, Henry Franklin Belknap Gilbert, born in Somerville and now living in Cambridge, gave the racy modern touch to a program led by one of the three immortal Mozart symphonies, the one in G minor. Mr. Gilbert was represented by a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," suggested by George W. Cable's article of the same title, reminiscent of ante-bellum days in New Orleans. "The Place Congo was a no-count open space at the far-end of New Orleans," according to the composer. "The slaves were given liberty to meet there and enjoy themselves once a week, and it is one of their rude but picturesque gatherings which Cable tells of in his article." The composition was once submitted to Dr. Muck, who, according to report, "referred to it contemptuously as 'nig-gah music.'" So the composer took the music back and turned it into a ballet, which was performed here two years ago by the Metropolitan Opera Company dancers. It was a novelty, therefore, only to those who take their musical fare exclusively at the Symphony table.

The music is assuredly "rude and picturesque," with a strong flavor of the bamboula, a dance that came from the West Indies—brutal, bizarre music, that threw the slaves into a frenzy of excitement. New Orleans stopped the Place Congo dances long, long ago. Mr. Gilbert's work reflects his praiseworthy enthusiasm over American subjects; also his skill and imagination; but "Place Congo" is music for the connoisseur. The audience found it not only grotesque and bizarre, but exotic, bewildering. Place Congo and the levee are far removed from the old Suwanee plantation. The New Orleans of this tone picture is as strange a place as Timbuctoo. Mr. Monteux conducted con amore, and Mr. Gilbert came forth to bow to the fitful applause.

Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, and native American, played the solo part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Of his artistry, Bostonians may well be proud. His full-fledged technic made light of bristling difficulties; his tone, though not large, was always round and pure, and after the first few nervous moments he played with the zest of the true virtuoso. He did well to shake hands with Mr. Monteux and thank him for the splendid assistance of the orchestra. The audience recalled him several times, paying warm tribute to his admirable efforts.

The crowning feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mozart's brilliant and beautiful symphony. It was worthy of the palmest days of the orchestra. Truly Mozartian! Never was an ovation more richly deserved.

GILBERT'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

Advs. Feb. 21/20
"Dance in the Place Congo"
Found Interesting

Concert Master Fradkin Scores as
Soloist in Lalo's Music

"The Dance in the Place Congo," by Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge, was the most interesting item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. It was suggested by an article in an old number of a magazine, by George W. Cable, which Mr. Gilbert discovered when casting about for a distinctively American subject for a symphonic poem. The Place Congo is an open square in the outskirts of New Orleans, where the slaves used to gather to dance and sing on Sunday afternoons.

Mr. Gilbert's music was first heard in Boston at a ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. In his opinion, and in that of many others, the Metropolitan forces, with excellent intentions, did not altogether do the work justice. Mr. Monteux, who conducted the Metropolitan performances, showed again yesterday that he is not the ideal leader for such music. All the outbursts sounded calculated. It was like an academically trained musician trying to play ragtime in a dance hall and unable to play it spontaneously, as though Schumann and Debussy had never lived.

This regrettable sophistication is, however, not confined to Mr. Monteux. Mr. Gilbert himself has made the error of introducing a free fantasia on two dominant motives derived from the folk dance, the "Bamboula," something obviously derived from the practices of classic composers and not inherent in the nature of the negro folk tunes he is using as his themes.

The modern Russians, in using folk music as the melodic basis of their works, usually eschews anything which savors of the development sections of classic symphonies, because many folk tunes can only be "developed" by main strength.

In the introductory section, which returns at the close of the symphonic poem, however, Mr. Gilbert has struck a truer balance between civilized and primitive music, and written some very moving and eloquent pages. His treatment of the "Bamboula," when he announced it as a theme, is equally commendable. But it is always a mistake modern improvements into primitive folk tunes.

Mr. Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was very successful as soloist in Lalo's familiar "Spanish Symphony." His tone and technic show steady improvement. He is not content with being a good orchestra player, but vies with some success with many much-exploited virtuosos.

The first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony is unquestionably "allegro molto," and was so played yesterday. Dr. Muck used to make it an allegretto, with an artistic success, which warranted the liberty taken. It can, moreover, be argued that Mozart meant by "allegro" to indicate the mood rather than the speed of the music.

The other three movements came nearer the superb standard set by Muck in this music, but paradoxically enough it was the Teutonic version which used to be delicate and graceful where the Gallic version seemed clumsy and heavy handed. The gradations of accent lacked subtlety yesterday. In

Mr. Gilbert at an early age taught himself to play the violin. His first instrument was made by his grandfather from a shingle and cigar box. He afterwards studied the violin for several years with Emil Mollenhauer. He took lessons in harmony with George H. Howard and studied composition and orchestration for three years with Edward MacDowell. About 1892 he went into business and

Mr. FREDERIC FRADKIN was born of Russian parents in Troy, N.Y., on April 2, 1892. At the age of five he began the study of the violin with Henry Schradieck. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1905 Mr. Fradkin went to Paris, where his teachers at first were Guillaume Antoine Roemy, called Rémy, and José Silvestre de los Dolores White, commonly known as Joseph White. In 1907 he entered the Paris Conservatory as a pupil of Narcisse Augustin Lefort, and in 1909 he was awarded a first prize for violin-playing. First prizes were also awarded that year to Miss Roussel, Miss Fidide, Messrs. Astruc and Krettly. The jury in Mr. Fradkin's case was unanimous. His first engagement was as concert-master and soloist for the orchestra at Royan led by J. Pennequin. In the following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist at Monte Carlo. Having studied at Brussels with Ysaye, he returned to the United States, and on February 19, 1911, played Mendelssohn's Concerto at a concert of the Philharmonic Society led by Gustav Mahler. In the spring of that year he went to London, where he played. In 1912 he was engaged as concert-master and soloist of the Vienna Concert Society. He came back to the United States in the fall of 1914 to be the concert-master and soloist of the Russian Orchestra of New York. In 1916-17 he was concert-master and soloist of the Russian Ballet Orchestra. In August, 1918, he was engaged as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On February 14, 1919, he played Mendelssohn's Concerto at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

232

233

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have arranged for a "Young People's Concert" at Symphony Hall on Thursday Afternoon, January 29, at 4 o'clock. There will be a charge of 25, 35, and 50 cents for tickets.

This concert and any others of a similar character to be undertaken later will provide the best music by the full orchestra under its regular conductor. The programme will be suited to a youthful audience, which the Trustees hope will be made up from those who attend the schools of Greater Boston.

It will be evident to all that these concerts are undertaken in the interest of those who have had little or no opportunity to hear the finest symphonic music in the finest performance. As equitable a plan as possible will soon be completed for the distribution of tickets through school and settlement officials.

W. H. BRENNAN, G. E. JUDD,

Manager Assistant Manager

SYMPHONY HALL

Thursday Afternoon, January 29, 1920, at 4 o'clock

FIRST

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME

Beethoven . . . Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 24

Schubert . . . Unfinished Symphony in B minor

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.

Delibes . . . Ballet, "Sylvia"

- I. Prelude: "The Huntresses."
- II. Intermezzo and Waltz.
- III. Pizzicati.
- IV. The Procession of Bacchus

236

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN (1770-1827)

OVERTURE TO GOETHE'S "EGMONT"

This Overture which Beethoven wrote to be played with Goethe's Tragedy seems to tell the same story which Goethe told, but it is always a mistake to connect music too closely with a story. Beethoven left no clue that certain notes described certain persons and events, and he wrote over his Pastoral Symphony for the benefit of those who would be too concerned with their programmes: "An expression of feeling rather than a description." Indeed, music is almost always a matter of feelings and moods. If you can simply enjoy it, then you will find afterwards that you have understood it. As for the Overture to "Egmont," we can say with certainty only that it begins in gloom and sorrow and ends with a great outburst of joy—as does also the play.

The story is about the people of the Netherlands, who suffered terribly in the sixteenth century under the cruel and oppressive government of Philip II. Some have pointed out just which places in the music seem to describe this oppression, and the hopeless woe of the nation which is crushed down under it. As the music suddenly quickens with a new vigor, there comes to them the fearless young soldier Count Egmont, who is to deliver his people from the foreign tyrant king. The new music bravely sweeps the old aside, and finally rises to a huge tumult of triumph from the whole orchestra. There is joyousness everywhere, for the people are at last freed.

Beethoven was a friend and admirer of the poet Goethe. And Goethe was puzzled by the proud and fiery composer who was scarcely taller than his shoulder, and whose music he found strange and terrifying. At that time Napoleon was conquering the world, and Beethoven rightly felt himself an even mightier conquerer in the realm of music. As for the lords and dukes who could accomplish nothing in particular, and gave themselves grand airs on account of their titles and power, he had a very small opinion indeed of their importance. Moreover, he was never afraid to say just what he thought of them, at the risk of getting into trouble. He was once taking a walk with Goethe when the whole royal family appeared in the distance, in great state. Goethe immediately stood at the side of the road, and would not take another step. Beethoven jammed his hat tighter on his head, buttoned his waistcoat, and held his arms behind his back while the princes, Duke Rudolph, and the Empress herself bowed to him and to Goethe, bent almost double in a profound salute, with his hat in his hand. Beethoven taunted him afterwards, and never forgot his behavior—nor did Goethe forget Beethoven's.

237

FRANZ SCHUBERT (1797-1828) UNFINISHED SYMPHONY IN B MINOR

To be really great, a composer must create music that is new and entirely his own, instead of merely copying the ways of his master, and his master's master. But the world always likes the old music it is accustomed to, and resents the really new music which it does not understand. For this reason, many of the great composers, including Beethoven and Schubert, have been despised and neglected and left to die in poverty, while some third-rate composer of the day received all the worship and flattery. When the genius of the great composers was finally discovered, they had been in their graves a long while.

This indeed happened to Schubert, who once wrote two movements of a symphony and nine measures of a third movement—a scherzo—and then locked his work up in his desk without ever finishing it. When he died, his good friend Anselm Hüttenbrenner took charge of his papers, but did not even bother to go through them, so that this wonderful "Unfinished" Symphony lay there unknown for years. A whole generation later, a musician named Herbeck called upon Anselm, now a failing old man on the point of death. "I want to have one of your works played in Vienna," Herbeck told him, and the old man, delighted, took him to his work-room, stuffed with dusty and yellow papers, all in confusion. Herbeck chose one of a dozen overtures that Anselm had written, and added that he would like to have something by Schubert played at the same concert for old time's sake. Anselm pulled a mass of papers out of an ancient chest, and Herbeck saw on one of them the inscription "Symphony in B minor" in Schubert's handwriting. "Can I have this copied right away?" he asked, after looking it over. "There is no hurry," answered Anselm; take it with you."

Fifty years have passed since then, and this symphony is loved and played again and again in all parts of the world. The music of Anselm, and others of Schubert's fellow-musicians, who were once considered highly important, is now entirely forgotten. If you heard it, it would probably seem as old and dead as an Egyptian mummy. But Schubert's Symphony blossoms from beginning to end with wondrous melody, as fresh and new as if it were just born instead of being a hundred years old. The lovely parts which the first violins and violoncellos sing should be especially noted; also the syncopated accompaniment in both movements, and towards the end the exquisite dialogue of the oboe and the clarinet.

238

LEO DELIBES (1836-1891), "SYLVIA," OR "THE NYMPH OF DIANA," GRAND MYTHOLOGICAL BALLET

The plot of "Sylvia" is similar to many others in the early days of operas and ballets. The scene was almost always in pastoral Arcadia, a country in which the ancient Greeks idealized green meadows and forests. The inhabitants of Arcadia were nymphs and satyrs, gods and goddesses, shepherds and shepherdesses. They never did any work, but spent their time dancing, hunting, and love-making.

The Sylvia of this Ballet was a beautiful nymph in the train of Diana, the Goddess of the Chase (note the hunting-horns in the first movement). The love of Sylvia for Aminta, the shepherd, met with many obstacles. But finally Cupid, the child God of Love, appeared in a cloud (as always happened in Arcadia) and united the pair with his blessing. The music was of course all intended to accompany dancing on the stage. "Pizzicati" means that the musicians are to pluck the strings of their instruments with their fingers instead of using a bow.

A SECOND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

WILL BE GIVEN AT SYMPHONY HALL
Thursday Afternoon, February 26, at 4 o'clock

In allotting tickets for the concert on February 26, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them.

Applications have already been received from more than 40 schools—enough to subscribe for all tickets for the second concert.

Since February 26 falls in the vacation period for many schools, tickets will be ready for distribution to the schools, February 16 and 17, and may be returned, if unsold, on or before February 20 (Prices 25, 35 and 50 cents, tax exempt).

In view of the other engagements of the Orchestra it will not be possible to give additional Young People's Concerts this season.

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager.

G. E. JUDD,
Assistant Manager.

239

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS
BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

Thursday Afternoon, January 29, 1920, at 4 o'clock.

Beethoven Overture to "Egmont"
Schubert Unfinished Symphony in B-minor
Delibes Suite from the Ballet, "Sylvia"

ALL TICKETS FOR THIS CONCERT HAVE BEEN DISTRIBUTED THROUGH THE COOPERATION OF
THE SCHOOLS OF GREATER BOSTON.

THE SECOND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT WILL BE GIVEN AT SYMPHONY HALL, THURSDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 26, AT 4 O'CLOCK.

Applications for tickets should be made by the heads of the various schools of Greater Boston, not later than February 12, inclusive. Address, W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Each applicant will be advised on or before Monday, February 16, of the allotment of tickets, which may be secured at Symphony Hall, on February 19 or 20.

In allotting tickets for the concert on February 26, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them.

The prices of tickets will be 25, 35 and 50 cents.

W. H. BRENNAN, G. E. JUDD,
Manager Assistant Manager

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S NEW VENTURE

Trans. — Jan. 30, 1920
A First Afternoon for Young People—An Interested, Pleasured Audience and Generally Auspicious Outcome—The Cecilia, with Mr. Mitchell Leading, in Short, Variegated and Unaccompanied Choral Pieces—Mr. Busoni as Lion of London—A New Piece from Mr. Carpenter—Mr. McCormack's Plans

THERE were new sensations aplenty at the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Contrary to custom, however, they sprang from the auditorium and not from the stage. There, as usual, sat the band in such dimensions as the chosen pieces required, and thence, much as usual in these days of Mr. Monteux, it played Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont," the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert and four numbers—the prelude of the huntresses of Diana, the waltz, the pizzicato polka, and the procession of Bacchus—from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia." As was to be expected from a conductor and an orchestra with esprit de corps and honneur d'artiste—as the two happy French phrases go—it played all these pieces with the same regard for pace and rhythm, euphony and color, melodic beauty and imaginative suggestion as it is wont to show on a Saturday evening in Boston or a Thursday evening in New York. Exactly as on those occasions did the new audience applaud it, recalling Mr. Monteux at the end as though it already guessed the custom of the Symphony Concerts. Even programme-notes were not overlooked. This time, however, they filled but four pages where Mr. Burk of the staff of Symphony Hall had discerningly and ingeniously written them for young understandings. Whether the spoken word, such as Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch use at similar concerts in Chicago and New York, would have more interested the youngsters is hard to say. Mr. Monteux has many talents, but not yet the gift of tongues when he must speak in a free, lightly running and idiomatic English; while Symphony Hall lacks any spokesman likely to be at ease in explanation of music to 2000 young folk. Yet it is easy to remember how apt Mr. Guy Maier was in speech when he carried a similar audience through piano-pieces and how eagerly it followed him. For the purpose and in the circumstances the spoken word may be better than the printed page. If there is to be a series of concerts for young people at Symphony Hall next season, as all concerned now intend, why not "have in" Mr. Maier as "lecturer" of proved abilities?

In parquet and galleries a few seats were allotted to the guardian-teachers, to a few reporters, to a few more adult guests. Otherwise every chair held a young listener. As it seemed in a cursory survey of the hall, more were girls than boys—according to American habit in the concert-hall, or in any other exercise of the arts. As usual also in such circumstances, Italian, Jewish, Slavic, and European faces generally were not few; for the "alien" of much loud-mouthed and current scorn has a quick instinct for the finer things of music and the stage that hardly smoulders in many a native American. Unexpected, however, were the very young years of row upon row of children. Perhaps the unpractised, indiscriminating bachelor eye mistakenly saw them as no more than of nine, ten or eleven summers; but, unless they were unsuspected and surprisingly numerous prodigies, they did seem rather too young for the pleasures of serious music; while before the hour was ended, more than one was naturally restless. On the other hand, youth of both sexes in their early teens or on the edge of them filled much more than half the hall; for them the concert was intended; and to it they responded with every auspicious sign. They were not merely attentive; they were interested; not merely dutiful but pleased. They discriminated between the pieces as when they applauded the flowing song of Schubert's Andante more warmly than the less melodious Allegro; as when they perceived that the grace of Delibes's waltz and the snapping gayety of his polka were pleasanter to hear than his louder and more "stagey" music of prelude and procession. Honest, intelligent, too, were overheard comments from mouth to mouth in the intermission; while good to see was as intelligent a curiosity over the instruments and the workings in general of a full orchestra. It would not be misplaced in the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Rightly for such youth are these concerts for young people designed; theirs are the likings to be fostered through the years in which most of us first discover what sort of entertainment gives us most pleasure entering, as it were, into the knowledge of good taste and bad taste; from them also must come in large part the public that twenty and thirty years hence will be the audience of the Symphony Orchestra. Enough then the reward of the day since the concert interested and pleased them. Would it have warmed them more, had the programme been lighter, had it included more short pieces? Would one movement from a symphony been wiser choice than two? Was the overture to "Egmont" somewhat over many a youngster's head? It is hard to answer. Mr. Stock's practice in Chicago favors more and shorter pieces. Mr. Damrosch's in New York agrees with Mr. Monteux's experimental programme. Inevitably, the youth of yesterday "caught on" quickly and gladly to the bright rhythms, the pretty tunes, the showy sonorities of Delibes's ballet. Yet their interest and seeming pleasure in Shubert (outside the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony) and even in the Beethoven of "Egmont" were not appreciably less.

H. T. P.

CHILDREN HEAR CLASSIC MUSIC

Young People's Concert by
 Symphony Orchestra
 Is Rare Treat

PUPILS COME FROM MANY CITY SCHOOLS

Herald — Jan. 30, 1920
 By PHILIP HALE

The first Young People's Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The hall was filled with children of all ages and all sizes from the public and parochial schools and from the various settlements.

The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Delibes, Suite from the ballet "Sylvia."

The question at once comes up: What orchestral compositions are most appropriate for a concert of this nature? Should the music be first of all ear-tickling and heel-stirring? It should certainly be tuneful, and the rhythms should be strongly marked. It is a mistake to think that children do not enjoy music that gives older persons of musical experience genuine pleasure. Music that is often written deliberately for children may easily bore them. Mr. Guy Maier, who gave a piano recital not long ago for children, solved the problem, nor was their enjoyment solely derived from his agreeable talk about the music. They were pleased by the music itself. The selections were admirably chosen and the greater number were by acknowledged masters.

Were the little hearers in Symphony Hall so pleased yesterday that they would gladly attend a second concert? They applauded heartily; but applause does not necessarily mean enjoyment; it is often perfunctory, an expression of politeness, even at the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights. Children, fortunately, are not sophisticated in this respect. They are, as a rule, brutally frank. The faces yesterday showed curiosity, wonder, pleasure. Some of the younger children, no doubt, twisted in their seats. Perhaps they were bodily uncomfortable; perhaps they were nervous. We have seen men and women restless when long winded symphonies were performed.

The experiment was at least worth trying. In all probability a new world was opened to many, a world that they would gladly visit again. They were not awed by the names "Beethoven," "Schubert." If they enjoyed the music it was not because they thought it necessary to pay homage to these men.

No committee of three or of 10 could vote unanimously for this or that program. One might ask for an overture by Auber, or the overture to "Mignon" or "Zampa"; a gay symphony by Haydn; some pretty Intermezzo or Prelude; a waltz by Johann Strauss. Another, some kill-joy, might say: "No, we must choose only educational music. These children must be trained to love the 'classics'." And so through the three or 10. A Symphony Orchestra does not lose dignity on an occasion like this by playing a sparkling overture or one of Johann Strauss's waltzes.

The second concert will be on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26 at 4 o'clock.

The program, which contained pertinent and entertaining notes by Mr. John N. Burke of Symphony Hall, made this announcement:

In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. Applications have already been received from more than 40 schools—enough to subscribe for all tickets for the second concert. Since

Feb. 26 falls in the vacation period for many schools, tickets will be ready for distribution to the schools, Feb. 16 and 17, and may be returned, if unsold, on or before Feb. 20 (Prices 25, 35 and 50 cents, tax exempt). In view of the other engagements of the orchestra it will not be possible to give additional Young People's Concerts this season."

CHILDREN HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Display Keen Interest
at First School

Concert

Post Jan. 30, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

Those who boarded cars almost anywhere about Boston early yesterday afternoon found themselves surrounded by chattering schoolboys and girls of the city, apparently out for a lark. Passengers and conductors of non-musical habits were at a loss to explain this development. The children were bound for Symphony Hall and the first Young People's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PIECES EASY TO GRASP

These concerts, one more of which will be given this season, have been arranged at a very low rate of admission for the younger people of the city, to give them the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra and becoming acquainted under the best possible conditions with symphonic music. This is a new departure for the Boston Symphony, although similar undertakings have ere this met with success and made new audiences for orchestras in other cities. It is certainly a move calculated to make the Boston Symphony more than ever an integral part of the musical life of the community, and to democratize its mission.

The programme arranged by Mr. Monteux for this concert consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; and the Prelude, Intermezzo and Waltz, "Pizzicati" and "Procession of Bacchus" from Delibe's ballet, "Sylvia."

Readily Understood

Of the orchestral performance of these pieces it is needless to speak in detail. The orchestra gave its best. The individual members of it, if one excepts a harp out of tune—excelled themselves in the performance of solo passages in which they displayed with exceptional mastery the capacities of different instruments. The general character of the music was melodious and comparatively easy to grasp. Whether those unaccustomed to music can be expected to feel the heroic spirit of Beethoven's overture is a question one does not answer with full confidence in the affirmative.

The lofty simplicity of Beethoven may be readily understood by children or youths, but many of us had to grow internally as well as musically for many years to comprehend the grandeur of this overture. It is, however, music, as it seems, of a drama, of movement, action; it has clear melodious outlines and a thrilling finale. And it is music which may well be a part of youth's heritage.

Interested in Players

The Schubert symphony is a work everyone should grow up with, and Mr. Monteux is particularly fortunate in his interpretation of this work. Listeners, old and young, took pleasure in the piquant music of Delibes.

The audience, consisting of children of rich and poor, from every quarter of the city and its environs, with a sprinkling of adults as escorts, was interested no less in the motions of the conductor and the movement of the men, the shape of the instruments, the occasional whistle of a piccolo or whack of the drum than in the melodies themselves. Occasionally, there was an exclamation or a crow from someone very young—a kind of musical commentary of a kind not included in the programme.

The second of these concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Feb. 26, when preference will be given first to many who applied for tickets for the concert of yesterday afternoon after the hall was sold out. The programme for this concert will soon be announced.

SYMPHONY HALL . Thursday Afternoon, February 26, 1920, at 4 o'clock

SECOND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEAUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME

- | | |
|-------------|--|
| Weber | Overture to "Der Freischütz" |
| Beethoven | Andante from the Symphony in C major,
No. 1, Op. 21 |
| Grieg | Suite, "Peer Gynt" |
| | I. Morning Mood. |
| | II. Death of Aase. |
| | III. Anitra's Dance. |
| | IV. In the Hall of the Mountain King. |
| Mendelssohn | Scherzo from the Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" |
| Berlioz | Rakoczy March |

All tickets for this concert having been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. It will not be possible to give further Young People's Concerts this season.

BETTERING THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Trans. Feb. 28/20
A Second Experiment with a Programme More Wisely Chosen and a Clearly Interested and Pleasured Audience—The Daily Chronicle of Symphonic Strife—Mr. Carpenter's Ballet Raises and Fulfills Expectations—Items and Prospects

FROM experience all concerned in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people are learning wisdom, so that the second, which befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, clearly bettered the first. The music again filled only an hour—probably the limit of normal youthful interest and attention—but this time it consisted of five short pieces, or even of eight, if the listener chose to count each division of Grieg's music to the play, "Peer Gynt," as a separate number. There is reason to doubt whether a more or less untutored audience, in years hardly above the middle teens, is quite ready as yet to listen to Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and to Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont" as it was asked to do at the first concert. In all probability it heard these pieces with more wonder and speculation than interest and understanding. Even adults variously measure their pleasure in them. In contrast, the young listeners of yesterday seemed to follow gladly and comprehendingly the mellow periods or the warm flow of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz"; the fairy-footed progress of Mendelssohn's Scherzo for the elves of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the surges of sound and the flashes of rhythm through Berlioz's "Rakoczy March." The audience of January often seemed restless and puzzled; the audience of February was plainly intent and pleased. Not less eagerly than it heard the pieces aforesaid, did it listen also to the Andante from Beethoven's first symphony and to the suite of Grieg. Fortunately youth not to speculate upon Beethoven's gentle, transparent, undulating song as forerunner of deeper melodies and to hear Grieg's measures as so much music in itself and not as decoration to a seldom

Feb. 26 falls in the vacation period for many schools, tickets will be ready for distribution to the schools, Feb. 16 and 17, and may be returned, if unsold, on or before Feb. 20 (Prices 25, 35 and 50 cents, tax exempt). In view of the other engagements of the orchestra it will not be possible to give additional Young People's Concerts this season."

CHILDREN HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Display Keen Interest
at First School

Concert

Post Jan. 30, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

Those who boarded cars almost anywhere about Boston early yesterday afternoon found themselves surrounded by chattering schoolboys and girls of the city, apparently out for a lark. Passengers and conductors of non-musical habits were at a loss to explain this development. The children were bound for Symphony Hall and the first Young People's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PIECES EASY TO GRASP

These concerts, one more of which will be given this season, have been arranged at a very low rate of admission for the younger people of the city, to give them the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra and becoming acquainted under the best possible conditions with symphonic music. This is a new departure for the Boston Symphony, although similar undertakings have ere this met with success and made new audiences for orchestras in other cities. It is certainly a move calculated to make the Boston Symphony more than ever an integral part of the musical life of the community, and to democratize its mission.

The programme arranged by Mr. Monteux for this concert consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; and the Prelude, Intermezzo and Waltz, "Pizzicati" and "Procession of Bacchus" from Delibe's ballet, "Sylvia."

Readily Understood

Of the orchestral performance of these pieces it is needless to speak in detail. The orchestra gave its best. The individual members of it, if one excepts a harp out of tune—excelled themselves in the performance of solo passages in which they displayed with exceptional mastery the capacities of different instruments. The general character of the music was melodious and comparatively easy to grasp. Whether those unaccustomed to music can be expected to feel the heroic spirit of Beethoven's overture is a question one does not answer with full confidence in the affirmative.

The lofty simplicity of Beethoven may be readily understood by children or youths, but many of us had to grow internally as well as musically for many years to comprehend the grandeur of this overture. It is, however, music, as it seems, of a drama, of movement, action; it has clear melodious outlines and a thrilling finale. And it is music which may well be a part of youth's heritage.

Interested in Players

The Schubert symphony is a work everyone should grow up with, and Mr. Monteux is particularly fortunate in his interpretation of this work. Listeners, old and young, took pleasure in the piquant music of Delibes.

The audience, consisting of children of rich and poor, from every quarter of the city and its environs, with a sprinkling of adults as escorts, was interested no less in the motions of the conductor and the movement of the men, the shape of the instruments, the occasional whistle of a piccolo or whack of the drum than in the melodies themselves. Occasionally, there was an exclamation or a crow from someone very young—a kind of musical commentary of a kind not included in the programme.

The second of these concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Feb. 26, when preference will be given first to many who applied for tickets for the concert of yesterday afternoon after the hall was sold out. The programme for this concert will soon be announced.

SYMPHONY HALL . Thursday Afternoon, February 26, 1920, at 4 o'clock

SECOND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEAUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME

- | | |
|-----------------------|--|
| Weber | Overture to "Der Freischütz" |
| Beethoven | Andante from the Symphony in C major,
No. 1, Op. 21 |
| Grieg | Suite, "Peer Gynt" |
| | I. Morning Mood. |
| | II. Death of Aase. |
| | III. Anitra's Dance. |
| | IV. In the Hall of the Mountain King. |
| Mendelssohn | Scherzo from the Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" |
| Berlioz | Rakoczy March |

All tickets for this concert having been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. It will not be possible to give further Young People's Concerts this season.

BETTERING THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Trans. Feb. 28/20
A Second Experiment with a Programme—More Wisely Chosen and a Clearly Interested and Pleasured Audience—The Daily Chronicle of Symphonic Strife—Mr. Carpenter's Ballet Raises and Fulfills Expectations—Items and Prospects

FROM experience all concerned in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people are learning wisdom, so that the second, which befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, clearly bettered the first. The music again filled only an hour—probably the limit of normal youthful interest and attention—but this time it consisted of five short pieces, or even of eight, if the listener chose to count each division of Grieg's music to the play, "Peer Gynt," as a separate number. There is reason to doubt whether a more or less untutored audience, in years hardly above the middle teens, is quite ready as yet to listen to Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and to Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont" as it was asked to do at the first concert. In all probability it heard these pieces with more wonder and speculation than interest and understanding. Even adults variously measure their pleasure in them. In contrast, the young listeners of yesterday seemed to follow gladly and comprehendingly the mellow periods or the warm flow of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz"; the fairy-footed progress of Mendelssohn's Scherzo for the elves of Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the surges of sound and the flashes of rhythm through Berlioz's "Rakoczy March." The audience of January often seemed restless and puzzled; the audience of February was plainly intent and pleased. Not less eagerly than it heard the pieces aforesaid, did it listen also to the Andante from Beethoven's first symphony and to the suite of Grieg. Fortunately youth not to speculate upon Beethoven's gentle, transparent, undulating song as forerunner of deeper melodies and to hear Grieg's measures as so much music in itself and not as decoration to a seldom

244

Andante yielded the pleasure of simple and purling instrumental song; that the music of Asa's death sounded gently, the music of Anitra's dance brightly, the music of the trolls gaily, fantastically.

As it happened likewise, the young people heard these pieces of Grieg played with a delicacy of detail they have not received hereabouts in years; while the string and the wind choirs could hardly have been smoother or more songful than they were through Beethoven's Andante. Mr. Montoux and the orchestra do not spare pains upon these young people's concerts, even if the dewy shimmer, the tripping lightness of Mendelssohn's Scherzo did in measure evade them. Finally, the audience seemed better chosen than it was a month ago. There, too many of the "young people" were no more than children for whom, unless they were uncommonly precocious, music and orchestra were but occasion for restless wonder. Yesterday some such children were discoverable; but on every side around them, in grateful numbers, interest and pleasure sat the youth in the teens whose curiosity it is the design of the concerts to waken, whose inclinations in music, pieces and performance are to form. Another year, after these two preliminary ventures, the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should fulfil their purpose and assemble the desired audiences. Perhaps they would gain in animation and be more a thing apart from routine did some adaptable speaker say the persuading and enlightening word about the several numbers that the programme-sheet now bears in print. Perhaps, also, as a cynic or two has ventured to hint, the youth of the private as well as the public schools might be advisedly included in the audiences. But who, except those same cynics would dare to suggest that their taste needs guidance? Have they not the musical plays?

BOYS AND GIRLS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb. 28, 1920
Attentive Audience Greets
Grieg and Berlioz

Symphony Hall was crowded with boys and girls yesterday afternoon for the second concert for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Symphony concerts in Boston have come to be regarded as designed chiefly for rich old ladies, and the management when it announced an experimental concert for young people last month was not prepared for the overwhelming demand from the schools and left many disappointed applicants. There was no public sale and no one who obtained tickets for the first concert, given last month, was allowed tickets for the second.

The average age of yesterday's audience was 14 to 15, and boys and girls were present in about equal proportions, with a few scattered grownups. One might have expected such an audience to be more interested in cutting monkey shins than in listening to Beethoven and Berlioz. But it proved the most attentive and thoughtful crowd the orchestra has played to in many a long year.

The hum and buzz of eager comment and gossip ceased as soon as Mr. Montoux tapped his desk with his baton, and determined but futile endeavors were made after several number to secure an encore, something which is forbidden by long standing rule at Symphony concerts.

The youngsters, many of them, followed the excellent brief program notes written by Mr. Burke of Symphony Hall during the performance. Individuals with pocket scores and handbooks on symphonic music, which they coned attentively, were scattered through the crowd.

The program was made up of a number of short and not too exacting pieces, among which Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and Berlioz's stirring "Hungarian March" seemed to afford the most pleasure. The performance was dashing and vivid, though the rehearsals seemed to have been too few to permit the usual meticulous nuances.

More of these young people's concerts may be hoped for next season, there is no doubt.

ALANDSCA
LAW BOOKS
Manual of Business Corporations
L. E. Boston Transcript
Standard Rye, London S.E. 22, England
NOS. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100

Important will be advised on or before Monday, Feb. 16, of the allotment of tickets, which may be secured at Symphony Hall on Feb. 19 or 20. In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools which applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. The prices of tickets will be 25, 35 and 50 cents.

245

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SIXTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, AT 8 P. M.

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| GLUCK, | OVERTURE to "Iphigénie en Aulide," (Wagner's ending) |
| HAYDN, | SYMPHONY in G major, (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 13)
I. Adagio; Allegro
II. Largo
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito |
| DEBUSSY, | LYRIC POEM, "La Damselle Édue," (The Blessed Damsel), (after Dante-Gabriel Rossetti)
(With female chorus trained by STEPHEN S. TOWNSEND)
Soprano Solo, Miss ETHEL FRANK
Contralto Solo, Miss CLARAMOND THOMPSON
[First time at these Concerts] |
| CHARPENTIER, | ORCHESTRAL SUITE, "Impressions of Italy,"
I. Serenade. (Viola Solo, Mr. FREDERIC DENAYER)
II. At the Fountain
III. On Muleback
IV. On the Summits
V. Naples |

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

seen play. Enough for them that the Andante yielded the pleasure of simple and purring instrumental song; that the music of Ase's death sounded gently, the music of Anitra's dance brightly, the music of the trolls gaily, fantastically.

As it happened likewise, the young people heard these pieces of Grieg played with a delicacy of detail they have not received hereabouts in years; while the string and the wind choirs could hardly have been smoother or more songful than they were through Beethoven's Andante. Mr. Montaux and the orchestra do not spare pains upon these young people's concerts, even if the dewy shimmer, the tripping lightness of Mendelssohn's Scherzo did in measure evade them. Finally, the audience seemed better chosen than it was a month ago. There, too many of the "young people" were no more than children for whom, unless they were uncommonly precocious, music and orchestra were but occasion for restless wonder. Yesterday some such children were discoverable; but on every side around them, in grateful numbers, interest and pleasure sat the youth in the teens whose curiosity it is the design of the concerts to waken, whose inclinations in music, pieces and performance are to form. Another year, after these two preliminary ventures, the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should fulfil their purpose and assemble the desired audiences. Perhaps they would gain in animation and be more a thing apart from routine did some adaptable speaker say the persuading and enlightening word about the several numbers that the programme-sheet now bears in print. Perhaps, also, as a cynic or two has ventured to hint, the youth of the private as well as the public schools might be advisedly included in the audiences. But who, except those same cynics would dare to suggest that their taste needs guidance? Have they not the musical plays?

BOYS AND GIRLS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb. 28, 1920
Attentive Audience Greeted
Greig and Berlioz

Symphony Hall was crowded with boys and girls yesterday afternoon for the second concert for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Symphony concerts in Boston have come to be regarded as designed chiefly for rich old ladies, and the management when it announced an experimental concert for young people last month was not prepared for the overwhelming demand from the schools and left many disappointed applicants. There was no public sale and no one who obtained tickets for the first concert, given last month, was allowed tickets for the second.

The average age of yesterday's audience was 14 to 15, and boys and girls were present in about equal proportions, with a few scattered grownups. One might have expected such an audience to be more interested in cutting monkey shins than in listening to Beethoven and Berlioz. But it proved the most attentive and thoughtful crowd the orchestra has played to in many a long year.

The hum and buzz of eager comment and gossip ceased as soon as Mr. Montaux tapped his desk with his baton, and determined but futile endeavors were made after several number to secure an encore, something which is forbidden by long standing rule at Symphony concerts.

The youngsters, many of them, followed the excellent brief program notes written by Mr. Burke of Symphony Hall during the performance. Individuals with pocket scores and handbooks on symphonic music, which they coned attentively, were scattered through the crowd.

The program was made up of a number of short and not too exacting pieces, among which Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and Berlioz's stirring "Hungarian March" seemed to afford the most pleasure. The performance was dashing and vivid, though the rehearsals seemed to have been too few to permit the usual meticulous nuances.

More of these young people's concerts may be hoped for next season, there is no doubt.

LANDSCAPE
L. E. Boston
Manual of Business Transactions
Second Edition
Address
LAW BOOKS
Tucker—Second Edition
Standard Authors
Beckham Rye, London
S.E. 22, England
n 15 n
Bren-
Boston.
ATKINSON
187 Solicitor will be advised on or before Monday, Feb. 16, of the allotment of tickets, which may be secured at Symphony Hall on Feb. 19 or 20.
In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools which applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. The prices of tickets will be 25, 35 and 50 cents.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SIXTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, AT 8 P. M.

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| GLUCK | OVERTURE to "Iphigénie en Aulide," (Wagner's ending) |
| HAYDN, | SYMPHONY in G major, (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 13)
I. Adagio; Allegro
II. Largo
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito |
| DEBUSSY, | LYRIC POEM, "La Damselle Édue," (The Blessed Damsel), (after Dante-Gabriel Rossetti)
(With female chorus trained by STEPHEN S. TOWNSEND)
Soprano Solo, Miss ETHEL FRANK
Contralto Solo, Miss CLARAMOND THOMPSON
[First time at these Concerts] |
| CHARPENTIER, | ORCHESTRAL SUITE, "Impressions of Italy,"
I. Serenade. (Viola Solo, Mr. FREDERIC DENAYER)
II. At the Fountain
III. On Muleback
IV. On the Summits
V. Naples |

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

seen play. Enough for them that the Andante yielded the pleasure of simple and purring instrumental song; that the music of Ase's death sounded gently, the music of Anitra's dance brightly, the music of the trolls gaily, fantastically.

As it happened likewise, the young people heard these pieces of Grieg played with a delicacy of detail they have not received hereabouts in years; while the string and the wind choirs could hardly have been smoother or more songful than they were through Beethoven's Andante. Mr. Montoux and the orchestra do not spare pains upon these young people's concerts, even if the dewy shimmer, the tripping lightness of Mendelssohn's Scherzo did in measure evade them. Finally, the audience seemed better chosen than it was a month ago. Then, too many of the "young people" were no more than children for whom, unless they were uncommonly precocious, music and orchestra were but occasion for restless wonder. Yesterday some such children were discoverable; but on every side around them, in grateful numbers, interest and pleasure sat the youth in the teens whose curiosity it is the design of the concerts to waken, whose inclinations in music, pieces and performance are to form. Another year, after these two preliminary ventures, the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should fulfil their purpose and assemble the desired audiences. Perhaps they would gain in animation and be more a thing apart from routine did some adaptable speaker say the persuading and enlightening word about the several numbers that the programme-sheet now bears in print. Perhaps, also, as a cynic or two has ventured to hint, the youth of the private as well as the public schools might be advisedly included in the audiences. But who, except those same cynics would dare to suggest that their taste needs guidance? Have they not the musical plays?

BOYS AND GIRLS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb. 28, 1920
Attentive Audience Greet
Grieg and Berlioz

Symphony Hall was crowded with boys and girls yesterday afternoon for the second concert for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony concerts in Boston have come to be regarded as designed chiefly for rich old ladies, and the management when it announced an experimental concert for young people last month was not prepared for the overwhelming demand from the schools and left many disappointed applicants. There was no public sale and no one who obtained tickets for the first concert, given last month, was allowed tickets for the second.

The average age of yesterday's audience was 14 to 15, and boys and girls were present in about equal proportions, with a few scattered grownups. One might have expected such an audience to be more interested in cutting monkey shins than in listening to Beethoven and Berlioz. But it proved the most attentive and thoughtful crowd the orchestra has played to in many a long year.

The hum and buzz of eager comment and gossip ceased as soon as Mr. Montoux tapped his desk with his baton, and determined but futile endeavors were made after several number to secure an encore, something which is forbidden by long standing rule at Symphony concerts.

The youngsters, many of them, followed the excellent brief program notes written by Mr. Burke of Symphony Hall

Trans. Jan. 17, 1920.

The Symphony and the Schools

A Second Young People's Concert

THOUGH the first of the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra is two weeks away, every ticket for it has already been distributed through the schools of Greater Boston. A second concert is, accordingly, announced for Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, with the following hints as to tickets:

Applications for tickets should be made by the heads of the various schools of Greater Boston, not later than Feb. 12, inclusive. Address W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Each applicant will be advised on or before Monday, Feb. 16, of the allotment of tickets, which may be secured at Symphony Hall on Feb. 19 or 20.

In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools which applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. The prices of tickets will be 25, 35 and 50 cents.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SIXTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, AT 8 P. M.

GLUCK.

OVERTURE to "Iphigénie en Aulide," (Wagner's ending)

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in G major, (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 13)

I. Adagio; Allegro

II. Largo

III. Menuetto; Trio

IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito

DEBUSSY,

LYRIC POEM, "La Damselle Éluë," (The Blessed Damsel), (after Dante-Gabriel Rossetti) (With female chorus trained by STEPHEN S. TOWNSEND)

Soprano Solo, Miss ETHEL FRANK

Contralto Solo, Miss CLARAMOND THOMPSON

[First time at these Concerts]

CHARPENTIER,

ORCHESTRAL SUITE, "Impressions of Italy,"

I. Serenade. (Viola Solo, Mr. FREDERIC DENAYER)

II. At the Fountain

III. On Muleback

IV. On the Summits

V. Naples

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Waiting to Drop Their Quarters in the Sack. The Historic "Rush Line" Is a Living Relic of the Days When the Final Rehearsal for Saturday Actually Was Held Friday Afternoon. At This "Public Rehearsal" the Audience Would Behold the Conductor Stop His Men and Repeat a Difficult Passage

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Feb. 28, 1920
Gluck, Haydn,
Charpentier
Program

EN
ED

there, and the occasional touch of vulgarity, the Suite is melodious, agreeable music, skilfully orchestrated, agreeable to the ear. "On the Summits," by reason of Mr. Monteux's interpretation, had a significance not given to it before.

Is the beauty of a famous poem enhanced by music? Mr. Bantock, greatly daring, has set music to the choruses of "Atalanta in Calydon," and there was an Englishman, we forget his highly respectable name, who turned nearly all of Shakespeare's sonnets into songs with piano accompaniment. No wonder that Debussy was fascinated by "The Blessed Damozel." If any one was to choose it for a cantata, he was the man. But does his music emphasize the inherent beauty of the verse? The introduction suggests the proper mood. Charles Lamb thought that Milton should be read after a hearing of organ music. Debussy's orchestral introduction prepares one for reading Rossetti's poem. The orchestral pages are more in the Rossettian mystically sensuous spirit than the measures to be sung; the words of the waiting and longing woman need no music. It is true that the solo singers yesterday were inadequate; but could any singers change the inherent and disappointing character of the music allotted them? One listened with delight to Debussy's orchestra; the chorus of omen was heard with pleasure; but while the reciter and the Damozel were at work, there was consolation in the intended text.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Berlioz, "Fantastic" Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Feb. The Music of Boston 28 20

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert of the present season on February 27 with the following program:

Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"
Haydn—Symphony in G major
Debussy—"La Damoiselle élue"
Charpentier—"Impressions of Italy"

A chorus of women's voices, Ethel Frank, and Claramond Thompson assisted in the Debussy piece. Frédéric Denayer played the viola solo in the first movement of Charpentier's suite.

This program might well have been entitled "Music of the past and present," although the Haydn symphony would have to be grouped with the music of the present and "La Damoi-

in "Naples"—this last movement is long-drawn-out—nor does "At the Fountain" hold firmly the attention; but on the whole, and in spite of the too great influence of Massenet heard here and

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Herald Feb. 28, 1920

Works by Gluck, Haydn,
Debussy and Charpentier
Comprise Program

CHORUS OF WOMEN IS WELL TRAINED

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, Symphony, G major (B. & H. 13); Debussy, "The Blessed Damsel" (Female Chorus trained by Mr. Townsend; Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto); Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

There is old music that defies time; as motets of Vittoria, airs of Purcell and Handel, piano pieces of Scarlatti, Couperin and Bach. Gluck's overture was first heard in Paris nearly 150 years ago, yet, even with an inevitable formula of its period, it is still nobly pathetic. We have seen and heard what Richard Strauss did with the story of Electra. One shudders at the thought of what he might do to Iphigenia. It is not necessary to label, as Wagner did, the themes of Gluck. The whole story is in the music; the title is enough; the overture is purely Grecian in its restrained passion, pathetic calm, the suggestion of inexorable Fate.

Haydn's symphony was written for Paris. It is one of his best. Whatever Haydn wrote is conspicuous for careful workmanship; but this symphony was composed with even more than his customary care. Played delightfully, it again made its appeal.

Mr. Monteux gave a very brilliant reading of Charpentier's "Impressions," the most brilliant we have heard; for never before in Boston have the last three movements had so much character. Some of the pages have already lost their freshness; for example, we could spare some in the "Serenade," also in "Naples"—this last movement is long-drawn-out—nor does "At the Fountain" hold firmly the attention; but on the whole, and in spite of the too great influence of Massenet heard here and there, and the occasional touch of vulgarity, the Suite is melodious, agreeable music, skilfully orchestrated, agreeable to the ear. "On the Summits," by reason of Mr. Monteux's interpretation, had a significance not given to it before.

Is the beauty of a famous poem enhanced by music? Mr. Bantock, greatly daring, has set music to the choruses of "Atalanta in Calydon," and there was an Englishman, we forget his highly respectable name, who turned nearly all of Shakespeare's sonnets into songs with piano accompaniment. No wonder that Debussy was fascinated by "The Blessed Damsel." If any one was to choose it for a cantata, he was the man. But does his music emphasize the inherent beauty of the verse? The introduction suggests the proper mood. Charles Lamb thought that Milton should be read after a hearing of organ music. Debussy's orchestral introduction prepares one for reading Rossetti's poem. The orchestral pages are more in the Rossettian mystically sensuous spirit than the measures to be sung; the words of the waiting and longing woman need no music. It is true that the solo singers yesterday were inadequate; but could any singers change the inherent and disappointing character of the music allotted them? One listened with delight to Debussy's orchestra; the chorus of women was heard with pleasure; but while the reciter and the Damsel were at work, there was consolation in the printed text.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Berlioz, "Fantastic" Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Feb. The Music of Boston 28 20

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert of the present season on February 27 with the following program:

Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"
Haydn—Symphony in G major
Debussy—"La Damselle élue"
Charpentier—"Impressions of Italy"

A chorus of women's voices, Ethel Frank, and Claramond Thompson assisted in the Debussy piece. Frédéric Denayer played the viola solo in the first movement of Charpentier's suite.

This program might well have been entitled "Music of the past and present," although the Haydn symphony would have to be grouped with the music of the present and "La Damselle"

248

selle éblue" with the music of the past. Debussy's setting of the Rossetti poem sounds strangely unlike the composer of "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," "La Mei" and "Pelléas." There seems not to be the faintest foreshadowing of this later Debussy. Massenet, well diluted, is the prevailing character of the music. If only Wolf-Ferrari, composer of the incomparable "Dance of Angels," were to set this poem! Even Debussy of the later years might have found more fitting harmonies and orchestral tints, although it is doubtful if the mysticism of the poem was of a kind with which his nature was entirely sympathetic. Yet it was pleasant to hear the composition, if only by way of comparison with his later style. "Papa" Haydn's symphony was as fresh as on the day when it was written. To be sure, it is comfortable, perhaps superficial music, but so genuine and sincere that although old-fashioned, it will never grow old. Mr. Monteux, an admirer of the modern school, never fails to interpret the music of the eighteenth century with grace and charm, as witness the playing of this symphony as well as that of Mozart's in G minor of last week's program. Charpentier's suite is an example of a poetic idea developed with masterly skill. There have been many compositions portraying Italian life and atmosphere more or less successfully, but few excite the imagination as does this suite, written by a Frenchman. The orchestration is so cleverly contrived and so tastefully varied, the melodic ideas are so fresh—and we might add that the several movements are so tactfully short—that each hearing brings new pleasure. We have always thought that the viola solo in the first number (played behind the scenes) was intended to be a distant echo of the opening theme of the violoncellos. As played yesterday, Mr. Denayer might almost as well have sat in his accustomed place in the orchestra.

DEBUSSY PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Female Chorus Assists in His "Blessed Damoiselle"

Post Feb. 28, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

Debussy's "Blessed Damoiselle," after the poem of Rossetti, was performed for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducting, with Miss Ethel Frank and Miss Claramond Thompson as soprano and contralto soloists, and a female chorus prepared for this concert by Stephen Townsend.

The orchestral compositions were Gluck's superb overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's G major symphony (Breitkopf and Hartel number 13), and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

EXQUISITELY FRESH

Debussy's music keeps its exquisite freshness, its pre-Raphaelite beauty. It sounds today prodigiously simple, though it was only a few years ago—in 1905, to be exact—when it sounded very dangerous and strange, and many people hooted one interviewer, who farther-sighted than others, remarked that the day might come when Claude Debussy would seem more original a composer than Richard Strauss—15 years ago, to be exact, and that day has arrived. Debussy is indisputably the more original composer of the two, and there is this happy difference between the early music of Debussy and the early music of some other composers. Debussy's early music remains fresh, exquisitely made, supremely art in its perfection of line and color.

It is not the music of the late Debussy, but it is and will be for many years to come, the ineffably beautiful music of a great genius—genius which recalls the line of Edgar Lee Masters: "Genius is wisdom and youth."

Not Well Balanced

Mr. Monteux interpreted this music sympathetically. The chorus had been well prepared, though the balance between voices and orchestra was not always perfect. The entire performance was a little stiff, as it seemed, and it must be confessed that neither of the soloists, intelligently as they performed, were particularly in the vein or over effective under the circumstances.

The feature of the concert, for the writer, was the performance of the noble and dramatic music of Gluck. Mr. Monteux made this music modern without distorting or abusing its classic spirit. He seemed to us to be singularly successful in thus understanding an 18th century composer and his period, yet in presenting this music to his hearers in a way that brought it home with the greatest force to the present generation.

Displays Gluck's Greatness

We have heard performances as respectful, but much colder; performances which left you calm, and saying to yourself, as Mr. Clemenceau is said to have said to himself of the League of Nations, "Now Georges Clemenceau, you do believe in the League of Nations"—so the young man, listening to this music, which his elders had told him was so great, said to himself, "Now, George Smith, you do believe in the greatness of Gluck." Yesterday afternoon, he did not merely believe in it. He knew it and felt it in every fibre of his musical being.

The opening of the allegro was of prodigious portent, grand, austere, ominous of tragedy and of Fate that gods themselves might not disobey. Then recall the tenderness, the noble melancholy, the melancholy that brings to mind the name of "Niobe," in the responses of strings and wind instruments in the passage which Wagner described as expressing "agonizing pity." It was fully apparent that neither Wagner nor Berlioz, in their day, overrated the genius of Gluck.

Haydn's Symphony

The playing of Haydn's symphony was spirited, robustious, if not as clear and transparent in tone qualities as other performances have been. The slow movement was beautifully sung, and the performance of the scherzo, with the humorously discordant notes in the trio, was delightful. In the playing of "Charpentier's 'Impressions of Italy'" there was occasion to admire the tone of Mr. Denayer, of Mr. Hedetti and other instrumentalists of the orchestra. Yet it must be said that this music, melodious, sincere, tuneful, vulgar with the refreshing vulgarity of the so-called "common people," is aging. The opening "Serenade," the movement "On Muie-back" and some pages of the finale were freshest to the writer's ear yesterday; but music has to be built of the most marvellously durable material to sound well in the ears of even two successive generations.

Romain Rolland expressed it happily when he said that of all the arts, music was the quickest to consume itself by the very intensity of its own heat.

CHORUS SINGS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Blessed Damozel" Given
With Women's Voices

Gluck, Haydn and Charpentier Heard
in the Program

The most interesting item in yesterday's Symphony concert was Debussy's setting for female voices and orchestra of Rossetti's familiar lyric poem, "The Blessed Damozel." Although it was performed for the first time at these concerts, it is not new to Boston, for the first performance here was in 1903, and there have been at least three others since then.

"La Demoiselle Elue," with French text by Gabriel Sarrazin, was composed in 1887 as one of the "envois," or duty pieces, expected of every winner of the famous "Prix de Rome." Although the judges looked rather askance at what then seemed its daringly ultra-modern qualities, it seems orthodox enough today, with its suggestions of Wagner's "Tristan," mingled with a tentative use of the type of harmony now associated with Debussy.

The piece is the work of a composer of great imaginative power and strongly marked individuality, who has not quite found himself and disentangled his genius from the influences that helped form it.

The performance was satisfactory and at times brilliant. Mr. Townsend as usual had schooled chorus and solo voices with great care and skill, and Mr. Monteux is always a sympathetic interpreter of Debussy. The solo parts sung by Ethel Frank and Claramond Thompson suffered somewhat from the nervousness inevitable to novices at Symphony concerts. Miss Frank is a capable singer who has pleased many recital audiences. Miss Thompson has a voice of beautiful quality which one would gladly hear under more favorable circumstances than the few thankless measures allotted her yesterday.

The finest of the other numbers was Gluck's somber and austere tragic overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis." His music is too seldom heard nowadays. It has far more of the timeless quality of Bach and Beethoven than has Haydn's Symphony in G major, which followed it yesterday.

Mr. Monteux too often makes 18th century music sound clumsy and flat footed by neglecting the delicate gradations of accent and of tone volume on which its essential grace and delicacy depend. Haydn and Gluck, as well as Mozart, are really immensely difficult to perform properly, though any amateur orchestra is capable of plodding through most of their works.

Charpentier's Italy, in his youthful orchestral "Impressions" of that country, reeks of the opera house. It is effective in a banal and rather cheap manner, but fades into insignificance beside such musical pictures as Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The performance yesterday lent power to the music, and was largely responsible for the outburst of applause at the end.

SYMPHONY CONCERT, SYMPHONY

Irma. QUARREL Feb. 28/20

A Tranquil Yesterday with Debussy, Haydn, Gluck and Charpentier to Busy Conductor, Orchestra and Audience—A Perturbed Today with an Organized Union Ready to Confer with the Trustees — The Harvard Glee Club Puts Even Kreisler in Second Place

THOUGH nearly every tongue in Symphony Hall wagged yesterday afternoon with the controversy between the members and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, the concert itself betrayed not a hint of it. Mr. Monteux, holding wisely aloof from the whole quarrel, had prepared and practiced the programme as though all concerned were as tranquilly minded as he seemed. The men, as if to give individual and collective proof of their regard for the high standards of the band, played at the top of their bent. An assisting chorus of women added to interest and pleasure, chosen by Mr. Townsend with his usual flair for bright, clear, supple voices, trained by him to precision and plasticity, ease and understanding with the music in hand. Assisting solo-singers—Miss Frank and Miss Thompson—were less fortunately chosen, far less well prepared for their considerable task. In measure, perhaps, their awkward and expressionless song accounted for the cool applause that their hearers returned to Debussy's setting for orchestra and women's voices of Rossetti's poem, "The Blessed Damsel." Perhaps, again, it is not a piece advisedly included in a Symphony Concert.

Once the orchestra has made way through the prelude, it has only to weave the fine web of atmosphere and suggestion, detail by detail, above and through which should shimmer the singing voices. The chorus gained this luminosity and suavity, this soft glitter and delicate sensibility of tone. The solo-singers fell far short of such virtue, and theirs, after all, is the major part of the music. Heard, imagined apart from the chance circumstances of the day, it has the iridescent loveliness of a web of gauze spread over the poem, threaded into it. Yet the soft glow, the clear transparencies, the gentle progress, the finely chiselled detail, the whole atmosphere of remote and mystical scene, of idealized and semi-mystical emotion in tones are but reflections of Rossetti's animating and coloring verse. That verse strikes the human note. Recall the line that melts the heart: "All this is when he comes." Remember the gentle pride of the avowal to Mary, the warm petition to Christ the Lord. Debussy's music turns the Damsel to bright phantom, disembodies her vision and her longing. More than to the music the hearer makes answer to the poem and little does the music prompt him.

Before Debussy, contrasting ancients of music had their inning—Gluck with the overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn with a little symphony in G major. Once more the overture proved that scant expressive means as we regard them nowadays, thin harmonic and instrumental dress as it seems in 1920, and eighteenth-century formulas in alternation of matter and mood, may still summon the passion and the illusion of the tragedy of Agamemnon's daughter. Enough that in the composer is the creative imagination and passion to compass them—and defy the years. In such music of the theatre Mr. Monteux is almost unfailingly eloquent; but in another vein he and the orchestra surpassed themselves. Not before in ventures into eighteenth-century symphonies have they gained the fleetness of pace, the lightness of accent, the flow of melodic line, the grace of ornament, the brightness of rhythm with which they set Haydn's music to singing, dancing, smiling and sporting anew. A feat in little, it is true, but a difficult feat and a feat well and truly done. Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," big as they seem beside the little symphony, are twice as easy to set sounding. When they were newer than they are today, it was the custom to believe them graphic and imaginative tone-pictures—the twang of the midnight serenade, the rattle and blaze of Naples in fete, the tinkling mule-train ascending the mountain, the still girls by the fountain, the pulsing glow of Italian landscape, pulsing also in the heart of the poet. Now not much is left but a thick and theatrical musical rhetoric, "effective" enough in the trite sense of the word. Long since the music-drama of "Louise" proved Charpentier man of the theatre. By the same token the Italy of his suite is the Italy that used to be painted on drop-curtains.

As the Wind Sets Today

"The world do move" as the old negro preacher finally agreed, but nowhere at the moment does it seem to be moving quite so fast as it does in the outgivings of the associated members of the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday, "rich and prominent men" stood ready to pay the bills of a reorganized band that should be a very paradise of players. Today the city, the state, even the national government have replaced these unnamed liberators. "There is a bare possibility," according to "assurances from a responsible source," that the city or the State will take over the orchestra and maintain it, with becoming consideration for the rank and file. More: "a prominent official at Washington" intimated no longer ago than the years of war, that "the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be kept intact by the United States Government itself." Wide stretch engaging horizons. Across them floats a vision of the Honorable Claud Kitchen of Scotland Neck, N. C., rising in the Congress to propose an increase in the Federal appropriation for the Boston Orchestra, or of the excellent Mr. "Jerry" Watson, representing the City Council as trustee thereof; or yet again, of a committee—say on fisheries—in the Massachusetts Legislature gravely debating "acts and resolves" for Symphony Hall.

Seriously, do the presumably intelligent men composing the Symphony Orchestra believe that such nonsense impresses or alarms the trustees and the public of the concerts? Do they suspect that soon no one but very young reporters will have either an eye or an ear for these comicallies? Can they not see that such absurd stuff weakens and cheapens whatever is just and strong in the very case they would put to the public? Possibly it is easily deceived; but it does know transparent "bunk" when it reads and hears it. As futile to even the half-informed are the threats of departures from Symphony Hall to Detroit, to New York and to other cities. Nearly every symphony orchestra in the United States is nearing the end of the season. As it is constituted at present, so will it remain constituted, under existing contracts, through March and April. The very union to which the Bostonian players have joined themselves would protect those whom they might now displace. Not for this spring, but for next autumn are managers and musicians proposing contracts. The members of the Boston Orchestra are doing so themselves. Yet they fancy that these alarms and excursions vastly perturb the public of the concerts and turn the hearts of the trustees to water. Such self-delusion, tactlessness, silliness are beyond understanding. They are almost maudlin.

Yet somewhere in the background are wiser and more practical heads. They have completed the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Association; they have joined it to the Boston Musicians Protective Association, which in turn is affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians. From the members of the orchestra,—and not, be it noted, from the union at large,—a committee of seven has been chosen to confer with the trustees over changes in contracts, "to comply with the obligations fixed by the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians," and over the original request for a flat increase of $1000 in the salary next season, of each and every member of the Association. There is no reason to doubt that the trustees will welcome such conference and debate. There the real issue will be joined again.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY JOIN THE UNION

Feb. 28, 1920

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—A strong effort is in evidence to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra a union orchestra. It has been the one orchestra of first importance in the United States the players of which have not been union men. Major Higginson, the founder, and for many years the sustainer of the organization, was unalterably opposed to his men joining the union, basing his objections on the ground that the tendency of the union was to lower artistic standards.

The present discussion arose when certain of the players made a demand on the trustees of the orchestra for

An increase in salaries, the minimum to be of $1000 a year. In reply to this the president of the trustees, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, made a statement to the men in which he said that such an increase would mean that subscriptions of $100,000 a year would have to be forthcoming in addition to the $100,000 now contributed to run the orchestra. He also said that an endowment fund of $2,000,000 which it was proposed to raise would have to be made $4,000,000, and unless either the additional annual amount or the increased endowment were in sight, that it would be impossible to grant the request.

Before the men's demand had been made the management had started to increase salaries when new contracts were made. It is reported that many of the players, among them the concert master, Fredric Fradkin, have signified their willingness to join the union. It is understood that the trustees have no objection to the union provided that they are allowed to secure players from whatever source they desire without dictation.

DEMAND ON SYMPHONY TRUSTEES

Union Asks Flat Raise
of $1000 for Each Player

Post Feb. 28/20
The committee of seven of Boston Musicians' Union yesterday sent a communication to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which it refutes recent statements made by Judge Cabot of the board and demands a conference and a flat increase of $1000 for each player in the orchestra.

The request for a conference with the board of trustees and for the wage increase are reiterations of former demands.

MONTEUX OPPOSES MOVE

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, yesterday said he has never supported the players who have in their agitation for higher wages threatened to break from the orchestra. He says that from the beginning he has had no part in the dispute and that he has personally disapproved the course adopted by the men.

F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was in Boston yesterday to secure players for Detroit. He said he has places for 20 musicians in his orchestra. None of the members of the Boston orchestra signed with the Detroit, preferring, they said, to await developments in the present situation.

Warning From Weber

Warning was sent out yesterday by Joseph N. Weber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, urging all musicians to keep away from Boston and not to deal with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, until the present controversy is adjusted.

Five more members of the local orchestra were said last night to have applied for admission into the local musicians' union. Among them are said to be Arthur Brooke, flutist and G. Mager, trumpet. William G. Dodge of the local union has been delegated by President Weber to assume charge of the union's part in the present controversy.

Trustees Query Fradkin

The trustees have apparently not receded from their attitude as defined in the recent statement by Judge Cabot of the board of trustees.

The determined opposition to unionism on the part of the board may be seen by its having called Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, yesterday afternoon to make clear his attitude on the subject of the musicians' union.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SEVENTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 5, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, AT 8 P. M.

BERLIOZ,

FANTASTIC SYMPHONY, No. 1, in C major, op. 14, A

I. Dreams, Passions. Largo; Allegro agitato e appassionato assai

II. A Ball. Waltz; Allegro non troppo

III. Scene in the Meadows. Adagio

IV. March to the Scaffold. Allegretto non troppo

V. Dream of a Sabbath. Larghetto; Allegro

MALIPIERO,

SEVEN SYMPHONIC EXPRESSIONS, "Le Pause del Silenzio." ("The Pauses of Silence")

BORODIN,

ORCHESTRAL SKETCH, op. 7, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "The Flying Dutchman"

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

an increase in salaries, the minimum to be of $1000 a year. In reply to this the president of the trustees, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, made a statement to the men in which he said that such an increase would mean that subscriptions of $100,000 a year would have to be forthcoming in addition to the $100,000 now contributed to run the orchestra. He also said that an endowment fund of $2,000,000 which it was proposed to raise would have to be made $4,000,000, and unless either the additional annual amount or the increased endowment were in sight, that it would be impossible to grant the request.

Before the men's demand had been made the management had started to increase salaries when new contracts were made. It is reported that many of the players, among them the concert master, Fredric Fradkin, have signified their willingness to join the union. It is understood that the trustees have no objection to the union provided that they are allowed to secure players from whatever source they desire without dictation.

DEMAND ON SYMPHONY TRUSTEES

Union Asks Flat Raise
of $1000 for Each Player

Post Feb. 28 '20
The committee of seven of Boston Musicians' Union yesterday sent a communication to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which it refutes recent statements made by Judge Cabot of the board and demands a conference and a flat increase of $1000 for each player in the orchestra.

The request for a conference with the board of trustees and for the wage increase are reiterations of former demands.

MONTEUX OPPOSES MOVE

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, yesterday said he has never supported the players who have in their agitation for higher wages threatened to break from the orchestra. He says that from the beginning he has had no part in the dispute and that he has personally disapproved the course adopted by the men.

F. Sturm, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was in Boston yesterday to secure players for Detroit. He said he has places for 20 musicians in his orchestra. None of the members of the Boston orchestra signed with the Detroit, preferring, they said, to await developments in the present situation.

Warning From Weber

Warning was sent out yesterday by Joseph N. Weber, international president of the American Federation of Musicians, urging all musicians to keep away from Boston and not to deal with the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, until the present controversy is adjusted.

Five more members of the local orchestra were said last night to have applied for admission into the local musicians' union. Among them are said to be Arthur Brooke, flutist and G. Mager, trumpet. William G. Dodge of the local union has been delegated by President Weber to assume charge of the union's part in the present controversy.

Trustees Query Fradkin

The trustees have apparently not receded from their attitude as defined in the recent statement by Judge Cabot of the board of trustees.

The determined opposition to unionism on the part of the board may be seen by its having called Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, yesterday afternoon to make clear his attitude on the subject of the musicians' union.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SEVENTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 5, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, AT 8 P. M.

BERLIOZ,

FANTASTIC SYMPHONY, No. 1, in C major, op. 14, A

I. Dreams, Passions. Largo; Allegro agitato e appassionato assai

II. A Ball. Waltz; Allegro non troppo

III. Scene in the Meadows. Adagio

IV. March to the Scaffold. Allegretto non troppo

V. Dream of a Sabbath. Larghetto; Allegro

MALIPIERO,

SEVEN SYMPHONIC EXPRESSIONS, "Le Pause del Silenzio." ("The Pauses of Silence")

BORODIN,

ORCHESTRAL SKETCH, op. 7, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "The Flying Dutchman"

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT
Chairman of Trustees of the Symphony
Orchestra

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Ovation Acclaims Greatest Success Achieved in Thirty Years

Herold — Mich. 6. 1920

FRADKIN INCIDENT MARS PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

When Mr. Monteux came on the platform he was greeted with extraordinarily hearty and prolonged applause.

After a brilliant performance of the symphony—a performance that has not been equalled here for 30 years; that has been approached only by the one given by a visiting orchestra led by Mr. Weingartner in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux was, naturally, recalled. He was recalled again. He then invited the orchestra to share in the applause. All stood, except Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the concert master. Whatever personal disagreement there may be between the conductor and the concert master—the reports published in the newspapers have been exaggerated and evidently one-sided—the platform of Symphony Hall is not in the course of a Symphony concert the place to air a real or fancied grievance. Mr. Fradkin, by not rising with the others, acted discourteously toward the applauding audience. When he left the stage for the intermission many in the audience hissed him for his rudeness. When he returned some, especially in the second balcony, applauded; there was also hissing; some in the orchestra were so tactless, not to say discourteous, toward the audience, as to join in the applause. Mr. Fradkin had the assurance to stand up this time. He bowed to the audience and the orchestra.

As soon as Mr. Monteux reappeared there was a mighty counter-demonstration. The applause was enthusiastic; it grew louder and louder until the great audience stood for some time, clapping hands vigorously; there was also cheering. Mr. Monteux then went on with the concert.

It was a deplorable scene. Nothing like it had happened in the history of the orchestra. May nothing like it happen again! No player, before yesterday, had allowed personal feeling to overcome him so as to forget the observance of common courtesy toward men and women that were generous in their support and in their appreciation of the orchestra to which he belonged.

This symphony is an amazing work; not only because it was first played 90 years ago when Beethoven had not been dead four years and young Wagner was studying at Leipsic; not only because in orchestration it was a revelation; it is amazing today by reason of the wild imagination, the flaming romanticism, the audacities in musical thought and musical expression. If Berlioz had not lived, the men that came after him, Wagner included, would have been obliged to work out painfully their own orchestral salvation. The influence of this genius, a man practically self-taught, a master of no instrument, brilliant as critic and essayist, a poet when writing a treatise on instrumentation, profoundly unhappy, unappreciated in his own city until long after his death, a self-torturer; the influence of this man is still felt throughout the musical world.

After the scene that has been described, the audience was hardly in a quietly receptive mood, yet there was again wonder at the moods of Malipiero's "expressions," music that 50 years from now may be to hearers as simple as Haydn's is now to us; there was enjoyment of Borodin's Sketch and Wagner's engrossing overture.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from his music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Loeffler, "A Pagan Poem" (piano, Mr. Gebhard, English horn, Mr. Speyer); Glazounoff, Symphony No. 6, C minor.

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert on March 5 with the following program:

Berlioz. "Fantastic" Symphony.
Malipiero. "Pauses of Silence."
Borodin. "On the Steppes of Central Asia."

Wagner. Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

An afternoon of romantic music, yet of great variety. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, save for occasional episodes, still stirs the imagination. Its orchestral colors are fresh. The composer's inventive skill, when compared with the practices of the greater number of his contemporaries, is a marvel. Genius lurks in every measure. Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was authoritative. Trained in the Paris tradition under the great Colonne, his interpretation was full of fire and feeling. It was conceived in the "grand manner" which this music so imperatively calls for. Even the melodramatic, swaggering of certain pages seemed sincere and convincing.

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" was played here for the first time last season. Then the work excited interest because of its strange orchestral effects, its extreme harmonic idiom, its general novelty. According to Henry Prunières (quoted in the program book), "One is not able to hear this singular composition without a sort of awful horror," an opinion in which we heartily concur. Upon a second hearing, this composition furnishes ample proof that harmonic and orchestral effects, whose sole appeal is their novelty, are no longer interesting once their novelty is gone. There are other elements required to make a composition of lasting worth.

In the last movement of the "Fantastic" symphony the score calls for two bells and six pianofortes. Needless to say that the six pianos were not present, yet this calls to mind Mr. Salzedo's prediction of a harp section in the orchestra consisting of 35 harps. The effectiveness of the piano in the modern orchestra has not been great.

Will some venturesome composer dare to introduce a pianoforte section? Having heard seven harps, we tremble to think of 35, but add to this six or more pianos! Berlioz should have reflected before writing those words.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON THAT CLEARED THE AIR

Fradkin Affronts Audience and Conductor and, Within a Few Hours, Pays Just Penalty—The Trustees and Mr. Monteux Learn the Temper of Their Public—"Manifestations" New and Strange in the Records of the Orchestra—Incidental Music and Eloquent Performance

THE only possible answer to the untoward episodes yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert is written in the letter of the trustees of the orchestra, summarily and sharply dismissing Frederic Fradkin as concert-master for gross breach of discipline and grosser affront to the audience. Wisely, the letter was despatched within a few hours after those incidents had put to shame the present and the past of the Symphony Concerts and made known as promptly to a public clearly resenting them. Better still, it contains not a hesitation or reservation. At last the trustees seem ready to make an end of the mounting indiscipline within the orchestra and to face whatever consequences the restoration of order and obligation may bring. It was high time. There has been much and reasonable mistrust of their seeming dalliance, however necessitated by undisclosed circumstance, with a situation needing to be gripped and broken; while by every discoverable sign, in and out of Symphony Hall, the public of the Symphony Concerts applauds and sustains their present resolution, will join with them in the meeting of the consequences. Tame submission to such things as befell yesterday would be far worse in continuing and sapping outcome than even a temporary suspension of the Symphony Concerts (though no such event impends) and a clearance of the disaffected from the orchestra itself.

For Mr. Fradkin, now plainly uneasy under the consequences of his follies, there is hardly an extenuating circumstance, however apologetic he now feigns to be. For days past, as his outgivings to the press have proved, he has been as a man beside himself with the vanities and the insolences of a fictitious self-importance. Long since he lost all sense of the actualities of his place in the orchestra, of the decencies of his conduct toward the public. His following in the orchestra, in equal heat and blindness of folly, a few foolish partisans in the audience of Friday afternoon have done the rest. Whatever may next befall at Symphony Hall, the air is at last cleared and decision has timely replaced indecision. Unless many a sign fails and not a few reports are mistaken, more than one member of the Symphony Orchestra has yesterday and today seen a light. However they are minded in the present quarrel, they have discovered that discipline and decency are still to prevail in the conduct of the band toward the public.

There is little need to recall in detail the incidents of the afternoon, which will make a strange page in the records of the Symphony Concerts. They befell before and after the intermission; in that quarter hour hundreds of tongues rang with them; and for the rest of the day they quite overclouded music and performance. At the Opera House last evening, they were repeated by and large. Today the town spurts with them. Briefly they ran in this wise. Mr. Monteux, coming to his place at the beginning of the concert, was received with significantly long and loud applause as though the audience would approve his poise and procedure through the present controversy. He and the orchestra with him recalled Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" to such musical, pictorial and romantic life as it has not known in years in Bostonian ears. Sincere, hearty and insistent applause rewarded the conductor once and twice. At the second recall he bade the orchestra, according to custom, rise in its place to share and acknowledge the plaudits it had helped to win. Fradkin remained obstinately and ostentatiously in his chair. There were sharp hisses; there were renewed clappings for Mr. Monteux and the rest of the band. Then the intermission and the usual departure of conductor and men.

When the players returned, Fradkin, lingering until most of them had resumed their places, obviously courted the attention of the audience. A few hands in the second balcony clapped; more hands in the orchestra itself, especially among the minor strings, joined with them. In measure, deliberate indiscipline prompted this applause; in measure, it sprang from childish irritation at the mood of an audience altogether in sympathy with Mr. Monteux. With elaborate vanity, Fradkin bowed to his partisans on the stage and to his partisans in the auditorium. He was scarcely in his seat before Mr. Monteux returned, lifted, almost, to his platform by a flood of applause that swept from one end of Symphony Hall to the other. Many stood; cries and cheers rose above the din of hands. For once an American audience, a Bostonian audience "manifested" and beyond mistake of purpose or doubt of sincerity. The rebellious in the orchestra had their answer; the trustees received their spur. Within a few hours the salutary consequences began to be written—for beginning.

There was no reflection of these disturbances in the playing of the orchestra; indeed, from first to last, the concert was one of unusual brilliance. Mr. Monteux's reading of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" surpassed any that has been heard here, except perhaps, Mr. Weingartner's. The dramatic nature of the music tempted his better qualities, and he rose to it as he has to perhaps nothing during his stay among us. Despite its occasional ineptness and the absurdly romantic programme which inspired it, this Symphony remains one of the miracles of the art; both because of its amazing eloquence after ninety years and by reason of its entire independence of all previous and contemporary music. It is easier to imagine that it was written yesterday than it is to believe that it was composed but three years after the death of Beethoven. Except for the picturesque piping of the shepherds, the "Scene in the Meadows" now seems somewhat futile, tenuous and over long, and it is hard to take the clap-trap of the last movement seriously. But in the "March to the Scaffold" and at the end, the usually reticent Mr. Monteux was as one possessed, and it is easy to understand the applause which led to such disastrous consequences.

Malipiero's Seven Symphonic Expositions, "Pauses of Silence," were played here for the first time by Mr. Rabaud. On a second hearing the music seems less strange, and also less remarkable. Some writer on music once remarked, quite unjustly, that Sgambati was an Italian who had sold his birthright, melody. It is interesting to speculate on what he would have thought of Malipiero. The music rivets the attention, but there is little that can be carried away in recollection save biting and acid harmonies, bizarre instrumental effects and tortured melodic phrases. Between Malipiero and Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman, which ended the concert, stood Borodin's Orchestral Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia." To read the composer's explanatory preface before hearing the piece is to experience disappointment, as the music gives but faint suggestion of its programme. The two melodies are striking in themselves; the Oriental song, which typifies the advancing caravan, is fascinatingly exotic, but in company with Berlioz and Wagner, and even Malipiero, Borodin's music was no more than a pleasing interlude.

It was good to hear again the Flying Dutchman Overture, which served as a fitting conclusion to the concert. The performance was effective, although other conductors have better suggested the music's wildness and elemental breadth. Its compelling eloquence again prompted the reflection that Wagner at his best stands apart from all other composers in the beauty, vitality and validity of his ideas, and in their perfect expression.

ACT AT CONCERT CAUSES CRISIS IN RELATIONS

Herald — March 6, 1920
Concert Master Brings Down Hisses from Big Audience

ALONE HELD SEAT
DURING APPLAUSE

Fradkin, Through Counsel, Says He May Sue for Rights in Case

The gathering bitterness of feeling in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, aggravated by a verbal clash at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday night, between Pierre Monteux, conductor, and Fredric Fradkin, concert master, reached its climax in a dramatic demonstration at the Symphony Hall concert yesterday afternoon and the summary discharge of the concert master last night.

The crisis in the controversy was acted out on the stage of Symphony Hall in the view of a great audience. It came as a sudden and startling dis-

FREDERIC FRADKIN,
Symphony Concert Master, Dismissed
by Trustees Following Scene at Rehearsal Yesterday.

version for the rapture induced throughout the assembly by a musical performance declared to be the most brilliant and masterly heard in this city for years.

Monteux Shares Applause

The appearance of Conductor Monteux at the opening of the concert had been a signal for applause of unusual fervor. Whether a consideration of the Sanders Theatre episode influenced the warmth of this reception is problematical.

Then, after a marvelous rendition of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, the applause broke out in torrents never equalled at any previous concert. Mr. Monteux retired, but re-appeared to acknowledge the continued applause. Again he was recalled and this time he waved to the members of the orchestra to rise and share the applause with him.

All rose save Concertmaster Fradkin. The significance of his attitude was sensed immediately by the audience. An embarrassed hush intruded upon the plaudits, to give way in a moment to a mightier roar of applause for the conductor and the others, and an intermingling of hisses for the concertmaster.

There was hissing again when Mr. Fradkin retired at the intermission, but when he returned there was a ripple of applause for him, this coming chiefly from the second balcony. Mr. Fradkin stood and bowed in acknowledgement of this greeting.

The trustees' letter of discharge, sent by Judge Frederick P. Cabot to Mr. Fradkin last night, was as follows:

"I hereby notify you that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., have passed the following votes in reference to you.

Failed in Agreement

"Voted that in the judgment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., acting by its trustees in a meeting held on the evening of March 5, 1920, Fredric Fradkin has failed to keep his written agreements entered into between him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., in that he did not comply with the instructions of the conductor in reference to his deportment and order at the public rehearsal at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, March 5, 1920, and that therefor he be dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and in further accordance with the terms of his agreement he be paid his agreed compensation to the time of his dismissal.

"Voted that the president of the trustees be directed to give Fredric Fradkin notice forthwith of the foregoing action."

"In pursuance of this action of the trustees you are hereby notified that you are dismissed from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

"I enclose check for $234.38 in payment of your agreed compensation to the time of dismissal. Yours truly,

"(Signed) FREDERICK P. CABOT, President of the trustees, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

May Break Up Orchestra

The controversy has now reached a point which threatens the disruption of the orchestra. A meeting of those members of the orchestra who have joined the musicians' union since the inception of the trouble may be held today and will develop some sort of ultimatum to the trustees as a result of the concertmaster's discharge.

The dissension began with a demand by the players for $1000 salary increases. It progressed through a unionization of the greater number of the players as the trustees deferred definite action on the salary demand. The concertmaster cast his influence into the players' side, even to the extent of joining the union, although his salary is several times greater than that of the men, and of serving on the union executive committee of seven. The feeling reached the acute point in the Sanders Theatre incident, with the denouement yesterday.

Fradkin May Bring Suit

Shortly after midnight, last night, Fradkin, through his counsel, in discussing his dismissal, declared that he had been improperly discharged. He maintained that he holds himself in readiness to perform his contract, and this attitude his lawyer asserted, means a civil suit, unless the trustees rescind the discharge.

A member of the players' committee of seven, and one of the prominent players, who was still in Fradkin's apartments, where the committee had been meeting prior to the news of the discharge, stated that it was his impression that the trustees were evidently bent on disrupting the orchestra, and if that was their intention they could not have adopted a better means than by discharging Fradkin.

As the committee meeting in Fradkin's apartments had broke up before the news of the discharge was received by the concertmaster no arrangements to act on the unexpected situation that has arisen could be taken, but members still present expect the action of the trustees will precipitate an expression of violent indignation today from the more than 75 union members of the orchestra.

APOLOGIZES TO PUBLIC

Fradkin Felt Applause Not for Him
—Mother's Illness Upset Him

Mr. Fradkin, in explaining his reasons for not rising, declared last night, before the notice of his discharge had reached him, that he felt none of the applause had been for him. He asserted that he had felt the demonstration marked the springing of a "plant" to humiliate him, and he noted that he was under severe mental stress, as he had just come from a visit to the bedside of his mother, who had been taken to a hospital to undergo an operation for appendicitis.

"I humbly apologize to the audience and to the public, if they feel I have offended them in any way by not rising and joining in the tribute to Mr. Monteux," he said, in supplementary comment to a formal statement which he issued from a gathering of union players with the counsel of the union at his apartments in the Fenway.

His formal statement follows:
"When I came on the stage this afternoon I realized that a good deal had been said in the newspapers of the Monteux-Fradkin clash, so to speak. After attending to my duties of tuning up the orchestra I took my post and sat down."

"Conductor Monteux then came on the stage and received a demonstration that continued and was prolonged to such an extent that he was obliged to turn round twice and bow his acknowledgment, and again for a third time. There was never a time in my memory that he ever received such an ovation, not even when he made his first appearance as conductor of the orchestra.

"When the conductor turned around to bow his acknowledgments for the third time he signalled to the rest of the orchestra to rise, but I remained seated. From the unexpected ovation I strongly felt that something or other had been planted to uphold him in his tiff with me and to get the audience to show its disapproval of my action in joining the union, and their approval of Conductor Monteux's action in showing his disapproval of the same.

"I felt deeply hurt, as it appeared to me as if the audience was trying to impress upon me, by the cajolery of something that failed to show on the surface, that I was agitating a movement of some kind that was distasteful, or spelled propaganda, although I am a naturalized American citizen and have been for years:

"This tremendous demonstration to Mr. Monteux came after the first Berlioz symphony, and it was so pronounced that I didn't rise because I felt the applause offered was not intended for me. It was with no intention to offend the audience nor to antagonize anyone. I took it for granted, then and there, that the audience had no sympathy for me, under these particular circumstances.

"When I returned to the stage after the intermission and came on the stage alone, the audience applauded me and I rose and bowed my acknowledgments, realizing then that the applause was for me. Up to then I didn't think I was included in the appreciation bestowed.

"Up to the present time I never asked any member of the orchestra to support me in any stand I have taken, and there has never been any danger of a stampede of the men in any of the performances thus far given. A majority of the members have sympathized with me for the slight shown me in Cambridge Thursday night, and I believe that I have the good feeling and support of the majority of the players in the situation that I find myself in, because I have joined the union and thrown my lot with the men for a principle, although I will not benefit any financially as an enrolled member of the union.

"I trust that if the audience feels offended by my not rising at yesterday afternoon's performance that they will accept my most humble apology. It was not intended as an affront to the audience or to anyone else. In the action of the men in the movement to unionize we all desire the good will of the public and there was no attempt on my part to give offence to the public, as I think was demonstrated by the fact that the orchestra never in its 38 years gave a better and more brilliant performance than it did yesterday.

A member of the committee of seven, who was present during the Fradkin statement that Mr. Monteux was a viola player and a member of the French Federation of Musicians' an organization similar to the American Federation of Musicians', with which a majority of the men are now affiliated. He pointed out from the bylaws of the French federation that any member going to a strange country is instructed to promote, uphold and extend the work of the federation, or similar bodies, and that a penalty for not carrying out the mandates of the French federation is usually a boycott against him in all musical circles of France, in the event that he returns.

BACK TO REHEARSAL

Trans. ———— Mch. 8, 1920
AGAIN THE SYMPHONY PLAYERS
VEER

The Whole Orchestra at Work This Morning—More Letters Sent and More Conferences Impending—Events of Saturday as They Were Construed on Sunday—Signs for the Future on Both Sides

THE events of today have belied the events of Saturday at Symphony Hall. On Saturday evening when the orchestra had assembled in the tuning-room for the appointed concert, half the players declined to proceed with it. The wood-wind choir—flute, oboe, clarinets and bassoons—remained at their posts. The horns, with one exception, were like minded. Among the brass, drums and the like, some went to the stage and some left the hall. The string-choir—first and second violins, violas, violoncellos and basses—suffered most. An ill-balanced band remained, thinly provided with strings, too well furnished for working proportions in the other divisions. For it Mr. Monteux improvised a programme that ran through Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; Haydn's little symphony, "The Queen of France." Berodina's tone-picture of an Asian steppe for one of the pieces originally proposed; Mozart's overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute," and Saint-Saëns's concerto for violoncello, with Mr. Fedetti in the solo-part. Before this concert began, Judge Cabot spoke for the Trustees to the audience, declaring their intention to maintain the orchestra and to uphold its independence and standards. The response from a company that filled somewhat more than half the hall showed clear approval and warm sympathy.

This morning, as usual, the orchestra was called for rehearsal of the music to be played on Friday and Saturday of next week. It assembled in full numbers, less one or two necessary absences from illness or like cause. In the tuning-room the men took counsel among themselves, especially over a letter from Mr. Fradkin in which he urged them to take no further action in his behalf. Then the whole orchestra went upon the stage and the rehearsal proceeded as usual. At the end, the players dispersed and this afternoon those of them who have joined the union are to meet to consider future action.

Early today, however, the players who declined to take part in the concert of Saturday evening received the following letter from Judge Cabot writing for the Trustees:

According to report, you are one of those who refused to play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last Saturday. Such refusal clearly constituted a breach of contract. There was a good deal of excitement at the time, and doubtless some men were influenced by views or feelings which others did not have. I shall be at Symphony Hall between two and five in the afternoon, Monday, March 8, and request you to see me there at that time if there is anything you wish to say prior to action by the Trustees. Meanwhile, if the report is correct as to you, you are excused from attendance at the rehearsal, Monday, March 8.

Nonetheless, the players in receipt of this letter came to the tuning room and took part in the rehearsal. They, however, and the whole orchestra, were told that they did so of their own motion and decision, pending the conferences with Judge Cabot this afternoon.

The unionized members of the orchestra are to confer over Mr. Fradkin's letter this afternoon. As it was made known to them and to the other players this morning he accepts his dismissal as a finality and asks those who threaten to leave the orchestra unless he is reinstated, to reconsider their intention. It is a long letter, obviously intended for publication. For the twentieth time, it asserts his devotion to his fellow-players and their cause. For the tenth time, it recounts their complaints as to salary and to the limited employment possible to them as members of a non-union orchestra. Once more he sets down his interpretation of the applause for Mr. Monteux at the concert of last Friday and renews apology for his own conduct. He is "deeply grateful" to the players who out of regard for him declined to take part in the concert of Saturday and otherwise testified to what he is pleased to call their "splendid loyalty." Next, two sentences contain the gist of the letter:

Your unselfishness and loyalty commend me to a similar course. Accordingly I wish to urge upon you to return to your places in the orchestra at the rehearsal which takes place today and to urge upon you further that you take no action which has any relation to my dismissal.

In a few more paragraphs, Mr. Fradkin exhorts the players to persist in their present efforts for higher wages and takes "fraternal," expansive, and seemingly final leave of them.

Meanwhile there is nearly endless speculation about the course that the Trustees and the players who quit work on Saturday will follow. By every evidence that an audience could give, no less on Saturday evening than on Friday afternoon, the public of Symphony Hall is at one with the Trustees in desire to sustain the concerts and maintain the orchestra in the independence and at the standards now threatened. It is not probable that the Trustees will restore Mr. Fradkin to his place; for no longer time than is considerate and conciliatory are they likely to leave the door ajar for the return of the deserting men; if necessary they will proceed forthwith to reconstitute and restore the orchestra by every means at their command, at whatever expenditure may be necessary. They have reason to believe that the events of the past fortnight will bring them financial support that they might not easily have gained when the Symphony Concerts were running in tranquil and prosperous course. There is even a possibility that taking advantage of the present temper of the public, they will speedily ask for an endowment sufficient to secure the future of the orchestra and enable it to pursue liberal policies alike toward the players and the public. Judge Cabot's speech to the audience at the concert of Saturday evening spoke in general terms the mind of the Trustees. The response of the audience there and elsewhere has indicated yet more clearly the temper of the public. Far from letting the orchestra fail, it is likely to support it more vigorously than ever before.

What course the rebellious players will follow is more difficult to say. The number of defections on Saturday, when the moment for decision came, manifestly disappointed them. By this time, it seems clear that the French players in the orchestra will remain at work; that many of the Germans who have been with it for years are like-minded; that most of the rebellious among the older and the younger players, have already been counted. Even to keep the ranks of the restless intact may not prove easy. The revolt lacks able and astute leadership; while it is now plain that it has stirred little sympathy among the public most interested. In the conditions of the hour comically solemn pronouncements from the Central Labor Union go for little beside the rally of the audiences of the Symphony Concerts to the support of the trustees. If the concerts go forward, as there is every reason to expect, it will be hard to keep the excitement of changeable, child-like and unreasoning men at the necessary boiling-point. Still more are present fervors likely to subside if and when the quest for new jobs begins. Much has been said about the desire of other orchestras to absorb the malcontents; actual contracts are another thing, while as a matter of fact, most of the rebellious are less minded to leave the Boston Orchestra than to try to get their way with it. The last thing for which they are prepared is a long contest in which they might be gradually replaced and through which the concerts would continue. They are slow to see that there is no occasion now to debate the expediency of a union; instead, the security of the orchestra is at stake. When, moreover, they are not speaking for their precious "publicity," they do not conceal their surprise at the present vigor of the Trustees and at the support that vigor has rallied.

SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

SIXTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, March 4, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

LAURA LITTLEFIELD

SOPRANO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

DISCIPLINE AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Trans. ———— Mch. 5, 1920
The Episode at Cambridge and Several Clear Morals—Pieces, Performance and a Singer Disabled—"Aida" by the Chicago Company — The New Public to Which It Ministers and That It Meets More Than Half Way — Verdi's Music with More Vigor Than Finesse

THE whiff of open quarrel that blew over the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening, was certainly trivial and probably tactless. Yet it is clear sign of the decline of discipline in the orchestra, of the disposition of the players to use a high hand, of the tension that now strains the relations of conductor, band, management and trustees. It is an exceedingly minor matter whether the concert-master lays off his overcoat and straightens his tie in a room with the conductor or in a room with the rank and file. Such "questions of personal privilege" are familiar vexations in opera companies; now it appears they may also disturb the peace of orchestras. Usually managers adjust them with patience, even when there is loud talk about "apologies"; while bystanders observe these pastimes of temperament with amused smiles. It is, however, another and graver thing when the men of an orchestra are so eager to pick a quarrel over a trifle as they seemed to be last evening and when they threaten to make a waiting audience the victim of their irritation. There goes discipline, and without discipline no such body as the Symphony Orchestra can exist, much less flourish. There also goes disregard of obligation to the public and without its good will

Symphony Hall.

there can be no Symphony Concerts in Cambridge, in Boston, or anywhere else.

Not a few of the players fly into angry furies if they are told that their clear purpose with the orchestra is to rule or ruin it. Yet what plainer evidence could they give of such intention than the threat to compel the dismissal of the audience at Cambridge? They are as wrathful at any hint that their course is not well and calmly considered; yet there they were last evening making a mountain of an "apology" and frantically seeking the "publicity" which to some of them has become the breath of present life. Before the representatives of the players and the representatives of the trustees sit down to negotiations over the questions in issue, discipline in the fullest sense of the word should be sharply and firmly restored in the Symphony Orchestra. For, without discipline, such a body cannot fulfill its first obligation, which is to give the public the concerts announced, at the standard expected. Alienate the public and the Symphony Concerts are at end, and a hundred men, who may or may not be receiving the salaries they deserve, will then be jobless. It is quite true that other orchestras would eagerly absorb a few notable virtuosos in the Boston band. It is by no means so demonstrable that they are at all eager to annex the rank and file. By all accounts, the delegates of the players and the spokesmen of the trustees are about to sit down to thorough-going negotiation. Therein they will consider and perhaps determine how far the obligations of the men toward their union are consistent with their obligations to the orchestra, and how far the rules of the union are in harmony with the declared policies and standards of the Symphony Concerts. Such incidents as that in Cambridge do not smooth the way—to say nothing of tempers—in such debates and decisions.

The Concert Itself

Stricken with a cold at the eleventh hour, Mrs. Laura Littlefield was unable to sing with the Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening. Instead of adding another orchestral number to the programme Mr. Monteux abandoned his intention of playing Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" and substituted for it Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy," which he had played in Boston last week. The two other numbers on his original list, the First Symphony of Brahms and Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," remained. The qualities which distinguished Mr. Monteux's reading of the Brahms Symphony were even more marked than they were last December when he played it here for the first time. In his hands the first movement is gripping and dramatic; it might well stand alone as a Tragic Overture, and might better deserve that title than the piece which the composer so designated. The second movement has often seemed no more than a complex development of a somewhat academic theme; but Mr. Monteux makes it eloquent and moving instrumental song. Only in the last movement does he disappoint, the incisiveness and vigor which he gives it are in keeping with his conception, but one misses the note of uplift and exaltation which certain other conductors have found in the music.

The years have robbed Borodin's piece of its pictorial quality. There is far more suggestion of waste and desolate places in the piano accompaniment of Gretchaninov's song "The Steppe." His music charms because of its striking melodies and instrumental coloring, but it is now hardly more than a pleasing Intermezzo à la Ruse. Nor is Charpentier's Suite immune from the ravages of Time; the musically discriminating have become distrustful of it. But there is no gainsaying its verve and vividness, its melodic appeal. And if it has its taints of theatricality, especially in the last movement, it has its moments of fancy. Certain details of picturesque description linger in the memory; the serenading mandolins, the marching girls with their water pitchers, the tinkling bells of the mules; and there is genuine poetry in the fourth movement, "On the Summits." It is easy to predict that for a long time to come audiences will delight in this music, and, after all, there are few pieces so frankly entertaining in the repertory of the orchestra.

child-like and unreasoning men at the necessary boiling-point. Still more are present fervors likely to subside if and when the quest for new jobs begins. Much has been said about the desire of other orchestras to absorb the malcontents; actual contracts are another thing; rebellious are less minded to leave the Boston Orchestra than to try to get their way with it. The last thing for which they are prepared is a long contest in which they might be gradually replaced and through which the concerts would continue. They are slow to see that there is no occasion now to debate the expediency of a union; that, instead, the security of the orchestra is at stake. When, moreover, they are not speaking for their precious "publicity," they do not conceal their surprise at the present vigor of the Trustees and at the support that vigor has rallied.

SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

SIXTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, March 4, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

LAURA LITTLEFIELD

SOPRANO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

DISCIPLINE AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Trans. ———— Mch. 5, 1920
The Episode at Cambridge and Several Clear Morals—Pieces, Performance and a Singer Disabled—"Aida" by the Chicago Company — The New Public to Which It Ministers and That It Meets More Than Half Way — Verdi's Music with More Vigor Than Finesse

THE whiff of open quarrel that blew over the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening, was certainly trivial and probably tactless. Yet it is clear sign of the decline of discipline in the orchestra, of the disposition of the players to use a high hand, of the tension that now strains the relations of conductor, band, management and trustees. It is an exceedingly minor matter whether the concert-master lays off his overcoat and straightens his tie in a room with the conductor or in a room with the rank and file. Such "questions of personal privilege" are familiar vexations in opera companies; now it appears they may also disturb the peace of orchestras. Usually managers adjust them with patience, even when there is loud talk about "apologies"; while bystanders observe these pastimes of temperament with amused smiles. It is, however, another and graver thing when the men of an orchestra are so eager to pick a quarrel over a trifle as they seemed to be last evening and when they threaten to make a waiting audience the victim of their irritation. There goes discipline, and without discipline no such body as the Symphony Orchestra can exist, much less flourish. There also goes disregard of obligation to the public and without its good will

Symphony Hall.

there can be no Symphony Concerts in Cambridge, in Boston, or anywhere else.

Not a few of the players fly into angry furies if they are told that their clear purpose with the orchestra is to rule or ruin it. Yet what plainer evidence could they give of such intention than the threat to compel the dismissal of the audience at Cambridge? They are as wrathful at any hint that their courses are not well and calmly considered; yet there they were last evening making a mountain of an "apology" and frantically seeking the "publicity" which to some of them has become the breath of present life. Before the representatives of the players and the representatives of the trustees sit down to negotiations over the questions in issue, discipline in the fullest sense of the word should be sharply and firmly restored in the Symphony Orchestra. For, without discipline, such a body cannot fulfill its first obligation, which is to give the public the concerts announced, at the standard expected. Alienate the public and the Symphony Concerts are at end, and a hundred men, who may or may not be receiving the salaries they deserve, will then be jobless. It is quite true that other orchestras would eagerly absorb a few notable virtuosi in the Boston band. It is by no means so demonstrable that they are at all eager to annex the rank and file. By all accounts, the delegates of the players and the spokesmen of the trustees are about to sit down to thorough-going negotiation. Therein they will consider and perhaps determine how far the obligations of the men toward their union are consistent with their obligations to the orchestra, and how far the rules of the union are in harmony with the declared policies and standards of the Symphony Concerts. Such incidents as that in Cambridge do not smooth the way—to say nothing of tempers—in such debates and decisions.

The Concert Itself

Stricken with a cold at the eleventh hour, Mrs. Laura Littlefield was unable to sing with the Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening. Instead of adding another orchestral number to the programme Mr. Monteux abandoned his intention of playing Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" and substituted for it Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy," which he had played in Boston last week. The two other numbers on his original list, the First Symphony of Brahms and Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," remained. The qualities which distinguished Mr. Monteux's reading of the Brahms Symphony were even more marked than they were last December when he played it here for the first time. In his hands the first movement is gripping and dramatic; it might well stand alone as a Tragic Overture, and might better deserve that title than the piece which the composer so designated. The second movement has often seemed no more than a complex development of a somewhat academic theme; but Mr. Monteux makes it eloquent and moving instrumental song. Only in the last movement does he disappoint, the incisiveness and vigor which he gives it are in keeping with his conception, but one misses the note of uplift and exaltation which certain other conductors have found in the music.

The years have robbed Borodin's piece of its pictorial quality. There is far more suggestion of waste and desolate places in the piano accompaniment of Gretchaninov's song "The Steppe." His music charms because of its striking melodies and instrumental coloring, but it is now hardly more than a pleasing Intermezzo à la Russe. Nor is Charpentier's Suite immune from the ravages of Time; the musically discriminating have become distrustful of it. But there is no gainsaying its verve and vividness, its melodic appeal. And if it has its taints of theatricalism, especially in the last movement, it has its moments of fancy. Certain details of picturesque description linger in the memory; the serenading mandolins, the marching girls with their water pitchers, the tinkling bells of the mules; and there is genuine poetry in the fourth movement, "On the Summits." It is easy to predict that for a long time to come audiences will delight in this music, and, after all, there are few pieces so frankly entertaining in the repertory of the orchestra.

264

18 - 1

265

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

EIGHTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 12, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, AT 8 P. M.

MENDELSSOHN,

SELECTIONS from the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream"

- a) Overture
- b) Nocturne
- c) Scherzo

GRIEG,

CONCERTO in A minor for Pianoforte, op. 16

- I. Allegro molto moderato
- II. Adagio
- III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 4 in B flat major, op. 60

- I. Adagio: Allegro vivace
- II. Adagio
- III. Allegro vivace: Trio: Un poco meno allegro
- IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo

Soloist:

HEINRICH GEBHARD

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Grieg's Concerto

Mr. Jacques Hoffman, director of the Peoples' Orchestra.

VIRTUOSO SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post-Me. 13. 1920
Superb Playing by Reduced Band--Gebhard Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

With a membership of 67, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave its customary Friday concert yesterday afternoon. An audience, which gathered early and displayed the greatest interest in events, applauded practically every member of the orchestra as these men came on the stage singly or in groups to take their regular seats. The place of Fredric Fradkin, the former concertmaster, was filled by J. Theodorowicz, previously assistant concertmaster.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

When Mr. Monteux entered he was applauded long and loudly. At the end of the concert the audience stood, applauding for some time. The programme in its revised state consisted of music from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Grieg piano concerto, Heinrich Gebhard of this city as pianist, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

Mendelssohn's music was held up by the late Edward MacDowell to his pupils in orchestration as a model of what a composer could do with relatively few instruments. It was delightfully played, and both Mr. Wendler, the admirable first horn, and Mr. Laurent, the equally masterly flutist, were called by

Mr. Monteux to bow to the audience. Great enthusiasm and unanimity on the part of the men was felt in the performance of the overture, which was very brilliantly played. And what music this is! How fresh, how poetic today! No wonder it was applauded—the music and the virtuoso performance.

Mr. Gebhard and Grieg

It must be admitted that the music of Grieg is pale by comparison. Yet it appeared years after the youthful music of Mendelssohn. Mr. Gebhard had intended to play Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra, but the orchestra was too small, so that Grieg's work replaced the Loeffler composition.

Taking into account the fact that Mr. Gebhard himself can hardly have illusions about Grieg's aging music, he played it superbly, like the sane, authoritative artist that he is. To play it with more abandon would have required a belief in it, and we cannot believe that Mr. Gebhard is enthusiastic about this out-moded concerto of Grieg, especially when he is deeply immersed in the music of Mr. Loeffler. But he was justly applauded and recalled, and the orchestra provided an excellent accompaniment of the concerto.

Beethoven Played Superbly

As for the Beethoven symphony, it was one of the best performances of this work we can remember. This early symphony gains rather than loses by a smaller body of strings than usual. It had at last the almost Haydnesque clarity, simplicity, lightness of touch that is desirable, and which is almost always lost when the symphony is played by the average-sized modern orchestra. Beethoven's fourth symphony naturally calls for fewer instruments. Mr. Monteux showed himself thoroughly a master of the score and his men carried out his wishes to the smallest nuance.

The management of the Boston Symphony states that between 75 and 80 players are now available for next week's tour, and that in addition to these about 25 additional players are expected to be enrolled in the very near future.

Fill Vacant Positions

At the rehearsal the orchestra went through Wagnerian excerpts which require a large orchestra for performance.

It was also emphasized by the management that from now on newcomers to the Boston Symphony are not in any sense "strike-breakers." They are simply men who have applied and been given positions which are now vacant in the Symphony Orchestra.

18TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Heard March 13, 1920
Great Audience Welcomes
Conductor Monteux
and His Players

FINE PERFORMANCE
STIRS ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, necessarily changed from the one announced last week, was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Grieg, Concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist); Beethoven, Symphony No. 4.

The great audience welcomed Mr. Monteux and the faithful men of the orchestra warmly. The enthusiasm showed conclusively appreciation of the stand taken by the trustees and of the loyalty shown by so many valuable, distinguished players. It also showed a confidence in the future and the glory of the orchestra, a confidence not to be shaken.

The performance deserved the hearty applause that punctuated the concert throughout. It is hardly necessary to write at length concerning the music itself. Mendelssohn's overture and Scherzo are still delightful. Would that he had always written in this vein, for he was, first of all, a romanticist, never so happy as when excited by a fantastical subject, as by Shakespeare's comedy, or "The First Walpurgis Night," or by a scene in Nature, as in the overture to "The Hebrides." In the Nocturne we note the peculiarly suave sentiment that too often degenerated into rank sentimentalism, as in many of the "Songs Without Words." Mr. Wendler, horn, and Mr. Laurent, flute, contributed so greatly to the success of the performance that they were obliged to come forward in acknowledgment of the applause; this applause was also for the whole orchestra. The Scherzo was played with the utmost delicacy and crispness, and the wood-wind choir covered itself with glory.

Admirable, too, was Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony, which, with the exception of the Adagio, is not among the greater works of "the deaf man of Bonn," as he was recently characterized by a flippant critic. Here, as in the performance of Mendelssohn's music, there was ever-present clarity and a fine sense of proportion.

Is Grieg's concerto becoming shopworn? Mr. Gebhard's playing of it was brilliant, rather than poetic or romantic. The better portions of the concerto are surely romantic. In the first movement he appeared to be in a restless mood; the lyric passages were not sufficiently elastic; more than once a phrase sung enchantingly by the violoncellos was repeated by the pianist rigidly. It should be remembered, however, that Mr. Gebhard played at comparatively short notice.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away on its last southern trip next week. The program for the concerts of March 26, 27 will be as follows: Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, "From the New World"; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy, Little Suite (orchestrated by Henri Busser); Berlioz, Rakoczy March.

CONCERT GIVEN IN SPITE OF STRIKERS

Heard March 13, 1920
Symphony Orchestra's
Work Is Excellent

Monteux Receives Big Ovation on Appearance

The Symphony concert yesterday afternoon proved that the orchestra, despite the strike, can give concerts which attain its usual high standard provided music written for a full modern orchestra is avoided. The possible repertoire for the diminished band includes most classic symphonic music, and offers plenty of variety to choose from.

Except for an unusual volume of applause when Mr. Monteux first appeared, and most of the capacity audience rose to clap loud and long, the concert proceeded as though nothing had happened. The revised program began, as the one originally planned did, with three familiar excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and included Grieg's piano concerto in A minor and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, replacing the previously announced "Pagan Poem" by Mr. Loeffler, and Glazounoff symphony. Heinrich Gebhard was the soloist, according to schedule.

Many Violinists Missing

The most noticeable gaps in the ranks are in the strings and percussion sections of the orchestra. There were only about half the usual number of second violins, yet the quality of tone from both first and second violins seemed better than it has at any time in the past two seasons. It had the old golden shimmer, but of course lacked volume and depth, comparatively speaking.

Only momentarily, however, were the strings overbalanced by woodwind and brass, which goes to show that those who have always contended that there were too many strings in proportion to the rest of the band had some reason for their attitude.

The program book listed the strikers among the members of the orchestra, but omitted Fradkin, substituting as concert master the name of Julius Theodorowicz. The inclusion of the other strikers is probably simply due to the fact that their defection came after the programs were printed, though it caused some comment. The programs also contained, as explained elsewhere in today's Globe, an appeal from the trustees for contributions to the endowment fund of the orchestra.

Mr Gebhard Applauded

Mr Gebhard played with his usual skill and taste and was warmly applauded. The orchestra gave him capable support, and Mr. Monteux led sympathetically.

There was a sonority and brilliance about the performance of the familiar Beethoven symphony which would have been worthy of comment under normal circumstances. As things stood yesterday it was a remarkable achievement, for which conductor and players deserve great praise. If there are no further defections there can be no possible doubt of the artistic success of the rest of the regular season, as well as the "Pops" afterward.

No concerts are scheduled for the coming week, as the orchestra will go on tour. The program will be repeated tonight at 8, as usual.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Afternoon That Excelled Anticipation
—A Diminished Orchestra on Its Mettle, and a Poised and Resourceful Conductor —Interesting Pieces Eloquentely Played

There was no mistaking the temper of the audience at the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon. It came early to Symphony Hall and, as the present members of the orchestra passed singly or in groups to their places on the stage it applauded them heartily. When Mr. Monteux made his way to the conductor's stand, it clapped him yet more warmly; while a few in parquet and balconies, following an amusing local custom, stood as well. At the end of each number upon the programme or at pause in it plaudits again ran high—for the performance, for the leader, for the orchestra in general, for individuals who had shone through the piece just heard, like Mr. Wendler, the first horn, in the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Mr. Laurent, the first flute, in the succeeding Scherzo. Finally, when the whole concert was done, the listeners lingered to renew their plaudits and to bring the whole band to its feet. Clearly the audience was on the side of the players who have kept their contracts; clearly it approves recent decisions of the trustees. Evidently the board has wisely decided to strike for an endowment while the iron of excitement over the present and the future of the orchestra is still hot. Each programme-book contained a circular inviting contributions to such a fund—now set at three millions—apparently as preliminary step to wide and vigorous canvass, later in the spring. In no respect—to end the record—were the numbers or the quality of the audience diminished, while its interest in the concert was keen.

Nearly seventy men sat in the orchestra—the sixty-odd players who have respected their contracts, plus a few veterans who, retired on pensions, voluntarily returned to their places. The wood-wind choir was virtually complete; the brass choir sufficed; the violins and the violas were plainly depleted; the violoncellos and basses served the needs of the day and something more; gone are most of the men who played upon drums, cymbals and the like. In the absence of Mr. Neumann from the tympani, of Mr. Mattersteig from the tuba and of Mr. Helm as the first trumpet, the orchestra suffers appreciable loss; otherwise to a man the more or less noted virtuosos remain—Messrs. Laurent, Longy, Sand, Laus and Speyer in the wood-winds; Mr. Wendler among the horns; Mr. Theodorowicz—now concert-master in succession to the departed Fradkin—Mr. Denayer, Mr. Bedetti and sundry others in the strings. From that choir, unfortunately, more than one man of tried merit has departed and it most needs immediate repair. By wise distribution of available forces by sedulous regard for balance and euphony of tone, Mr. Monteux obtained excellent results from an orchestra so constituted and proportioned. The mental poise, the firm yet considerate will, the readiness in resource with which for days he has met and conquered difficulties once more praised him.

To a man the orchestra was on its mettle. Through the chosen pieces from Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," it did outdo itself in zest for rhythm, in lightness and brightness of tone, in spirited transitions, in artful blendings of voices, in all the graces proper to the music. In Grieg's concerto for piano, its suppleness and warmth chided by example the cool and precise Gebhard, playing the solo part. In Beethoven's fourth symphony, the depleted strings excelled all anticipation. Their tone was as clear as the day; it bent to every modulation of the music; it glowed with songful beauty. The other choirs fell not a whit below them and the outcome was performance in which the simplicity, the charm, the bright flow, the tender or the stouter ardors of the music lived anew. There have been Symphony Concerts in normal circumstance and with full ranks when the orchestra played far less well. Each to each, audience, band and conductor were as responsive whole.

As plainly the programme indicated that Symphony Concerts are not only possible but enjoyable when the choice of pieces is conditioned by the numbers and the balance of the available orchestra. Mendelssohn in his symphonies may now sound thin, accademic, antiquated; not a few of his piano-pieces may be worn thread bare; many of his songs turned flavorless; but through this overture, scherzo and nocturne to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" he still teems with fanciful invention and felicitous means. The overture is voice to the spirit and mirror to the matter of Shakespeare's fantasy; the night-piece and the scherzo are interludes that sustain the poetry and the caprice of the play; while in every measure of all three the musical means accomplish the imagined and illuding end. For once a composer has written a perfect music in kind. Grieg's concerto stiffened under Mr. Gebhard's rigid tone and progress. Far too cool and objective was he with an intrinsically rhapsodic music. Agreed that Grieg wrote fitfully, almost gaspingly; but each mood, while it lasts, beats warm and high. There are dry measures in the concerto wherein Grieg takes thought of rule and process; and time and change are gnawing at them. There are also fine fervors wherein it is still possible to make the music soar. As for Beethoven's symphony, too seldom will the conductors let us hear him limpid, fanciful, charming, even sentimental. For them, by choice, the greater, the deeper Beethoven. With reason Mr. Monteux cherishes the graces of this simple, smiling music. Inclination as well as necessity yesterday sent him to it.

H. T. P.

The Music of Boston

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place March 12. The program, after revision, made necessary by the dismissal of some of the players, was as follows:

Mendelssohn—Selections from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.
Grieg—Pianoforte Concerto, Heinrich Gebhard, soloist.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 4.

The orchestra, having recently undergone important changes, played surprisingly well. Mr. Monteux has again proved himself a man of resource under trying conditions, a man who thoroughly understands every detail of his profession, a practical musician. Those who stated that his interpretations lacked in authority failed to realize that he was patiently building up the efficiency of the orchestra so that he might in due time give all his attention to the interpretive side of his art.

This necessary technical efficiency had almost been attained and Mr. Monteux was beginning to show his audience another phase of his musical nature, as witness last week's memorable performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, when circumstances obliged him to rebuild his almost perfect orchestra. Yet there was much to praise in yesterday's performance, even if the difficulties under which Mr. Monteux labored had not been known to the audience. The apt characterization of different styles of music was still to be observed, the dash and virtuosity of the orchestra had not been lost, the beauty of tone and phrasing which have been so noticeable during Mr. Monteux's tenure of office were still within the power of the orchestra. The audience realized the marvel that had been wrought and rewarded the orchestra and its conductor with generous applause.

Grieg's concerto served to display Mr. Gebhard's well-known and excellent qualities as a virtuoso.

Editor — Mar. 13, 1920

AND NOTHING HAPPENED

Trans. — Mar. 19, 1920
THE DEPLETED BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK

Warm Applause for the Reduced Band and Hearty Sympathy for the Conductor
— A Changed Programme Excellently Played — The Reviewers' Reflections, and Also Discoveries, About Present Tribulations

ORCHESTRAS, like nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening, he finds himself in the centre of an unmusical whirlwind, what he would call a "tourbillon," while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marsellaise." The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the Musical Union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only twenty members, as Manager Brennan put it.

After the defection in Boston some old members came forward and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothée Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concert master and Gerlicke conductor. Arcadian days, indeed. As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the part of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodorowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder at his accustomed desk; Mr. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir. There were only ten first fiddlers as against the usual sixteen; the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping. . . . Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns — stopped by his honor — what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valiant crew.

It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charming, but of finesse. The original programme scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's fourth symphony and a group of Wagner's excerpts made up an interesting evening. Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happened to be "sacred codfish." [James Huneker in The World]

Present and Future

What became of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz? That question must have ruffled the equable temperaments of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts as they sat in their seats at the final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. The very types had melted into glowing streams of glorification when the work was lately performed in Boston, and despite the fact that a somewhat weighty concert master had remained sitting when Pierre Monteux, conductor, commanded the orchestra to rise and accept the laudations of cultivated Boston, the piece had been announced for repetition before the mercenary children of New York.

But without explanation it vanished into thin air, almost as thin as some of its own, and in its place the astonished auditors beheld on the programme the unfamiliar B flat symphony No. 4 of Beethoven. . . . Many fine things have been written about this symphony, but one feels certain that Boston would not have been shaken to its centre by last evening's performance, as it was by the Fradkinized interpretation of the "Fantastique." After Beethoven there was a row of specimens of Wagner, namely, the prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll, "Forest Murmurs" and bits of the third act of "The Mastersingers." The audience was very demonstrative.

Thirty-one members of the orchestra were absent last evening. The number of players was seventy-two, on a basis of ten first violins and six double basses, but some of these were substitutes. The missing members left the orchestra because of the discharge of Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, for insubordination. At the recent performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Boston he refused to rise when Mr. Monteux directed the orchestra to stand in acknowledgement of applause. Several of the seceders have already asked for reinstatement, and W. H. Brennan, the manager, said last night that all would surely do so. Mr. Fradkin will not be reinstated. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun]

Notable Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its last visit to New York in the midst of tribulation. Some of the results were apparent last evening in the appearance of the orchestra considerably reduced in numbers. There were also a number of unfamiliar faces. Some of them were said to be of players formerly members of the orchestra, recruited now for the emergency. The audience was ready to show its sympathy with the conductor, and when Mr. Monteux appeared he was greeted with an extra round of applause. At the close of the symphony there was an enthusiastic demonstration, which Mr. Monteux desired to share with the players—and none failed to rise to acknowledge it.

Under the circumstances, it was not to be expected that all the remembered qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be shown in the performance. But it was evident that both conductor and players were on their mettle. The performance had many admirable qualities and showed the fine musicianship that was centred in that reduced aggregation of players. Of course the volume of the string tone was not there. The playing of the symphony, however, had great spirit, elastic rhythm, delicacy and finesse; an engrossing performance. And if the balance of tone was different from that familiar to concertgoers of these days, some may have consoled themselves by thinking that it was nearer to that of the orchestras that played it for Beethoven in 1806. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the division of the strings in the scoring and the reduced numbers available for the several parts emphasized somewhat the loss in volume. But the "Siegfried Idyll" was originally conceived for a small orchestra and loses little in a performance by one. If Mr. Monteux's coat in certain passages was a little rigid the delicacy and poetic coloring of the orchestra were delightful. The audience was cordial in its manifestation of enjoyment. [Richard Aldrich in The Times]

Undisturbed and Well Received, the Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Usual Concerts Abroad—Appearances and Actualities Among the Dismissed Players—A Singer's and a Pianist's Recital

THE present concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in the cities southward that it regularly visits began auspiciously in Washington on Monday afternoon; continued as fortunately in Baltimore last evening and promise to move as smoothly in Philadelphia today. No unionized stage-hands have refused to set chairs for the band; the audiences have been as numerous as usual and quite as warmly disposed; Mr. Monteux has put together a pleasurable programme; and in it he and his seventy men have acquitted themselves well. The orchestra is the orchestra heard at Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, with sundry additions to the string choir from applicants long since tested and approved for it, should vacancies arise. Late last week Mr. Monteux heard them anew, accepted a few for immediate service and has since rehearsed them in the current pieces. For Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, these numbers are Beethoven's fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll"; the introduction, dance of the apprentices and other fragments from the third act of his opera, "The Mastersingers." Between whiles, Miss Destinn, long since engaged for the four concerts, sings an air from Mozart's opera, "Don Juan" and three Bohemian songs from Smetana and Dvorak. At the two concerts in New York, without Miss Destinn, Mr. Monteux will repeat the orchestral pieces aforesaid and add to them Mozart's symphony in G minor, Wagner's prelude to his opera, "Lohengrin," the "Forest-Music" from his "Siegfried," Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio," Borodin's "Asian Sketch" and Debussy's "Little Suite." Thus, in spite of difficulties at home, the Symphony Orchestra is keeping its engagements abroad and keeping them in becoming fashion everywhere, moreover, its audiences have cheerfully accepted the limitations of the moment. When they have applauded conductor and band, they could hardly have been altogether unmindful of recent events, decisions and resolutions in Boston.

Here at home the rebellious remnant, dismissed from the orchestra last week, are cultivating an admirable talent for publicity. Each day, after the manner of "strikers," they meet for the mutual encouragement of talk and speech-making. Each day they become "the nucleus" of a new orchestra—on Monday to be organized and endowed by "prominent Back Bay women"; on Tuesday by the publishers and sellers of music in this town; today, possibly, by their "comrades" of the pavers' and longshoremen's unions. Each day, furthermore, they announce new meetings that their spokesman will address—"forums" and the like, where the affairs of the Symphony Orchestra have never been discussed before and, in all probability, never will be again. So much for the pretty and playful game of appearances. Actually, the more far-sighted "strikers" are warily seeking work in other orchestras; while one, two or three are not unwilling, could they go their own way, to return to their chairs in Symphony Hall. They have missed sorely the present journey of the orchestra to New York and other cities; they are uneasy away from the work and the associations of years; they are anxious over the future. They even decline to be cheered by the prospect of a concert on Sunday evening at the Colonial Theatre, in which they will be the nucleus of a "scratch" orchestra. A few, of course, believe that they can now ruin the orchestra; they have failed to rule, have forgotten, indeed, every grievance over salary and unionization in single-hearted desire to "get even" with the trustees and the management who dismissed them. But for these implacables the whole secession might speedily simmer away.

THE SYMPHONY STRIFE

A Second Concert by the Diminished Orchestra in New York—Foreboding Comment from Metropolitan Reviewers—Fresh Evidence of the Overshadowing Fradkin

THE final concert for this season of the Boston Orchestra in New York befell on Saturday afternoon last and The Tribune on Sunday made record of it as follows:

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra do not seem to have affected the number of people who in New York wish to hear the famous band. The concert yesterday afternoon found Carnegie Hall crowded and Mr. Monteux greeted with more than ordinary heartiness. Mr. Monteux has naturally tempered the programme to his shorn orchestra, yet despite a certain loss in tonal resonance its playing yesterday was admirable, and notably so in Debussy's Petite Suite. Mr. Monteux is entirely at home in the music of Debussy, and he gave the suite a graceful and atmospheric performance. The other numbers were the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

The reviewer for The Sun was less pleased with the concert but he soon puts it by for pessimistic reflections upon the present and the future of the disrupted band. He writes:

There was some good playing in Debussy's suite, but in general the orchestra sounded rough. There was little or nothing of the delicious mellowness and transparency of tone for which the Bostonians have been noted. However, in the circumstances no finished performance could be expected. It was evident that the sympathies of the audience were with Pierre Monteux, the conductor; for the applause with which he was received when he first appeared and which followed the symphony was plainly meant as a special demonstration.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the lap of the gods who protect union labor. It remains for unionism to perpetuate or destroy this institution. If it proves to be true that seventy-four members are pledged to leave the orchestra if it is not unionized then the organization is doomed, for great concert orchestras cannot be improvised. For the sake of its splendid history and of musical art in this country it is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will survive the deadly blow it has received and will continue to bring its delightful contributions to New York's musical season.

On another page of The Sunday Sun, Mr. Henderson, reprinting Mr. Roth's letter already published in these columns, renews his forebodings:

Mr. Roth's letter proves conclusively that the present state of the Boston Orchestra is precarious. If its men are pledged to unionism and the trustees remain firm in their determination not to recognize a union the present orchestra will cease to exist and a new one will have to be formed. If the trustees believe that they can go out and buy a new Boston Symphony Orchestra just as they would buy a new bass drum they are lamentably mistaken. To the disinterested outsider it looks as if the famous old orchestra was approaching dissolution. Such an outcome of the matter would be a calamity to the musical world and all music lovers will fervently hope that differences may be adjusted.

The Times likewise prints a summary of Mr. Roth's letter and then, with the pen of Mr. Aldrich, comments as follows on the conditions it discloses:

The New York public will join in the general lamentation if the Boston Symphony Orchestra is damaged beyond repair. It is unsafe at this distance and without a knowledge of all the facts to venture on prediction; but most admirers of the orchestra will think that if three-quarters of the present personnel leave it, and the management tries to build it up to former standard with new men—or women—in their place, the outlook will not be promising. It took some of the rarest ability a good many years to bring the Boston Orchestra up to its preeminent position. It will not be done again immediately, even if an equal amount of ability in the direction and in the personnel is at once available.

The merits of the unionizing scheme are not for outsiders, imperfectly acquainted with the circumstances, to discuss. It is natural, probably inevitable, that the trustees of the orchestra should carry out strictly the policy they inherited from Mr. Higginson against it. They no doubt consider it a part of the many-sided wisdom that marked his control of the orchestra for so many years and that brought such unique results. Whether they will "relent" or whether they can withstand the pressure, greater now than at any time in Mr. Higginson's day, and whether, if they do, they can successfully make up the loss of three-quarters of the orchestra and restore it to what it has been so very recently, these are all questions that cannot fail to interest deeply the New York musical public, and the possibilities of the situation are such as to cause pain and anxiety.

Being two hundred miles away and engrossed in nearer matters, Mr. Hender-

274

men and Mr. Aldrich overlook the fact that here in Boston the strife within and without the band is fast degenerating into a personal issue: Shall the trustees and the conductor control the orchestra or shall it be controlled by Fredric Fradkin, the concert-master, dismissed for gross breach of discipline and general effrontery? Outwardly at least, the seceders are now neither more nor less than an obsequious following awaiting his daily bidding. In their eyes increase of salaries and unionization—the issues with which the controversy began—are fast becoming incidental beside the omnipotent and omnipresent Fradkin. So also among the sympathizers with the seceders. Their concert, last evening, at the Colonial Theatre ran merely perfunctory course until it was the turn of Fradkin to play the sickly sweet "Meditation" from Massenet's opera, "Thais." Then ovations for "the idol," ovations for "the hero" and all that sort of thing. No wonder that Mr. Webber, the president of the American Federation of Musicians—an astute and far-seeing man withal—found himself unable to address the company; while two actors, also announced to grace the occasion, discovered engagements elsewhere. Until Fradkin's brief day passes, as it is sure to pass with the fickle temperaments he now sways, the dispute and the merits of the dispute are likely to get "no forrarder."

As the Subscribers Feel

From a score of notes sent to this department by subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who resent Mr. Roth's recent letter on the part of the seceders from the orchestra, here follows one that well represents them all:

Otto Roth and the seceding Symphony players do not seem to give a thought to the fact that they broke faith with a large audience of many old subscribers to the concerts on one of the most inclement nights of the winter. Many like myself made an effort to go to Symphony Hall because the original programme was played so well Friday afternoon. To allow a peevish violinist who has been with the orchestra as concert master but two seasons to influence the seceders to the extent of their not only breaking their contracts with the trustees but with this audience of subscribers who have assisted in the financing of the orchestra, makes it still more evident that unionism is the last thing desirable for a good orchestra. My feeling is that tickets should not be bought for a concert where any one of them take part until they have shown that they have overcome their present lack of responsibility to the public who support them.

SYMPHONY SEEKING $3,000,000 FUND

Globe ———— Mel. 18. 1920
Endowment Is Needed to Meet Expenditures

Deficit Faced Annually, That for 1919 Being $100,000

The programs at yesterday's Symphony concert made the first definite announcement of a campaign to raise a permanent endowment fund for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The amount set as a goal by the trustees is "at least three millions," although $2,000,000 is the largest sum previously mentioned tentatively by them as possible.

If this great fund can be raised it should prove possible in future to pay members of the Boston Symphony higher salaries than those given anywhere else in the world. On the success or failure of the endeavor depends the future standing of the orchestra.

There has always been a deficit at the end of each season. According to the official "Historical Sketch of the Symphony Orchestra," published in 1914, the annual deficits from the beginning to that time had totaled about $900,000 and averaged $20,000 per season. Until Maj. Higginson relinquished control in May, 1918, he paid the bill out of his own pocket.

Since that time the present board of trustees, with the aid, it is said, of a few others, have had to meet deficits larger than ever before. The total deficit for last season, according to Judge Cabot, the chairman, was nearly $100,000. Unless a permanent fund is raised there will always be danger of private generosity finding the burden too great to bear.

The appeal from trustees to subscribers follows:

"Symphony Hall, March 12, 1920.
"To the Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts—Many friends of the Symphony Orchestra have requested an immediate opportunity to testify to their interest in securing its future through a permanently endowed foundation. This attitude means only one thing, that these great audiences realize all that this orchestra has signified. From its inception under Maj. Higginson it has brought beauty into the lives of our citizens and distinction to our city. The spontaneous desire to help should not be held back to perfect the detailed plan for raising an endowment fund of at least $3,000,000; and accordingly the trustees will gladly receive at once subscriptions and pledges from all those who believe in the vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and country.

"There is annexed a subscription blank which may be signed and left at the box office or mailed to the treasurer at Symphony Hall.

"Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

18-11

Symphony Hall,
April 2, 1920.

275

TO THE

SUBSCRIBERS TO THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS:

Many friends of the Symphony Orchestra have requested an immediate opportunity to testify to their interest in securing its future through a permanently endowed foundation. This attitude means only one thing, that these great audiences realize all that this orchestra has signified. From its inception under Major Higginson it has brought beauty into the lives of our citizens and distinction to our city. The spontaneous desire to help should not be held back to perfect the detailed plan for raising an endowment fund of at least three millions; and accordingly the Trustees will gladly receive at once subscriptions and pledges from all those who believe in the vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and country.

There is annexed a subscription blank which may be signed and left at the box office or mailed to the Treasurer, Mr. ERNEST B. DANE, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INC.

BOSTON, Mass., April.....1920.

The undersigned hereby agrees to pay the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., for its permanent endowment fund..... dollars on or before.....19....., or in instalments as follows:

$.....on.....19.....
$.....on.....19.....
$.....on.....19.....

Name.....

Address.....

Prov.

274

son and Mr. Aldrich overlook the fact that here in Boston the strife within and without the band is fast degenerating into a personal issue; Shall the trustees and the conductor control the orchestra or shall it be controlled by Fredric Fradkin, the concert-master, dismissed for gross breach of discipline and general effrontery? Outwardly at least, the seceders are now neither more nor less than an obsequious following awaiting his daily bidding. In their eyes increase of salaries and unionization—the issues with which the controversy began—are fast becoming incidental beside the omnipotent and omnipresent Fradkin. So also among the sympathizers with the seceders. Their concert, last evening, at the Colonial Theatre ran merely perfunctory course until it was the turn of Fradkin to play the sickly sweet "Meditation" from Massenet's opera, "Thais." Then ovations for "the idol," ovations for "the hero" and all that sort of thing. No wonder that Mr. Webber, the president of the American Federation of Musicians—an astute and far-seeing man withal—found himself unable to address the company; while two actors, also announced to grace the occasion, discovered engagements elsewhere. Until Fradkin's brief day passes, as it is sure to pass with the fickle temperaments he now sways, the dispute and the merits of the dispute are likely to get "no forrarder."

As the Subscribers Feel

From a score of notes sent to this department by subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who resent Mr. Roth's recent letter on the part of the seceders from the orchestra, here follows one that well represents them all:

Otto Roth and the seceding Symphony players do not seem to give a thought to the fact that they broke faith with a large audience of many old subscribers to the concerts on one of the most inclement nights of the winter. Many like myself made an effort to go to Symphony Hall because the original programme was played so well Friday afternoon. To allow a peevish violinist who has been with the orchestra as concert master but two seasons to influence the seceders to the extent of their not only breaking their contracts with the trustees but with this audience of subscribers who have assisted in the financing of the orchestra, makes it still more evident that unionism is the last thing desirable for a good orchestra. My feeling is that tickets should not be bought for a concert where any one of them take part until they have shown that they have overcome their present lack of responsibility to the public who support them.

SYMPHONY SEEKING $3,000,000 FUND

Globe Mel. 13. 1920
Endowment Is Needed to Meet Expenditures

Deficit Faced Annually, That for 1919 Being $100,000

The programs at yesterday's Symphony concert made the first definite announcement of a campaign to raise a permanent endowment fund for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The amount set as a goal by the trustees is "at least three millions," although $2,000,000 is the largest sum previously mentioned tentatively by them as possible.

If this great fund can be raised it should prove possible in future to pay members of the Boston Symphony higher salaries than those given anywhere else in the world. On the success or failure of the endeavor depends the future standing of the orchestra.

There has always been a deficit at the end of each season. According to the official "Historical Sketch of the Symphony Orchestra," published in 1914, the annual deficits from the beginning to that time had totaled about $900,000 and averaged $20,000 per season. Until Maj Higginson relinquished control in May, 1918, he paid the bill out of his own pocket.

Since that time the present board of trustees, with the aid, it is said, of a few others, have had to meet deficits larger than ever before. The total deficit for last season, according to Judge Cabot, the chairman, was nearly $100,000. Unless a permanent fund is raised there will always be danger of private generosity finding the burden too great to bear.

The appeal from trustees to subscribers follows:

"Symphony Hall, March 12, 1920.
"To the Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Concerts—Many friends of the Symphony Orchestra have requested an immediate opportunity to testify to their interest in securing its future through a permanently endowed foundation. This attitude means only one thing, that these great audiences realize all that this orchestra has signified. From its inception under Maj Higginson it has brought beauty into the lives of our citizens and distinction to our city. The spontaneous desire to help should not be held back to perfect the detailed plan for raising an endowment fund of at least $3,000,000; and accordingly the trustees will gladly receive at once subscriptions and pledges from all those who believe in the vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and country.

"There is annexed a subscription blank which may be signed and left at the box office or mailed to the treasurer at Symphony Hall.

"Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

275

Symphony Hall,
April 2, 1920.

TO THE

SUBSCRIBERS TO THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS:

Many friends of the Symphony Orchestra have requested an immediate opportunity to testify to their interest in securing its future through a permanently endowed foundation. This attitude means only one thing, that these great audiences realize all that this orchestra has signified. From its inception under Major Higginson it has brought beauty into the lives of our citizens and distinction to our city. The spontaneous desire to help should not be held back to perfect the detailed plan for raising an endowment fund of at least three millions; and accordingly the Trustees will gladly receive at once subscriptions and pledges from all those who believe in the vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and country.

There is annexed a subscription blank which may be signed and left at the box office or mailed to the Treasurer, MR. ERNEST B. DANE, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INC.

BOSTON, Mass., April.....1920.

The undersigned hereby agrees to pay the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., for its permanent endowment fund..... dollars on or before.....19....., or in instalments as follows:

$.....on.....19.....
$.....on.....19.....
$.....on.....19.....

Name.....

Address

Prov.

19-1

276

277

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

NINETEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, AT 8 P.M.

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," ("Z Novecho Sveta") op. 95 1

I. Adagio: Allegro molto

II. Largo

III. Scherzo

IV. Allegro con fuoco

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "Lohengrin"

WAGNER,

"Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried"

DEBUSSY,

PETITE SUITE, (arranged for Orchestra by Henri Büsser)

I. En Bateau

II. Cortège

III. Menuet

IV. Ballet

(First time at these Concerts.)

BERLIOZ,

HUNGARIAN MARCH, (Rákoczy)

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Loyal House Acclaims Return of Monteux and
"Faithful" Players

SHOW OLD POWER IN 'LOHENGRIN' PRELUDE

Herald — Mich. 27, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, "From the New World" symphony; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" and "Forest Numbers" from "Siegfried;" Debussy, Little Suite (first time at these concerts if not in Boston); Berlioz, Rakoczy March.

This was a remarkably brilliant concert, one that excited the enthusiasm of an audience that completely filled the hall. Mr. Monteux was greeted warmly when he came on the platform. There was the assurance of belief in him; appreciation of the players faithful to their engagement and mindful of their obligation to the audience that has for many years been faithful to them; confidence in the splendor of the orchestra in the future as in the past. The applause that followed the performance of each composition was not merely sympathetic and encouraging; it was the enthusiastic approval of the performance itself; and the performance in each instance justly deserved this recognition.

Sitting one night with Horatio Parker when Dvorak's "New World" symphony was played, we were surprised to hear him characterize the work as "meretricious." Did he mean by this that it was immediately pleasing; that it was showily attractive; that it was too melodious? Our friend, whose departure is mourned by many, had a habit of making surprising statements; perhaps to provoke discussion; perhaps to express a passing whim. He certainly did not mean that the music was showy, for the sake of show. There never was a simpler, more sincere composer than Dvorak. He was by nature a child or a savage—which is often the same thing—delighting in strongly marked rhythms and gorgeous colors. He saw red, yellow, scarlet, purple when he sat down to compose. How he would rejoice today in a jazz band! There was a time when this symphony almost caused shedding of blood over the question whether it was inspired by "Negro music." Now, without thought of this question without inquiry as to "Negro" or Czech origin, the music gives pleasure at the time of performance and in the recollection of it.

Mr. Monteux put on the program the Prelude to "Lohengrin," probably because he and many others enjoy hearing it; and also to prove that in spite of street rumors and statements, to say the least misleading and often palpably absurd, that have been published in newspapers of this city and of New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not today without a sufficient and capable string choir. (And so at the next concert a Concerto Grosso of Handel's for strings will be performed.) The Prelude was finely played, as was the excerpt from "Siegfried," which took us back to the nights of German opera in Boston. Again we saw and heard Max Alvary, a wretched singer, but the most picturesque and convincing of Siegfried's; again we saw and heard other Germans, who howled and bawled and shrieked and were fat and dramatically grotesque; again we saw and heard Jean de Reszke, a city gentleman lost for a few hours in the forest.

Debussy's Little Suite, written originally for piano (four hands), and orchestrated by Busser, was played for the first time at a Symphony concert. The four pieces are pretty in themselves and delicately transferred to the orchestra. The first, "En Bateau," was already familiar through the transcription for violin and piano. The Suite is signed with Debussy's name, but the moods and the expression are by no means those of the Debussy that brought a new harmonic scheme into the world and still exerts a mighty influence.

It was often said in Paris during our student years: "to hear the music of Berlioz, you must attend a Colonne concert." It might now be said: "to hear the Rakoczy March, you must hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it, led by Monteux." The march has often been performed in Boston: never with the irresistible dash, the blazing fire, the furious and overwhelming climax that marked the performance of yesterday.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week is as follows: Handel, concerto Grosso for strings, No. 5, D major; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, concerto No. 5, for piano (Rudolph Ganz, pianist); Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride."

ORCHESTRA WINS UNUSUAL APPLAUSE

Spirited Performance at the
Symphony Concert

Dvorak, Wagner, Berlioz, Debussy

Among Composers Interpreted

9 Feb — Mich. 27, 1920

There was unusual applause at the Symphony concert yesterday at each break in a program, which consisted of familiar and well-liked pieces by Dvorak, Wagner and Berlioz, and one novelty, an orchestral arrangement by Henri Busser of Debussy's "Little Suite," written for piano four hands. There was no soloist. The diminished orchestra, with a few new men, again gave a performance that proved beyond question that the season will be finished at no sacrifice of quality.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony is a favorite illustration with those who believe that American art should derive its themes and atmosphere from American folk music. Its rhythms certainly are often like those of negro music, but the composer's Bohemian compatriots say that they are also the rhythms of his native folk music.

The themes are all Dvorak's own, beyond question. It is a fruitless task to explore the sources of masterpieces in a hope of being able to find a formula which will replace the creative imagination of productive genius. The important thing about this symphony is its intrinsic musical worth.

Like all Dvorak's music it shows great fertility of melodic invention and little skill in development and variation. It is spontaneous, not well made. There are some banal harmonies. The performance was spirited, yet balanced and proportioned.

Wagner fared less well than Dvorak at Mr. Monteux's hands. The "Lohengrin" Prelude demands a more smoothly mounting crescendo, and in the "Waldweben" the leading motives did not stand out solidly from the orchestral background.

The pretty "Little Suite" sounds much better on the piano than it does in M. Busser's flat-footed and probably pot-boiling arrangement, yet Mr. Monteux achieved a spirited performance.

The remarkably brilliant performance of the "Rákoczy March" with which the concert closed was a triumph for all concerned. It far surpassed that given here recently by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Next week Rudolph Ganz will play the solo part in Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto. The other numbers are to be a "Concerto Grosso" by Handel; the prelude to "Parsifal," and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

Mich. Music in Boston 27, 1920

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The program of the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 27 was as follows:

Dvorak, Symphony
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner..Forest murmurs from "Siegfried"
Debussy.....Petite Suite
Orchestrated by Henri Busser
Berlioz....."Rákoczy March"

Dvorak's symphony has not been heard here for some time, and it was a pleasure to renew acquaintance with this old friend, at one time so frequently to be met with. The largo and scherzo are still as fresh as ever, still making their emotional appeal. The other movements have lost somewhat in charm. The development of the themes seems stilted and old-fashioned.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" is always impressive, but the necessity of playing the "Forest Murmurs" is not entirely obvious. Whatever the value of this scene may be in the theater, it is certainly ineffective in the concert room. The picturing of the forest has been done more strikingly and suggestively by other composers.

Debussy's suite, originally written for pianoforte, four hands, but now cleverly orchestrated by Henri Busser, is agreeable music. Music of this character was good to hear after the more serious and taxing moods of the program. Refined, ingratiating, it pleased an appreciative, even enthusiastic audience. Berlioz's march has seldom been given a more inspiring reading. Under Mr. Monteux's hands the "great romanticist" is gradually coming into his own in this city where his music has suffered so much in the past from unsympathetic interpretations.

The orchestra played with unusual beauty of tone and great flexibility.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW MOODS ASTIR THROUGH THE AUDIENCE

Hearers That Recent Happenings Have Awakened—A Sufficient Orchestra, with Conductor and Men on Their Mettle—
The Restless and Waning Secession —
Wagner, Berlioz, Debussy and Dvorak
Fill a Diversified and Agreeable Programme

A REKINDLED audience, stimulating to see, hear and feel, now frequents the Symphony Concerts. It is numerous as usual; even yesterday when there was no "assisting artist" and no outstanding piece, it filled every seat in Symphony Hall. Thither, however, it goes in a new spirit. No longer does it take orchestra, conductor, concerts, as a matter of course. The recent secession from the band, the malignant desire of a few seceders, to disrupt and extinguish it—could they work their full will—have awakened the subscribing public to new sense of pleasures received and returns to render. It hears the chosen music with quickened ears, freshly it notes the merit, the distinctions of performance; in a difficult hour it would encourage the conductor and his forces, the directing management, the sustaining trustees. Hence the intent listening of yesterday; hence the long, hearty and sincere applause bestowed upon Mr. Monteux and all concerned; hence a pervading atmosphere of animation, interest, pleasure. "The trustees," said a leaf in the programme-book, replacing the usual tabulation of the orchestra, "heartily thank the patrons who have already contributed, according to their varying means, by checks and pledges to the future maintenance of the orchestra. This prompt response to the first suggestion that a permanent fund will be raised gives clear proof of the support to be expected from Boston concert-goers. Every immediate contributor helps to give the campaign the strong start essential to its ultimate success." By the same token every such concert as that of yesterday helps, by the temper of both stage and auditorium, to surmount the present and secure the future.

As it is, the orchestra comprises seventy-odd players, three-quarters, and a little more, of the usual numbers in recent years. It is as large, indeed, as it was through not a few auspicious and unquestioned seasons of beginning. Sundry young musicians, already tested and waiting opportunity to join the band, have increased the string choir; out of semi-retirement have come such a virtuoso of the trombone as Mr. Hamper and so expert a kettle-drummer as Mr. Rettberger. The orchestra is quite large enough for a wide choice of pieces distributed through interesting programmes. The several choirs are better balanced than they were a fortnight ago, and there was little hint of diminished tone even in the divided violins of the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Lohengrin." Only in the forest-music from his later "Siegfried"—a more closely woven music—did the hearer miss a full-throated underbody of tone, a larger sonority. Even in the Rákoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the orchestra flamed and clanged. With every choir in such mettle as it was yesterday, with every individual player clearly minded to do his utmost, the orchestra holds firm and supple. In it as in the audience is new esprit de corps.

Moreover, there is reason to expect a gradual secession from the seceders themselves—a secession indeed that has already begun. It is an open secret, though obviously they do not hand it to the newspapers, that certain men in their ranks are quietly on their way back to Symphony Hall. It is as true, though again their spokesmen overlook the matter, that certain others are making contracts that by next autumn, if not earlier, will take them far from any actual or hypothetical Boston Orchestra. Zest for the secession is manifestly cooling outside a few faithful "Fradkinettes." In new contacts the more intelligent seceders have discovered that not a few blatant partisans of "unionism," "Americanization" and that sort of thing count the hearing of symphonic music like to a visit to the dentist and are no more inclined to pay money for it than they would for a series of lectures on the epistle to the Ephesians.

By this time these men are as well aware that the sentiment of the sustaining public for symphony concerts in Boston runs almost unanimously against them; that many a conductor, manager and guarantor of orchestra or opera company in America, whatever may be his public pretence, is eagerly watching and waiting to see Symphony Hall make head against an over-exacting union and in private, makes no secret of his desire. Worse still, as some say, the august officers of the union itself, having "demands" elsewhere to enforce, are by no means so zealous in this "Boston affair" as they were expected to be. Hence more "unrest" even among the restless and the amusing whistling to keep up courage that pipes out almost every day a new orchestra—to be incorporated—a new concert hall—to be built, a new nebula of some sort for the seceders' rather empty heaven. They themselves put no faith in these outgivings. They are a part of the game; they deceive no one; there is reason to believe that even the vasty vanity of Mr. Fradkin does swallow them with a painful gulp. Events, or rather the failure of events to eventuate, are gradually curing the seceders of that painful, lingering, very human malady which is self-deceit.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Familiar pieces, except one, naturally filled the concert and that one—Debussy's "Little Suite"—is no more than a dexterous, pleasant trifle. He wrote it as piano-duet in his young years; perhaps to put a few hundred francs in his purse; thirteen years later, when Debussy was celebrated but not prolific, Henri Büsser, musical man of all work in Paris, obligingly and amiably scored it for orchestra. It begins with pretty little melodies in lightly swaying rhythms—"En Bateau"; continues with a brightly paced march-tune with a tinkling intermezzo—"Cortège"; proceeds with an artfully artless Minuet; ends with dance-tunes, now sparkling, now sensuous—"Ballet." It is all neat, pretty, graceful, charming; the late Monsieur Massenet, the venerable—some prefer senile—Monsieur Saint-Saëns would surely admire it; any drawing-room would not talk shrilly enough quite to drown it. Barely once, and curiously in the Minuet does Debussy show the budding horns of individual idiom and innovation. Enough that innate elegance and finesse adorn his trifle. On that score in performance, Mr. Monteux, the string and the wind choirs matched him. The foil, for concluding number, was Berlioz's Rákóczy March—the antipodes of the "Little Suite," music that stamps and shouts, boils and flames, sweeps tribes or armies forward, cries with them to each other and to heaven. Somehow the "big note" of these "Romantics" somehow outlasts the purlings of Messieurs les Éléphants. Fortunately for his audience, Mr. Monteux keeps good company with both.

Wagner and Dvorak provided the rest—the Wagner of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the forest-music in the second act of "Siegfried"; the Dvorak of the symphony, "From the New World." The Prelude was test-piece to the string choir; contrary to anticipation, there was no hint of diminished numbers; beyond expectation, silvery shimmer and then golden glow of tone lighted the pathway of the Grail descending from heaven, reascending to it. As of old, the music wrought illusion; mystical and romantic voice blended within it; in pure loveliness of melodic progress, it sang anew. In riper years, Wagner wrote more spaciously, more intensively; but not until the end in "Parsifal," with such ethereal beauty summoned anew. Vigorously Mr. Monteux swept the Grail across the troubled earth; a shade too slow was, perhaps, the pace of descent and ascent; but at his hands the prelude was thrilling to hear. Somehow, he is not always so eloquent with fragments of Wagner's later music-drama. Two or three months ago he fell short of the might and splendor of the glorification of Siegfried dead; yesterday, the sheen and quiver of the forests in the sunshine, the clang of heroic youth in the postlude that sends Siegfried up to Brynhild's fiery rock evaded him. But the Volsung music sang deep especially on Mr. Bedetti's violoncello, while the birds might have envied Mr. Laurent's flute. There was also Dvorak's symphony—a simple, homely, transparent music, as easy to write, seemingly, as it is easy to hear, born of elementary instinct for tune rhythm and color, stirring responsive instinct in those that hear gladly, openheartedly. Thereby it has survived many a page of more sophisticated and artificial music. After all, a symphonic primer may be pleasant to con. Mr. Monteux turned the worn leaves quickly.

H. T. PARKER

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Dvorak, Debussy and Wagner Numbers
Played

Post ———— Nov. 27, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was accounted by many, one of the most brilliant concerts of the season. This though the orchestra was still of diminished numbers, consisting of between 70 and 80 men, and including two players who had rejoined the orchestra on recent days.

These were August Rettberg, who replaced Mr. Neumann at the tympani, and Carl Hampe, now first trombone and one of the finest trombonists in the history of this organization.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

The audience, however, had not shrunk in numbers, nor had its enthusiasm for the music and its support of Mr. Monteux and the management in any way flagged or weakened. Mr. Monteux was again applauded long and loudly, both at the beginning and at the end of the concert, following the performance of the electrical "Rakoczy March" of Berlioz.

For a novelty at these concerts there was played the early and charming "Petite Suite" of Debussy, originally a suite for piano, and later orchestrated by Henri Büsser. The music is Massenetish, but fanciful and lending itself well to orchestral treatment. This suite was preceded by two Wagnerian excerpts, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and the prelude to "Lohengrin," music marvellous alike in its inspiration and its scoring.

To proceed in the established order of this article, which discusses the programme backwards, the Dvorak "New World" symphony opened the programme, and the pleasure of the audience in this delightful music was impressively demonstrated. Again Mr. Monteux had chosen a piece which sounds better and not worse with a relatively small orchestra. The felicity of Dvorak's instrumentation, simple as it is, is always astonishing, and often as inventive as his harmony. The folk-quality of the music, which has been so often discussed as "American" folk-music, because, forsooth, Dvorak uses a scrap of "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and other negroid or Indian themes, is as a matter of fact not American, but Bohemian. Dvorak used a little of the material of folk-melody which he found here, but he used it wholly in the manner and the spirit of his native land, in the work which remains the orchestral masterpiece of his career.

RECRUITS PLAY FOR SYMPHONY

Ten of 32 Places Left Vacant Already Filled; Concert Brilliant

By E. F. HARKINS.

In spite of its still crippled condition, the Symphony Orchestra's nineteenth matinee concert was one of the best of the season. The orchestra is being recruited slowly. Of the thirty-two places left vacant after the Fradkin incident, ten have been filled, at least temporarily. Some twenty more players are needed to make up the regular complement.

Among the recruits who took part in the nineteenth pair of concerts were Rettberg, tympani player, and Hempe, of trombone fame. In its long career the orchestra has had only two tympanists, Rettberg and Neumann. The later followed Fradkin into what is called the American Federation Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

In the latest program the customary roster is displaced by a statement from the trustees of the orchestra, acknowledging contributions to the projected $3,000,000 maintenance fund.

The attitude of the trustees and patrons indicate that powerful efforts are to be made this year to sustain the orchestra under the independent policy fixed many years ago by Major Higginson.

The 19th program comprised Dvorak's symphony in E minor, "From the New World," which was written during the composer's stay in New York; two Wagner numbers, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy's "Petite Suite," offered for the first time at these concerts, and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." The present weakness of the string sections of the orchestra was evident here and there in forte passages; nevertheless, the concert was brilliant and thoroughly delightful from first to last.

The Debussy "novelty" is in reality a work nearly twenty years old. The suite was written for two pianos and then Henri Büsser turned it into an orchestral piece. It is not typical Debussy music, for it abounds in the frank melodious expressions that Debussy disdained when he became an impressionist. To see an audience taking genuine delight in Debussy "tunes," as in the folk-song moods of the Dvrok symphony, was indeed a rare spectacle.

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heartily thank the patrons who have already contributed, according to their varying means, by checks and pledges to the future maintenance of the Orchestra. This prompt response to the first suggestion that a permanent fund will be raised gives clear proof of the support to be expected from Boston concert-goers.

Every immediate contributor helps to give the campaign the strong start essential to its ultimate success.

20-1

287

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTIETH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 2, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3, AT 8 P. M.

HANDEL,

CONCERTO GROSSO, No. 5, in D major, for String Orchestra. (Edited by G. F. Kogel)

- I. Introduction: Allegro
- II. Presto
- III. Largo
- IV. Minuet
- V. Allegro

Solo Violins, Messrs. J. THEODOROWICZ and J. HOFFMANN
Solo Viola, F. DENAYER. Solo Violoncello, J. BEDETTI

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "Parsifal"

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for Pianoforte in F major, op. 103

- I. Allegro animato
- II. Andante
- III. Molto Allegro

SMETANA,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Prodana Nevesta," (The Sold Bride)

Soloist:

RUDOLPH GANZ

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Wagner's Prelude

RUDOLPH GANZ

20TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald — Apr. 2, 1920
Strings Excel in Handel's
"Concerto"—Prelude to
"Parsifal" Given

PROGRAM IN SPIRIT WITH GOOD FRIDAY

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, D major, No. 5 (edited by G. F. Kogel); Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Concerto, F Major, No. 5, for piano; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride." Rudolph Ganz was the pianist. The solo violins in Handel's Concerto were played by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Hoffman; the solo viola, by Mr. Denayer; the solo violoncello by Mr. Bedetti.

There was a triumph of strings in Handel's concerto and in Smetana's overture. Mr. Monteux had confidence in the new members; his confidence was fully justified. It may be said without exaggeration that the present section of second violins is the most capable in the history of the orchestra. Admirable, too, was the work of the other players on stringed instruments. All were severely tested; all acquitted themselves gloriously. The young blood in the orchestra of today is more than a fair exchange for the phlegm of past seasons. The new members and the old were on their mettle.

Now is the time for the trustees to make an energetic, unrelaxing "drive" for the desired endowment. The orchestra, today, is a superb body of players; it will be even a more magnificent institution at the beginning of next season. The great ability of Mr. Monteux as disciplinarian and interpreter is fully recognized. Interest in the "new" orchestra, which contains nearly all the famous players of the past, is at its height. The great public, not only the audiences, should take pride in this orchestra as a civic institution. It should also forbid insidious German propaganda to work its mole-like way in matters of art.

Mr. Monteux has proved that as a program-maker he is far from being a chauvinist; he welcomes music of all nations, provided the music is good.

When one hears a work of Handel played as it was yesterday by soloists and choir, one no longer wonders why Beethoven shortly before his death said of Handel: "He is the master of us all." What freshness, spirit, vitality there is in this old music! The solemn beauty of the Largo, beautifully performed, is Miltonic. There is a grandeur, nobility in the Handelian simplicity that no other composer has attained, not even Bach; not even Palestrina or Vittoria.

The prelude to "Parsifal" was fittingly chosen for a concert on Good Friday. What has been said about the character of the drama—and much has been written in bitter comment by warm admirers of the music itself—has not shaken the belief of those regarding "Parsifal" as a profoundly religious work in its symbolism and its realism. Who would rashly disturb this faith? Who would point out much that is obnoxious, abhorrent in the doctrines that are inculcated? The performance, an impressive one, conducted with rare skill and understanding, was heard as if it were part of a religious service.

We became acquainted with Saint-Saens's concerto 16 years ago, when Mr. Ferruccio—we are tempted to write "Ferocious"—Busoni introduced it, and it made little impression at the time. Yesterday, as it was played by Mr. Ganz and the orchestra, the concerto was engrossing. The thematic material of the first movement no longer seemed almost childish; it reminded one of Mozart's adorable simplicity. Nor is it necessary to say that this material is finely employed. The rhapsodical orientalism, with the use of a Nubian boat song, is fascinating; it does not for a moment degenerate into anything merely bizarre. Saint-Saens here catches the spirit of the East, but he is not mastered by it; he does not lose his shrewdly observing, coolly reflecting western head. Then comes the rushing finale, which, however, does not throw aside in the excitement the traditional French elegance that characterizes the work of Saint-Saens. Mr. Ganz played as Saint-Saens played when he was in his high estate; but with more warmth in the lyric passages. In the bravura and more furious passages he, too, kept his head, ever mindful of clarity and elegance. All in all, a most excellent

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Julius Theodorowicz

RUDOLPH GANZ was born at Zurich, Switzerland, on February 24, 1877. When he was ten years old he appeared in public as a violoncellist. Two years later he played the piano in public. He began to study seriously with his uncle, Carl Eschmann-Dumur, when he was about sixteen. He studied also at Lausanne and Strasbourg, and later with Busoni in Berlin, where he appeared as pianist and composer late in 1899. From 1901 to 1905 he taught in Chicago. Since 1905 he has devoted himself to concert playing, composition, and private teaching. He was heard for the first time in Boston at a Kneisel concert early in 1906; then at a Symphony concert March 24 of that year (Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major). He gave a recital on March 26, 1906, when he introduced pieces by Ravel. Since then he has played in Boston, recitals, chamber concerts, etc. On October 19, 1907, he played at a Symphony concert Liszt's Concerto in A major, and on October 21, 1911, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major. Among his compositions are a symphony, concert piece for piano and orchestra, pieces for piano, also for violin, male choruses, and over a hundred and fifty songs. He played here at a Kneisel Quartet concert on March 14, 1916 (Ravel's Trio in A minor).

HANDEL'S CONCERTO WINS WARM APPLAUSE

Excerpt — Apr. 3, 1920
Wagner, Saint-Saens and
Smetana Also at Symphony

The feature of yesterday's symphony concert turned out to be a remarkably fine performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, for string orchestra, in which the four solo parts were taken by Messrs Theodorowicz and Hoffmann, violins; Mr Denayer, viola, and Mr Bedetti, cello. They thoroughly deserved the applause which compelled them to rise and bow acknowledgement. Each is a virtuoso more admirable than most of the much advertised recital givers.

The number of strings is still somewhat less than the full quota, but the quality of their playing is wholly admirable. The volume of tone is not noticeably less than normal, and its richness and smoothness could hardly be improved upon.

The majestic sonority of Handel's music is the feature of it which always impresses the average listener and performer; yet, as Rolland argues in his life of the composer, its lightness and delicacy are often hardly less striking. Yesterday the fleetness and grace of the presto were as artistically conveyed to the listener, as was the grave and noble dignity of the Largo.

Mr Monteux's interpretation of the prelude to "Parsifal" lacks the massive solidity of Dr Muck's. Monteux makes the rhythm more restless and the motives ejaculatory outbursts. His is romantic Wagner where Muck's was classic in its poised and balanced power.

Rudolph Ganz gave a meticulous performance of the solo part in Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto. His playing suited the music, which is well made without being either dull or deep. The slow movement, with its rather conventionally exotic coloring, and the finale, which probably recalled "jazz" to more than one listener by its clever syncopated rhythms, gave especial pleasure, to judge by the volume of applause.

Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" has long been a show piece with the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday's performance was spirited, but less flawlessly finished than some we have heard in former years. The music begins to show signs of age, as minor masterpieces have a way of doing when the fashions of the generation in which they gained their vogue are outmoded.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. The concerts next week bring a Concertante Symphony by Mozart; the first performance here of Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte"; a revival of Ravel's "Mother Goose" and the first performance at these concerts of dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

205

RUDOLPH GANZ was born at Zurich, Switzerland, on February 24, 1877. When he was ten years old he appeared in public as a violoncellist. Two years later he played the piano in public. He began to study seriously with his uncle, Carl Eschmann-Dumur, when he was about sixteen. He studied also at Lausanne and Strasbourg, and later with Busoni in Berlin, where he appeared as pianist and composer late in 1899. From 1901 to 1905 he taught in Chicago. Since 1905 he has devoted himself to concert playing, composition, and private teaching. He was heard for the first time in Boston at a Kneisel concert early in 1906; then at a Symphony concert March 24 of that year (Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major). He gave a recital on March 26, 1906, when he introduced pieces by Ravel. Since then he has played in Boston, recitals, chamber concerts, etc. On October 19, 1907, he played at a Symphony concert Liszt's Concerto in A major, and on October 21, 1911, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major. Among his compositions are a symphony, concert piece for piano and orchestra, pieces for piano, also for violin, male choruses, and over a hundred and fifty songs. He played here at a Kneisel Quartet concert on March 14, 1916 (Ravel's Trio in A minor).

HANDEL'S CONCERTO WINS WARM APPLAUSE

Esch — Apr. 3, 1920
Wagner, Saint-Saens and
Smetana Also at Symphony

The feature of yesterday's symphony concert turned out to be a remarkably fine performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, for string orchestra, in which the four solo parts were taken by Messrs Theodorowicz and Hoffmann, violins; Mr Denayer, viola, and Mr Bedetti, 'cello. They thoroughly deserved the applause which compelled them to rise and bow acknowledgement. Each is a virtuoso more admirable than most of the much advertised recital givers.

The number of strings is still somewhat less than the full quota, but the quality of their playing is wholly admirable. The volume of tone is not noticeably less than normal, and its richness and smoothness could hardly be improved upon.

The majestic sonority of Handel's music is the feature of it which always impresses the average listener and performer; yet, as Rolland argues in his life of the composer, its lightness and delicacy are often hardly less striking. Yesterday the fleetness and grace of the presto were as artistically conveyed to the listener, as was the grave and noble dignity of the Largo.

Mr Monteux's interpretation of the prelude to "Parsifal" lacks the massive solidity of Dr Muck's. Monteux makes the rhythm more restless and the motives ejaculatory outbursts. His is romantic Wagner where Muck's was classic in its poised and balanced power.

Rudolph Ganz gave a meticulous performance of the solo part in Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto. His playing suited the music, which is well made without being either dull or deep. The slow movement, with its rather conventionally exotic coloring, and the finale, which probably recalled "Jazz" to more than one listener by its clever syncopated rhythms, gave especial pleasure, to judge by the volume of applause.

Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" has long been a show piece with the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday's performance was spirited, but less flawlessly finished than some we have heard in former years. The music begins to show signs of age, as minor masterpieces have a way of doing when the fashions of the generation in which they gained their vogue are outmoded.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. The concerts next week bring a Concertante Symphony by Mozart; the first performance here of Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte"; a revival of Ravel's "Mother Goose" and the first performance at these concerts of dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

291

RUDOLPH GANZ was born at Zurich, Switzerland, on February 24, 1877. When he was ten years old he appeared in public as a violoncellist. Two years later he played the piano in public. He began to study seriously with his uncle, Carl Eschmann-Dumur, when he was about sixteen. He studied also at Lausanne and Strasbourg, and later with Busoni in Berlin, where he appeared as pianist and composer late in 1899. From 1901 to 1905 he taught in Chicago. Since 1905 he has devoted himself to concert playing, composition, and private teaching. He was heard for the first time in Boston at a Kneisel concert early in 1906; then at a Symphony concert March 24 of that year (Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major). He gave a recital on March 26, 1906, when he introduced pieces by Ravel. Since then he has played in Boston, recitals, chamber concerts, etc. On October 19, 1907, he played at a Symphony concert Liszt's Concerto in A major, and on October 21, 1911, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major. Among his compositions are a symphony, concert piece for piano and orchestra, pieces for piano, also for violin, male choruses, and over a hundred and fifty songs. He played here at a Kneisel Quartet concert on March 14, 1916 (Ravel's Trio in A minor).

HANDEL'S CONCERTO WINS WARM APPLAUSE

By Cole — Apr. 3, 1920
Wagner, Saint-Saens and
Smetana Also at Symphony

The feature of yesterday's symphony concert turned out to be a remarkably fine performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, for string orchestra, in which the four solo parts were taken by Messrs Theodorowicz and Hoffmann, violins; Mr Denayer, viola, and Mr Bedetti, cello. They thoroughly deserved the applause which compelled them to rise and bow acknowledgement. Each is a virtuoso more admirable than most of the much advertised recital givers.

The number of strings is still somewhat less than the full quota, but the quality of their playing is wholly admirable. The volume of tone is not noticeably less than normal, and its richness and smoothness could hardly be improved upon.

The majestic sonority of Handel's music is the feature of it which always impresses the average listener and performer; yet, as Rolland argues in his life of the composer, its lightness and delicacy are often hardly less striking. Yesterday the fleetness and grace of the presto were as artistically conveyed to the listener, as was the grave and noble dignity of the Largo.

Mr Monteux's interpretation of the prelude to "Parsifal" lacks the massive solidity of Dr Muck's. Monteux makes the rhythm more restless and the motives ejaculatory outbursts. His is romantic Wagner where Muck's was classic in its poised and balanced power.

Rudolph Ganz gave a meticulous performance of the solo part in Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto. His playing suited the music, which is well made without being either dull or deep. The slow movement, with its rather conventionally exotic coloring, and the finale, which probably recalled "jazz" to more than one listener by its clever syncopated rhythms, gave especial pleasure, to judge by the volume of applause.

Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" has long been a show piece with the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday's performance was spirited, but less flawlessly finished than some we have heard in former years. The music begins to show signs of age, as minor masterpieces have a way of doing when the fashions of the generation in which they gained their vogue are outmoded.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. The concerts next week bring a Concertante Symphony by Mozart; the first performance here of Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte"; a revival of Ravel's "Mother Goose" and the first performance at these concerts of dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

performance by pianist and orchestra. A stirring reading of Smetana's ever-welcome overture, a performance that in its brilliance and speed did not lose in clearness and precision, brought to an end one of the most memorable concerts of the season.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Concertante Symphonie for Violin and Viola (Messrs. Theodorowicz and Denayer); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Raval, "Ma Mere l'Oye," five children's pieces; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor," act II (first time at these concerts).

SYMPHONY REVELS IN VIRTUOSITY

Post — Apr. 3, 1920
Orchestra and Mr.
Ganz Display Great Powers

BY OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was undoubtedly one of the most brilliant of the season. In response, perhaps, to rumors that the Boston Symphony, owing to the strike of certain members, was practically without a string division, the opening number on the programme was Handel's fifth "Concerto grosso," for strings alone, with Messrs. Theodorowicz, concertmaster; J. Hoffmann, second concertmaster; F. Denayer, first viola, and J. Bedetti, first 'cellist, as players of the solo passages. Seldom has the string division of this orchestra been heard to better advantage.

IN PRE-STRIKE FORM

The majestic introduction was played with the most imposing sonority and vibrancy of tone, and the fugue which follows was characterized by the utmost clearness of the parts and the finest rhythmic precision. In the Largo, and the trio of the Menuet, the players showed their skill in cantalena. Solo players and ensemble distinguished themselves. It is not astonishing that Mr. Monteux could accomplish all this with his players, for he is a very serious student of old as well as new music, and was himself, for many years, a viola player of attainments. But it may have served to answer conclusively, the rumor concerning a lack of strings in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra of last week, augmented by some of the recent strikers who have resigned from the musical union, and returned to the symphony, showed its capacities in other performances, for the full band, of Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens piano concerto in F-major, too rarely played, and the sparkling overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," in which the strings had again their opportunity. Rudolph Ganz was the solo pianist.

Both Sublime and Vulgar

Either conditions of the moment were uncommonly propitious, or Mr. Ganz has grown substantially as an artist since last he played in Boston. He brought with him, in addition, an entertaining concerto, which is too little played. This fifth concerto of Saint-Saens has for its material a first movement, which is Saint-Saens in his conventionally glib vein; a second movement which must rank among the most picturesque and warmly imagined passages in his instrumental compositions, and a finale, flashy to the point of vulgarity, which nevertheless affords a marvellous display of virtuosity—if the pianist is equal, as Mr. Ganz was fully equal to the occasion.

The concerto, indeed, is the epitome of certain inconsistencies of matter and style, which students of Saint-Saens' music have often observed. There is the neat dove-tailing of the different portions of the first movement, the clear, polished style, the meaningless decorative quality which says nothing. Then there is the remarkable slow movement, an oriental rhapsody the middle section, of which is built on a Nubian love song heard by Saint-Saens as he went down the Nile in a dahabeeyah. Forthwith the composer paints a perfect picture of the orient, an orient to which he does full justice, leaving an impression so vivid, so beautiful, so genuinely of the east, that you will never forget it. (The editor of the programme book calls attention to the instrumentation of certain passages in this movement as compared with the instrumentation of the Nile music in Verdi's Aida, and there is, indeed, striking similarity.)

In this slow movement the piano and orchestra are on a par. The one instrument is as important and as dramatic in expression as the other. Then what we? We have at first the most irritating music in the world, a theme as vulgar, as showy, as cheap as any that Saint-Saens has produced—fully as cheap, for example, as the theme of the last movement of the B-minor violin concerto. The fun comes in the development of this matter and in subsidiary themes which appear. The music is at times almost savage or barbaric; at other times, as at the beginning, it verges perilously on farce. The composer has his tongue in his cheek, and he wantonly offends our best people.

Mr. Ganz could hardly have improved on his performance. His tone was of the most beautiful quality in singing passages. He had incomparable strength and velocity when required. He entered thoroughly into the spirit of every measure. His playing of the slow movement will linger long in the memory because of its dramatic eloquence, its sensuous appeal.

His performance of the finale was simply breath-taking, for its authority, its sureness and grip, as for the headlong pace of the entire movement. There are many—we are among them—who think the occasion very exceptional when the performance of a soloist does not mar the effect of an orchestral programme, especially when that orchestra is the Boston Symphony. When a virtuoso does appear, he should do so either as the player of a work in which the piano is employed orchestrally, or else as a virtuoso who exhilarates everyone by his personality and the excitement of his playing.

Taking ground yesterday in the latter class, Mr. Ganz added to the pleasure and the thrill of an orchestral concert. It is needless to say that he was repeatedly recalled. So on several occasions was Mr. Monteux and the orchestra itself.

Apr. 3. Music in Boston 3.1920
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twentieth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 2 was as follows:

Handel, Concerto grosso in D major; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, Pianoforte Concerto No. 5, Rudolph Ganz, soloist; Smetana, Overture to the "Sold Bride."

This program, although containing no novelties, was so well selected and arranged, its contrasts were so artfully contrived and well balanced that it refreshed the listener. Handel, too long known only as the composer of the "Messiah," was again revealed to us as the master of pure form and noble melodic outline. How fresh and inspiring this concerto must have sounded to eighteenth century ears accustomed to the operatic trivialities of that day and how fresh and inspiring it sounded yesterday in comparison with the often forced and unnatural musical speech of the present day. It contains great thoughts said with a great and noble simplicity and was so played by Mr. Monteux. The fifth concerto of Saint-Saens is among the few interesting modern compositions for piano and orchestra. The orchestral portion of the work is important but never overshadows the piano part, while this latter never degenerates into a mere display of passage work. The second movement, an oriental rhapsody, is by far the finest of the three, and it is certainly one of the composer's most original inspirations. Its orientalism is not of the often too literal type favored by Rimsky-Korsakoff and other Russians. Its suggestiveness is brought about by the simplest means, much being left to the imagination. This movement was played by Mr. Ganz and the orchestra with the spontaneous abandon of an improvisation. In the past Mr. Ganz has often played with a depressing coldness. Not so on yesterday afternoon, when he played not only with his familiar and accustomed virtuosity (truly remarkable in the final movement), but also with an added grace and delicacy of touch and sentiment altogether satisfactory. Was he not, perhaps, given additional inspiration by the orchestra, which accompanied him with such perfect understanding? The string section of the orchestra, now restored to almost full strength, played Handel's concerto grosso with fine tone and ensemble. Mr. Monteux led throughout the afternoon with his accustomed enthusiasm and the audience and orchestra responded in kind.

Steinway Pianoforte used

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Apr. 3, 1920
THE ORCHESTRA FILLED AND IN FORM AGAIN

A Sufficient and Efficient String Choir
That Praises Mr. Monteux—The Freshness and Bigness of Haendel — More Wagner, and a Moral — Saint-Saëns
Both Elegant and Exotic

SOONER than there was reason to expect, in better quality than there was reason, almost, to hope, Mr. Monteux has filled the chairs in the string choir left vacant by the recent secession from the Symphony Orchestra. Few anticipated the repairing of the gaps before the beginning, next autumn, of a new season. Yet within a month the conductor has restored the band to sufficiency and efficiency. The declimated strings now stand only a little short of full quota; the wood winds and the horns continue virtually intact; the trumpets and the trombones have regained familiar strength. There is no lack, at need, of manipulators for the instruments of percussion. A player upon the tuba is much to be desired, a second harp would be useful; but for most practical purposes, the Symphony Orchestra flourishes again in full numbers. Were it not so, Mr. Monteux would hardly have included Ravel's exacting suite of tonal tales from "Mother Goose" in the concerts of next week or be meditating a repetition of his flaming version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," as yet unheard by the audiences of Saturday. Upon the few programmes remaining he may now set what he will.

The restored orchestra is, moreover, a band of signal quality. No listener to the string choir in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, may plausibly doubt its virtue. At both concerts it was well tested. A Concerto Grosso of Händel—stripped and unsparing music—disclosed its sonority, plasticity and propulsive power, revealed its warmth and sensibility of tone. The Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Parsifal," proved its command of enriching, expressing and dramatizing voice. The Overture to Smetana's folk-opera, "The Bartered Bride," left no doubt of its keenness for pace, rhythm, climax. Since the best days of Dr. Muck, the string choir has not been—especially in the second violins—so full-bodied, warm-blooded and generally sensitive an instrument. Diligently Mr. Monteux has sifted the many applicants and finally chosen well from them. The woodwinds, of course, keep unique quality; the brass, unless the listener questions the sharpness of French trumpets, do their office. Händel's Concerto, intermittent repository piece "at these concerts," has moved in no larger stride, sang in no more erudite voice. The Prelude to "Parsifal" has seldom seemed a more poignant music of anguish, aspiration, compassion, even if in the past it has been woven in more mystical glamours of tone. Smetana's Overture teemed with rhythmic life, snapped with lively modulation and sprightly contrast, needed only a little more burnishing of glint and sparkle. When the Symphony Orchestra plays, there is need no longer to make allowance for adverse conditions. Mr. Monteux's work and the new spirit in all the choirs—and in the audience too—have removed them. And that work the more praises him because he has done it unperturbed and undaunted, with endless pains and unrelaxing standards. Once more the quiet way to meet an emergency is—to meet it.

Both in Cambridge on Thursday and in Boston on Friday pieces and performance highly pleased the audience. Beyond peradventure the average twentieth-century ear hears eighteenth-century music gladly. It may be no more than superficial with Mozart because his infinite grace, flawless felicity and perfect plasticity are almost a sophistication in themselves. The interwoven splendors, the manifold and exhaustless creative passion of Bach may in measure baffle it. A high god, however human his momentary guise, has his remoteness. With Haydn and Händel, however, the listener of 1920 is on firm ground. The simplicity, the directness, the melodious sentiment, the springing vivacities, the transparent artistry and artlessness of Haydn make music in his ear. No less surely and delightedly he answers to the ample periods, the sonorous progress, the ordered and expansive vigors of the Händel of concertos, overtures and orchestral interludes. Every one of us in our hearts loves on occasion a stately, a ceremonious music. Our moderns may feign to write it when the occasion bids and the rules are handy, but by no more than half do they really believe in what they put to paper; whereas with Händel it was self-expression in a stimulating world.

To more sophisticated ears, there is a fascination, besides, in this music of dominant and vitalized line, of relatively naked tonal design. To conscious or unconscious surfeit our listening generation knows the harmonic luxuriance of Wagner, Strauss and their brood; the harmonic sharpness and subtlety of the children of light—and Paris. From Berlioz to Carpenter we have been titillated with timbres in endless gamut of color. Back we go to Händel in such a Concerto as that of yesterday and to! there is only tonal line—yet how ample and supple, how energetic and diverse, striding the air, weaving patterns of sound upon it. These designs are spacious and stately; in large progress they take shape, round themselves; rhythm animates them; contrasts diversify them; sonorously the strands expand, entwine, mount, cumulate; creative power fashions and speeds them: the final impression is of stripped beauty—a music for the mind as well as for the senses. There is color in it also; for Ravel was not the first to set string timbre beside or against string timbre; or to offer the earliest divider of such a choir. Our moderns would be sumptuous or sinuous. For Händel the straightforward magnificence of a grand seigneur who made music as though he were hanging tapestries. No wonder these days hear him gladly.

Unless Mr. Monteux alters pending programmes, with the Prelude to "Parsifal," he ended for the year excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. With reason he has restored them to the active repertory of the Symphony Concerts, wherein music is played to give pleasure and not to minister to prejudice. By many a sign his public hears them eagerly, especially when he is as eloquent with them as he was with this very Prelude, with the Prelude to "Lohengrin" a week ago, the Prelude to "Tristan" upon a Thursday in Cambridge, the final scene of "The Gleaming of the Gods" when Mme. Matzenauer sang with the orchestra. Some, hearing this music, no doubt rejoice inwardly that Wagner happened to be a German composer only forty years removed from our immediate time. Others hearing it, repine and rail outwardly at that same inexorable fact. Meanwhile, ninety-nine out of every hundred listeners are taking not a thought of Wagner's nationality and care not half a pin for him otherwise than as maker of music. Enough that in tones he stirs, illudes, pleasures, transports them; that changeless in his operas dwell a lasting power, an enduring beauty.

The truth is that in concert-hall or opera-house listeners and composers are thorough-going individualists. It is an excellent thing that Mr. Carpenter, for example, happens to be an American and that clear American impulses prompt some of his music; but what would such birth, residence and predilection profit him were he mediocre of imagination and skill? Being French, Debussy is counted among the artistic glories of France, but his music is what he himself out of mind and spirit —and only incidentally out of accidental circumstance—made it. Because Debussy was Debussy, and not because he was a French citizen, is it both unique and universal. So equally with the listener. He may find Mr. Carpenter's music boresome, prefer Dvorák's to it and yet remain 114 per cent American. He may rail at Debussy with the senile fury of Saint-Saëns and still dwell within the union sacrée of French citizenry. As with Debussy, so with Wagner. His music also is unique and universal, not because he was German, but because he was himself. As individually, and with no other sensation, the listener receives a personal pleasure and stimulation. There is no more to be said—unless it be that by like title and as like source of pleasure, the Strauss of "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration" will as surely and speedily return to American concert-rooms.

This same Saint-Saëns, not as querulous raller in print, but as expert artificer in tones provided the fourth piece of the day—his Concerto in F major for piano and orchestra, the Concerto with which he rounded half a century as pianist and that hearers best remember from a singular middle movement. This Andante begins with whirling and acrid measures, not without Oriental dissonances; it calms into a thin, piercing, reiterating Nubian love-song that Saint-Saëns happened to hear upon the Nile. There is more Oriental dissonance; subdued, the wild measures of the beginning return. It is as though the composer had flung into his Concerto a semi-tropical rhapsody, brief and graphic. The rest is the Saint-Saëns of familiar dexterity, who makes a finale sound and glitter and race almost out of nothing, who leads fancy and form hand in hand through a first movement, who is equally happy in crisp "passage-work" to display the pianist and in crystalline melody of cool sentiment. Saint-Saëns elegant, exotic, entertaining—and the Concerto has run its course. Mr. Ganz, not too often heard in Boston, played the solo part, played it—with one reserve—in the very image of the music. Over-much, as it seemed, he urged the pace in the first movement and even in the finale; but otherwise he was as lucid and brittle, as elegant or exotic as Saint-Saëns himself. Music of poetry and passion used sometimes to betray him into hardness and exaggerated stress. In music of artifice, even when he pushes the pace, his poise is pleasure.

H. T. PARKER

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

296
SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

SEVENTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, April 1, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALBERT STOESSEL

VIOLIN

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

20-11
297
WELL ON THE WAY TO NORMAL
COURSE

Trans. — Apr. 2, 1920
The Symphony Orchestra Heard, Nearly
as Usual, in Cambridge—Mr. Stoessel
Plays Brahms's Violin Concerto—Edwin
Hughes, Pianist with Limitations—Mr.
Longy to Disinter Fanelli — The Next
Bach Festival

POSSIBLY the audience at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge, last evening, believed that the orchestra had so far conquered its recent plight as to need no further encouragement to fortitude. There was reason for such notion, inasmuch as the band, sitting upon the stage of Sanders Theatre, seemed as numerous as it ever is on the further bank of the Charles. True, before and after the playing of Brahms's Concerto for violin, there were shiftings enough from chair to chair in the string choir to suggest that it is not yet quite normal when it must undertake, at short notice, a "repertory piece." On the other hand, Mr. Monteux's violins, violas, violoncellos and basses are now in sufficient force and practice to achieve a full-voiced and warm-blooded performance of a striding Concerto Grosso by Händel; while throughout the evening, there was but one obvious slip among the newcomers—not, as it happened in the freshly recruited strings, but in the brass at an entrance in the prelude to "Parsifal." Otherwise all concerned and all that befell seemed quite normal, even to the hearty applause that is the habit of this audience at Cambridge. Perhaps, it could not have swelled its clapping if it would; yet, when the players upon the wind and the brass instruments came to the stage in the pause after Händel's Concerto, much more than the usual ripple of hands greeted them. By so much at least, the listeners remembered recent incidents; while they can take thought of the future as well as the past, if they are minded to write signatures on a slip in the programme-book inviting them to contributions to the endowment fund. Within and without the "university circle," Cambridge would miss these Symphony Concerts, did an untoward fate overtake the orchestra. As it happens, also, under precedent set by Mr. Higginson, it is asked to pay less for them than any other occasional public of the band. No doubt it remembers recent incidents—only, moreover, in its own theatre—but last evening, it seemed to believe that peace and plenty were already reestablished. In a sense they are; but by no means have the secession and the consequences of the secession altogether vanished.

Mr. Monteux took his courage in his hands when he set the string choir to a Concerto by Händel within the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre. Those walls are exceedingly resonant and, as always with eighteenth-century pieces, they disclosed every detail of the music—and also of the playing. Händel himself also wrote nakedly—patterns in tone for the patterns' sake before the days in which lush harmonies may opportunely swathe the composer's design or iridescent intricacies mist it. At every turn conductor and choir met well the test. Neither sonority nor incisiveness evaded them. The violins in particular sounded keen and bright; the violas were by no means the "noiseless tenor" of someone's scornful phrase; the darker strings, oftenest making backgrounds, were full-textured. So played the ample periods of the introduction strode; the patterning of the allegros had pith and point; the slow movement rose in large and flowing curve; the minuet kept its native state; the presto went unhurried and unblurred. By wise choice of pace, Mr. Monteux kept the music to intrinsic dignity; largely he rounded the aspiring phrases; eloquently, as Händel bid, choir answered choir. Ours are the days of pastels and etchings in tones. In these Concerti Grossi, Händel wove tapestries. So the conductor made the music sound. If the flowing finesse of certain ancient music sometimes eludes Mr. Monteux, the contrasting breadths and vigors of a Händel or a Rameau do not.

As resonant were the strings in the succeeding Prelude to "Parsifal," as sharp of accent when Wagner would have his music most anguished, as deep of tone when he answers despair with compassion. As to Händel's Concerto, so is Sanders Theatre to this Prelude—the place above all others hereabouts in which to hear it. For when Wagner in relative old age would write preface and epitome to his final opera, he also put to paper a naked, simplified, concentrated music, distilling and isolating to his purpose his spacious range of means. He strips agony; he unveils mercy; he summons spiritual pomps; he opens celestial vistas. No music that he has written better gains the imagined, the impressive ends. None is freer from tonal rhetoric or mere romantic glamour. As he wrote, Mr. Monteux imparted; in no other fragment of Wagner has he

296
SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

SEVENTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, April 1, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALBERT STOESSEL

VIOLIN

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

20-11
WELL ON THE WAY TO NORMAL
COURSE

Trans. — Apr. 2, 1920
The Symphony Orchestra Heard, Nearly
as Usual, in Cambridge—Mr. Stoessel
Plays Brahms's Violin Concerto—Edwin
Hughes, Pianist with Limitations—Mr.
Longy to Disinter Fanelli — The Next
Bach Festival

POSSIBLY the audience at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge, last evening, believed that the orchestra had so far conquered its recent plight as to need no further encouragement to fortitude. There was reason for such notion, inasmuch as the band, sitting upon the stage of Sanders Theatre, seemed as numerous as it ever is on the further bank of the Charles.
True, before and after the playing of Brahms's Concerto for violin, there were shiftings enough from chair to chair in the string choir to suggest that it is not yet quite normal when it must undertake, at short notice, a "repertory piece." On the other hand, Mr. Monteux's violins, violas, violoncellos and basses are now in sufficient force and practice to achieve a full-voiced and warm-blooded performance of a striding Concerto Grosso by Händel; while throughout the evening, there was but one obvious slip among the newcomers—not, as it happened in the freshly recruited strings, but in the brass at an entrance in the prelude to "Parsifal." Otherwise all concerned and all that befell seemed quite normal, even to the hearty applause that is the habit of this audience at Cambridge. Perhaps, it could not have swelled its clapping if it would; yet, when the players upon the wind and the brass instruments came to the stage in the pause after Händel's Concerto, much more than the usual ripple of hands greeted them. By so much at least, the listeners remembered recent incidents; while they can take thought of the future as well as the past, if they are minded to write signatures on a slip in the programme-book inviting them to contributions to the endowment fund.
Within and without the "university circle," Cambridge would miss these Symphony Concerts, did an untoward fate overtake the orchestra. As it happens, also, under precedent set by Mr. Higginson, it is asked to pay less for them than any other occasional public of the band. No doubt it remembers recent 297 incidents—one, moreover, in its own theatre—but last evening, it seemed to believe that peace and plenty were already reestablished. In a sense they are;

but by no means have the secession and the consequences of the secession altogether vanished.

Mr. Monteux took his courage in his hands when he set the string choir to a Concerto by Händel within the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre. Those walls are exceedingly resonant and, as always with eighteenth-century pieces, they disclosed every detail of the music—and also of the playing. Händel himself also wrote nakedly—patterns in tone for the patterns' sake before the days in which lush harmonies may opportunely swathe the composer's design or iridescent intricacies mist it. At every turn conductor and choir met well the test. Neither sonority nor incisiveness evaded them. The violins in particular sounded keen and bright; the violas were by no means the "noiseless tenor" of someone's scornful phrase; the darker strings, oftenest making backgrounds, were full-textured. So played, the ample periods of the introduction strode; the patterning of the allegros had pith and point; the slow movement rose in large and flowing curve; the minuet kept its native state; the presto went unhurried and unblurred. By wise choice of pace, Mr. Monteux kept the music to intrinsic dignity; largely he rounded the aspiring phrases; eloquently, as Händel bid, choir answered choir. Ours are the days of pastels and etchings in tones. In these Concerti Grossi, Händel wove tapestries. So the conductor made the music sound. If the flowing finesse of certain ancient music sometimes eludes Mr. Monteux, the contrasting breadths and vigors of a Händel or a Rameau do not.

As resonant were the strings in the succeeding Prelude to "Parsifal," as sharp of accent when Wagner would have his music most anguished, as deep of tone when he answers despair with compassion. As to Händel's Concerto, so is Sanders Theatre to this Prelude—the place above all others hereabouts in which to hear it. For when Wagner in relative old age would write preface and epitome to his final opera, he also put to paper a naked, simplified, concentrated music, distilling and isolating to his purpose his spacious range of means. He strips agony;
he unveils mercy; he summons spiritual pomps; he opens celestial vistas. No music that he has written better gains the imagined, the impressive ends. None is freer from tonal rhetoric or mere romantic glamour. As he wrote, Mr. Monteux imparted; in no other fragment of Wagner has he 298

been so eloquent; few heard without emotion. Last for one more test of the strings, the whipping rhythms, the whirling under-voices, the racing pace, the bright glints of Smetana's overture to his Czech opera, "The Bartered Bride." Again they and the music fared well—if not quite to the perfection that haunts virtuosos conductors.

Between the two Preludes stood Brahms's Concerto for violin with Albert Stoessel to play the solo-part. Boston knew him first as youthful and able violinist driven by the war from studies in Berlin. Then he vanished into the St. Louis Orchestra and thereafter into the American Expeditionary Force. Now he has returned ripened—perhaps the more for war-time experiences. His tone is deeper, smoother, richer and at need more incisive. His intelligence reads the music in hand clearly—even when contours are as intricate and contents as abstruse as Brahms in this Concerto chose to make them. Securely he played it—with the mingling of confidence and of warmth that is justice to Brahms's voice and style. He caught the nervous energy, the opening vistas of the first movement, the dusky beauty of the adagio, the tempered vigors of the finale. Once more the Concerto—spacious, poised, close knit, at once reflective and expansive—sounded as a man's music for men; while man-fashion Mr. Stoessel played it.
H. T. P.

Items and Incidents Trans. Apr. 5/20

The seceders from the Symphony Orchestra drew only a few hundred listeners to their concert in the Colonial Theatre last evening—for the most part, as the applause seemed to indicate, the "personal following" of Mr. Fradkin. The seceders were variously reinforced into a workable orchestra; Mr. Mollenhauer led it; the violinist played several numbers. There was every effort to keep up appearances, but the atmosphere of the occasion was cheerless. Scarcely one of the anticipations of the seceders has been fulfilled. The Symphony Concerts go their way better supported than they have been for several years; the orchestra has been already restored to sufficient numbers, with every sign that by autumn the ranks will be full again. Nobody has come or is likely to come to the rescue of the seceders. Even their fellow-unionists show little interest in them. Their only recourse now seems either return to the orchestra, for as many as it may receive again, or search for jobs elsewhere. Even these, the seceders are discovering, are not too many.

ORCHESTRA AND UNION

To the Editor of the Boston Herald:

For 20 years prior to 1911 the writer, as the most active trustee of the Chicago (Theodore Thomas) orchestra, was confronted with the problem of art vs. trades-unionism that now presents itself in acute form to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Carl E. Gardner—one of the recently unionized musicians of the latter—in a letter printed in last Sunday's Herald—so frankly voices the perfectly selfish motive underlying what is euphemistically called "collective bargaining," as to deserve more than passing notice. May I review the situation in the light of past experience, in your valued columns?

The Boston Orchestra, as every one knows, is a great art institution, supported at heavy cost for many years by Maj. Higginson and his successors, not for profit but for the sake of better music than is consistent with profit. They have privately and unostentatiously made up from year to year the heavy deficits created by paying salaries high enough and for a season long enough to secure the best musicians in the world, using most of their time in rehearsals that bring perfection but no money. The very limited Boston public, say 10,000 persons, that appreciate such music—a number exceeded nowhere in the world, save perhaps in New York—has slowly been educated upwards, at the expense of the generous gentlemen referred to, to a scale of box-office prices still moderate in comparison with those of so-called high-grade "amusements" conducted for profit—that is, whose personnel give most of their time to pay performance, and little to preparation. Neither Boston nor any other city anywhere, to my knowledge, has yet developed an audience of connoisseurs that value symphonic concerts, large enough, rich enough and devoted enough to pay, rather than lose them, such box-office prices as to make them self-supporting.

Without knowing details, I conjecture that, after the strain of war conditions and antagonism to Dr. Muck, and consequent reorganization, the trustees hesitate to raise box-office prices to well-to-do patrons; and are still more reluctant to raise them to those poorer but not less ardent music lovers, who wait patiently in line on Huntington avenue for the low-priced gallery seats. I cannot doubt that the trustees have well understood that rising cost of living would force the musicians to ask higher salaries; and have looked forward with a sigh, but with unshaken determination to "carry on," to an increasing deficit—to be borne by themselves and their associates, or in part distributed over box-office prices, to such extent as the public would bear. Substantially the same situation exists in all other cities that support Symphony Orchestras.

Turning now to the musicians, those of the great American orchestras, especially of Boston and Chicago, are the aristocrats of their profession; drawing the highest pay, for the most congenial work, under the most dignified and agreeable conditions. The Boston Orchestra, alone among the great orchestras, has been for many years strictly "non-union." That fact practically shuts its members out of playing other engagements; since union musicians (who fill most theatres and other orchestras) may not play with non-union men. The other symphony orchestras, all of whose men are unionized, give six or seven months' engagements; after which the men pick up summer and other jobs where they can, to make out a year's income—the bulk of which must come from the concert season. Most of them earn something also teaching, in off hours. The Boston Orchestra, to make up for summer jobs not open to non-union men, pays its men the whole year round; playing Pop and other engagements for that purpose. This steady work during the year, and the pleasure and prestige of membership in so famous an organization, makes it highly attractive to ambitious young artists at home and abroad.

It is and long will be necessary to seek abroad as well as at home for players of the attainments required by the Boston and one or two other of the great American Orchestras. Even the world supply of such men is limited; and the United States are particularly handicapped by one of organized-labor's ingenious procurements—the United States contract-labor law—which forbids an immigrant who contracts to come over the practice of his vocation until six months after his arrival in this country. This constitutes the little joker in Mr. Carl Gardner's letter in Sunday's Herald, where he camouflages "a 100 per cent. American movement"—which is, that American art, like American industry, must put up with such talent, good, bad or indifferent, as American organized-labor chooses to permit amongst us. Though able and willing to pay for the best, America must go without, for the benefit of the second, or third, or tenth best; just as it has of late gone without sugar, bought away from us by countries far less able to pay for it, because Congress for somebody's benefit blocked the course of trade.

Very naturally, organized labor, just as it was bound to unionize the Steel Corporation, has long been determined to unionize the Boston Orchestra, which had quietly gone its own free way to perhaps the greatest perfection in its chosen field attained anywhere. Recent rise in costs of living.

recent changes in direction and control, recent difficulty in adjusting income to outgo, have at last given the union organizers an opening. I imagine that the musicians have yielded to the standard argument of the organizers, which is always the same: "Here is a great business in full swing, with money taken in advance for concerts yet to be given. All you boys have to do is to join the union, stand together, and be ready to quit, all at once, and you have these trustees where you want them. You can rely on experienced leaders, backed by all the musicians in the United States to keep everybody away from this job. It is yours; and no one has any right to take it away from you. You can fix your own salaries, and if you don't like the conductor, or anybody or anything else you can fix that to suit yourselves also. The guarantors and most of the season subscribers are rich people, who have been exploiting you right along. It is all right to hold them up for a thousand a year for each man. You owe nobody any gratitude or loyalty except yourselves. This talk of art is all bunk; what you want is money. Be men; and have something to say about your own job."

Well—"Labor" can lead the Boston horse to water, as the proverb says; but can it make her drink? Mr. Carl Gardner thinks it can, and some Boston policemen thought so—once; but the writer sincerely hopes and believes that that able animal will refuse a beverage containing even so little as one-half per cent. of the wood-alcohol of coercion and monopoly. Speaking of beverages, a sort of Boston (Symphony) Tea Party seems to him in order.

The trustees—like Major Higginson before them—are doing a great and purely altruistic thing, in maintaining an orchestra and musical standards of extraordinary perfection. They could not do so without offering the highest salaries and best conditions to the best men, in competition with other employers. That they did; and that both pay and conditions have been satisfactory to first rank men, their presence and work in the orchestra abundantly prove. It may further be taken for granted that, as men of heart and judgment, and constancy of purpose, the trustees will continue to offer such pay and conditions as will hereafter secure competent musicians, in competition with all other engagements. There need be no fear that they cannot get them! Though fine musicians are few, and first rank conductors still fewer, great orchestras, and such engagements as Boston offers—which are absolutely unique—are fewest of all. The trustees need be governed only by the law of supply and demand.

That law is also the best friend of the

aries will be in the na-
They are regarded as a
the embarrassment that ence creates. For exam-
r's friends claim that he de a showing in New had not been restrained
y the regard he has had abinet member, for Mr.
wn intentions.
son is a ghost that must eratic leaders until they tions, much more so is

n issue has now passed
rbal exchange of achro-etween Mr. Bryan on the

34. Prussia led Austria upon Denmark which seizure of Schlesvig-
1866 Prussia attacked
er successful war an-
-Holstein, promising to
s in Schlesvig to decide by plebiscite, but never promise.

ade

esperous

sitions of Prussia and
e wars of conquest are foundations of the eco-ent of Germany. The pper Silesia and in the taken in Lorraine, the ons of Posen, the port
he control of the com-istula, have served to
with the opportunity to
into a great industrial her population was no
of France, in 1914 it
as great.

expansion was explica-stolen property. If essed the Sarre and
if Poland still kept
in which Poles pre-
Germany would be de-
ly those raw materials,
e coal, which were in sponsible for her great

Great expansion was ace rapid growth of that duced the war. For their supreme duty

ained that it entitled ases, they heir neigh-ulation had ew territoey marked
and French
ssibility of Polish hopes

d them into
h. Become ay of necescommerce,
vastly more they cong deficit in r-increasing
British colo-
e mastery of
For it was sh power to xchanges, if

e an overs manufact-
n markets,
et its come territorial g demands inued to in-
But only
ssia before y despoiled
a and Den-was she able nle develop-

RK
IN

emocr in the

flows all other
t heart of the n between the
g branches of

As been going me direction of
now of prestige
House has come Wilson's war
ment the dans White House
oy events vivid

ss.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

CONCERTANTE SYMPHONIE for Violin and
Viola, (Köchel No. 364)

I. Allegro maestoso
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin Solo: J. THEODOROWICZ
Viola Solo: F. DENAYER

DUKAS,

OVERTURE to Corneille's Tragedy, "Polyeucte"
[First time at these Concerts]

RAVEL,

FIVE CHILDREN'S PIECES, "Ma Mère l'Oye,"
("Mother Goose")

I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant, (Pavane of Sleeping Beauty)
II. Petit Poucet, (Hop o' my Thumb)
III. Laidronnette, Impératrice des Pagodes. (Laidronnette,
Empress of the Pagodas)
IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle and de la Bête. (Beauty and the Beast Converse)
V. Le Jardin Féérique. (The Fairy Garden)

BORODIN,

POLOVTSKIAN DANCES, from the Opera "Prince
Igor"
(First time at these Concerts.)

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Mozart's Concertante recent changes in direction and control, recent difficulty in adjusting income to outgo, have at last given the union organizers an opening. I imagine that the musicians have yielded to the standard argument of the organizers, which is always the same: "Here is a great business in full swing, with money taken in advance for concerts yet to be given. All you boys have to do is to join the union, stand together, and be ready to quit, all at once, and you have these trustees where you want them. You can rely on experienced leaders, backed by all the musicians in the United States to keep everybody away from this job. It is yours; and no one has any right to take it away from you. You can fix your own salaries, and if you don't like the conductor, or anybody or anything else you can fix that to suit yourselves also. The guarantors and most of the season subscribers are rich people, who have been exploiting you right along. It is all right to hold them up for a thousand a year for each man. You owe nobody any gratitude or loyalty except yourselves. This talk of art is all bunk; what you want is money. Be men; and have something to say about your own job."

Well—"Labor" can lead the Boston horse to water, as the proverb says; but can it make her drink? Mr. Carl Gardner thinks it can, and some Boston policemen thought so—once; but the writer sincerely hopes and believes that that able animal will refuse a beverage containing even so little as one-half per cent. of the wood-alcohol of coercion and monopoly. Speaking of beverages, a sort of Boston (Symphony) Tea Party seems to him in order.

The trustees—like Major Higginson before them—are doing a great and purely altruistic thing, in maintaining an orchestra and musical standards of extraordinary perfection. They could not do so without offering the highest salaries and best conditions to the best men, in competition with other employers. That they did; and that both pay and conditions have been satisfactory to first rank men, their presence and work in the orchestra abundantly prove. It may further be taken for granted that, as men of heart and judgment, and constancy of purpose, the trustees will continue to offer such pay and conditions as will hereafter secure competent musicians, in competition with all other engagements. There need be no fear that they cannot get them! Though fine musicians are few, and first rank conductors still fewer, great orchestras, and such engagements as Boston offers—which are absolutely unique—are fewest of all. The trustees need be governed only by the law of supply and demand.

That law is also the best friend of the

aries will be in the na-
They are regarded as a
the embarrassment that ence creates. For exam-
r's friends claim that he de a showing in New
had not been restrained
y the regard he has had
abinet member, for Mr.
vn intentions.

son is a ghost that must eratic leaders until they
tions, much more so is

n issue has now passed
rbal exchange of achro-etween Mr. Bryan on the

4, Prussia led Austria
upon Denmark which seizure of Schlesvig-
1866 Prussia attacked
er successful war an-
-Holstein, promising to
s in Schlesvig to decide
by plebiscite, but never promise.

ade

esperous

sitions of Prussia and
e wars of conquest are undations of the eco-nt of Germany. The per Silesia and in the taken in Lorraine, the ns of Posen, the port be control of the comstula, have served to
with the opportunity to
into a great industrial
her population was no
of France, in 1914 it
as great.

expansion was explicstolen property. If essed the Sarre and
if Poland still kept
in which Poles pre-
Germany would be de-
those raw materials, coal, which were in sponsible for her great

reat expansion was ace rapid growth of that duced the war. For

ained that it entitled ases, they their neigh-lation had ew territoey marked
and French possibility of Polish hopes

d them into
sh. Become ey of neces-
commerce,
vastly more they cong deficit in r-increasing
British colo-
e mastery of
For it was ish power to xchanges, if

e an overs manufact-
n markets,
et its come territorial ng demands nued to in-
t. But only
ssia before
y despoiled
a and Den-was she able mic develop-

RK
IN

emocr
in the

flows all other
t heart of the n between the
g branches of
F
As been going me direction of ow of prestige
louse has come
F Wilson's war
nent the dans White House
ry events vivid tiss.

s dominate the
their supreme duty

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

CONCERTANTE SYMPHONIE for Violin and
Viola, (Köchel No. 364)

I. Allegro maestoso
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin Solo: J. THEODOROWICZ
Viola Solo: F. DENAYER

DUKAS,

OVERTURE to Corneille's Tragedy, "Polyeucte"
[First time at these Concerts]

RAVEL,

FIVE CHILDREN'S PIECES, "Ma Mère l'Oye,"
("Mother Goose")

I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant, (Pavane of Sleeping Beauty)
II. Petit Poucet, (Hop o' my Thumb)
III. Laidronnette, Impératrice des Pagodes. (Laidronnette,
Empress of the Pagodas)
IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle and de la Bête. (Beauty and
the Beast Converse)
V. Le Jardin Féérique. (The Fairy Garden)

BORODIN,

POLOVTSKIAN DANCES, from the Opera "Prince
Igor"
(First time at these Concerts.)

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Mozart's Concertante recent changes in control, recent difficulties come to outgo, the union organizers define that the music to the standard organizers, which is "Here is a great swing, with money for concerts yet the boys have to do it stand together, and at once, and you where you want it on experienced leaders the musicians in it keep everybody away is yours; and no one take it away from your own salaries like the conductor, thing else you can yourselves also. most of the season people, who have right along. It them up for a each man. You of tude or loyalty extend talk of art is all is money. Be in thing to say about

Well—"Labor" horse to water, as can it make her dancer thinks it can, licemen thought writer sincerely he that able animal containing even per cent. of the cion and monopol erages, a sort of Tea Party seems

The trustees—before them—are purely altruistic an orchestra and extraordinary per not do so without salaries and best men, in competitors. That they d and conditions he to first rank men work in the orchestra. It may further that, as men of and constancy of will continue to conditions as will competent musicians, all other engaged no fear that th Though fine music first rank conduct orchestras, and Boston offers—unique—are few need be governed supply and demand That law is also musicians. Already, says Mr. Carl Gardner, the scouts for other orchestras are bidding for the Boston players. The famous orchestras were always gateways for young musicians to preferment in the minor ones—mere stepping stones in their careers; and so it should be. It is distinctly against their true interest that the unions should warn all union men away from the Boston job. Every good musician should be free to go after every good job in his own good time. As a matter of fact, good musicians have nothing to gain, while good art and orchestras have everything to lose, by establishing the "closed shop." Nothing is so deadly to art and ideality as the frank and brutal selfishness of trades unionism. Nothing so quickly kills that individual vitality, that elastic and instantly responsive ensemble, that are of the essence of perfection in orchestral work, as the union gospel that a man's job depends on his readiness to strike—not work; upon obedience to the whistle of the walking delegate—not the baton of the conductor.

I speak by the card; for during all my time with the Chicago Orchestra, it was constantly pulling against the drag of the local union; also Mr. Fradkin bears public witness today to the discord that has entered the Boston Orchestra, with the union, after years of harmony without it. Theodore Thomas originally unionized his orchestra—which we took over bodily—for the sole reason that it was a point of honor with him always to play music exactly as it was scored; never substituting one instrument in default of another. Travelling as he so often did in the South and West, far from where good musicians then grew, it was vital to him to be able in case of sickness or accident to pick up the best local musician to be found—union or not—who could take an empty chair on short notice. Thomas himself joined the union, and made his men do so; but he had a distinct understanding with its leaders that he would quit, and take his men with him en-masse, and never again employ a union man, the moment that the union should meddle with wages, discipline or personnel of his organization, or should attempt to prevent his sending abroad for a competent man, if unable to find one here at home. On one occasion he actually enjoined the union in the New York courts from ordering his men to break their contracts; after which they wisely let him alone.

Thomas had been a working musician. No man better loved and understood musicians than he did, or did more for his men; and when he died they knelt and prayed by his coffin with tears streaming down their faces. But he often said to me of them: "Musicians are not reasoning men; they are complained that development entitled increases, they upon their neighbors of population had that new territory and they marked Sgian and French in the possibility of ion of Polish hopes Poland. n pushed them into e British. Become tion, they of neces- foreign commerce, reduce vastly more s than they con- growing deficit in ith ever-increasing mense British colo- complete mastery of h fleet. For it was in British power to rcial exchanges, if became an over- on its manufact- foreign markets, o protect its com- ing more territorial growing demands ch continued to in- bounds. But only and Prussia before cessfully despoiled Austria and Den- vances was she able economic develop-

DARK CE IN

Democr s in the

ershadows all other to the heart of the relation between the slative branches of ver has been going s in the direction of This flow of prestige hite House has come sident Wilson's war ne moment the dan- n the White House rent by events vivid lousness.

who dominate the their supreme duty

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

CONCERTANTE SYMPHONIE for Violin and Viola, (Köchel No. 364)

- I. Allegro maestoso
- II. Andante
- III. Presto

Violin Solo: J. THEODOROWICZ
Viola Solo: F. DENAYER

DUKAS,

OVERTURE to Corneille's Tragedy, "Polyeucte"
[First time at these Concerts]

RAVEL,

FIVE CHILDREN'S PIECES, "Ma Mère l'Oye," ("Mother Goose")

- I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant, (Pavane of Sleeping Beauty)
- II. Petit Poucet, (Hop o' my Thumb)
- III. Laideronnette, Impératrice des Pagodes. (Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas)
- IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle and de la Bête. (Beauty and the Beast Converse)
- V. Le Jardin Féérique. (The Fairy Garden)

BORODIN,

POLOVTSKIAN DANCES, from the Opera "Prince Igor"
(First time at these Concerts.)

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Mozart's Concertante recent changes in trol, recent difficu come to outgo, ha union organizers a ine that the mus to the standard a ganizers, which is

"Here is a great swing, with money for concerts yet to boys have to do i stand together, and
at once, and you where you want t on experienced lea
the musicians in t
keep everybody aw is yours; and no c take it away from your own salaries
like the conductor;
thing else you c
yourselves also.
most of the season
people, who have right along. It them up for a t each man. You o
tude or loyalty ex talk of art is all is money. Be m thing to say abou
Well—"Labor" horse to water, as can it make her d
ner thinks it can,
licemen thought writer sincerely he that able animal containing even per cent. of the cion and monopol
erages, a sort of Tea Party seems
The trustees—li before them—are purely altruistic an orchestra and extraordinary per not do so without salaries and best men, in competit
ers. That they d and conditions ha to first rank me work in the orche
It may further that, as men of
and constancy of will continue to o ditions as will b
petent musicians,
all other engagen
no fear that th
Though fine mu
first rank conduc orchestras, and Boston offers—w unique—are fewe need be govern supply and deman
That law is also musicians. Already,

Gardner, the scouts for are bidding for the Bos famous orchestras we ways for young musi ment in the minor one stones in their careers;
be. It is distinctly ap interest that the unions union men away from Every good musician go after every good job time. As a matter of cians have nothing to art and orchestras ha lose, by establishing th Nothing is so deadly to as the frank and brut trades unionism. No kills that individual vi and instantly responsiv are of the essence of orchestral work, as t that a man's job deper ness to strike—not wor to the whistle of the w not the baton of the co
I speak by the card;
time with the Chicago constantly pulling aga the local union; also M public witness today to has entered the Boston
the union, after years out it. Theodore T unionized his orchestra
over bodily—for the so was a point of honor to play music exactly never substituting one fault of another. Tra often did in the Sout from where good musi it was vital to him to
of sickness or acciden best local musician to or not—who could tak on short notice. Thon
the union, and made
he had a distinct un its leaders that he wo his men with him en again employ a union that the union shou wages, discipline or organization, or shoul vent his sending abroa man, if unable to find
On one occasion he
the union in the New ordering his men to tracts; after which th alone.
Thomas had been a
No man better loved musicians than he did his men; and when and prayed by his streaming down their said to me of th
are not reasoning

rather emotional children. Personal consideration, absolute justice, no favoritism, firm discipline, are vital for maintaining their morale; indulgence spoils them." How often has experience proved his words!
It does not appear from the newspapers whether the Symphony men propose to strike at once, or to finish the season according to their contracts. If the latter, they are entirely within their rights in quitting individually or collectively, if in their judgment it will further their several interests. Collective action, however, either immediate or at the end of the season, will be nothing more or less than the stereotyped "hold-up game" played by every trades-union, intended to force the trustees to add a flat $1000 to every man's annual salary, or else begin all over again to build a great orchestra. If undertaken, it will be a particularly stupid and condemnable attempt at such a hold-up: first, because undeserved, and second, because unnecessary. Not only have the men always enjoyed large pay and high consideration at the expense of a few devoted workers for that art which every good musician really loves; but they have always been protected, and still are, in their fortunate positions by that same law of supply and demand which alone created them. Trades unions found no orchestras! If the musicians were "reasoning men" instead of "emotional children," they would recognize that fact, respond to the generosity of the Bostonians who have through long years and at great cost made life pleasant for them, and stand by the famous institution which Mr. Carl Gardner says their selfish union is sure so gaily to destroy.
Well—destructive coercion must be squarely met, in art as in industry, by constructive resistance. The writer, as a subscriber to the Symphony concerts, would respectfully urge the trustees to offer the musicians only such salary and conditions, free from all compulsion, as they see their way to provide. Should the men strike, he would likewise urge all season subscribers to back up the trustees, by accepting immediate termination of the present season, waiving reimbursement for concerts not given, and after that by supporting the orchestra during two or three years of reconstruction of its personnel, should it take that long.
As Gov. Coolidge might say: "Have faith in Boston—and the law of supply and demand."
Other cities would be likely to follow
Boston in thus freeing, as in originally establishing, their Symphony Orchestras. They must recognize also that art and trades unionism have nothing in common, as the unions are now constituted CHARLES NORMAN FAY,
Cambridge, March 3.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

CONCERTANTE SYMPHONIE for Violin and
Viola, (Köchel No. 364)

- I. Allegro maestoso
- II. Andante
- III. Presto

Violin Solo: J. THEODOROWICZ
Viola Solo: F. DENAYER

DUKAS,

OVERTURE to Corneille's Tragedy, "Polyeucte"
[First time at these Concerts]

RAVEL,

FIVE CHILDREN'S PIECES, "Ma Mère l'Oye,"
("Mother Goose")

- I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant, (Pavane of Sleeping Beauty)
- II. Petit Poucet, (Hop o' my Thumb)
- III. Laideronnette, Impératrice des Pagodes. (Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas)
- IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle and de la Bête. (Beauty and
the Beast Converse)
- V. Le Jardin Féerique. (The Fairy Garden)

BORODIN,

POLOVTSKIAN DANCES, from the Opera "Prince
Igor"
(First time at these Concerts.)

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Mozart's Concertante

21ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Apr. 10, 1920
Wide Range of Program Suggests Varied Moods
and Memories

PIECES FROM DUKAS, MOZART AND RAVEL

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Concertante Symphonie, for violin and viola (Mr. Theodorowicz, violin; Mr. Denayer, viola); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor" (first time at these concerts).

Little is known about the origin of Mozart's composition. It is not known when or for whom it was written—when it was first performed. The original manuscript is probably not in existence. There was a performance of the first movement at a Symphony concert in 1892, when Mr. Loeffler played the violin and Mr. Kniesel the viola. The whole work was performed about five years ago, with Messrs. Witek and Ferrir violin and viola. The form is conventional, but the movements are of a broader nature, more developed than was customary at the time. The work can hardly be classed among the more important compositions of Mozart, yet it is clearly Mozartian, especially by the peculiar melancholy that characterizes the greater part of the andante. We say peculiar, for several composers were melancholy, each in his individual way; each one differed from the others, as the stars, we are told, differ in glory. The melancholy of Mozart is unlike that of Schubert, but the two never whined, while Brahms and Tschalkowsky in doleful dumps were peculiarly hopeless. Brahms was inclined to whine and his melancholy was pessimistic. Tschalkowsky would now sigh like a furnace, now shriek in his despair. The melancholy of Mozart is more like the melancholy of the painter Watteau. The thought that life is fleeting, that beauty fades, inspired them to deeds of beauty. Mozart was of the 18th century and in that century passion in art, as we understand passion, was not admitted.

As the music was played yesterday by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Denayer, it gave the audience pleasure; yet we should not like to hear this work once a year. The form and the expression are foreign to this generation.

Dukas's overture was played at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, 10 years ago. It is for Corneille's tragedy, on which operas have been based: Among them Donizetti's "Polluto" and Gounod's "Polyeucte." The latter failed; the former had more success; a duet of religious fervor in the last act often served in the fifties and sixties as a galop for profane dancers. The overture is hardly as austere as Corneille's tragedy, but it is by no means theatrical, as sometimes happens when a Frenchman writes music for a play by Racine or Corneille: witness Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Dukas's spirit is distinctly modern; there is no suggestion of Gluck; but this music is not feverish, and it is not without dignity. There are impressive pages: Among them the introduction, the music that might justly be associated with Pauline, and the quiet, serene apotheosis. The allegro sections, possibly referring to the conflict of two faiths, and the struggle between love and duty, are not so effective.

It was a pleasure to hear Ravel's "Mother Goose" again; to note the exquisite results derived from economy of means, also from the judicious and unerring employment of the modern full orchestra. There are touches of the humor that runs at full speed in the opera, "The Spanish Hour"; as in the fourth movement, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast." Charming, too, is the frequent suggestion of old modes and ancient cadences. In this music, when a wind instrument is at work, it has its own speech; it is not there merely to double another instrument, to fill in, to assist in a din. Ravel is too refined for such misuse; but he is not super-remmed, as are some of his young imitators. He is the one composer to write a "unanimous" overture for the orchestra of ivory instruments that Jules Laforgue heard at the court of Herod before Salome bored the ambassadors by her profound essay on metaphysics.

In strong contrast with this delightful music was the splendid savagery of the dances from Borodin's opera. It is said that Rimsky-Korsakoff sandpapered the rough splendor of Moussorgsky's "Boris." The orchestration of Borodin's dances is wholly his; he emphasized the alternate oriental languor and ferocity. Nor does this music lose too much by its transference to the concert stage. In the concert hall, the attention is not distracted; the eye does not insist on the muffling of the ear.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio"—and concert No. 3 for piano (Alfred Cortot, pianist); Debussy, Fantasy for piano (Mr. Cortot)—first time in America; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Introduction and March from "The Golden Cockerel" (first time at these concerts).

NOVELTIES ON LIST BY SYMPHONY

Admirable Playing by Soloists From the Ranks

Post — Apr. 10, 1920
BY OLIN DOWNES

Echoes of the "strike" of certain players having receded in the distance and the Boston Symphony Orchestra assuming more and more nearly its proportions previous to that event, the concert of yesterday afternoon passed without sensations of a kind other than musical. Mr. Monteux was greeted with customary cordiality by the audience, but without the prolonged salute with which his hearers had shown their sympathy on a previous occasion. The orchestra gave performances with very nearly its full quota of players, including a new bass tuba player, so large that his gigantic instrument seemed almost small in his hands. The audience settled itself, forgetting the recent tempest in the teapot, to its wonted enjoyment of orchestral music.

SOLOISTS FROM ORCHESTRA

The programme opened with Mozart's Symphonie Concertante (Kochel No. 364) for violin and viola and orchestra. The violinist was Mr. Theodorowitz, the concertmaster, and the viola player the first violist, Mr. Denayer. This fluent, melodious work is genuinely in the manner of a symphony rather than a display piece for two soloists accompanied by an orchestra. It is more than fluent. It is of inspired craftsmanship. Even when Mozart does a routine job it has seldom the character of something laboriously, perfunctorily ground out. Rather the different themes and their development seem to be dovetailed together with almost miraculous ease; the form has the quality of predestination.

Therefore the first movement of this double concerto in the symphonic manner is beautiful and diverting, and the slow movement melodious, deeper and in every way finer music, while the finale seems somewhat conventional in its jollity. What seems strange is that Mozart, a man of dramatic temperament, of imagination when he wrote for orchestral instruments, should not have given to the viola and the violin more sharply individualized parts. The instruments play in unison or octave, in parallel consonant intervals, or they imitate each other precisely, first the violin playing a figure, then the viola, or vice versa, and sometimes with incongruous effects, for the nature of the two instruments is so very different, one from the other.

Brilliantly Played

This work was played brilliantly and in excellent style by the two soloists, and the orchestra collaborated in a manner equally fortunate. The music itself does not rank among Mozart's most important achievements.

Dukas' overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte"; Ravel's orchestral version of his five children's pieces, "Mother Goose," and the Polovskian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," completed this programme. Dukas' overture is in dignified and tragic vein, with more than a hint of the classic mood, while, on the other hand, there seems little melodic originality and more than a distant relation to certain orchestral tricks of Richard Wagner.

Ravel's Music Fascinating

Ravel's music becomes more fascinating with each hearing. The atmosphere throughout is that of fairy legend. The instrumental effects are of the most exquisite. In his musical invention Ravel may not be counted, perhaps, among the greatest composers of the modern period, but what modern composer can point to such an extraordinary variety and perfection of output? Consider these "Mother Goose" pieces, the string quartet, the "Spanish Rhapsody" for orchestra, the "Three Poems," after Stephen Mallarme; the one-act opera, "L'Heure Espagnole." Each one is completely different from the other and complete in its kind, yet at the same time each is stamped with the supreme mastery of means, the intellectual personality of its curiously gifted author. But the audience was not analyzing nor comparing one work of Ravel to the other as it listened yesterday. It was enjoying music of a bewitching grace, imagination, tenderness and humor—as in the movement, "The Conversation of Beauty and the Beast," wherein the motive of the Beauty has a sly reference to the opening phrase of Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," and the music of the Beast is an extremely clever take-off of the "Gymnopédies" of Eric Satie, to whom both Debussy and Ravel have confessed indebtedness. Mr. Monteux's performance was most sympathetic, which was true of all the rest of the programme.

Borodin's Savage Dances

As a foil to this—the classicism of Mozart, the modernity and refinement of the modern French music—came Borodin's savage, barbaric dances—music to make the blood boil; primitive, eastern music, made of sighing phrases which alternate with whirling, clashing, primitive dance rhythms. And yet, with all its sensuousness and its headlong fury, this series of dances is written with the hand of a master who does not lose sight for an instant of his purpose. There are admirable development, masterly orchestration and the closest relation between all of the dances and the initial song of the instruments.

These dances are, in fact, free variation of the theme, and miracles of force, passion, genius. Of these dances, barring a detail or two, there was a superb performance.

SYMPHONY CONCERT Trans. — Apr. 10, 1920 TRANQUIL PLEASURES FILL AN AFTERNOON

Agreeable Sense of Emergency Passed and Conquered—Amiable and Characteristic Mozart—Ravel in Sophisticated Simplicity—Contrasting Pieces from Dukas, Christian and Borodin Pagan—The Orchestra Works Ably

TRANQUILLITY has returned to the Symphony Concerts. For the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the zest of anxieties over the secession and real or imaginary consequences thereof has nearly vanished. The seceders have descended below the horizon, and there remains only an afterglow of speculation. Who of them wish to return to the orchestra? How many of them will be so reinstated? Where are the banished rest likely to find refuge? Gossip is plentiful, but now it is amused and inquisitive where once it was turbid and apprehensive. On the stage sits a re-filled orchestra, sufficient for any task Mr. Monteux may lay upon it. There are newcomers in it; remembered faces returned; familiar figures in unfamiliar place. The band, partially reorganized for the second time in two seasons, and beneficially cleared by the secession of sundry "deadwood," does its work well. As obviously it will do it better as it becomes more accustomed to its new self; more assimilated in routine; more instinctively responsive to the conductor. Mr. Monteux spares no pains. He is industry, ambition, discretion themselves. His choirs answer to him zealously. The emergency is past; the future stretches promisingly; the audience need but fill the usual places, as it did yesterday, and applaud with becoming and remembering warmth. Not even in the programme-book was there an unusual leaflet—not a word, contrary to recent practice, about the endowment fund; only an announcement that the new season of 1920-21 would begin on Oct. 8 and 9 next and that subscriptions are renewable for another series of twenty-four afternoon or evening concerts. Did any one, outside Mr. Fradkin and the editors of certain trade-journals in New York, doubt it?

In fine, there was nothing to do or say but take the pleasures of music and performance and these, again, were relatively tranquil. Especially were they so in the piece with which the concert began—a "Symphonie Concertante" by Mozart, that is to say a "symphonie" with more or less conspicuous solo-parts for violin and viola. Accordingly, Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Denayer rose from their usual places, stood side by side to the left of the conductor, received at pauses and at end their meed of particular applause. They deserved it; for the violinist accomplished his usual able and sound performance of whatever task falls to him; while the tone of the viola-player seemed less dry, warmer-bodied, more plastic than it did when he undertook the solo-part in Berlioz's symphony about Byron's Harold. The fine undulations of Mozart, an impersonal music, accord better with Mr. Denayer's ways and powers than the robust periods of a romantic piece. Occasionally, solo violin and solo viola interchange tonal dialogue; occasionally they speak together above the background of the rest; usually they merely blossom in individual measures into which Mozart has made the music bloom. So might the elegant companies of eighteenth-century salons, for which "symphonies concertantes" were destined, single out the virtuosi who particularly pleased them.

Advisedly, Mr. Monteux used a relatively small orchestra for this music—smaller, if memory does not slip, than that which Dr. Muck employed when he also revived it—not all the strings, no more than two horns and proportionate oboes. Furthermore, the conductor's hand was light, supple. Thereby the little symphony flowed pleasantly forward, kept undulating course, eddied into pretty euphonies, sang itself into phrases that human rather than instrumental, voices might be moulding. In music, as in much else, the eighteenth-century loved an elegant stateliness. Even Mozart, not altogether a conformist to the ways of his age, could be deferential to such liking. So the first movement of this "Symphonie Concertante" often runs in broad periods, incisive rhythms, forthright progress. There is even hint here and there of the Mozart who was later to write the measures of the Commander walking in marble across "Don Juan" and of Sarastro, the high priest, in "The Magic Flute." Few styles baffled his fecund many-sidedness; and he could be grave and stately without the hint of pomposity shaking too often out of Handel's full-bottomed wig. A more natural Mozart, however, sings his way through the perfect continuity of the Andante, weaving a silvery thread of song, spraying it with as silvery ornament, as effortless as though felicity were routine, charming with that half smile which is mask to so much of his music. What a pity that there must also be a Finale in which, if the truth is to be told, Mozart is no more than deft, and somewhat repetitious, music-maker! Unfortunately it was not the way of the eighteenth century to leave things incomplete. Possibly, too, its little orchestra shades and grades where Mr. Monteux holds straightforward.

The rest was innings for the moderns—Dukas with an overture to Corneille's "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte"; Borodin with the contrastingly pagan dances of a tribe of Polovtsi—otherwise Tartars—in his opera of old and legendary Russia, "Prince Igor." Usually in the arts the pagans get the better of the Christians and the pages of Borodin, clothed in orchestral dress by Rimsky-Korsakov—once more wardrobe-mistress to a fellow-composer—were distinctly more interesting than the pages of Dukas. Yet not so interesting, in spite of Mr. Monteux's rhythmic energies as they seemed when the Diaghilev ballet—Bolm en tête—danced and pranced to them. The eye of the imagination would hark back to the deep red tents of Golovin's—or was it Röhrich's?—Tartar camp; to the wan, rolling landscape, the twisting river that stretched behind. As the ear tingled to the music, the more memory hungered for sight of the whirling or languorous dancers, for their tossing or spinning lines, whipping now one and now another into fresh frenzies; for a glimpse of the Polovtsian women snatched and upborne by their masters, the men. A play—it is the custom to say—is not half itself until it is acted. Similarly these dances from "Prince Igor" are not half themselves until they are actually danced. There is no suggestion of out-of-doors in Symphony Hall; there was not too much in the Russian ballet's staging of these dances. Yet somehow they sound as though they belonged under the sky, on a wind-swept day, in a tumultuous camp. Barbaric Borodin is not with the glinting, clanging fantasy of Rimsky in "The Golden Cockerel," or Stravinsky in episodes in "The Fire-Bird"; but more than they he feels the spaciousness, the rudeness that ancient Russian legend may exhale. The very woodenness of some of his measures in these dances from "Prince Igor" resembles it.

Dukas's Christian martyrs in tones, set there in his younger days, are hardly more interesting than Corneille's in verse; and there are those who have sat before his tragedy at the Théâtre-Français when not even Mounet-Sully or Albert Lambert or Madeleine Roch herself could persuade them to turn a hair. Not that Dukas seeks to retell the tale, to characterize the personages of the play—Corneille's stiff-jointed, lofty-tongued Romans, beset between religious, conjugal and amorous loyalties. Rather the composer seems to be fashioning a well-made piece of music that shall be atmospheric and illuding prelude to the tragedy. There is grave, even lofty beginning; sombre, struggling measures as of emotional conflict and desolation; measures, finally, of tempered aspiration, serene exaltation. Dukas is apparently cultivating the grand manner—and gaining it but dryly; courting a classic reticence—and saying too little to be impressive. But his motifs are workable; his craftsmanship serves. He is as respectable as a Sunday evening audience before "Polyeucte" at the Comédie—and nearly as commonplace. Better twenty times, the sharp humors of his "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the imaginative fantasy of his "Péri"; the symphonic passion, so to say, of scenes in his "Ariane."

Between Dukas and Borodin, a familiar Ravel—the Ravel of the five fairy-tales that he is pleased to call "Pièces Enfantines" and to attribute to a Gallic Mother Goose, shamelessly un-Anglo-Saxon. They are of the miniatures of music, nearly flawless in kind and quality, wrought with adeptly sophisticated means to transparent simplicity of outcome. Twenty measures of the Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty and the hearer knows that she was a stately princess, wistful, remote, under fairy enchantment. A few pages more and "Hop o' My Thumb" is lost in the woods, childishly dazed, pitiful—and a bird dares twitter carelessly. Another turn of the leaves and all the Pagodes and Pagodines (as the seventeenth century called little porcelain figures of fairy-tale) are wagging tiny little heads and marching in nodding ranks upon their tiny toes—genre picture in humorous, titillating perfection, albeit somewhat heavily and emphatically played. A space further and Beauty is cajoling in the clarinet and Beast grunting in the double bassoon. "Come, dear Beast, you shall live to be my husband"; and they fade into mist upon Ravel's languorous waltz. And last, as for the lowering of a multi-colored, iridescent curtain, the music of the Fairy Garden. Throughout Ravel is as adroit of means as he is precise of imagination. It is hard to remember more artful and ingenious, more fanciful and pictorial miniatures in music. If only miniatures, there or anywhere else, did not cloy so soon. . . . but Ravel is shrewdly brief.

H. T. PARKER

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE PROGRAM

The Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave its 21st concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program: Mozart, Concertante Symphonie, for violin and viola (Mr. Theodorowicz, violin; Mr. Denayer, viola); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor" (first time at these concerts).

Mozart's Concertante Symphonie, although beautifully played by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Denayer, is rather uninteresting music; at least it seems so today, from the modern point of view. "Polyeucte," overture to Corneille's Tragedy, was an interesting contrast. Here is modern music, in the sense that Puccini's music is modern. Gounod wrote an opera "Polyeucte" based on Corneille's Tragedy which was a failure. He spoke of it to Brieux, the dramatist, as "the great grief of my life. Believe me," he said, "it is my best work for the opera house. When I am dead, this will be seen. I have had a great grief."

The five "Mother Goose" pieces by Ravel, including "Hop o' My Thumb" and the "Beauty and the Beast Converse" are delightful, brimming over with delicious humor, as witness the abrupt change from the delicate music, in which Beauty speaks, to the rumbling bassoon of the Beast. And then Hop o' My Thumb cannot find his path, because the birds have eaten the bread crumbs he had strewn, the cheeping of the little birds is piped out from the orchestra. We have seldom heard music more imaginative.

The dances from "Prince Igor" were, however, the most brilliant part of the performance. Savage, crashing, vivid music; its playing by the orchestra was a triumph. Transfer Apr. 10, 1920

MONTEUX SHINES IN BORODIN'S BALLET

Score — Apr. 10, 1920

All-Round Program Given at Symphony Concert

The program for yesterday's Symphony concert managed to cover almost the whole range of orchestral music. It began with the Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola of Mozart, and followed that classic with an unfamiliar overture by Dukas, which represents the routine work of the 1890's. Then came Ravel's "Mother Goose," an average specimen of contemporary composition, and some ballet music from Borodin's "Prince Igor," a stock example of Russian music.

The orchestra, now recruited to nearly its full strength, proved able to cope admirably with each number, as though the recent trouble had never happened. The usual capacity audience seemed appreciative, especially of the admirable solo work of Messrs Theodorowicz and Denayer in the Mozart Symphony.

Mr Monteux excels as a conductor of ballet music. In the dances from "Prince Igor" he chose the tempi best suited to each number and stressed the recurring strong accents with a regularity which avoided mechanical monotony. He made the orchestral tone color, on which half the charm of the music depends, brilliant by his intelligent, almost unerring, feeling for the right moment at which to allow the brass and percussion to dominate.

The virtues which enable him to succeed so well with such numbers, however, are not all that Mozart requires. Much of the Concertante Symphonie, except in the solo passages, sounded dull and colorless because Mr Monteux does not pay sufficient attention to the gradation of accents. There should be comparatively few very strong accents and no unaccented notes in Mozart, but Mr Monteux has only one sort of subtlety, that required for ballet music.

Nor does he seem to realize that the quality of tone, especially from the strings, should never be luscious in Mozart symphonies. Where the type of melody demands a thin golden thread of tone, he insists on warmth at the expense of fineness of quality.

Dukas in the Overture to "Polyeucte" shows a logical mind trained in the principles of musical composition as understood by theorists influenced by Wagner and Berlioz. He is trying to be original and profound, but barely escapes dullness through his fineness of taste rather than through any great imaginative gift.

Ravel is a composer who has made irony and satire his forte. He has great talent and a knack for whimsical orchestration which enable him to make a slender vein of genuine imaginative power go a long way. He disguises the essential triviality and cheapness of most of his melodies by a clever use of ultra modern harmonic and orchestral effects. But "Mother Goose," "L'Heure Espagnole" and the rest of his few works are merely brilliant and entertaining "jeux d'esprit," as he himself is apparently aware. They are not to be compared with the masterpieces of Debussy and Scriabin.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Next week Alfred Cortot is to play the solo part in Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto and in Debussy's Fantasy for piano and orchestra. The other numbers are Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and excerpts from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or."

April Music in Boston 10. 1920

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-first concert of the present season on April 9 with the following program:

Mozart, Symphonie concertante for Violin and Viola. (Violin solo, J. Theodorowicz, Viol solo, F. Denayer).

Dukas.....Overture, "Polyeucte"
Ravel....."Ma Mère l'Oye" Borodin, Polovtskiav, Dances from "Prince Igor"

Dukas' overture was played for the first time at these concerts. It recalls a story, told the writer by a well-known Boston musician, of a friend of his Leipzig student days who had composed an overture to "Hamlet." When it was presented for performance at the annual exhibition of the Conservatory, Reinecke remarked that he had already accepted another "Hamlet" overture, whereupon the resourceful composer promptly erased the title "Hamlet" from his score and substituted therefor "Julius Cæsar," which appears to have answered the purpose equally well. And so with this overture, which might prelude any tragedy. We know that it is intended to be a tragic overture, for do we not hear muted horns, cries of anguish from the wood-wind and heart-rending phrases from the strings? It may be surmised from the foregoing that there is little of distinction in this overture, which indeed seems to be the case. Massenet's "Phèdre," frankly melodramatic, undoubtedly inferior musically to "Polyeucte," is far more moving and emotionally exciting.

Ravel's suite of five children's pieces is not unknown here but proves to be a fresh and ever grateful work. Its graphic descriptions of Hop-r'-my-Thumb, Beauty and the Beast, the Sleeping Beauty, the Empress of the Pagodas and the Fairy Garden are still as charming and delightful as at the time of their first hearing. The orchestra played them with the greatest delicacy of tone and phrasing. Mozart's Symphonie concertante cannot be said to be one of his most interesting works. It served, however, to display the excellent qualities of the two soloists, who were warmly applauded. Borodin's ballet music brought the concert to a brilliant close.

SYMPHONY HALL

40th Season

1920-1921

24 FRIDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS
24 SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS
BEGINNING OCTOBER 8-9, 1920

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

WITH DISTINGUISHED SOLOISTS

SUBSCRIPTION INFORMATION

This year's subscribers for the series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts have an option until May 1 to retain their seats for the following season of 1920-21.

Subscription notices, containing cards and envelopes for reply, have been mailed all present subscribers. A prompt reply will be much appreciated.

Meanwhile, application may be made for additional seats by present subscribers or by those who wish to become subscribers. These applications will be filed in order of receipt and seats allotted as near the desired location as possible shortly after May 1.

Address all communications to

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager
Symphony Hall, Boston

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 16, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Fidelio," op. 72

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO No. 3, in C minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 37

- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Largo
- III. Rondo Allegro

DEBUSSY,

FANTASY for Pianoforte and Orchestra

- I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro giusto
 - II. Lento e molto espressivo; Allegro molto
- (First performance in America)

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF,

EXCERPTS from "Le Coq d'Or." ("The Golden Cock")

- a) Introduction
- b) March

[First time at these Concerts]

Soloist:

ALFRED CORTOT

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Beethoven's Concerto

Alfred Cortot, Pianist.

22D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald — Apr. 17, 1920
Interpretative Power of Orchestra Impresses
Audience

MR. CORTOT AT PIANO SHARES APPLAUSE

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Fidello" and Piano Concerto, C minor, No. 3; Debussy, Fantasy for piano and orchestra (first time in America); Rimsky-Korsakoff, Introduction and march from "Le Coq d'Or" (first time at these concerts). Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

The overture to "Fidello" is usually played at performances of the opera in Germany, probably because it is the most non-committal of the five that Beethoven wrote. (The one intended for Prague disappeared.) There is nothing in the "Fidello" overture that can lessen the effect of the opera itself. While the whole drama is in the "Leonore" No. 3 and even in the "Leonore" No. 2, some will agree to Vincent d'Indy's saying that "Leonore" No. 3 is a more dramatic and greater work than the opera that follows. The "Fidello" overture might be for any opera of a conventional nature without a tragic subject. It might even serve for a light opera of the better class. Did Beethoven purposely write it in this vein, without reference to Florestan, the prison, the jailer digging the grave, the arrival of the governor with Pizarro thwarted by the heroic wife, so that the one great and only dramatic scene in the opera might not be anticipated?

Strange to say, Beethoven's third concerto had been played at the Symphony concerts only twice. As it was performed yesterday it seemed a more engrossing and romantic composition than the two later concertos, although it was written in 1800. In the first movement the influence of Mozart is felt, but there is a depth of sentiment in the largo, a playful, whimsical spirit in the finale peculiar to Beethoven.

Or was this impression due to the extraordinary merit of the performance by the pianist and the orchestra? It is not easy to speak in measured terms of Mr. Cortot's interpretation. We have heard many pianists beginning with Rubenstein, Buelow, men and women of their period; famous pianists who were said by their audiences to excel in the performance of Beethoven's music. Their interpretations were described as dignified, profound, noble, classic, (as if Beethoven was not in his early maturity a romanticist), noble, sublime. They were admirable, each in its own way, yet having in the course of the years almost come to the conclusion that the piano is not a musical instrument in the highest sense of the word "musical", we are ready to cry "Peccavi" when a pianist like Mr. Cortot revealed the strength and the beauty of a great work and displays the qualities that characterize the great pianist-musician. To dwell on the nature of his interpretation; to analyze; to hunt for the fitting superlatives and purple phrases of praise would not convey to a reader not in the hall the glory of the performance. No wonder, the audience was enthusiastic; no wonder that Mr. Cortot was stormily recalled again and again, while Mr. Monteux, representing the orchestra, was not forgotten.

Debussy's Fantasy was written in 1889-90. It was not performed or published during his lifetime. Would he have been willing to grant a performance, even with Mr. Cortot as the pianist? The Fantasy was put in rehearsal long ago in Paris, but Debussy withdrew it. Surely, many of these early pages are more worthy of him than those in some of his latest compositions. The theme that pervades the Fantasy is ingeniously treated, but this is by no means the sole merit. There is a delightful freshness, exuberance, recklessness, that would have shocked the hidebound conservatives of the Institute if he had sent the Fantasy as his fourth envol. There are charming bits of instrumentation; everywhere are marks of the originality that startled Paris when his succeeding works were produced. Perhaps the later Debussy thought the Fantasy too formal, too much in accordance with respectable traditions; yet more than once he broke away from them; nor need he have deplored the beauty of the Lento section as obvious, not subtle. The performance by pianist and orchestra was ap-

Alfred Cortot, Pianist.

22D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Apr. 17, 1920
Interpretative Power of
Orchestra Impresses
Audience

MR. CORTOT AT PIANO SHARES APPLAUSE

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio" and Piano Concerto, C minor, No. 3; Debussy, Fantasy for piano and orchestra (first time in America); Rimsky-Korsakoff, Introduction and march from "Le Coq d'Or" (first time at these concerts). Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

The overture to "Fidelio" is usually played at performances of the opera in Germany, probably because it is the most non-committal of the five that Beethoven wrote. (The one intended for Prague disappeared.) There is nothing in the "Fidelio" overture that can lessen the effect of the opera itself. While the whole drama is in the "Leonore" No. 3 and even in the "Leonore" No. 2, some will agree to Vincent d'Indy's saying that "Leonore" No. 3 is a more dramatic and greater work than the opera that follows. The "Fidelio" overture might be for any opera of a conventional nature without a tragic subject. It might even serve for a light opera of the better class. Did Beethoven purposely write it in this vein, without reference to Florestan, the prison, the jailer digging the grave, the arrival of the governor with Pizarro thwarted by the heroic wife, so that the one great and only dramatic scene in the opera might not be anticipated?

Strange to say, Beethoven's third concerto had been played at the Symphony concerts only twice. As it was performed yesterday it seemed a more engrossing and romantic composition than the two later concertos, although it was written in 1800. In the first movement the influence of Mozart is felt, but there is a depth of sentiment in the largo, a playful, whimsical spirit in the finale peculiar to Beethoven.

Or was this impression due to the extraordinary merit of the performance by the pianist and the orchestra? It is not easy to speak in measured terms of Mr. Cortot's interpretation. We have heard many pianists beginning with Rubenstein, Buelow, men and women of their period; famous pianists who were said by their audiences to excel in the performance of Beethoven's music. Their interpretations were described as dignified, profound, noble, classic, (as if Beethoven was not in his early maturity a romanticist), noble, sublime. They were admirable, each in its own way, yet having in the course of the years almost come to the conclusion that the piano is not a musical instrument in the highest sense of the word "musical", we are ready to cry "Peccavi" when a pianist like Mr. Cortot revealed the strength and the beauty of a great work and displays the qualities that characterize the great pianist-musician. To dwell on the nature of his interpretation; to analyze; to hunt for the fitting superlatives and purple phrases of praise would not convey to a reader not in the hall the glory of the performance. No wonder, the audience was enthusiastic; no wonder that Mr. Cortot was stormily recalled again and again, while Mr. Monteux, representing the orchestra, was not forgotten.

Debussy's Fantasy was written in 1889-90. It was not performed or published during his lifetime. Would he have been willing to grant a performance, even with Mr. Cortot as the pianist? The Fantasy was put in rehearsal long ago in Paris, but Debussy withdrew it. Surely, many of these early pages are more worthy of him than those in some of his latest compositions. The theme that pervades the Fantasy is ingeniously treated, but this is by no means the sole merit. There is a delightful freshness, exuberance, recklessness, that would have shocked the hidebound conservatives of the Institute if he had sent the Fantasy as his fourth envol. There are charming bits of instrumentation; everywhere are marks of the originality that startled Paris when his succeeding works were produced. Perhaps the later Debussy thought the Fantasy too formal, too much in accordance with respectable traditions; yet more than once he broke away from them; nor need he have deplored the beauty of the Lento section as obvious, not subtle. The performance by pianist and orchestra was apappropriately now sensuous, now dashingly brilliant.

314

The excerpts from "The Golden Cock" are not so effective in the concert hall as in the opera house. They are entertaining enough, but they are far more amusing in the theatre.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C major; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain" (first time at these concerts); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris."

CORTOT AT PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Debussy's Fantasie Heard for First Time
in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Alfred Cortot, pianist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and the principal part of the programme was his. He played Beethoven's C minor concerto and Debussy's early Fantasie for piano and orchestra which was then performed for the first time in America. In both of these compositions Mr. Cortot again displayed the qualities which make him a commanding figure among his colleagues—his broad and noble conceptions of classic forms, his mastery of rhythm and phrase, his pianist authority and brilliancy.

BEETHOVEN VERY HUMAN

Seldom has Beethoven's concerto been played here in so Beethovenish a manner—in the first movement with enormous virility of thought and touch, in the second movement with repose and deep feeling, in the last movement with the jocosity, the reckless merriment, which is one of Beethoven's characteristic moods. When Beethoven is so played he is very noble, at the same time very human and very simple. Yes! But to play him that way is not so simple.

But Mr. Cortot was very much in the right when he insisted on Mr. Monteux acknowledging with him the applause, for Mr. Monteux' reading of the orchestral parts was as virile and as musicianly as Mr. Cortot's playing. Let us add, as an amen, that with all this fine playing the concerto is very old-fashioned, and one's enjoyment of it must be partly historical, rather than wholly emotional.

Debussy's Early Work

Then came Debussy's Fantasie. This early work was one of the pieces the composer sent back from Rome when he won the Grand Prix at the Paris Conservatoire. It excited distrust, and it was not heard until the 19th of last November in London—six years after the composer's death. The performance yesterday was from the proof sheets. When this work was played in London some of the reviewers thought that it would have been best not to exhume it. But that seems rather an extreme judgment. If one can endure the Fidelio overture of Beethoven, with which yesterday's concert commenced, is not a hearing of an early work of a great modern composer wholly justified?

True, there is in this Fantasie but little of the mature Debussy—at least on a first hearing—but throughout there are intervals and an occasional harmonic twist agreeable in themselves and of much interest as specimens of the composer's early attempts at expression. What is also interesting and rather amusing is to perceive Debussy making an attempt, at least, at classic form and symphonic working out of motives. He fails.

A Good Concert Piece

The opening motive of the first movement is infinitely more original and interesting than its working out. Secondly, we find Mr. Debussy, the master of marvellous effects gained by the original and unforseen employment of a few instruments, using heavy, whacking orchestration—sometimes with very brilliant, if coarse effect. In fact, the first movement of the Fantasie, by itself, would not be a bad concert piece to keep in the repertory. It has brilliancy and some good orchestral tricks. It has interesting if immature thematic material, and a great deal of muscularity and what is technically known as "pep."

The slow movement meanders about in a Massenetish manner, sometimes with touches of a fanciful Orientalism, and we hear hints of the "Fetes" movement of the Nocturnes, and of figures which occur in sundry piano pieces of this Debussy. These are first impressions. The work was not only worth hearing, but would be worth hearing again, and he is rather a bold man who says that on account of its immaturity this interesting music of the early Debussy should not be played.

From "The Golden Cock"

So much for the commonplace Beethoven overture, which was excellently played, and Mr. Cortot's performances. The concert came to an end with an introduction and march from Rimsky-Korsakoff's fantastical opera, "The Golden Cock," heard here in 1918. The introduction consists of various motives—that of the wheedling Queen of Shemakha, the Queen who works the old man's ruin in the opera; the motive of the astrologer who is the evil magician of the piece; the crow of the cock; the song of the seductive Queen when she salutes the sun, and finally a delicious fragment of Russian folk melody given to the strings. Then modulations, and the grotesque march of King Dodon. At the last, drums pounding, brass blaring, one had almost said, flags waving, a trumpet is shrieking out a caricature of the Queen's motive—that same wheedling arabesque, which runs through much of the score in the latter part of the opera, and whispers of bedevilling magic as the motive of Scheherazade in the "Thousand and One Nights" suite tells of the craft and the outrageous yarning of that fair lady.

This music is slight, but very suggestive in its melodic substance, very well made, though with little development of the ideas, and masterfully orchestrated. Then there is the mad humor and the fairy tale quality of all the music. It is inhuman, it is grotesque. It tells of strange land haunted by wizards and sirens, where the sun rises on the wrong side of the horizon, where men are led astray by (1) demon astrologers, (2) by women who do not exist, and (3) golden birds! When the opera was given here the strange scenery was so captivating that one did not get the full value of the music. The scenery is in the music. The music will not stand by itself, but if you know the story of Rimsky's opera and listen you will not need the scenery.

april 17, 1920
Music in Boston
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on April 16 with the following program:

Beethoven.....Overture to "Fidelio"

315
Beethoven, Concerto for Pianoforte No. 3
Debussy, Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra

Rimsky-Korsakoff, Excerpts from "Le Cig d'or"

Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

Beethoven's overture, although not among his greatest works, was a fitting introduction. Theatrical, romantic, it was played by Mr. Monteux with due appreciation of these qualities, and with spirit. The concerto, of Beethoven's earlier years, is too seldom heard. Many consider it, together with the first one in C major, to be proper in the class room only. What a sadly mistaken idea! Yet, it is not suited to the ordinary virtuoso, for in spite of its simple construction, and moderate technical demands, it requires a master musician, as well as pianist to play it properly. Unfortunately these qualities are not always united in the same person as is the case with Mr. Cortot. His playing was distinguished for its grace, nobility and feeling, particularly in the adagio and rondo, which were interpreted in the true Beethoven manner. He did not sentimentalize; he was never trivial. Such playing can be equaled by few, surpassed by none.

Debussy's Fantasy was played for the first time in America. The piece is divided into two parts by the composer although there are in reality four distinct movements—part one, introduction and allegro—part two slow movement and finale.

Chronologically the work belongs to the composer's early period—that of the Suite Bergamasque and the suite "Pour le piano"—but it seems to have been retouched by the composer in later years. The effect is not always happy. The opening is well conceived, but the succeeding allegro seems at a first hearing vague and ill-defined. There are characteristic progressions and orchestral effects but the total impression of the first part seems negligible.

Not so, however, that of the second part. The slow movement is poetic and imaginative and is full of beautiful orchestral color. The final allegro which follows without pause is festal in character. After a long crescendo terminating in a brilliant passage for the full orchestra there are reminiscences of the slow movement followed in turn by another crescendo and resounding climax. In this latter section, a theme of distinctly oriental character occurs. In fact the entire finale suggests some festival in the Far East.

The work as a whole is hardly characteristic of Debussy at his best. It makes but little subjective appeal save in the slow movement of the second part. The piano part, although evidently of great difficulty is far from effective and the delicate tints of Debussy's later style are lacking. It is undoubtedly worthy of many hearings but will scarcely add to the reputation of the composer of "L'après midi d'un Faun" or the "Sea pieces." The performance was wholly admirable. There was much applause, yet we venture to think that it was more in appreciation of the brilliant playing of Mr. Cortot and the orchestra than for the work itself.

The excerpts from "Le Coq d'or" were distinctly out of place in the concert room. This atmospheric music of the theater seemed weak and commonplace when derived of its natural setting, although played with extraordinary skill by the orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Apr. 27, 1920
THE AFTERNOON OF A PIANIST,
ALFRED CORTOT

"Assisting Artist" or Assisting Orchestra?
—Beethoven's Third Concerto Revived, and Debussy's Fantasia for the First Time in America—Notable Distinctions of Performance — A Prelude from "Fidelio," a Postlude from "The Golden Cockerel"

IT is possible to admire warmly Mr. Cortot as pianist and musician, to multiply praise of his share in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, and yet to regret that so much of it fell to him. It was a pleasure to note the numbers of the audience—filling every seat and likely to be as large this evening—and the applause heaped upon him. Yet these circumstances only accentuated his relative possession of the occasion. The orchestra indeed had appreciable share in one of his pieces, a Fantasia of Debussy's earlier years, but by itself, it no more than provided prelude and postlude. It began the concert with Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio"—secondary and space-filling Beethoven—and it ended the concert with the introduction to the first act and the march from the third in Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel"—music of the stage and of no other place. In other words and in the homely dialect of the theatre, the orchestra "played the audience in" and "played the audience out." Furthermore it accompanied Mr. Cortot in the third Concerto (in C minor) of Beethoven, in Debussy's Fantasia already specified. The pianist was the rest.

The purists speak with a show of reason when they contend that an assisting singer has no just place in a concert of symphonic music, is, indeed, an anomaly therein. The ground, however, cracks beneath their feet when they assert that assisting pianists or violinists are in like case. Without them, Concertos would disappear from active repertoires and Concertos pass commonly for symphonic pieces. At the least, tradition, custom, the liking of the public, hallow them. It is one thing, however, to invite the virtuoso to one Concerto, and another thing to permit him two or the equivalent of two. In such excess, the concert virtually becomes his with an assisting orchestra, whether it is short, as it was yesterday under Mr. Monteux, or long, as it happened to be when Dr. Muck once allowed Mr. Ysaye, the violinist, such luxury as Mr. Cortot enjoyed. Not without questionings, may one or another listener hear the Symphony Orchestra "assisting" at one of its own concerts, especially in these days when its public has warmed so wholeheartedly to it. Agreed that Mr. Cortot is interesting personality as well as pianist and musician—and for that very reason the concert seemed only the more to be his. With a rarely heard Concerto of Beethoven and a novel Fantasia of Debussy, between a relatively insignificant prelude and postlude, he was bound to prevail. At his first coming to Boston to play the piano-parts in Franck's Symphonic Variations and d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air, he quite swept poor old Rabaud into the background. Fortunately, Mr. Monteux is of another mettle and well divided with Mr. Cortot the honors of Debussy's Fantasia. Nevertheless it was he who came, played, conquered. From season to season the old régime at Symphony Hall used to surrender a pair of concerts to Mr. Paderewski. The new régime seems disposed to do likewise by Mr. Cortot. Yet somehow the notion will persist that the Symphony Orchestra ought to be preponderant on its own days in its own house. Else why its official designation of soloists as "assisting artists"?

At two concerts in New York at mid-winter, Mr. Cortot, with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra played all five of Beethoven's Concertos for piano. Thus prepared, he began yesterday with the third in C minor, heard but four times in the whole forty years of the Symphony Concerts. It deserves frequent revival—the more because the fifth ("The Emperor") tends to become a kiln-dried masterpiece; while the fourth grows tedious nowadays before and after the poetic slow movement. Presumably the first and the second are little brothers to Beethoven's first and second symphonies. The third, however, by intrinsic quality as well as by relative freshness, gives lively pleasure. No sooner has the orchestra opened the way into the first Allegro than the light energy and elastic pace of the music win the ear. The contrasting melody matches not a few of Mozart in grace of line and supple, fanciful progress. The succeeding slow division begins in Beethoven-like song, warm and rich; before long the piano, passing it to the orchestra, is garlanding melodious measures with Mozartean arabesques—to end with Mozartean euphonies, and something more, between the several voices. The closing Rondo, unlike some of Beethoven's finales, charms the listening perceptions rather than stretches taut the listening nerves. In fine, the music of Beethoven light-handed, lithe-footed, graceful, fanciful, transparent, lyric, writing a tone-poem that flows or sparkles through all the deference to orthodox form and method.

In turn, Mr. Cortot, cultivating his familiar dry lights, was as luminous as the piece. Phrase, period, modulation, progression, ran crystal-clear. Every jointure snapped gently upon the ear; every inflection fell as crisply. Animated, indeed a shade too urgent, was Mr. Cortot's pace in the first movement; but the light beat of his elastic rhythm never flagged. He polished the suavities of the Mozartean song, burnishing phrase into phrase. He touched it with a cool sentiment of the mind. Precision and elegance hand in hand achieved the euphonies of the Largo; while cool color played over its more songful measures. The interplay of motifs and rhythms in the Finale was a sportive jugglery, delicate, piquant, sure. Mr. Cortot's perceptive faculties were as unerring as his revealing fingers. Beethoven in high light, in dry light, could not have stood more clear. Perish the thought that the slow song might have pulsed more warmly; the Mozartean song flowed more tenderly. Enough that the lights upon Mr. Cortot's crystal were prismatic.

Debussy's Fantasia yielded the pianist room for more diversified and subtler tonal color; gave him and the orchestra opportunity for harmonic half-tint and suggestion; bade him to rhythmic intricacies; invited him to ornate and resilient rhapsody in the Finale; opened before him in the slow division a rarefied and poignant beauty; touched with mystery the preluding measures whence the music expands. A master of clarity was Mr. Cortot as he carried the germinating and unifying motif through the whole body of the Fantasia. Whenever the harmonic color was characteristically Debussyan, he touched it in as with fine shining points. His communicating ardor sped the two displayful Allegros. His comprehension of the mood of mystery in the opening measures, of the aerial and penetrating voice of the slow movement, was unerring. Again Mr. Cortot's mind was as fine and keen as his touch. Whatever the limits of his temperament, it is in even balance. Its passion (as a Parisian wit once said) is poise.

As the Fantasia came and went, for the first time in American concert-hall, it was hard to understand Parisian and British regrets over it as a relatively early and uncharacteristic music that Debussy in his lifetime had of purpose denied to publishers and pianists. It is far more interesting than some of his pieces of the eighties that he himself revised and sanctioned for performance—the cantata of "The Prodigal Son," for example, or the "Springtime" suite. In retrospective glance from his prime, it is a more individualized music than the setting of "The Blessed Damsel" or the youthful piano-pieces. True, there are moments, especially in the first Allegro when the Fantasia treads water, and other moments, as in the Finale, when it is more displayful than choice of means. The mature Debussy endlessly selected, endlessly sifted. Before ripening, he was more easily content. On the other hand, the texture of the whole Fantasia is no small feat of technical, yet seemingly spontaneous, ingenuity; the preluding measures foretell the Debussy of shadowy atmospheres; while the slow movement not only prophesies but gains the sublimated and piercing beauty that overspreads "The Afternoon of a Faun" or permeates the slow section of "Ibéria." Such measures are not to be buried; they better deserve the light than many another of Debussy's decline.

So much for Mr. Cortot's concert. The rest, as has been said, was prelude—Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio"—and postlude—the fragments of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Golden Cockerel." Both are music of the theatre, by which sign Mr. Monteux "read" them graphically, fervidly. The excerpts from the Russian opera are also music of the stage—a prelude designed to summon the sun-drenched, droning, somnolent atmosphere of the first act; a march designed to clothe and point a prescribed procession.

Removed to the concert-hall, stripped of the accessory—or rather the essential—stage, they become but cursory examples of Rimsky-Korsakov's skill and imagination with rhythms, harmonies, timbres, a vivid but also an empty vesture. As for the overture, "Fidelio," it would be all very well were not the other overture ("Leonora No. 3"), in which Beethoven concentrated and magnified his opera ten times more familiar and twenty-fold more eloquent.

H. T. PARKER

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF ENLIVENS CONCERT

Scots — Apr. 7, 1920
Parts of "Le Coq d'Or" by
Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven and Debussy Also Are Brilliantly Rendered

The most interesting number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was a spirited performance of excerpts from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Le Coq d'Or," which had been previously heard in this city only at a single performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. Mr. Monteux, who has conducted many operatic performances of the music, chose selections which included all of the chief themes on which it is founded. When fragments of the "Hymn to the Sun" were heard, there was a buzz of whispered recognition in the audience, to which Kreisler's transcription for violin has become familiar, through repeated hearings.

Sticklers for tradition may protest that operatic pot-pourris belong at the "Pops" and not on the regular Symphony programs, where they have not appeared in recent years. Yet where the music in question is of remarkable quality and able to stand alone in the concert hall, there seems no valid reason for objecting to the introduction of excerpts, especially from unfamiliar masterpieces, in which the voice parts are either absent or of minor importance.

Russian music is not, in the main, characterized by connected development of motives. Its charm lies in the themes themselves and in the harmonic and orchestral color. There was quite as much continuity in these fragments of "Le Coq d'Or" as there is in "Scheherazade" or in "Thamar," which were written for concert performance.

Alfred Cortot, the soloist, chose distinctly inferior specimens of Beethoven and of Debussy. To the piano part in each he brought a delicate, smooth tone and a considerable feeling for nuance in interpretation. His chief defect is a lack of reserve force behind his fortissimo, which is strained and brittle in quality.

Beethoven was far better represented by the noble Overture to "Fidelio" than by the unfamiliar Third Concerto, an early work. Its slow movement

Debussy's Fantasy

That admirable pianist Alfred Cortot will play at the Symphony concerts this week a concerto of Beethoven that is not often heard, and a Fantasy of Debussy which will be performed in this country for the first time. The history of this Fantasy is a singular one.

Debussy was awarded the prix de Rome in 1884. From Rome he sent as his "envoi" for the first year a fragment of a lyric drama, "Almanzor" (drama of Heine); an orchestral Suite in two parts, "Spring," for orchestra and chorus; the third was "The Blessed Damsel"; the fourth was to have been this "Fantasy" for piano and orchestra.

As he could not find a satisfactory translation of Heine's poem, he never completed the drama. His "Printemps" did not please the hide-bound conservatives of the Institute at Paris. They were shocked by the use of the voice, without words, used in an instrumental role, and the tonality seemed to them dangerous. One of them re-

Mr. Cortot played it at a concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society, London, on November 20, 1919. It was said at the time that there had been a semi-private performance in London by Mr. Cortot, not with orchestra, but with Berthe Bert playing the transcription for second piano from the score.

The concerto was performed in Paris for the first time on Dec. 7, 1919, at a Lamoureux concert conducted by Messager, when Marguerite Long was the pianist. Gustave Samazeuilh, reviewing the performance, said that while the orchestration was not characteristic of the later Debussy, the music showed the exceptional gifts that gave him later his world-wide reputation. The reviewer found in the first portion an irresistibly fascinating youthful freshness and spirit, and certain formal features that reminded him of d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air. In the transition from the Andante to the Finale, one heard already the voices of the sirens in Debussy's "Nocturnes"; in the Finale there is anticipation of the fancy that vitalized his string quartet, the fourth "Lyric Prose," and the subtle rhythm of "Fetes." "The writing for the piano often enlures the orchestral speech with capricious garlands." Well, well! We shall hear what we shall hear. Certainly if any one can bring out all that is in this Fantasy, his name is Alfred Cortot. Herald Apr. 11, 1920

THE ORCHESTRAS OF NEW YORK

Apr. 7, 1920
Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NEW YORK, New York—Orchestral music here has lately begun to drag its anchor. Instead of riding the tide, as it used to do, securely fastened to the favor of the public, it has taken to drifting, pulled by two cross-currents, one of which is wealthy patronage and the other, professional dictation. Formerly an art, expressing the aspirations of audiences, orchestral music is becoming an industry, or something very like one, answering to the people's capacity for absorbing sound. For it has been organized, as nobody can deny, upon a basis of administration and production, after the manner of a monopoly, with one group of persons furnishing the capital and the other the labor, and both groups, by collective agreement, determining what kind of programs and what kind of performances the town shall be treated to.

Policies and the Public

Things are going this way, obviously, in about all the orchestras of New York, artistic policies being formed not so much upon what the public may be supposed to wish to hear, as upon what the representatives of the guarantors and the committees of the players, taking thought together, conclude is best for it to hear. Not that guarantors and players ever hold formal deliberations over the matter. That would be unnecessary. The conductor can easily find out what is in the minds of both parties and can nominally himself be the arbiter of artistic policies. The idea is, that whereas a few years ago he did not have to trouble himself for a moment about either the patron on the one hand or the players on the other, but was responsible only to his audiences, today he may leave his audiences out of the reckoning altogether.

Guarantors being conservative, and players being disposed to live much in tradition, it is hardly to be wondered at that orchestral programs in the season now maturing have been stationary. The New Symphony Orchestra, which has enjoyed a successful winter under the baton of Artur Bodanzky, has been little more than a repertory practice class. Lately it gave a concert, with Leopold Godowsky, pianist, assisting, with Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony and Chopin's concerto in F minor as topics of dutiful study. This organization is taking on a second conductor, William Mengelberg, next year, and is doubling, if not nearly trebling, its schedule of performances, and is changing its name to the National Symphony Orchestra. Unless it plays more national music under this designation than it played new music under the former one, it can with propriety in 1921 ask the state authorities' permission for another change.

The Russian Orchestra

An institution which used to be progressively inclined, but which has been little heard from this season, the Russian Symphony Orchestra, recently gave a concert under the direction of Modest Altschuler, at which it presented nothing more startling than Kalinnikoff's symphony in G minor and Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor, with Leo Ornstein, much in the character of a repentant rebel, as soloist.

The orchestra which has always been in the forefront and still holds its place there, the New York Symphony, has led its supporters into the splendid extravagance of a music festival, which opened in the Seventy-First Regiment Armory on April 6, under the direction of Walter Damrosch.

An orchestra which David Mannes brought together for the special purpose of giving free Saturday evening concerts in the main hall of the Metropolitan Museum of Art has been the delight of the throngs of people who heard it play, and must accordingly have been a satisfaction to the patron of music who paid for its services. At the last concert, given on the evening of March 27, the number of persons registered on the turnstiles at the museum doors is said to have totaled 9644.

MR. ALFRED DENIS CORTOT was born of French parents at Nyon, Switzerland, on September 26, 1877. Going at an early age with his family to Paris, he received his first pianoforte lessons from his sisters. He entered the Paris Conservatory, where he was in turn the pupil of Decombes* and Diémer. As a pupil of the latter he was awarded the first prize for pianoforte-playing in 1896. Taking part in the Lamoureux and Colonne concerts, he soon became known throughout Europe. He has played in England, Italy, The Netherlands, Russia, Spain, Switzerland. Having been a répétiteur at Bayreuth he staged in Paris "Götterdämmerung." In 1904 he founded the concert society that bears his name, and with it he has given performances of important choral works by Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, etc., also a concert performance of "Parsifal." In 1904 he was chosen conductor of the Société Nationale; in 1907 he took charge of an advanced pianoforte class at the Paris Conservatory. Chief of the Service d'Études Artistiques du Ministère de l'Instruction Publique et des Beaux-Arts, he was named a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1914.

Coming to the United States with the Société des Concerts du

* Émile Decombes, born at Nîmes in 1829, was awarded the first prize for piano-forte-playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1846. It is said that he was one of the last pupils of Chopin. From 1875 to 1899, Decombes was an instructor of preparatory classes in pianoforte-playing at the Conservatory. He wrote a "Méthode," exercises and transcriptions for the pianoforte.

Conservatoire, André Messager conductor, in the fall of 1918, he played in Boston at a concert of that orchestra on October 30, 1918 (Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor, No. 4). He played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on January 24, 1919 (Franck's Symphonic Variations and d'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Song).

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 18, at 3.30

THIRTY-FOURTH CONCERT FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE ORCHESTRA'S

PENSION FUND

By the

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

Assisted by

The Harvard Glee Club

Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, Conductor

.. PROGRAMME ..

SAINT-SAENS Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78

I. Adagio; Allegro moderato; Poco adagio.

II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Maestoso; Allegro.

Organist, Mr. ALBERT SNOW.

Pianist, Mr. ALFRED DE VOTO

A CAPPELLA	{	PALESTRINA	Adoramus Te
		LOTTI	Crucifixus
		LEISRING	O Filii et Filiae

GLUCK Minuet from the Opera "Orpheus"
Flute solo, GEORGES LAURENT

CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA { RUBINSTEIN Two Pictures from "The Tower of Babel"
(Choruses of Ham and Japheth)
NETHERLAND FOLK-SONG Prayer of Thanksgiving

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF . . Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
Alborada—Variations—Alborada—Scene and Gypsy Song—
Fandango of the Asturias

MASON & HAMLIN PIANO USED.

The assistance of the Harvard Glee Club is gratefully acknowledged by the Pension Fund Institution.

SYMPHONY HALL

40th Season

1920-1921

AIDS SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Herald Apr. 19, 1920
Harvard Glee Club's Singing a Notable Feature
of 34th Concert

CHORUSES RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 34th concert for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Archibald T. Davison, conductor. There was a very large audience. The program was as follows: Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3; unaccompanied choruses: Palestrina, Adoramus Te; Lotti, Crucifixus; Leisring, O Filii et Filiae, conducted by Dr. Davison. Gluck, Minuet from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Mr. Laurent); chorus and orchestra. Rubinstein, Choruses of Ham and Japheth from "The Tower of Babel;" Netherlands Folk Song, Prayer of Thanksgiving, conducted by Mr. Monteux. Orchestra: Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish themes.

Music by Coleridge Taylor if we are not mistaken, to Newbolt's sturdy verses, "Drake's Drum," was sung after the first group of choruses in response to the enthusiastic applause. This applause was deserved. Harvard University may well be proud of its Glee Club and the conductor of it. It should be remembered that the personnel necessarily changes with each graduating class. This makes the task of drilling the more arduous.

There was a time when the Glee clubs of Harvard and Yale sang chiefly college and popular songs for their own amusement and for the pleasure of the alumni in the cities the clubs visited. The singing as a rule was of the rough and ready-go-as-you-please, muscular variety. Throats were strained, chords stuck out on the sides of the neck, faces were flushed, there was painfully evident bodily activity from the waist up. In these clubs were often good voices and a few men that had studied singing; but the general result was a fervent roar of mediocrity. Today the Harvard Club challenges the admiration of all those interested in chorus singing. Dr. Davison has taught these students intelligently, musically; he has not over-trained them, for they sang yesterday with delightful spontaneity, yet with a careful regard for nuances of expression, with a mastery of dynamic gradations. In piano passages there was security of intonation; when full vocal strength was demanded, tonal quality was not lost. Especially noteworthy was the performance of the music by Lotti and Leisring, a performance that might excite the envy of any male chorus composed of picked professional singers who had long worked together.

It was a pleasure to hear the choruses from "The Tower of Babel." When this oratorio was performed by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1883 the music given to the Shemites and the Hamites was thought to be extremely oriental. In 1920 young composers, French, Americans, English, when their musical thoughts turn eastward, are more oriental than the orientals themselves.

It was a happy thought to call in the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club for this occasion. The club responded in most generous spirit. Let us hope that these singers next season may be heard in some important work for male voices and orchestra at a subscription concert.

Saint-Saens's impressive symphony was finely played. The lyrical section with organ displayed the eloquence of the upper strings, sonorous and beautiful in the long cantidena. Mr. Monteux gave a dramatic reading, and prepared the grand climaxes in a masterly manner. Mr. Laurent's full tone and expressive interpretation in Gluck's heavenly music were warmly appreciated. A brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar Caprice ended a concert of much more than ordinary interest.

A CAPPELLA—

ADORAMUS TE Giovanni Pierluigi Palestrina (1526-1594)

Adoramus te, Christe!
Et benedicimus tibi.
Quia per sanctam crucem tuam
Redemisti mundum!
Qui passus es pro nobis
Misere nobis, Domine!

CRUCIFIXUS Antonio Lotti (1667-1740)

Crucifixus etiam pro nobis, sub Pontio Pilato; passus, et sepultus est.

O FILII ET FILIAE Volckmar Leisring (-1637)

O filii et filiae!
Rex celestis! Rex gloriae!
Christus surrexit hodie!
Alleluia.

TWO PICTURES from the "Tower of Babel"

Anton Gregorovitch Rubinstein (1830-1894)

FIRST PICTURE. Chorus of the Sons of Ham:—

Forth from Euphrates' fertile vale we wander,
Unto the burning sandy desert,
Where the sun darts forth his ray,
And night ne'er cools the heat of day!

We roam far and wide without rest or peace,
Like the sand when blown by the whirlwind
So wander we forever.

We pitch our light tent, and our cattle graze,
And the place of our sojourning
Sees us no more returning.

SECOND PICTURE. Chorus of the Sons of Japheth:—

Where in inlets deep sports the ocean glad,
Where the murmuring streamlet the shore doth kiss,
That bright shore all in verdure clad:
There, make we our abode.

Where in desolate forests, in piny crag
Eagles build their eyrie,
Where all around is heard ne'er a sound:
There, make we our abode.

Where on high their blue peaks the mountains raise;
Where the landscape ever new charm unfolds
To the spirits' dreamy gaze:
There, make we our abode.

PRAYER OF THANKSGIVING Netherlands Folk-song

We gather together to ask the Lord's blessing,
He chastens and hastens his will to make known;
The wicked oppressing cease then from distressing,
Sing praises to his name, he forgets not his own.

Beside us to guide us, our God with us joining,
Ordaining, maintaining his kingdom divine,
So from the beginning the fight we were winning!
Thou, Lord, wast at our side, the glory be thine!

We all do extol thee, thou Leader in battle,
And pray that thou still our Defender wilt be.
Let thy congregation escape tribulation:
Thy name be ever praised! O Lord, make us free!

SYMPHONY HALL

40th Season

1920-1921

AIDS SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Herald — Apr. 9, 1920
Harvard Glee Club's Singing a Notable Feature
of 34th Concert

CHORUSES RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 34th concert for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Archibald T. Davison, conductor. There was a very large audience. The program was as follows: Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3; unaccompanied choruses: Palestrina, Adoramus Te; Lotti, Crucifixus; Leisring, O Filii et Filiae, conducted by Dr. Davison. Gluck, Minuet from "Orpheus" (flute solo, Mr. Laurent); chorus and orchestra. Rubinstein, Choruses of Ham and Japheth from "The Tower of Babel;" Netherlands Folk Song, Prayer of Thanksgiving, conducted by Mr. Monteux. Orchestra: Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish themes.

Music by Coleridge Taylor if we are not mistaken, to Newbolt's sturdy verses, "Drake's Drum," was sung after the first group of choruses in response to the enthusiastic applause. This applause was deserved. Harvard University may well be proud of its Glee Club and the conductor of it. It should be remembered that the personnel necessarily changes with each graduating class. This makes the task of drilling the more arduous.

There was a time when the Glee clubs of Harvard and Yale sang chiefly college and popular songs for their own amusement and for the pleasure of the alumni in the cities the clubs visited. The singing as a rule was of the rough and ready-go-as-you-please, muscular variety. Throats were strained, chords stuck out on the sides of the neck, faces were flushed, there was painfully evident bodily activity from the waist up. In these clubs were often good voices and a few men that had studied singing; but the general result was a fervent roar of mediocrity. Today the Harvard Club challenges the admiration of all those interested in chorus singing. Dr. Davison has taught these students intelligently, musically; he has not over-trained them, for they sang yesterday with delightful spontaneity, yet with a careful regard for nuances of expression, with a mastery of dynamic gradations. In piano passages there was security of infonation; when full vocal strength was demanded, tonal quality was not lost. Especially noteworthy was the performance of the music by Lotti and Leisring, a performance that might excite the envy of any male chorus composed of picked professional singers who had long worked together.

It was a pleasure to hear the choruses from "The Tower of Babel." When this oratorio was performed by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1883 the music given to the Shemites and the Hamites was thought to be extremely oriental. In 1920 young composers, French, Americans, English, when their musical thoughts turn eastward, are more oriental than the orientals themselves.

It was a happy thought to call in the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club for this occasion. The club responded in most generous spirit. Let us hope that these singers next season may be heard in some important work for male voices and orchestra at a subscription concert.

Saint-Saens's impressive symphony was finely played. The lyrical section with organ displayed the eloquence of the upper strings, sonorous and beautiful in the long cantidena. Mr. Monteux gave a dramatic reading, and prepared the grand climaxes in a masterly manner. Mr. Laurent's full tone and expressive interpretation in Gluck's heavenly music were warmly appreciated. A brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar Caprice ended a concert of much more than ordinary interest.

A CAPPELLA—

ADORAMUS TE Giovanni Pierluigi Palestrina (1526-1594)

Adoramus te, Christe!
Et benedicimus tibi.
Quia per sanctam crucem tuam
Redemisti mundum!
Qui passus es pro nobis
Miserere nobis, Domine!

CRUCIFIXUS Antonio Lotti (1667-1740)

Crucifixus etiam pro nobis, sub Pontio Pilato; passus, et sepultus est.

O FILII ET FILIAE Volckmar Leisring (-1637)

O filii et filiae!
Rex celestis! Rex glorie!
Christus surrexit hodie!
Alleluia.

TWO PICTURES from the "Tower of Babel"

Anton Gregorovitch Rubinstein (1830-1894)

FIRST PICTURE. Chorus of the Sons of Ham:—

Forth from Euphrates' fertile vale we wander,
Unto the burning sandy desert,
Where the sun darts forth his ray,
And night ne'er cools the heat of day!

We roam far and wide without rest or peace,
Like the sand when blown by the whirlwind
So wander we forever.

We pitch our light tent, and our cattle graze,
And the place of our sojourning
Sees us no more returning.

SECOND PICTURE. Chorus of the Sons of Japheth:—

Where in inlets deep sports the ocean glad,
Where the murmuring streamlet the shore doth kiss,
That bright shore all in verdure clad:
There, make we our abode.

Where in desolate forests, in piny crag
Eagles build their eyrie,
Where all around is heard ne'er a sound:
There, make we our abode.

Where on high their blue peaks the mountains raise;
Where the landscape ever new charm unfolds
To the spirits' dreamy gaze:
There, make we our abode.

PRAYER OF THANKSGIVING Netherlands Folk-song

We gather together to ask the Lord's blessing,
He chastens and hastens his will to make known:
The wicked oppressing cease then from distressing,
Sing praises to his name, he forgets not his own.

Beside us to guide us, our God with us joining,
Ordaining, maintaining his kingdom divine,
So from the beginning the fight we were winning!
Thou, Lord, wast at our side, the glory be thine!

We all do extol thee, thou Leader in battle,
And pray that thou still our Defender wilt be.
Let thy congregation escape tribulation:
Thy name be ever praised! O Lord, make us free!

The Symphony Orchestra Plays for Its Pension Fund—Lights and Shadows Upon The New Quality of the Band—Mr. Monteux and Theatre-Music—Dr. Davison's Glee Club from Harvard Assists in Familiar Glories—Mmes Lipkowska and Raisa Reveal Themselves in Variegated Song—Mr. Griffes and Fate—Mr. Heifetz Departs

WITH music of the theatre, with music depending for impression, there or elsewhere, upon rhythm and color, there is no doubting Mr. Monteux's admirable powers. Thus, on Saturday evening, as after-piece to Mr. Cortot's concert, he repeated the introduction to the first act and the march from the third act in Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel." To the march, awaited by his simple-minded, obedient, inquisitive folk, foolish, doting old King Dodon brings back his bride, the capricious and fantastical Queen of Shemanakha. Warriors and slaves lead the procession; then come the giants, dwarfs, acrobats and "freaks" with which it was her custom to be amused; and last appear high in their gilded chariot their Majesties themselves. The folk, says the stage-direction, are as "excited as children"; akin to a page from some big, warmly colored child's picture-book should be the pageant; the music, like the rest of the opera, takes half-seriously, half-mockingly, the action it clothes and points. For a few measures before the march sounds, there is preluding of the expectant, bobbing; then from a distance it begins; soon the warriors, the slaves, are hastening across the scene. Then, look at the acrobats turning hand-springs, O Marousia! See the one-eyed giant, O my Feodor! And last—molto crescendo—the queen, the royal pair themselves.

Not many in Symphony Hall had seen and heard the opera; fewer still could have read and remembered it; there were no stage, no pageant, no crowd, no lights, settings, dresses and bustle. Yet by sheer imagination in the quickening or the staying of the rhythms, in the quality and the intensity of tone, in the varying play of harmonic and instrumental color, Mr. Monteux gave the music almost the effect it gains in the theatre—manifold and freakish, suspensive and exciting, pageant of the stage, picture-book of folk-lore. By like intuition and experience with rhythm, with like sensibility to sustained or modulated tone, Mr. Monteux kept the quality of the droning or the prattling music of the lazy, sunny introduction.

On Sunday afternoon at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund, the conductor did as much for another music of Rimsky-Korsakov that he was undertaking for the first time in Boston—the "Spanish Caprice," show-piece, these many years at Symphony Hall. It was not written for the theatre; but it might well be shifted thither. The wonder is, indeed, that Mr. Diaghilev or Mme. Pavlova has not long since laid transferring hand upon it. The final "Fandango of the Asturias" invites the rhythmic and colorful whirl of the Russian dance; the repeated introduction is as tempting; individual and artful prowess could display itself (as it does in the concert-hall) to the variations and to the succession of cadenzas. The eye of fancy readily clothes the music in the glow of Spanish backgrounds and Spanish dresses. Certainly it was as music of the stage that Mr. Monteux brought the Caprice to such performance as in Boston it had never known before. Dr. Muck refined upon the Fandango; Mr. Monteux cut it loose with the keenest intuition in the slackening or the tightening of the rhythm. It rushed; it glowed. There was like rhythmic flare, like tonal elasticity in his version of the introduction returning as intermezzo; while this or that virtuoso of the orchestra proved his mettle in variations or cadenzas. Who but Rimsky-Korsakov, in sheer exuberance of mastery, would have set first violin over snare-drum and bade the rest of the band be silent? Of all the show-pieces of Symphony Hall none is quite so good fun as this "Spanish Caprice." The bearded, spectacled composer, professor of this and that in one and t'other state school, must have had "the time of his life" as he wrote it.

In this Caprice, in the other orchestral numbers of Sunday afternoon—Saint-Saëns's "organ" symphony and the dance of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields of Gluck's "Orpheus"; in Debussy's Fantasia and other music of Saturday evening, the quality of the reconstituted orchestra stood fairly clear. The wood-winds, of course—virtually an unchanged choir—keep their familiar distinctions. Mr. Laurent, indeed, spoke for them when he played the flute-part in Gluck's dance with a felicity of tone that was the flower of technical skill and musical perception. In the transparent, undulant voice of his flute went the simplicity, remoteness, wistfulness of Gluck's measures, painting in melody and modulation what a century later Puvis de Chavannes painted in line and color. There might have been softer, more shimmering texture in the voices of the accompanying violins. Warmth, animation, accent, alertness the string choir does not lack; its bows bite; its instruments sing. Yet it might be mellow, more translucent, more golden of tone; while the darker voices are not yet numerous enough for full underbody, for rich or darkly glowing background. The brass keeps balance; the players upon the instruments of percussion feel rhythm and color. There was no doubting the power of the orchestra in the upswelling periods of Saint-Saëns's symphony or the climax of Rimsky-Korsakov's march. Its elasticities quickened the occasional monotones of Debussy's Allegros. It sustained, full-throated, the ample progress of Saint-Saëns's slow movements. A finer-textured, a more sensitive, a more euphonious tone are necessarily works of time. Mr. Monteux's acute ear and tireless hand should yet achieve them. The autumn will not go far before the orchestra in quality as well as in numbers will again be the orchestra.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 18, at 3.30

For a second time a choir from Harvard led by Dr. Davison shared in a concert for the Pension Fund—the Glee Club as he has developed it into a body of adept singers unsurpassed hereabouts, and probably through the whole country, in the music that it sings. As the tale is told, Dr. Davison has a theory about the youth he has brought to such perfections. They are of an age—he believes—that craves self-expression, emotional, even romantic self-expression. As individuals they will not so release themselves; it is bad form according to the lights of their years and station. No more will they do so in a work specifically from their hands, like a story for print, a play for the theatre, a drawing for public exhibition. Per contra, assemble them in numbers with each separate identity merged into a mass; give them some common channel for mutual expression like choral song—and the inhibitions disappear, the checked impulses find voice and the outcome is a rare warmth, sensibility, sincerity of utterance. Whatever the theory, the Glee Club under Dr. Davison's training and by its own united effort has certainly attained these qualities. Yet, being wise, he has been careful to instil and cultivate the technical means that best release them. The student-singers now share his ear for roundness, smoothness, transparency of tone. They know and use the virtues of exact intonation and clean-cut song. They have gained the finesse that modulates and shades a long vocal gradient. At need they can summon vigor, but their tone never becomes harsh; at need they can sustain unclouded a delicate softness of song; while between goes unfailing elasticity. When a choir of men and boys from the basilicas of Rome visited the United States last autumn, it received just praise for the quality of its song. Yet it is excelled here in America, no farther away than Cambridge, by the youth of Harvard College—and, most of all, by Dr. Davison.

Ancient churchly music, unaccompanied, from Palestrina, Lotti and Lelzing and modern pieces—two choruses from Rubinstein's oratorio, "The Tower of Babel," and Coleridge-Taylor's setting of Newbolt's churning ballad, "Drake's Drum"—exemplified these abilities on Sunday, with a folk-chorus of the Netherlands, "Prayer of Thanksgiving," added for good measure. In this piece, moreover, and the fragments from Rubinstein, the orchestra joined the singers. The sons of Ham sing of their wanderings in murmuring, monotonously rhythmical oriental song. The half-voice of the choir, the sustained yet flexible rhythm won the ear. The sons of Japhet sing an idyl of mountain and sea. The Glee Club looped the gentle phrases as though not eighty voices, but rather one, were shaping them. In the clean-cut, sturdy singing of "Drake's Drum" Dr. Davison and his choir imparted exactly the stark sinewy vigors of English balladry when it puts by its bane which is over-sentiment. The folk-chorus ascended in broadly sustained and interlocked sonorities. Yet in the churchly pieces, the finest glories of conductor and chorus stood clear. Often the intrinsic beauty of the tone was an emotion in itself. At the beginning of Lotti's "Crucifixus," indeed throughout the piece, it melted not only the listening ear, but the answering heart. The contrasts of Palestrina's "Adoramus Te" seemed more as the quickened impulses of devout spirits stirred than as the prescriptions of the composer. When the ancient painters set on canvas the ascension of Jesus, they suffused the surrounding air with radiance. So sounded the voices as phrase upon phrase ascended in Lelzing's seemingly simple hymn. In such singing live the very body and spirit of this ancient music of devotion. The mind follows the artfully interwoven strands, heeds the adroit contrasts; the ear receives the beauty of the singers' tone laid upon them; the heart swells to the warmth, the depth of the simple, the direct emotion. Far away across a gulf of method and spirit wider than the three centuries, seemed the Saint-Saëns of the "effective" climaxes, the smoothed slow movements, the neat Allegros of the "organ" symphony.

The assistance of the Harvard Glee Club is gratefully acknowledged by the Pension Fund Institution.

SYMPHONY HALL

40th Season

1920-1921

Archibald Thompson Davison

Symphony Hall, Boston

"THE MAN WHO MADE US"

Trans. — Apr. 10, 1920
Dr. Davison Whose Work and Spirit
Has Transformed the Harvard Glee Club
Into a Remarkable Men's Choir—As His Singers See Him

If you ask any member of the Harvard Glee Club how it happens that the club has achieved the impossible and become one of the most thoroughly trained and accomplished men's choruses in the country, the answer is simply "Doc."

Dr. Archibald T. Davison—or Assistant Professor Davison, to be exact, for that is his title on the Harvard record books, although the men in the Glee Club all call him "Doc"—has spent most of his thirty-five years at Harvard. He studied there as an undergraduate from 1902 to 1906. He continued there, doing graduate work in music, with one brief intermission when he studied the organ under Widor in Paris, taking first prizes for his playing. He began to teach in 1908. In 1910 he became organist and choirmaster at the college chapel. This position he still holds. Meanwhile, during the last ten years his growing success has carried him steadily up the ladder of promotion to the rung of assistant professor. In 1916 one of his compositions was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now he is directing the Glee Club. A few years ago one of his Harvard choirs sang with the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck; a week from next Sunday his Glee Club will sing with it under Mr. Monteux.

That is all you find on the college records, and it doesn't look like anything extraordinary. What matters is the story that lies behind those commonplace facts. Davison, as choirmaster, began to attract attention a good many years ago by making the Harvard choir a brilliant musical organization. He taught them, little by little, the best church music of all ages and he revealed to them the fascination of that music. Many members of the choir were also members of the Glee Club of that day—on ordinary college Glee Club, wedded to a banjo club and a mandolin club, and dedicated to the cause of sentimental or jazz music lifted from the musical comedy stage. These particular men, to whom Davison had revealed the fact that first-class music is worth singing, preferred the things he taught them to the stuff which they performed in the Glee Club. They found that the better the music, the more fun it was to sing and the more the audience liked it.

So, to make a long story short, this year the Glee Club turned over a new leaf, forsook the instrumental clubs, and set out for itself. As now organized, it is new in everything but name. And the members of the club are still marveling at the success of their venture, and wondering whether the critics are really sincere in saying that the club has not only out-distanced all other college glee clubs, but gone far toward surpassing all other choral organizations in the country, of whatever sort, with the possible exception of the Russian Cathedral Choir in New York. The voices of the men in the club are not remarkable. They are not a brilliantly musical group. And yet Davison has made them into the most perfectly sensitive musical instrument, capable of performing the most difficult choral music. How does he do it?

Dr. Davison is a smallish, strongly-built, light-haired man of about 35. Not an unusual-looking fellow, except, perhaps, for his keen blue eyes. But watch him as with his quick step he walks upon the concert platform and begins to lead the chorus. He is electric with energy and controlled enthusiasm. Listen to him as he talks to the men between pieces. You can see that he has leadership, sympathy, and a friendly attitude toward the men no less than he has an alert sensitiveness to musical values. The men are loyal to him. They follow his every motion, listen to his every word; and the result is that he plays upon them as he might upon an organ. It is the old, old story of the power of personality.

If you ask Dr. Davison how such a state of affairs has been brought about, he tells you about a prominent musician connected with another well-known college, who heard the Harvard Glee Club and went home and asked the leader of his own glee club why they didn't have the same sort of thing.

"I guess we never thought of it," said the leader.

"That's just it," says Dr. Davison. "Most college glee clubs haven't thought of it. Those fellows happened to have the idea. They put it through. It works. And I will venture that other clubs could do the same thing if they woke up to the fact that the better the music you sing, the more you and your audience enjoy it." But the undergraduates in the club prefer their own explanation. They simply point to the fact that Harvard has its Dr. Davison, and not every college possesses such a source of musical enthusiasm and inspiration.

We all do extol thee, thou Leader in battle,
And pray that thou still our Defender wilt be.
Let thy congregation escape tribulation:
Thy name be ever praised! O Lord, make us free!

PENSION CONCERT BEST YET

Harvard Glee Club
Sings With Symphony

Post ——— Apr. 19, 1920
BY OLIN DOWNES

Perhaps the finest programme in the history of the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions, conducted by Pierre Monteux, were Saint-Saens' C minor symphony for organ and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously-colored "Spanish Caprice." These works and their performance would have made the concert well worth while. In addition, the Harvard Glee Club, directed by Dr. Archibald Davison, sang a capella music by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring, two "pictures" from a forgotten choral work of Rubinstein, "The Tower of Babel," and the Netherlands folk-song known as "Prayer of Thanksgiving," with accompaniment of orchestra and organ.

IDEAL PROGRAMME

In all respects this was an ideal programme for a Sunday afternoon concert. The Saint-Saens symphony is a sonorous and impressive work, very seriously composed, yet with sufficient brilliancy and dramatic rhetoric in it to make it immediately popular. It enlisted the full resources of the orchestra, and those who do not regularly attend these concerts had unusual opportunity in this symphony and in the scintillating music of Rimsky-Kors-koff to realize what wonderful things these players bring to pass.

The singing of the chorus was extremely impressive. Too much praise cannot be given Dr. Davison for the work he accomplishes with these singers. They are young men, with voices of good or average quality, many of whom are not preparing for a musical career, with whom music is a side issue at the college. Yet the most noted

note Apr. 19, 1920
The Harvard Glee Club, which under Dr. Davison's remarkably able leadership has become the finest chorus in Boston, assisted the Symphony Orchestra at yesterday's Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall. Their singing, both a capella and with orchestral accompaniment, was of such phenomenal excellence that the prolonged and spontaneous applause which greeted it was thoroughly deserved. They gave one encore, "Drake's Drum," by Coleridge-Taylor, but, probably owing to the length of the program, resisted determined efforts to obtain other extras.

Following the present policy of the Glee Club at all its concerts their selections were of as high artistic quality as those of the Symphony Orchestra. Palestrina's "Adoramus Te," one of the most perfect and most moving pieces in the whole range of religious music, could hardly have been better sung by the Vatican Choir than it was yesterday by these college students.

The individual voices in the Glee Club are few of them exceptional, but the ensemble singing has a tone quality, a precision of attack and phrasing and a clarity of enunciation rare in the work of the best professional singers. Dr. Davison both feels and understands the music he conducts, but it seems almost miraculous that he can get such intelligent and enthusiastic cooperation from an amateur chorus.

The two choruses from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," in which Mr. Monteux led the Glee Club and orchestra, are seldom heard. Yet their oriental atmosphere, with its vivid rhythms and distinctive harmonies, recalled the work of Borodin and of Rimsky-Korsakoff rather than the pseudo-German banality of the composer's more familiar works and suggested that other delvers among his forgotten pieces might, like Dr. Davison, make interesting discoveries.

A performance which was both accurate and spirited won instant favor with the audience. The "Prayer of Thanksgiving," one of the loveliest of folk tunes, in an excellent arrangement for chorus, orchestra and organ, was the most memorable item in a memorable concert.

The orchestra gave excellent routine performances of two familiar numbers, Saint-Saens' "Organ" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." Mr. Laurent played the flute solo in the minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus" in masterly fashion. One wished that operatic excerpts of this quality could replace some of the third-rate symphonic music heard at the regular concerts.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 23, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7

- I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro vivace

MOUSSORGSKY,

ORCHESTRAL FANTASIA, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve," ("A Night on the Bare Mountain")

RABAUD,

SYMPHONIC POEM, (after Lenau), "La Procession Nocturne"

SVENDSEN,

EPISODE for Orchestra, "Carnival in Paris" op. 9

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

PENSION CONCERT BEST YET

Harvard Glee Club
Sings With Symphony

Post — Apr. 19, 1920
BY OLIN DOWNES

Perhaps the finest programme in the history of the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions, conducted by Pierre Monteux, were Saint-Saens' C minor symphony for organ and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously-colored "Spanish Caprice." These works and their performance would have made the concert well worth while. In addition, the Harvard Glee Club, directed by Dr. Archibald Davison, sang a capella music by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring, two "pictures" from a forgotten choral work of Rubinstein, "The Tower of Babel," and the Netherlands folk-song known as "Prayer of Thanksgiving," with accompaniment of orchestra and organ.

IDEAL PROGRAMME

In all respects this was an ideal programme for a Sunday afternoon concert. The Saint-Saens symphony is a sonorous and impressive work, very seriously composed, yet with sufficient brilliancy and dramatic rhetoric in it to make it immediately popular. It enlisted the full resources of the orchestra, and those who do not regularly attend these concerts had unusual opportunity in this symphony and in the scintillating music of Rimsky-Korsa-koff to realize what wonderful things these players bring to pass.

The singing of the chorus was extremely impressive. Too much praise cannot be given Dr. Davison for the work he accomplishes with these singers. They are young men, with voices of good or average quality, many of whom are not preparing for a musical career, with whom music is a side issue at the college. Yet the most noted voice — Apr. 19, 1920

The Harvard Glee Club, which under Dr Davison's remarkably able leadership has become the finest chorus in Boston, assisted the Symphony Orchestra at yesterday's Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall. Their singing, both a capella and with orchestral accompaniment, was of such phenomenal excellence that the prolonged and spontaneous applause which greeted it was thoroughly deserved. They gave one encore, "Drake's Drum," by Coleridge-Taylor, but, probably owing to the length of the program, resisted determined efforts to obtain other extras.

Following the present policy of the Glee Club at all its concerts their selections were of as high artistic quality as those of the Symphony Orchestra. Palestrina's "Adoramus Te," one of the most perfect and most moving pieces in the whole range of religious music, could hardly have been better sung by the Vatican Choir than it was yesterday by these college students.

The individual voices in the Glee Club are few of them exceptional, but the ensemble singing has a tone quality, a precision of attack and phrasing and a clarity of enunciation rare in the work of the best professional singers. Dr Davison both feels and understands the music he conducts, but it seems almost miraculous that he can get such intelligent and enthusiastic cooperation from an amateur chorus.

The two choruses from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," in which Mr Monteux led the Glee Club and orchestra, are seldom heard. Yet their oriental atmosphere, with its vivid rhythms and distinctive harmonies, recalled the work of Borodin and of Rimsky-Korsakoff rather than the pseudo-German banality of the composer's more familiar works and suggested that other delvers among his forgotten pieces might, like Dr Davison, make interesting discoveries.

A performance which was both accurate and spirited won instant favor with the audience. The "Prayer of Thanksgiving," one of the loveliest of folk tunes, in an excellent arrangement for chorus, orchestra and organ, was the most memorable item in a memorable concert.

The orchestra gave excellent routine performances of two familiar numbers, Saint-Saens' "Organ" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." Mr Laurent played the flute solo in the minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus" in masterly fashion. One wished that operatic excerpts of this quality could replace some of the third-rate symphonic music heard at the regular concerts.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 23, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7

- I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro vivace

MOUSSORGSKY,

ORCHESTRAL FANTASIA, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve," ("A Night on the Bare Mountain")

RABAUD,

SYMPHONIC POEM, (after Lenau), "La Procession Nocturne"

SVENDSEN,

EPISODE for Orchestra, "Carnival in Paris" op. 9

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

PENSION CONCERT BEST YET

Harvard Glee Club
Sings With Symphony

Post ——— Apr. 19, 1920
BY OLIN DOWNES

Perhaps the finest programme in the history of the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions, conducted by Pierre Monteux, were Saint-Saens' C minor symphony for organ and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously-colored "Spanish Caprice." These works and their performance would have made the concert well worth while. In addition, the Harvard Glee Club, directed by Dr. Archibald Davison, sang a capella music by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring, two "pictures" from a forgotten choral work of Rubinstein, "The Tower of Babel," and the Netherlands folk-song known as "Prayer of Thanksgiving," with accompaniment of orchestra and organ.

IDEAL PROGRAMME

In all respects this was an ideal programme for a Sunday afternoon concert. The Saint-Saens symphony is a sonorous and impressive work, very seriously composed, yet with sufficient brilliancy and dramatic rhetoric in it to make it immediately popular. It enlisted the full resources of the orchestra, and those who do not regularly attend these concerts had unusual opportunity in this symphony and in the scintillating music of Rimsky-Korsakoff to realize what wonderful things these players bring to pass.

The singing of the chorus was extremely impressive. Too much praise cannot be given Dr. Davison for the work he accomplishes with these singers. They are young men, with voices of good or average quality, many of whom are not preparing for a musical career, with whom music is a side issue at the college. Yet the most noted chorus might be proud of such tone-quality, such musicianly pleasing fineness of nuance, clearness of enunciation. More: It was evident that the singers felt the music profoundly. It would be hard to overestimate the effect of this noble music on the audience, as it would be difficult to overestimate the effect on character which work such as Dr. Davison's must exert in a university.

As an encore to the first a capella group, the chorus sang a setting of "Drake's Lullaby." The choruses of Ham and Japheth from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" have a melodious and pseudo-oriental character to commend them, and were greatly enjoyed by the audience. Enthusiasm rose to its height after the "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Finally, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra distinguished themselves in a superb performance of the "Spanish Caprice." The audience was a very large one. The concert will long be remembered.

NEW YORK, April 18—Wall Street viewed this week's action of the Government in approving an issue of short-term Treasury 6½ percent certificates as a formal recognition of the rise in interest rates.

That is the highest interest rate paid by the Government since the Civil War, and it follows a short-term loan made last week by the Pennsylvania, the premier railroad of the country, that cost that company, including bankers' commission, something like 7½ percent. For the past week, or ever since the terms of the Pennsylvania Railroad became known to Wall Street, the price of Liberty Bonds and other high-class securities have been declining. The net result, from the viewpoint of the investor with idle cash seeking employment, is an opportunity that comes once in a lifetime.

This week a number of Liberty issues made new low records for all time, with the income return offered to investors in some cases as high as 7½ percent.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" — Mr. Laurent played the flute solo in the minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus" in masterly fashion. One wished that operatic excerpts of this quality could replace some of the third-rate symphonic music heard at the regular concerts.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 23, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7

- I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro vivace

MOUSSORGSKY,

ORCHESTRAL FANTASIA, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve," ("A Night on the Bare Mountain")

RABAUD,

SYMPHONIC POEM, (after Lenau), "La Procession Nocturne"

SVENDSEN,

EPISODE for Orchestra, "Carnival in Paris" op. 9

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

23D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald

Apr. 24, 1920

Orchestra Gives Eloquent Performance of Schubert Master Work

RUSSIAN'S SATANIC REVEL PICTURESQUE

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d symphony concert, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain", symphonic poem; Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Svendsen, "Carnival at Paris."

Moussorgsky's Fantasia was composed in 1867 and was thus one of the few early Russian orchestral compositions of a fantastically picturesque nature. In the original form it was no doubt crude, for Moussorgsky had little technic for the larger forms of music; he despised "style" and believed that much knowledge would prevent him from attaining the realism that was his goal. That he himself was not satisfied with this symphonic poem is shown by the fact that he revised it two or three times. He died; Rimsky Korsakoff edited it and orchestrated it. The music was finally heard after Moussorgsky's death. Rimsky Korsakoff was a fastidious musician, a learned harmonist, a master of orchestrations. It is said that he sandpapered and polished "Boris Godorenoff" to the great detriment of Moussorgsky's opera; he chastened the wild spirit; he tamed the native savagery so it is said. What did he do to this musical picture of a Witches' Sabbath on Bald Mountain?

Having heard several musical descriptions of these unholy Sabbaths, where reverence was paid Satan, exultantly ruling in the form of a he-goat, where there was horrid, obscene revelry, if we may believe well-instructed ancient and modern writers on Satanism and witchcraft, we wonder why any woman, young or old, straddled a broomstick and made her way hopefully and joyfully to a lonely mountain or barren plain. If we can put faith in the musical descriptions given by Berlioz, Boito, Gounod, Satan's evening receptions were comparatively tame affairs, with dancing of a nature that would not have offended the selectmen and their wives and sisters of our little village in the Sixties; when the waltz was frowned on as a sensual and ungodly diversion. Liszt's Mephisto waltz is, indeed, sensual, fleshly, but Satan in this instance only plays the fiddle; he is not master of Sabbatic revels. In Moussorgsky's symphonic poem, which was performed here for the first time at a Symphony concert—Mr. Longy conducted it 16 years ago at a concert of the Orchestral Club—the allegro devoted to the worshippers of the devil is rather commonplace; its laborious wildness becomes monotonous in spite of the editor's instrumentation. Far more original and effective is the second section, in which a church bell puts the blasphemous revelers to flight.

The performance of Schubert's great symphony was a most eloquent one, surpassing any performance that we remember, here or abroad. It was remarkable by reason of tempi happily chosen; of a poetic treatment of episodes that did not check the musical flow; of a masterly handling of dynamic gradations—witness the marvellously managed sinking from fortissimo to pianissimo in the finale; of brilliant solo work; of the constantly pervading romantic spirit with which the music is charged. One of the many memorable features of this performance was the reading of the opening flourish of the finale; music that would have suited the great feast at which Belshazzar drank wine before a thousand of his lords.

It was a pleasure to hear Rabaud's beautiful music again, beautifully played; not only because this music reminded one of the composer-conductor, his dignified, high-bred, and gentle nature, and the many imaginative interpretations during the last season; the music itself has character and charm.

Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" had not been heard at a symphony concert for many years. As we remembered, it was an earnest, preconcert effort to be jolly with slim results. Yesterday it was, for the most part, fresh and joyous, while the idyllic episode, developed at length, had a northern rather than a Parisian tenderness, and suggested abiding love rather than an accidental amorous encounter.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week, the last of the season, will be as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, Scene and Rondo, "Non temer"; d'Indy, "Istar," variations; Frank Bridge, Sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out You Bugles"; Wagner, overture to "The Mastersingers". John McCormack will be the singer.

SYMPHONY DISPLAYS SCHUBERT

Post — Apr. 24, 1920
First Hearing Given
Striking Russian
Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

Schubert's C major symphony, the one of "heavenly length"—and the description is not inaccurate—opened the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

IMPRESSIVE MUSIC

This symphony made an astonishing impression, not merely because of a very brilliant performance, but above all because of the music itself. And the impression the music made in turn had much to do with Mr. Monteux's treatment of the introduction. We had never heard this part of the symphony read with such feeling and imagination. Once having heard it thus played the hearer was at the mercy, so to speak, of composer and conductor.

We have reservations about Mr. Monteux's interpretation of certain movements. The pace of the slow movement for us verged perilously on "allegretto" (somewhat fast), rather than an "andante con moto" (slow, with motion). The shorter notes, in energetic dotted rhythms, were a little scrambled, and one could have wished a somewhat broader restatement of the theme of the introduction where it recurs at the end of the first movement. These are the reservations. But after the intoxicating beauty of the opening measures and the joyous accents, the fluttering accompaniment figures of the movement proper, one was in no state of mind to bother very much as to details.

Has Marvellous Effect

With a much poorer performance, with wind players of infinitely less art, the symphony would have made a marvellous effect. Perhaps it needed the terrific experiences of a war to make the younger generation realize what a wondrous work this is. It is so clear, so melodious, so Olympian in its joy, and yet it is so human, comprehending, and seraphic in its expression. After innumerable hearings of this symphony its beauty still impresses one afresh as a prodigious and incredible thing. In the slow movement is deep melancholy, but this, and the autumnal sadness of the middle section of the scherzo, are warp and woof of a great poetic fabric which is all-embracing in its emotional gamut, like life, and again, like life, a promise of inconceivable exaltation at some unknown time to come.

But what is the use of attempting to describe the music of Franz Schubert? The audience felt the music profoundly. Personal opinion of certain details of the performance aside, it was a remarkable interpretation in its phrasing, its rhythmic impulse, its revelations of instrumental color.

"Night on Bald Mountain"

Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" was played for the first time at these concerts. This is the argument published in the score: "Subterranean din of supernatural voices. Appearance of spirits of darkness, followed by that of the god Tchernobog. Glorification of Tchernobog. Black mass. Witches' Sabbath. At the height of the Sabbath, there sounds far off the bell of the little church in a village, which scatters the spirits of darkness. Daybreak." It is music highly tinged with Berlioz, effectively orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff, immature in conception, mediocre in invention. For all that it makes a striking effect, and it has imagination. But after all it is a work to be taken with charity by the hearer, and to be regarded with historical forbearance.

The programme was completed by Henri Rabaud's poetic "Procession nocturne," and by Svendsen's brilliant "Carnaval in Paris."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. MONTEUX FINDS NEW VOICE FOR SCHUBERT

A Performance of the Symphony in C Major, Departing from "the Tradition," Shunning Sentimentality, Rekindling and Exalting the Music—The Disappointing Musorgsky of a Tone-Picture—Rabaud and Svendsen, Carnival and Contemplation, Set in Contrast

NOT long ago Monsieur Camille Chevillard, the eminent Parisian conductor, paid a professional visit to the German cities on the west bank of the Rhine, now occupied by French soldiery. At one of them, Mainz, he led a German orchestra through various French and German pieces. An English listener, who happened to be in the audience, recorded in a letter to a friend in America the tendency of the German band to linger over songful measures, to sentimentalize them; whereas the French director was disposed to brisker pace and more energetic progress. In Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, thought of this contrast returned before Mr. Monteux and his orchestra had proceeded far into Schubert's symphony in C major. Never before had most of the audience received the music from a French conductor; while few could have heard it anywhere or from any hand in such quick movement. Mr. Gericke, in his days at Symphony Hall, liked to say that Schubert spoke for himself; that with this symphony all the conductor needed to do was "to let it run." Yet neither he nor his German successors, if they shared that belief, quite fulfilled it. In spite of their minds, their hearts and also their hands drew out long Schubert's instrumental melodies. With reason they loved them—for it is the way of his music to inspire an almost personal affection—and they were prone to dwell upon their love. They were disposed also and in like spirit, to soften the composer's vigors in contrasting measures and to set forth the whole symphony in "sweetness and light," as so much lyric song with the orchestra as singer. So treated, the music almost always seemed lengthy, repetitious, over-written. There was not only beauty, but a surfeit of beauty.

A year and more ago, when Mr. Rabaud undertook the Unfinished Symphony, he gave hint of a French way with Schubert's music; while yesterday, with the symphony in C, Mr. Monteux supplemented suggestion with revelation. Throughout, and particularly in the first movement, he took the music at a swifter pace than is the German way. He indeed disclosed it as instrumental song, stirring the ear, stimulating fancy, warming emotions; but at every turn he shunned the sentimentality that lingers and sugars. More: when Schubert spoke boldly, largely, as he does, for example, in the introductory Andante and in the Finale, the conductor sustained his vigors, communicated his energies. Then the music strode, as in tonal mass, wide-spaced, plastic, buoyant. In such voice the symphony, for once and in spite of Schubert's repetitions, escaped tedious lengths, sustained animation, gained contrasts, tingled upon the ear as well as caressed it. Modulations seemed more impulsive; decorative figures ran more brightly; the music had sinew as well as grace; suggestion replaced over-emphasis; spacious simplicities relieved linked sweetness. On the other hand, in this speed, vigor and breadth of contour, not a few of Schubert's marvellous euphonies, tremulous modulations, flecks of ornament, merely swept past—barely heeded eddies upon the flood of tone. Even so, it was new and penetrating sensation to hear this symphony in C unsentimentalized, led, as it were, out of the hothouse of reverent and affectionate tradition, into the open air of direct yet romantic speech.

So played and heard, moreover, the symphony gained an appeal to the mind and the imagination. No longer did it address only the innocently sensuous ear. The instrumental melody of Schubert is often like to the opening of a window in a bright morning upon a fair prospect. Fresh is the air, warm and quivering the sunshine. Akin to rapture is the first deep sensation. But Schubert lingers over the melody; while the listener tarries, as it were, at the opened casement. Before long, the prospect becomes familiar, soon a little monotonous. Look, look and look again Schubert seems to be saying with his tremulous modulations and gliding figures; whereas Beethoven, for example, more variously developing his instrumental song, is ever finding new vistas, arraying new lights and shadows. Schubert may cloy; Beethoven never satiates. The quick pace, the kindling energies, the bold contrasts of Mr. Monteux with this symphony in C relaxed these limitations. Upon a terrace sweeping the tonal landscape, rather than from window to window in more separate contemplation, walked the listener. Besides, in the introductory Andante, in the Finale, in measure through the slow movement, it was possible to feel as in new sensation the frequent spaciousness, the recurring exaltation of Schubert's speech in tones. After all, he was more than writer of relatively simple song, in endless fertility, for orchestra as for voice. In the symphony in C, in the Unfinished Symphony he also achieved the noble period, the tongue of power. Achieving them, moreover, he strode onward; while it is over his purest and most naïve instrumental song that he lingers until satiety numbs the hearer. One and another, of late, has argued for a sympathetic revision of this symphony of the "heavenly lengths," excising repetitions, daring discreet compressions. When Mr. Monteux wings the music, as he did yesterday, the listener is not so sure of such necessity.

Thus did Schubert prevail through the length and breadth of the concert, though it was no distinguished miscellany that followed his symphony. Expectation was keen over Mussorgsky's tone-picture of a witches' Sabbath—"A Night on Bald Mountain"; but, as the music soon made evident, there are at least three Mussorgskys. First the Mussorgsky of the songs and a few piano-pieces (like "Pictures at an Exhibition")—composer of rare delineative imagination playing through the barest of expressive means. Second, the Mussorgsky of the theatre—of the music-dramas of "Boris Godunov" and in less degree, "Khovanchchina"—who could summon to the stage beyond any other composer, the voice and the spirit of the folk; who, again, could strip tones until they are like a naked nerve of speech or emotion. Third, the Mussorgsky of this tone-picture and of a few other symphonic pieces, wherein he is, in no respect individual or significant composer. Toward the end of "A Night on Bald Mountain," a distant church-bell interrupts the satanic revels; they subside; the dawn breaks serene upon a smiling earth, upon the untroubled spirits of a sleeping, pious folk. And the music that is to summon this illusion is veritable commonplace—Mild-Victorian or worse. An English "successor to Mendelssohn" would have made it more graphic. As amorphous, cloudy and relatively feeble is the din of the devilish rout. Suspensive pauses, sharp juxtapositions, insistent or broken rhythms, wild reels, tonal mutterings and shriekings are Mussorgsky's means. Valiantly he strives with them; unmoved the hearer watches the struggle. Never once does the listener say to himself "I am there," and only rarely "This is Mussorgsky." "Allegro Feroce" he labels the piece.

"The Black Mass"—the impious sacrifice of the buck goat—is, he says, celebrated. Memory recalls Berlioz's infernal trombones designed by the composer "to shout obscenities"—and the one stage direction is as foolish and futile as the other. No! Mussorgsky, even revised—once more—by the indispensable Rimsky-Korsakov was not a composer of symphonic music.

Two more tone-pictures—Rabaud's "Midnight Procession" and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris"—at least set each other in contrast. So far as they go, the Frenchman's exact and economical measures summon vision of the still, solitary, foreboding forest; of the train of old men, boys and virgins that cross it singing a holy chant, bathed in semi-celestial glow; of the bitter, torturing emotion in the soul of the watching Faust. Precisely the composer has shaped his design, assembled and adjusted his means; even the proper page of Wagner to recall and utilize never once escapes him. A deliberate music accomplishes as deliberate an end: Better far than these calculations, the Svendsen that "cuts loose." His rhythms snap; his phrases chortle; his tumult is gay; his dissonances squeak and scream; and how warm-hearted, and warm-voiced is his amorous interlude upon the songful strings and horns. (For symphonic carnivals are as obliging as stage-carnivals when lovers crave solitude.) Hardly a brilliant or a highly fanciful music; yet colorful, brightly rhythmed, vivid and animated withal. Handiwork, if the hearer chooses, yet not altogether the handiwork of a thoughtful, an eminently respectable gentleman making effective music. The bourgeoisie may have their Rabaud and welcome. They could not and did not quite kill Svendsen's native wildness.

H. T. PARKER

April Boston Music 24.1920
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on April 23 with the following program:

Schubert.....Symphony in C major
Mussorgsky, "Une nuit sur le Mont Chauve" Rabaud....."La Procession Nocturne"
Svendsen....."Carnival in Paris"

A program, almost entirely devoted to the symphonic poem, could not fail but produce a certain sense of monotony, which was not lessened by Schubert's symphony. This symphony contains many beautiful thoughts, but would that they were more succinctly expressed. The performance was all that could be desired, spirited, warm, emotional, and the phrasing (particularly by Mr. Longy in the andante), was of great beauty.

Mussorgsky's tone poem was played for the first time at these concerts. It is picturesque music, brilliantly orchestrated and plainly shows the influence of Liszt and Berlioz.

Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," already known here, recalled pleasantly the days when its distinguished composer conducted the orchestra. Its romantic melancholy was admirably delineated by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, which played with evident sympathy for the work. The incidental violin solo was expressively rendered by Mr. Theodorowicz. Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" is a lively affair. If not serious music, it is still effective even in these days of highly colored orchestral effects.

MONTEUX SHINES IN SYMPHONY PROGRAM

April 24, 1920
Schubert's Long Work Given
Spirited Production

Mussorgsky, Svendsen and Rabaud
Contribute to the List

Whatever his general merits and defects may be, there is plainly one point on which Mr. Monteux surpasses most of his predecessors, the ability to choose interesting programs. At yesterday's Symphony concert there was no soloist and no new composition. The chief item was Schubert's C major Symphony, one of the masterpieces which a wise tradition requires to be played every other season.

Instead of getting other and perhaps less welcome routine numbers out of the way at the same concert, as Dr. Muck would probably have done, Mr. Monteux chose two unfamiliar numbers by Mussorgsky and Svendsen, and repeated from last season what was then a well-liked novelty, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne."

The applause showed that the audience got as much pleasure from the concert as they would from one with special features in the shape of a soloist of the first rank or an outstanding novelty.

The length of Schubert's C major Symphony is proverbial. Some have found it heavenly, and others have hinted that a few cuts would do no harm. Mr. Monteux did not take all the repeats, and he hurried the Andante into a sort of "Marche Militaire." The result was an exceptionally brief and spirited performance which stressed the gaiety of the music at the expense of its quiet lyric melancholy. Yet the peculiar charm of Schubert depends on a blending of both qualities.

Mussorgsky's orchestral fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain," was first written in 1867 and afterwards revised by the composer and by his friend Rimsky-Korsakov. It had never been played till yesterday at the Symphony concerts. The music deals with a Russian Witches' Sabbath, which contrasts with the one in the last movement of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" to be heard next week. The themes are not strong enough intrinsically to avoid bombastic effects when they are given out fortissimo by full orchestra.

The work is, as a whole, rather tentative, but interesting historically as a specimen of the early work of the modern Russian school of composers. The performance had all the requisite dash and fire.

Svendsen's "Carnival" is one of those agreeable minor works easily listened to and as easily forgotten, which show great talent and a slender creative imagination. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" escapes falling in the same category chiefly because every bit of it is delicately and finely wrought.

Perfect workmanship and the infinite capacity for taking pains are not quite genius, but when guided by a taste as exquisite as Mr. Rabaud's they can produce works sure to give pleasure to cultivated musician. Mr. Monteux no pains to make the perfect the music.

SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SEASON

Thursday Evening, April 22, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

PIANIST

When E. Robert Schmitz played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last February 13 and 14, the newspapers commented as follows:

Boston Herald: "Mr. Schmitz displayed a singularly beautiful and liquid touch, a strength that is in contrast with his delicate, sensitive appearance, compelling brilliance, and exquisite phrasing."

Boston Transcript: "His light, bright touch suited the music; he had been sensitive to its caprice of rhythm, modulation, mood, and course."

Boston Post: "Mr. Schmitz proved himself a super-pianist in mastering any and all difficulties, in showing his complete orchestral understanding of the music, in expressing himself on the piano with a virtuosity as unbridled and yet under control as certain as the virtuosity of the composer."

Boston Globe: "Mr. Schmitz plays with remarkable technical skill and with feeling for the spirit of the music. He will be heard again with pleasure."

Christian Science Monitor: "His tone is of great beauty, and his playing indicated the true artist."

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

From Schubert to Schmitz

Originally announced to be played in Boston as a companion piece to Mr. Carpenter's Concertino on the occasion of Mr. Robert Schmitz's first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra, the Symphonic Variations of Franck came finally to performance in Cambridge last evening, with Mr. Schmitz as pianist. Each succeeding time that he is heard Mr. Schmitz strengthens the excellent impression which he originally made. At his recent recital he revealed many admirable qualities which he could hardly display in his rather inconspicuous part in the Concertino. And if he disclosed no additional virtues last evening, at least he fulfilled the expectation that he would bring César Franck's golden music to finer and more revealing performance than it had ever received here. Exquisitely sensitive, finely poised—perhaps beyond any pianist that has come to us—yet brilliant when the occasion demands, Mr. Schmitz is preëminently fitted to play these Variations, and his performance of them was a thing long to be remembered. Mr. Monteux and the Orchestra led or followed, according to their place in the musical scheme, no less responsive than Mr. Schmitz to its varying moods, no less sensitive to its changing flux and flow.

As the performance of the Variations surpassed its predecessors, so in many respects was Mr. Monteux unusually happy in his reading of Schubert's Symphony in C major. By his tactful quickening of the pace in the Andante, by his successful maintenance of the pervading rhythm of all the movements—yet with no slighting of details—and by his skilful brightening of Schubert's instrumental colors, Mr. Monteux made the lengths of the symphony more endurable than they have been within recollection. Many varying comments have been passed on this symphony, if Schumann found its length "heavenly," Bernard Shaw has pronounced it to be no more than a huge "Rossini crescendo," yet so discriminating a musician as Felix Weingartner confesses that the piece exhilarates him strangely, giving him the sensation of a flight through space. Certainly Beethoven at thirty-one had written no music to compare with it, perhaps he never attained to the sweep of the first and final movements, but Schubert had the good fortune to be born twenty-seven years later. On the other hand, Hector Berlioz, who in the minds of most musicians does not occupy so high a place as Schubert in the Pantheon of composers, was but four years his junior, and he composed his "Fantastic Symphony" when he was twenty-nine, but two years after this symphony of Schubert's—a circumstance which may well modify our admiration for Schubert's orchestration, superior as it is to that of his fore-runners. And while Schubert was writing the last of the great line of "classical symphonies," his French contemporary was blazing the trail for modern music; and the four years which separate them now seem like half a century.

The remainder of the programme fell to Musorgsky's Orchestral Fantasia, "A Night on Bald Mountain" and "Svendsten's Carnival in Paris." Composed in 1867, Musorgsky's piece is chiefly interesting as one of the first examples of the nationalistic tendency in Russian symphonic music. Although unquestionably wild, it probably was much more "blood-curdling" when it was first played than it is today. And the closing Andante is weak and commonplace, realizing but faintly the picturesque suggestion of the "argument" found in the score of the bell of the little church in the village which sounds far off scattering the spirits of Darkness, with the ensuing dawn of day. Musorgsky's lack of training deprived him of the constructive power necessary for even so simple a piece as this. Perhaps his "Boris" will hold the stage for sometime, at least in Russia, but there is every probability that in the not-far-distant future he will be known only through his extraordinary songs, and as a composer whose greatest work was after all the inspiration which he gave to his fellows and his followers. On the other hand, because of Svendsen's greater skill in composition and superior mastery of orchestration his "Carnival in Paris," although composed but three years later, sounds far fresher today. And he had but a tithe of Musorgsky's genius and originality. While no more typical of Paris than of any other gay city, this Carnival is brilliant, exciting even in such performance as it received last evening. The instrumentation is highly effective and there is genuine beauty in the lyrical section. As in the last concerts in Boston there was no longer any thought in the playing of the orchestra of its recent vicissitudes. It is possible that there will be improvement in certain minor details next season; but there is no longer any need for reservations or apologies. W. S. S.

Schmitz a Versatile Pianist

Post Apr. 18, 1920.

A Virtuoso Creative and Interpretive — At Home With Modern French Music—"Monsieur Beaucaire"—What Is an Operetta?

Most concerts, or recitals, are not worth writing about. Still less reading about. It is hard enough to write the 16483d article about a pianist or a singer or fiddler and say something interesting under any circumstances, but it is really unfair to expect any writer to say something interesting about a concert which does not deserve space in a newspaper at all.

But when an artist does come along who is worth writing about great is the joy in newspaper row. This reflection is inspired by the piano recital given by Robert Schmitz last Thursday afternoon in Jordan Hall. That was a concert, he is a pianist, worth writing about.

An artist is not worth writing about because of his whiskers or his "technique," or the fact that he tells you how Lady Paget gave him letters of introduction to all the best people in this saintly town, or because he has studied with all of the great teachers and played with all the noted orchestras in the world, or even because he can play important compositions in a brilliant and authoritative manner. An artist is worth listening to, learning from, and telling a reader to the best of one's ability what one has learned when he interprets in a great and creative manner.

A Creative Artist

Mr. Schmitz, a virtuoso of the first rank, an orchestral conductor, a learned and versatile musician, is also a creative artist. When he interprets the music of a given composer he first lays at the composer's disposal his technique, his musicianship, his eclectic appreciation of the music of that composer and his school. After which, starting from this point, Mr. Schmitz presents the music in the mirror of his own striking individuality. Since this pianist is a man of intellect, imagination, with an evidently profound knowledge of his art, it develops that in conveying the message of the composer he gives it a personal inflection, coloring and emotional quality which is significantly expressive of himself. His own imagination and personality causes him to re-create, though not to re-compose the music, as he plays.

As a matter of fact, any artist who interprets must re-create his music. He will either do this or he will do a negative thing which has no real vitality or significance for anyone. There is no middle path. No man interprets a piece of music exactly as it is written or exactly as the composer intended, any more than any man ever knows the exact truth about anything, or there exists a single person who is not to a greater or lesser degree insane. There are varying degrees of insanity. Absolute sanity, the ability to perceive values exactly as they stand, uncolored by personal qualifications of vision, or to make any purely reasonable and dispassionate decision—this does not exist. According to the same principle, an interpretive artist to be sincere must interpret the music as it appeals to him, and can never hope to interpret the music in precise accordance with either the letter or the spirit of the printed page.

Players Who Imitate

But most performers do not interpret at all. They play as they have been told to play. They follow the signposts provided by the expression marks in a score. They play the music inch by inch, looking no farther than their nose. They very seldom indeed consult themselves, and say, "Now, having studied this music with all care and reverence for a work of art, do I, can I, feel it as as I am informed I should feel it?" They do not do this, and then act accordingly. They are slavish imitators. Others are reckless poseurs or charlatans. The very few emerge from the mass fitted by knowledge, by breadth of appreciation, by temperament, by respect for their own immortal soul, to say something important to the world. Mr. Schmitz is such a musician. So, among his colleagues are, for example, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Rachmaninoff, Mr. George Copeland in certain music and when he is wholly in the vein, and there are, of course, others, a number whose names do not come instantaneously to mind, but they are, relatively speaking, very few.

Mr. Schmitz is an interesting pianist for another reason. He is in the broadest and most fundamental meaning of the phrase the admirable exponent of a certain school. He is, as we have tried to show, a strong individuality as an artist, but he is also a French artist and an artist peculiarly in sympathy with the music of his country and his period.

E. Robert Schnitz, pianist.

Doubtless he will be heard in other music than that by modern French and Russian composers in time to come, and it is reasonably certain that he will show the same fine appreciation when he plays German, Scandinavian, English, American or other music that other French musicians of today display in the same circumstances. Witness the accomplishments of Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts in the last two years. But at the bottom of his soul Mr. Schnitz is a French pianist, his musical consciousness is French, and we think it evident that these racial and temperamental characteristics of his art result in certain valuable and unusual characteristics of his piano playing.

French Piano Compositions

The compositions for piano as well as the performance of piano virtuoso of this period in French musical development show that combination of extremely clear, scientific analysis with the intuition for pure beauty which has always been characteristic of French art. Take the compositions of Debussy or Ravel. They carry on piano technic, piano effects, to places never reached before, but they do this less as Liszt for instance, did it—by making an orchestra of the piano—than by reckoning first of all with what the piano is. These Frenchmen reflect, before they begin to write, on the peculiar beauties and the characteristic limitations of the instrument. The resultant step in the evolution of piano music is one marvellously expressive of the spirit of the instrument itself, yet new, and intoxicating in its possibilities. It is as if the piano had gratefully responded, as if, having at last found in a composer or two a congenial confidant, it had said, "Since you understand me and sympathize with me so deeply, I will show you some things you will be glad to know, which I have never told anyone else." Therefore we have the new, extraordinary richness of piano figures, of sonorities so delicate, varied and haunting in their beauty that one wonders what else and if anything else can possibly be done with this supposedly hard and uninteresting box of wires and keys. (Then one remembers how he said exactly the same thing when he first came to the music of Chopin, and when next he explored the treasure-house of Schumann's imagery of the piano).

Chopin the Godfather

These modern French composers appear to start with two plain and incontestable assumptions. (1) The piano is a percussive instrument, one in which the sound is produced by striking, and one which cannot sustain a note in the way an organ, a string, brass, or woodwind instrument can sustain it. (2) The magic of the piano, a magic possessed by no other instrument, is the pedals. From this point they build, Chopin is their godfather. But if one thinks Chopin did everything that could be done with the pedal, just consult Ravel's "Jeux d'eau" as one of a dozen astounding accomplishments, or a simple piece like Debussy's "Reflets dans l'eau"—and listen to the harmonic over-tones. Or for technical figures and effects consult Ravel's "Gibet" or his "Alborada del graziosa." These are not the most remarkable samples of the discoveries of modern Frenchmen, but they are enough to illustrate the case. Instead of forcing the piano to do what it could to embody a tonal conception, these men have made sure, before they began to compose a piece in this medium, that their idea was suitable to the genius of the piano.

Twenty-fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 30, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 1, at 8 o'clock

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| Berlioz | Fantastic Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 14 A
(By request) |
| I. | Dreams, Passions.
Largo; Allegro agitato e appassionato assai. |
| II. | A Ball.
Waltz: Allegro non troppo. |
| III. | Scene in the Meadows.
Adagio. |
| IV. | March to the Scaffold.
Allegretto non troppo. |
| V. | A Witches' Sabbath.
Larghetto; Allegro. |
| Mozart | Recitative "Non piu! tutto ascoltae," and Aria "Non temer, amato bene" (with violin obbligato) |
| d'Indy | Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42 |
| Frank Bridge | Sonnet for Voice and Orchestra: "Blow Out, You Bugles" |
| Wagner | Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" |

SOLOIST
JOHN McCORMACK

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the symphony

The ladies of the audience are earnestly requested not to put on hats before the end of a number.

The doors of the hall will be closed during the performance of each number on the programme. Those who wish to leave before the end of the concert are requested to do so in an interval between the numbers.

City of Boston, Revised Regulation of August 5, 1898,— Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement

Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn.
Attest: J. M. GALVIN, City Clerk.

E. Robert Schnitz, pianist, the phrase the admirable exponent of a certain school. He is, as we have tried to show, a strong individuality as an artist, but he is also a French artist and an artist peculiarly in sympathy with the music of his country and his period.

Doubtless he will be heard in other music than that by modern French and Russian composers in time to come, and it is reasonably certain that he will show the same fine appreciation when he plays German, Scandinavian, English, American or other music that other French musicians of today display in the same circumstances. Witness the accomplishments of Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts in the last two years. But at the bottom of his soul Mr. Schnitz is a French pianist, his musical consciousness is French, and we think it evident that these racial and temperamental characteristics of his art result in certain valuable and unusual characteristics of his piano playing.

French Piano Compositions

The compositions for piano as well as the performance of piano virtuoso of this period in French musical development show that combination of extremely clear, scientific analysis with the intuition for pure beauty which has always been characteristic of French art. Take the compositions of Debussy or Ravel. They carry on piano technique, piano effects, to places never reached before, but they do this less as Liszt for instance, did it—by making an orchestra of the piano—than by reckoning first of all with what the piano is. These Frenchmen reflect, before they begin to write, on the peculiar beauties and the characteristic limitations of the instrument. The resultant step in the evolution of piano music is one marvellously expressive of the spirit of the instrument itself, yet new, and intoxicating in its possibilities. It is as if the piano had gratefully responded, as if, having at last found in a composer or two a congenial confidant, it had said, "Since you understand me and sympathize with me so deeply, I will show you some things you will be glad to know, which I have never told anyone else." Therefore we have the new, extraordinary richness of piano figures, of sonorities so delicate, varied and haunting in their beauty that one wonders what else and if anything else can possibly be done with this supposedly hard and uninteresting box of wires and keys. (Then one remembers how he said exactly the same thing when he first came to the music of Chopin, and when next he explored the treasure-house of Schumann's imagery of the piano).

Chopin the Godfather

These modern French composers appear to start with two plain and incontestable assumptions. (1) The piano is a percussive instrument, one in which the sound is produced by striking, and one which cannot sustain a note in the way an organ, a string, brass, or woodwind instrument can sustain it. (2) The magic of the piano, a magic possessed by no other instrument, is the pedals. From this point they build, Chopin is their godfather. But if one thinks Chopin did everything that could be done with the pedal, just consult Ravel's "Jeux d'eau" as one of a dozen astounding accomplishments, or a simple piece like Debussy's "Reflets dans l'eau"—and listen to the harmonic over-tones. Or for technical figures and effects consult Ravel's "Gibet" or his "Alborada del graziosa." These are not the most remarkable samples of the discoveries of modern Frenchmen, but they are enough to illustrate the case. Instead of forcing the piano to do what it could to embody a tonal conception, these men have made sure, before they began to compose a piece in this medium, that their idea was suitable to the genius of the piano.

Twenty-fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 30, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 1, at 8 o'clock

Berlioz . . . Fantastic Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 14 A
(By request)

- I. Dreams, Passions.
Largo; Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
- II. A Ball.
Waltz: Allegro non troppo.
- III. Scene in the Meadows.
Adagio.
- IV. March to the Scaffold.
Allegretto non troppo.
- V. A Witches' Sabbath.
Larghetto; Allegro.

Mozart . . . Recitative "Non piu! tutto ascoltae," and Aria "Non temer, amato bene" (with violin obbligato)

d'Indy . . . Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42

Frank Bridge . . . Sonnet for Voice and Orchestra: "Blow Out, You Bugles"

Wagner . . . Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

SOLOIST

JOHN McCORMACK

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the symphony

The ladies of the audience are earnestly requested not to put on hats before the end of a number.

The doors of the hall will be closed during the performance of each number on the programme. Those who wish to leave before the end of the concert are requested to do so in an interval between the numbers.

City of Boston, Revised Regulation of August 5, 1898,—Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement

Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn.
Attest: J. M. GALVIN, City Clerk.

John McCormack

24TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

D'Indy's "Istar" Variations Heard Again After Interval of Eight Years

JOHN McCORMACK ON THE PROGRAM

Herald May 1, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The 24th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony (by request); Mozart, scene with Rondo, "Von Temer" (John McCormack); d'Indy, "Istar" variations; Frank Bridge, sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow out, you Bugles" (Mr. McCormack); Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers."

It was a pleasure to hear d'Indy's "Istar" variations again after an interval of eight years. They are to be ranked with his symphony on a mountain air and his symphony in B flat major. Taking an oriental subject, he did not succumb to orientalism either in the invention of thematic material or in harmonic or orchestral treatment. Nor is the originality of the structure, the announcement of the theme at the very end, typifying the stripping of Istar's last veil and the revelation of her splendid nudity, the chief feature of the workmanship. Each variation, as it marks the progress of Istar's descent to the immutable land, and the stripping in turn of tiara, pendans, precious stones, etc., in itself and as it comes nearer to the theme, is a masterpiece in musical construction and in color. The performance was a brilliant one, as was that of Berlioz's remarkable symphony, which played here on March 6 was requested for the concert of yesterday. Again the scene in the fields, with the famous pastoral music and the still more famous measures for kettle-drums, the wild nightmare, March to the Scaffold, and the Witches Sabbath were enthusiastically applauded.

Mr. McCormack is a master of the Mozartian style. In this respect he is among tenors what Mme. Sembrich in her prime was among sopranos. Yesterday he chose a Scene and Rondo written by Mozart for a private performance of his "Idomeneo" in Vienna. Mr. McCormack's delivery of the Recitative was dramatically varied and effective. The Rondo he sang skilfully, but the voice itself did not always have body or pleasing quality. His other selection was a setting to music by Frank Bridge to a sonnet of Rupert Brooke. This Bridge, an Englishman, but not to be confounded with the Bridge that turned out oratorios—is there not a "Jonah" among them, a "Jonah" but without music for the whale?—made the mistake of attempting to give musical significance to nearly every word of the sonnet. As a result there is a far nobler spirit in Brooke's poem than in Bridge's music. The attempt was laborious. In spite of Mr. McCormack's earnest and lofty interpretation, he could not raise this music to the poet's or his own noble conception.

The concert will be repeated tonight, when the 39th season of the orchestra will end.

In the weeks preceding the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, Mr. Monteux formed practically a new orchestra. He brought it to so high a state of perfection that Mr. Rabaud found it a euphonious and plastic instrument to play upon.

In the course of this season, when, suddenly, another conductor might have lost heart, he again formed an orchestra and in a few weeks worked a miracle. The concerts of the last month have been worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the height of its reputation. Nor has Mr. Monteux shone only as a drill-master; throughout the season he has proved himself an interpreter of the very first rank. A glance at the review of the season, which will be published in the Herald tomorrow, will show the catholicity of his taste. As an interpreter, no school, no period, is foreign to him: Beethoven and Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Griffes, Handel and Berlioz—he understands them, he shares his understanding and appreciation with the audience. He has been dramatic, but not sensational; reverential, but not dull; poetic, but not sentimental. And throughout the season, he has conducted himself as a modest, sincere gentleman; serious in his purpose, but not taking himself too seriously, for he has the saving grace of humor. Once asked if he was disturbed or upset by a wholly unforeseen and annoying occurrence, he smiled and said that he had been conductor of the Russian Ballet for several years.

Boston should be today as proud of its orchestra as at any time during its glorious past. It should also be proud of this orchestra's conductor. With him the future of the orchestra will be glorious.

3 344

Mr. JOHN McCORMACK, tenor, was born in Athlone, County Westmeath, Ireland, on June 14, 1884. Having been in school there, he went to Summer Hill College, Sligo, when he was twelve years old. There he won prizes and scholarships enough to pay his tuition for five of the six years. He went to Dublin, hoping to study law, but his voice attracted attention. He joined the Marlborough Choir and the Dublin Oratorio Society. On May 14, 1903, he competed at a festival open to tenors from all parts of Great Britain, and took the first prize. For two years he studied singing in Milan under Sabattini. On March 1, 1907, he sang at a Ballad Concert in London and made a sensation. He made his debut in opera at Covent Garden, October 15, 1907, as Turiddu, and was engaged at that theatre until the war. Coming to the United States in 1909, he made his first appearance at the Manhattan Opera House, New York, November 10, as Alfredo. For the two seasons following he was engaged with the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company and later with the Boston Opera Company, appearing as "guest" at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the fall of 1911 he went to Australia with Mme. Melba's company. On his way back to London he gave concerts in America, and in 1912-13 he gave many concerts in the United States and Canada. There was a second visit to Australia in the fall of 1913. In 1914, besides his concert work, he sang in opera with Mme. Melba in Paris, gave concerts in Ostend, and was to have taken part in "Don Giovanni" at the Salzburg Mozart Festival organized by Mme. Lilli Lehmann, but the war prevented. Since then he has given a great many concerts in the United States and Canada.

His operatic engagements in Boston have been as follows:—

MANHATTAN OPERA COMPANY in the Boston Theatre:—

Edgardo, March 29, 1910 (his first appearance in Boston). Tonio ("Daughter of the Regiment"), March 31, 1910.
Alfredo, April 2, 1910.

BOSTON OPERA HOUSE:—

Turiddu, December 2, 5, 1910.
Rodolfo, December 3, 15, 1910; December 28, 1912.
Pinkerton, December 14, 1912.
Almaviva, January 20, 1913.
Don Ottavio, February 7, 12, 15, 1913.

He sang at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 2, 3, 1917: Mozart, Rondo, "Per Pietà, non Ricercale"; Handel, "Stay, shepherd, stay," and Air, "Shepherd, what art thou pursuing," from "Acis and Galatea"; at the concerts December 14, 15, 1917: Handel, Air "Di ad Irene," from the opera "Atalanta"; Beethoven, Recitative, "Jehovah! Hear, oh, hear me," and Air, "Oh, my heart is sore within me," from the oratorio "Christ on the Mount of Olives."

24-5

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE RESPONDS

Tribute to Monteux and Players. Mc- Cormack Soloist

Post — May 1, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. John McCormack was soloist. The orchestra, almost completed today in its membership, and performing with the superb virtuosity and sonority of its best days, played Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony, which was on a former programme this season, and yesterday repeated by request, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Wagner's overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Mr. McCormack sang the recitative, "Non piu! tutto ascoltae" and the aria, "Non temer, amato bene," of Mozart and Frank Bridge's sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out, You Bugles." Throughout the concert the audience was very enthusiastic. It greeted Mr. Monteux long and loudly and the concert was a crescendo of applause, until at the last conductor and orchestra stood, acknowledging the tribute.

TO MONTEUX AND BRENNAN

This concert was indeed a tribute to Mr. Monteux's ability in whipping an orchestra recently reorganized in many positions into shape and making it capable, in a very few days, of virtuoso performances.

It was also testimony to the sagacity and energy of Mr. William H. Brennan, without whose judgment and masterly control of recent untoward conditions Mr. Monteux would not have had such a membership to work with.

Bridge's Song Poor Music

Mr. McCormack never interpreted a dramatic recitative more artistically than he treated Mozart's opening lines. The first two-thirds of the piece went admirably; but, probably for the reason that Mr. McCormack has been singing so much of late years, his voice was not in the best shape when he came to the rapid passages of the concluding rondo. It would be a pity for such a singer, such an artist, to be so prodigal of his voice that such conditions should recur.

In the song of Frank Bridge, a song very taxing because of its range and its tonal demands, Mr. McCormack was as dramatic as he could have been under the circumstances. But from a repetition of this composition may we be delivered! It is false music from the first bar to the last, strained in its effects, with no well-established outlines of any kind. The composer, underscoring each word and syllable of his text, becomes episodic and wanders now hither, and when he attempts to do the terse and manly he is merely affected and dull. Mr. McCormack and Mr. Monteux did much for Mr. Bridge, but Mr. Bridge did very little for Mr. Monteux and Mr. McCormack.

D'Indy's Variations

Berlioz's symphony was given a performance felt by many to be superior to the brilliant performance of this work given earlier in the season. For others the feature of the concert was the performance of d'Indy's variations. Here is a white heat of musical inspiration, imagination and intellectuality. It might be called by some intellectual emotion, for there are those who recognize only what is called emotion and is but an aspect of sensuality.

There is transparent, blazing, white heat of beauty in this noble music.

3 344

Mr. JOHN McCORMACK, tenor, was born in Athlone, County Westmeath, Ireland, on June 14, 1884. Having been in school there, he went to Summer Hill College, Sligo, when he was twelve years old. There he won prizes and scholarships enough to pay his tuition for five of the six years. He went to Dublin, hoping to study law, but his voice attracted attention. He joined the Marlborough Choir and the Dublin Oratorio Society. On May 14, 1903, he competed at a festival open to tenors from all parts of Great Britain, and took the first prize. For two years he studied singing in Milan under Sabattini. On March 1, 1907, he sang at a Ballad Concert in London and made a sensation. He made his début in opera at Covent Garden, October 15, 1907, as Turiddu, and was engaged at that theatre until the war. Coming to the United States in 1909, he made his first appearance at the Manhattan Opera House, New York, November 10, as Alfredo. For the two seasons following he was engaged with the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company and later with the Boston Opera Company, appearing as "guest" at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the fall of 1911 he went to Australia with Mme. Melba's company. On his way back to London he gave concerts in America, and in 1912-13 he gave many concerts in the United States and Canada. There was a second visit to Australia in the fall of 1913. In 1914, besides his concert work, he sang in opera with Mme. Melba in Paris, gave concerts in Ostend, and was to have taken part in "Don Giovanni" at the Salzburg Mozart Festival organized by Mme. Lilli Lehmann, but the war prevented. Since then he has given a great many concerts in the United States and Canada.

His operatic engagements in Boston have been as follows:—

MANHATTAN OPERA COMPANY in the Boston Theatre:—

Edgardo, March 29, 1910 (his first appearance in Boston). Tonio ("Daughter of the Regiment"), March 31, 1910.
Alfredo, April 2, 1910.

BOSTON OPERA HOUSE:—

Turiddu, December 2, 5, 1910.
Rodolfo, December 3, 15, 1910; December 28, 1912.
Pinkerton, December 14, 1912.
Almaviva, January 20, 1913.
Don Ottavio, February 7, 12, 15, 1913.

He sang at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 2, 3, 1917: Mozart, Rondo, "Per Pietà, non Ricercate"; Handel, "Stay, shepherd, stay," and Air, "Shepherd, what art thou pursuing," from "Acis and Galatea"; at the concerts December 14, 15, 1917: Handel, Air "Di ad Irene," from the opera "Atalanta"; Beethoven, Recitative, "Jehovah! Hear, oh, hear me," and Air, "Oh, my heart is sore within me," from the oratorio "Christ on the Mount of Olives."

24-5

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE RESPONDS

Tribute to Monteux and Players. Mc-Cormack Soloist

Post May 11, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. John McCormack was soloist. The orchestra, almost completed today in its membership, and performing with the superb virtuosity and sonority of its best days, played Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony, which was on a former programme this season, and yesterday repeated by request, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Wagner's overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Mr. McCormack sang the recitative, "Non piu! tutto ascoltae" and the aria, "Non temer, amato bene," of Mozart and Frank Bridge's sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow Out, You Bugles." Throughout the concert the audience was very enthusiastic. It greeted Mr. Monteux long and loudly and the concert was a crescendo of applause, until at the last conductor and orchestra stood, acknowledging the tribute.

245

TO MONTEUX AND BRENNAN

This concert was indeed a tribute to Mr. Monteux's ability in whipping an orchestra recently reorganized in many positions into shape and making it capable, in a very few days, of virtuoso performances.

It was also testimony to the sagacity and energy of Mr. William H. Brennan, without whose judgment and masterly control of recent untoward conditions Mr. Monteux would not have had such a membership to work with.

Bridge's Song Poor Music

Mr. McCormack never interpreted a dramatic recitative more artistically than he treated Mozart's opening lines. The first two-thirds of the piece went admirably; but, probably for the reason that Mr. McCormack has been singing so much of late years, his voice was not in the best shape when he came to the rapid passages of the concluding rondo. It would be a pity for such a singer, such an artist, to be so prodigal of his voice that such conditions should recur.

In the song of Frank Bridge, a song very taxing because of its range and its tonal demands, Mr. McCormack was as dramatic as he could have been under the circumstances. But from a repetition of this composition may we be delivered! It is false music from the first bar to the last, strained in its effects, with no well-established outlines of any kind. The composer, underscoring each word and syllable of his text, becomes episodic and wanders now hither, and when he attempts to do the terse and manly he is merely affected and dull. Mr. McCormack and Mr. Monteux did much for Mr. Bridge, but Mr. Bridge did very little for Mr. Monteux and Mr. McCormack.

D'Indy's Variations

Berlioz's symphony was given a performance felt by many to be superior to the brilliant performance of this work given earlier in the season. For others the feature of the concert was the performance of d'Indy's variations. Here is a white heat of musical inspiration, imagination and intellectuality. It might be called by some intellectual emotion, for there are those who recognize only what is called emotion and is but an aspect of sensuality.

There is transparent, blazing, white heat of beauty in this noble music which can be understood only by listening to the music itself. Its architecture towers to the skies, yet there is present also the note of that which is ancient, Oriental and languorous. Of such pages are those of the introduction itself, and the motive of three notes played at first by the horn, a motive which, recurring again and again as a salient feature of the theme of Istar, is as the cry of the goddess, or the woman, for her lover, whom she goes to the depths of hell to reclaim.

In Radiant Colors

And there is the thought of the gorgeousness of her dress, the glint of the jewels which are taken from her, and finally when Istar, deprived of one after one of her garments, stands forth in all the splendor of her nudity, D'Indy makes his orchestra throb and glow with a thousand radiant colors. It is a passage—this apostrophe to a beauty not seen by the crowd or known to those who have not come into contact with the pure spirit of art—which makes the throat tighten when the cry of longing is heard for the last time and the strings hymn the triumph of love. To this music, with its supreme logic and glorification of art, its miracles of workmanship, its elevation to a sublime ideal, one does indeed bow the knee.

The concluding performance of the "Meistersinger" overture was one singularly just to the music, singularly fortunate in the choice of tempi, in the warm, lyrical character of the love music, the humor of the fugue, of the conclusion. In certain passages, it is true, a part for a trombone or a trumpet, not in itself important, was over-emphasized. Otherwise this reading of the "Meistersinger" overture was one of the great readings of this score which Symphony audiences have known.

May Music in Boston 1. 1920
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-fourth and last concert of the present season on April 30 with the following program:

Berlioz Fantastic Symphony
Mozart Recitative and Aria d'Indy "Istar"
Frank Bridge, Sonnet for voice and orchestra.
Wagner, Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
The soloist was John McCormack.

We venture to say that the music of Berlioz has never been so well played in Boston as during the past season. Mr. Monteux may well be said to have revealed this composer to us. He has played this music with conviction and sincerity, and we have learned from him that Berlioz was not simply a juggler in orchestral tone, a searcher for the picturesque and bizarre; but that he was above all a poetic, sensitive genius whose music is quite capable of exciting and holding the listener's interest apart from the excessively romantic programs which were attached to it by its composer.

No program is necessary to understand the "Scene in the Meadows" in all its calm and peaceful beauty, which is only intensified by the pianissimo rolls of the drums. Neither is a printed synopsis essential to the comprehension of the wild and brutally realistic "Witches' Sabbath." All this and more has Mr. Monteux shown.

D'Indy's "Istar" variations added one more to the already long list of authoritative interpretations of works of the modern French school which it has been our privilege to hear during the past season. These variations, so often thought cold and unimaginative, glowed with warmth and color under Mr. Monteux's baton. Frank Bridge's sonnet for voice and orchestra aroused a desire to hear more of the music of this gifted and original composer.

The Boston symphony programs of this season have been of consistent merit. Though there has been an evident search for novelty, no piece has been selected which had only novelty to recommend it. American composers have had a fair share of attention, and their works have been given with a care indicating a desire to bring forward their merits. Many works long absent from these programs have been revived for the symphony patrons; and lastly, the classics have been interpreted with a new enthusiasm which has made them once more vividly alive. Boston should take pride in its orchestra and above all in its conductor, who has so bravely and intelligently guided its course.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE FINAL AFTERNOON OF THE SEASON May 1, 1920

Frank Bridge
Less Tribute to Mr. Monteux Than His Signal Services, Throughout the Year,
Have Deserved — Berlioz's "Fantastic
Symphony" in Vivid Voice, d'Indy's
"Istar" Revived and the Prelude to
"The Mastersingers" in Its Old Place as Proud and Joyous Ending—Mr. McCormack and Perfections of Mozartean Song

A MODEST as well as an able and tireless conductor is Mr. Monteux. By his works, and by his works only, have his audiences known and applauded him from last October into this present May. The more the satisfaction, then, that the programme of the final afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday, gave room for not a few of his best abilities. The less the satisfaction also, as some bystanders noted the incidents of the day, that his hearers, filling Symphony Hall to the last seat, did not return him longer and warmer personal tribute. True, they clapped him heartily when he came first to his place and when, with Mr. McCormack as "assisting artist," he returned to it after the intermission. Plentiful, too, were the plaudits at each pause in Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," presumably for piece and performance both; while at the end, the standing orchestra received its usual meed. On the other hand, the audience received rather coolly d'Indy's tone-poem, "Istar," and in vivid voice; while it lingered no longer after the final number—the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers"—than was necessary to take courteous leave of the conductor. At the end of many a season, the public of Friday afternoons has tarried for heartier farewell to one or another of his predecessors. But the concert of yesterday was not short.

On many a score, moreover, Mr. Monteux's deserts for the day and for the orchestral year in retrospect, ran high. He came to his post last autumn when the concerts were at lower ebb than they had been in long memory. The helpless provinciality of the passing Rabaud, the lingering prejudices of wartime, had stripped the programmes of catholicity, even of variety. They had become lists of formula and 191 time, like to those which Messieurs Pierné and Chevillard—but not the "intruding" and also eager Monsieur Khéné-Baton—impose upon the patient public of Paris. From the beginning to the end of the musical year, as the usual tables in the final programme-book attest, Mr. Monteux has restored the "active repertory" to familiar and established standards. His choice of pieces has ranged widely, interestingly; he has bidden his hearers to many novel, to not a few unfamiliar numbers, and almost every one has well deserved introduction or revival. He has assembled music for its merits as music, be it French, German, Italian, Czech, American, and not by reason of the nationality or the associations of the composers or the policies of their Governments through the years of war. He has whisked away the bigotries of that unhappy time. Once more the Symphony Contents are catholic, with doors flung wide to new music. Once more a cosmopolitan man of the world, a well-read musician, a receptive and ambitious conductor orders them.

Similarly Mr. Monteux received the orchestra when, however able the band, individual by individual, the mediocrity and the mildness of the temporary Rabaud had dulled and relaxed standards of performance. Reasonably, courteously, but unyieldingly, the new conductor restored discipline. Once more rehearsal became unrelenting. Anew the orchestra yielded the particular eloquence of the music in hand. If Mr. Monteux spared not his men, as little did he spare himself. His ear is keen; his hand often sensitive; gradually the band regained the beauty, the plasticity, the ardor of tone that had been familiar distinctions. Again it became the revealing, characterizing, enhancing voice of the chosen music, especially in the dramatic, pictorial, romantic, warmly colored, sharply rhythmical and generally high-pitched pieces in which the conductor excels. The orchestra was well on the way to these bettered standards when the strife and the secession of March again shook it. Mr. Monteux met the emergency with quiet resolution, with tranquil but inexhaustible energy. When his forces were diminished he yet made interesting programmes, and to the utmost of his own and the band's abilities maintained the quality of performance. When he and others had newly recruited the orchestra, and often for the better, he resumed in the spring—and nothing daunted—the assimilating work he had begun in the autumn. For a month past the outcome has weekly and richly praised him. Again the Symphony Orchestra goes forward; again its future in the season next to come sets fair. With reason the programme-book yesterday listed the personnel of the band; with just satisfaction the management reported scarcely a lapse in the renewal of subscriptions. Now and again in the forty years of the Symphony Concerts more eminent conductors than Mr. Monteux may have graced them. Not one, however, has done them so signal service. Double the plaudits he received yesterday would have fallen short of just reward.

Programme and performance were alike characteristic of the conductor at his best. He began with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," played once and remarkably on the eve of the secession; then necessarily set aside; now repeated at just and general request. It does not return so often to Symphony Hall as to become hackneyed. For nearly a century, in fact, the intrinsic vitality of the music has forestalled such fate. No more does it come back to the concert room of 1920 as interesting curiosity of a romantic composer and a romantic day in the arts. Rather, it still speaks for itself in highly individual and keenly penetrating voice. Fortunate in the years since Berlioz, in the years before him, the composer who could invent such a motif and so enrich it as that which embodies the haunting woman, the "fixed idea" of this symphony of drugged dream. Fortunate, again, and over like span of time, the composer who could imagine and accomplish music of such grim, graphic, fantastic power as "The March to the Scaffold" whether it rage in outburst or drone in sombre repetition. Fortunate, once more the composer, through the long line of two centuries, who from the poetry of mind and heart could summon such beauty of design as that which shapes the scene "In The Fields" and such poignancy of utterance as that which there speaks mood and picture.

Fortunate, finally, the composer yesterday, today and forever, who can write with such individuality as that which still vitalizes at least three of the divisions of the "Fantastic Symphony." Agreed that the episode of the ball has waned into commonplace, albeit still faintly flaming with romantic glow. Agreed that the finale of the witches' Sabbath has declined into what seems now the routine of romantic extravagance. But the rest as already set down, the rest through which flows the long, lean, incisive line of the music, the marvellous directness of imagery and expression, the high intensity of mood, emotion, utterance, the sinewy harmonies, the vivid timbres, the melody that is unescapable voice of the passion or the vision behind! It is accounted the chief glory of Musorgsky that in his music the thing to be expressed and the expression have become inextricably fused in single impression upon the hearer. Surely the like glory falls to Berlioz in this "Fantastic Symphony" and the more amply because, while the Russian is avowed realist, the Frenchman is as frankly romantic. There is music of Berlioz that has withered—the symphony of Harold and Italy, heard afresh only last autumn; but not the "Fantastic Symphony" when it is played as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played it yesterday. It has been the custom to say that only Mr. Weingartner, of living conductors, truly divines Berlioz's music, summons it anew to vivid and puissant voice. Mr. Monteux now parts the distinction with him.

Conductor and band shone again in the revival of Mr. d'Indy's "Istar," through nearly eight years unheard in Symphony Hall. The form of the music is characteristic of the familiar, the classified composer—seven successive variations with the theme, whence they spring unheard until in the finale it emerges first in naked unisons and then in full harmonic panoply. Hear the "cerebral" d'Indy even in those relatively young years of the nineties, who makes music, first of all, an exercise of the intellect. Another d'Indy, however, speaks in this "Istar" as tone-poem—a d'Indy of clearly and pervadingly sensuous imagination. Upon a clew from Phœnician legend, he imagines the goddess descending into the underworld where her lover is held captive. Seven closed portals bar her way. Each she passes, but at each the guardian of the gate strips her of jewel or of veil. Only in the stripped splendor of her revealed body may she finally conquer. Not only sensuous imagery but sensuous treatment. The jewels glint, the mantles shimmer in the motion and the color of the music. With harmonies and timbres Mr. d'Indy is almost voluptuous. There is cumulative progress; there is the haunting and wistful background of the quest. The ear hears the music as the eye sees one of Moreau's jewelled palpitating pictures of old legend—of Phaeton, of Salome. Yet d'Indy would not be d'Indy were not his inverted form, his cumulative processes contrived and adroit reflection of the course of his tonal narrative. Sensuous he may will to be, but the old cerebral Adam within him does timely get its way. In such music of color, of fantastical imagery it is Mr. Monteux's way to excel. Nor did he and the orchestra fall short in the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"—music of unfolding and manifold instrumental song as only genius may write it; music of the richness, the joy, the pride of life as only high-pitched and amply dowered spirit may know and release it; music that is very pæan to the arts it exemplifies. There is no piece so meet to end the Symphony Concerts. It was stirring to hear it restored to what is, almost, its traditional place in them.

There were interludes also—interludes of Mr. McCormack in declamation and song out of Mozart; in a sonnet of Rupert Brooke to the glory of those who to death in the war gave all the promise of their future living, who, so doing, restored noble passions to a world as sorely needing them as it has soon forgotten them. Frank Bridge, of the younger generation of British composers set the verse for tenor voice and orchestra—straightforwardly, sinewily, man-fashion, but without too much distinction and with overemphasis recurring. In these interludes, however, more significant was the manner than the matter of Mr. McCormack's song. When he is on his mettle as he was yesterday, when he holds every ability in elastic command, when circumstance and audience plainly stir him, he is incomparable singer, save only with Mme. Sembrich in our time, of the music of Mozart. Lengthy measures of declamation—"Non Più! Tutto Ascoltae"—precede the air and rondo—"Non Temer, Amato Bene"—which he sang yesterday as the composer interpolated them into his early and usually overlooked opera, "Idomeneo."

Uncoloured, unbroken, Mr. McCormack sustained the long line of the recitative; impeccably he placed every pause, shaped and adjusted every phrase. His diction was clarity itself, while at every turn his tones took color from the sentiment of the verse. Equally adroit of contour and of expression went the unfolding periods. He passed to the air; and he outdid himself in grace of melodic line, in loveliness of phrase, in the melting of contour into contour, in the play of sentiment as in undulation upon the whole. He ended with the rondo in traceries of tone more delicate than even those which the violin was weaving between the periods in Mozart's gossamer figures. The perfect art of Mozartean song inset within a voice that yesterday did it matchless service. Brooke's and Bridge's sonnet invited Mr. McCormack's larger and more heroic vein—the vein which maturity of mind, heart, art and voice steadily ripens. Readily he gained and sustained it. Yet his particular glory was the glory of his Mozartean song. In kind and quality, it fitly companioned the Berlioz of the "Fantastic Symphony," the Wagner, even, of the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

H. T. PARKER

WHATEVER the audience at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon lacked in heartiness toward Mr. Monteux, the succeeding audience of Saturday evening amply returned to him. For the conductor, for Mr. McCormack as assisting singer, for the orchestra, for the concerts as an institution, momentarily shaken but now firm-set again, the company filled Symphony Hall to the last seat. It was long, loud, sincere in applause when Mr. Monteux came to his place. It was first engrossed and then stirred by his version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" which, unlike the listeners of Friday, it was hearing for the first time. The "Scene in the Fields," the "March to the Scaffold" won warm plaudits; and at the end of the whole piece conductor and orchestra shared round after round of clapping. Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem, "Istar," was likewise better received on Saturday; while with Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers," the pleasure of music and performance plainly ran high and deep. When both were done nearly the whole audience lingered and, standing, recalled Mr. Monteux again and again. Soon he had the orchestra on its feet around him. For, without its fortitude, loyalties and zeal, not even he could have saved and restored the Symphony Concerts.

As good fortune would have it, both the conductor and the band were on their mettle. Clearly out of Berlioz's stripped, concentrated, superlatively direct music, wherein so many instruments and choirs are used separately, stood the individual quality of the orchestra and Mr. Monteux's ability as fusing leader. Seldom has the band been more graphic voice to such a symphony of pictorial, romantic, highly strung fantasy or a conductor, here in Boston, shown larger and finer mastery of these exacting pages. The orchestra's command of harmonic and instrumental color, Mr. Monteux's imagination with it and ear for it, shone manifold throughout the performance of "Istar," while both were equally plastic, songful, sumptuous and striding of tone through Wagner's Prelude. Even in Dr. Muck's time, it was hardly more thrilling to hear as crown to an ending season. Since those days also and in happy omen for the autumn, there has not been warmer leave-taking between audience, conductor and orchestra. Thanks, most, to Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Concerts are themselves again.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

"FANTASTIC" AGAIN AT THE SYMPHONY

Berlioz' Work Rendered
With Distinction

Globe May 1, 1920

The chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," played for the second time this season by request of many subscribers. It was at the close of the former performance that the much discussed Fradkin incident took place. Owing to the ensuing strike, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony had to be substituted at the Saturday concert. Yesterday the renewed orchestra gave an interpretation as finished and brilliant as that last March.

Berlioz certainly had the power of inventing distinctively beautiful themes, and his skill at orchestration is proverbial. His imagination is of the sort which subordinates formal proportioned perfection of structure to vivid and dramatic effects. All his works live chiefly by virtue of the striking musical episodes they contain. They lack the power and nobility Beethoven gained by sustained and unified structural development. They are all dramatic lyrics which lack epic grandeur.

D'Indy, who is commonly regarded as cerebral rather than emotional, succeeds in the "Istar" variations in suggesting the sensuous, almost sensual, emotional quality of the legend by means of music which like all his later works is, nevertheless, almost too painstakingly well constructed.

Wagner in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is as erudite as D'Indy, though he does not do any stunts comparable to the Frenchman's clever but rather perplexing trick of giving his variations first and his theme afterward. But the emotional force back of Wagner's music is so tremendous that most listeners never notice its intricate construction.

John McCormack showed his wonted artistry and taste in his Mozart recitative and aria. No tenor now before the public can excel him in such music. His other number, a setting of one of Rupert Brooke's sonnets on the war, by Frank Bridge, an English composer little known in America, was effective in a rather banal way. The music suited the words, which are platitudinously optimistic in the face of a tragedy still too near for any artist to approach objectively. It was well sung and capably played.

The end of the season sees the orchestra back in its old form. The return of Mr. Neumann to the tympani, is an especial cause for congratulation. He is in a class by himself as far as American orchestras are concerned and could not be adequately replaced. The list of members of the orchestra, printed in the programs for the first time since the strike, showed other welcome accessions and few vacancies still to be filled.

The concert will be repeated as usual tonight at 8. The 40th season begins Oct 8 and 9, with Mr. Monteux as conductor.

75% Boston
99% Monteux has changed his plans for 69% and summer. He will not re-100% Paris as he originally proposed. 96% present he will remain in Boston 44% re is much to do in preparation 40% Symphony Concerts of next 36% 83% 98% 98% 76% 20% 56% 61% 83% 71% 16% 51% 87% 59% 50% 86% 74% 98% 80% 101% 101% 76% 59%

ampsnir J. Clark preside rom loc omp'ishe
Pres
ggestion ne take

CAR who left the first desk in the elephono is now settled at Los An-ap 6 sembled a string quartet there.
the Los Angeles Symphony rough a single concert when conductor, Mr. Rothwell, was idently Mr. Noack is developnts.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Triumphs Over Obstacles

With Band Happily Restored to Old-Time Efficiency,
a Season Rich in Accomplishments Closes — Thrift of Certain Patrons of Boston Musical Association — Its Programmes

BY OLIN DOWNES

After three years, in which it was strongly and at times very disturbingly affected by issues of the war and the war's aftermath, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has emerged from its 39th season with flying colors and with unusually brilliant prospects, so far as one can judge in these troubled times, for the future.

It is reasonable to believe that the concerts next season will be fully as well patronized as they have during the winter past. The union issue, unfortunately and unwisely connected with the Fradkin issue, seems to have subsided, with the orchestra remaining intact and destined, by all signs and tokens, to be a better body than ever when the first concerts of next October take place. A campaign is on to secure guarantees of more money for the running expenses of this orchestra, which, like the expenses of everything else, have been constantly ascending during the last five years. This campaign should be vigorously and generously supported and no doubt it will be.

One element of the popularity of these concerts is Mr. Monteux's programmes. He is probably the best programme maker who has ever stood at the head of the orchestra, an ultra-modern in his keen, musical perceptions and sympathies, yet a profound student of the music of classic masters. Mr. Monteux is very eclectic in his musical interests. During the winter past 15 French composers, 10 German composers, seven Russian composers, four American composers, Gluck and Goldmark, Austrians; the Rumanian, Enesco; Ernest Bloch, the Swiss Jew; two Bohemians, Dvorak and Smetana; the Hungarian, Liszt; the Pole, Stokowski; two Italian composers, Verdi and Malapiero; one Spanish composer, Albeniz, and one English composer, Frank Bridges, have been heard. Of single composers Beethoven had the greatest number of works given. Ten of his compositions were performed.

Then came Wagner with 8; Schumann and Debussy with 5 each; Berlioz with 4, Brahms, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schubert and d'Indy with 3 each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, with 2 each, with the rest represented by a single work apiece. Haydn's "Queen Anne" symphony was repeated on two different programmes, as was Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." Although there were but 10 names of German composers—including Handel, in his later life a naturalized Englishman—and 15 names of French composers, including the Belgian, Cesar Franck, there were 44 performances of German works and but 25 of compositions by Frenchmen—sufficient of a reply to those who have tried to fasten on Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux, the two French conductors of the Boston Symphony, the charge of chauvinism in music, chauvinism which, as a matter of fact, was a prevailing characteristic of every German conductor the Boston Symphony knew. One German, Max Fiedler, had an exceptional curiosity and breadth of appreciation, but the programmes have never been so inclusive as they have during the last three years under French leadership.

Conductors who are internationalists are certainly desired by American audiences. When to this internationalism is added an enthusiasm, an appreciation, subjective as well as objective, of the works of classic masters even of enemy countries, then the audiences are fortunate indeed. No conductor we have ever heard equalled Mr. Rabaud's performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony. The same thing is true of Mr. Monteux's reading, among other works of Schumann's symphony No. 1—the symphony of Spring, and of Schubert's symphonie in B minor; but neither Mr. Rabaud nor Mr. Monteux has yet approached Dr. Muck, for instance, in his interpretation of Brahms or of Wagner. We say these things because

"FANTASTIC" AGAIN AT THE SYMPHONY

Berlioz' Work Rendered
With Distinction

Geobe May 1, 1920

The chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," played for the second time this season by request of many subscribers. It was the close of the former performance that the much discussed Fradkin incident took place. Owing to the ensuing strike, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony had to be substituted at the Saturday concert. Yesterday the renewed orchestra gave an interpretation as finish and brilliant as that last March.

Berlioz certainly had the power of inventing distinctively beautiful themes and his skill at orchestration is proverbial. His imagination is of the sort which subordinates formal proportion to perfection of structure to vivid dramatic effects. All his works illustrate chiefly by virtue of the striking musical episodes they contain. They lack the power and nobility Beethoven gained by sustained and unified structural development. They are all dramatic lyrics which lack epic grandeur.

D'Indy, who is commonly regarded as cerebral rather than emotional, succeeds in the "Istar" variations in suggesting the sensuous, almost sensual quality of the legend which means of music which like all his works is, nevertheless, almost too patently well constructed.

Wagner in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is as erudite as D'Indy though he does not do any stunts comparable to the Frenchman's clever but rather perplexing trick of giving his variations first and his theme afterward. But the emotional force back of Wagner's music is so tremendous that most listeners never notice its intricate construction.

John McCormack showed his wonted artistry and taste in his Mozart recitative and aria. No tenor now before the public can excel him in such music. His other number, a setting of one of Rupert Brooke's sonnets on the war, by Frank Bridge, an English composer little known in America, was effective in a rather banal way. The music suited the words, which are platitudinously optimistic in the face of a tragedy still too near for any artist to approach objectively. It was well sung and capably played.

The end of the season sees the orchestra back in its old form. The return of Mr. Neumann to the tympani, is an especial cause for congratulation. He is in a class by himself as far as American orchestras are concerned and could not be adequately replaced. The list of members of the orchestra, printed in the programs for the first time since the strike, showed other welcome accessions and few vacancies still to be filled.

The concert will be repeated as usual tonight at 8. The 40th season begins Oct 8 and 9, with Mr. Monteux as conductor.

Here in Boston

Mr. Monteux has changed his plans for the spring and summer. He will not return to Paris as he originally proposed. For the present he will remain in Boston where there is much to do in preparation for the Symphony Concerts of next season.

Frequenters of the Pop Concerts, when they return to Symphony Hall next Monday will discover that a bar—or rather what passes for one in these days of sweet shops—has been installed in the little used corridor back of the lower balcony.

Mr. Neumann, the player upon the kettle-drums, who was persuaded into the recent secession from the Symphony Orchestra, returns to his place today, there to continue indefinitely. For years he has been one of the ornaments of the band and well deserves re-instatement. On the other hand, it is definitely decided that Mr. Heim, the former first trumpet, will not be taken back.

Without so much as half a smile, Musical America solemnly announces in heavy black type that there is little likelihood that the seceders from the Symphony Orchestra can or will assemble a rival band. Nearly everybody else had forgotten them and it.

Mr. Noack, who left the first desk in the violins of the Symphony Orchestra last autumn and who is now settled at Los Angeles, has assembled a string quartet there. He also led the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra through a single concert when the regular conductor, Mr. Rothwell, was disabled. Evidently Mr. Noack is developing new talents.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Triumphs Over Obstacles

With Band Happily Restored to Old-Time Efficiency,
a Season Rich in Accomplishments Closes —
Thrift of Certain Patrons of Boston Musical Association — Its Programmes

BY OLIN DOWNES

After three years, in which it was strongly and at times very disturbingly affected by issues of the war and the war's aftermath, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has emerged from its 39th season with flying colors and with unusually brilliant prospects, so far as one can judge in these troubled times, for the future.

It is reasonable to believe that the concerts next season will be fully as well patronized as they have during the winter past. The union issue, unfortunately and unwisely connected with the Fradkin issue, seems to have subsided, with the orchestra remaining intact and destined, by all signs and tokens, to be a better body than ever when the first concerts of next October take place. A campaign is on to secure guarantees of more money for the running expenses of this orchestra, which, like the expenses of everything else, have been constantly ascending during the last five years. This campaign should be vigorously and generously supported and no doubt it will be.

One element of the popularity of these concerts is Mr. Monteux's programmes. He is probably the best programme maker who has ever stood at the head of the orchestra, an ultra-modern in his keen musical perceptions and sympathies, yet a profound student of the music of classic masters. Mr. Monteux is very eclectic in his musical interests. During the winter past 15 French composers, 10 German composers, seven Russian composers, four American composers, Gluck and Goldmark, Austrians; the Rumanian, Enesco; Ernest Bloch, the Swiss Jew; two Bohemians, Dvorak and Smetana; the Hungarian, Liszt; the Pole, Stojowski; two Italian composers, Verdi and Malapiero; one Spanish composer, Albeniz, and one English composer, Frank Bridges, have been heard. Of single composers Beethoven had the greatest number of works given. Ten of his compositions were performed.

Then came Wagner with 8; Schumann and Debussy with 5 each; Berlioz with 4, Brahms, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schubert and d'Indy with 3 each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, with 2 each, with the rest represented by a single work apiece. Haydn's "Queen Anne" symphony was repeated on two different programmes, as was Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." Although there were but 10 names of German composers—including Handel, in his later life a naturalized Englishman—and 15 names of French composers, including the Belgian, Cesar Franck, there were 44 performances of German works and but 25 of compositions by Frenchmen—sufficient of a reply to those who have tried to fasten on Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux, the two French conductors of the Boston Symphony, the charge of chauvinism in music, chauvinism which, as a matter of fact, was a prevailing characteristic of every German conductor the Boston Symphony knew. One German, Max Fiedler, had an exceptional curiosity and breadth of appreciation, but the programmes have never been so inclusive as they have during the last three years under French leadership.

Conductors who are internationalists are certainly desired by American audiences. When to this internationalism is added an enthusiasm, an appreciation, subjective as well as objective, of the works of classic masters even of enemy countries, then the audiences are fortunate indeed. No conductor we have ever heard equalled Mr. Rabaud's performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony. The same thing is true of Mr. Monteux's reading, among other works of Schumann's symphony No. 1—the symphony of Spring, and of Schubert's symphonie in B minor; but neither Mr. Rabaud nor Mr. Monteux has yet approached Dr. Muck, for instance, in his interpretation of Brahms or of Wagner. We say these things because there appear still to be those who are worrying over the change from what they term the "French regime," which has replaced the "German regime" at Symphony Hall. They have tried to represent the Frenchmen as narrow or limited in their musical appreciations. The only answer required is a record of recent programmes and reference to a majority of unprejudiced opinion about the interpretations. The scope of the programmes has been broader, the musical atmosphere freer from provincialism or arbitrariness, since Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux came to Boston, than ever before.

The orchestral compositions performed for the first time anywhere were Converse's C minor symphony and Griffes' "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." The tragic death of Charles T. Griffes, just as he was gaining widespread recognition as an American composer or rarely sensitive fancy and skill with the orchestra, is one of the real losses of American music. Mr. Converse's symphony is on a classical basis, and the writer personally did not find that it ranked in value with the same composer's "Mystic Trumpeter," which remains up to the present time Mr. Converse's masterpiece.

Of the works performed for the first time in America there were three. Debussy's "Jeux" and Fantasy for piano and orchestra—the piano part played by Alfred Cortot—and d'Indy's "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," a symphony inspired by the war which proved to be one of d'Indy's poorest works. Nor did the two compositions of Debussy, the one a very early work, the latter one of the latest efforts of the composer, make a very deep impression on initial acquaintance.

Of the works performed for the first time in Boston Albeniz's "Catalonia" pleases some and offended others by its vulgarity, its swinging rhythms, its crackling color. Carpenter's brilliant concerto for piano and orchestra, the piano part superbly played by E. Robert Schmitz, was heartily applauded and much enjoyed. Whether it has as much permanent value as other works of this composer is another question. Rachmaninoff's 3d concerto is poor music, but the composer played like a god; he has a very impressive personality. The audience was wild with delight.

Ernest Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114 stand out in the memory as the greatest novelties of the season, and as works certain to live long because of their inspiration, their dramatic and emotional qualities. Here, thank heaven, is a living composer of true greatness, simplicity, sincerity, breath of vision. Other first performances in Boston need not detain us. The works are already forgotten, though it was just that they should be heard.

Of first performances at the Boston Symphony concerts of unusual interest were those of Borodin's "Poloskian" dances from "Prince Igor," Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo," and Stravinsky's suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu." As shown, these works and others to be classified in the same category, had been performed previously in Boston by other organizations—the Borodin dances by the orchestra of the Boston Opera company and by the Russian ballet, which also gave repeated performances of Stravinsky's wonderful "Oiseau de feu." But one work, strictly speaking, had not been heard before to full advantage. This was Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo," poorly suited for ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company, and only heard to advantage when Mr. Monteux gave it in its original form as a symphonic poem in Symphony Hall. Then the music, in all its virility, its uncouthness, its romantic poetry, and its eerie conclusion was felt with its full force. For one listener, at least, Mr. Gilbert has produced in this work some of his greatest pages, pages which make him stand out, an individual and inimitable musical personality of today.

Another thing which has been brought overpoweringly to mind at these concerts is the unspeakable greatness of many works which young musicians of today—the writer has not been guileless in this respect—describe condescendingly as "classic masterpieces," or in words more contemptuous. The reason this has come so forcibly to mind is threefold. First, Mr. Monteux has gone rather extensively into orchestral literature of the classic period; secondly, he understands most of this literature uncommonly well, and communicates his understanding to the listener; thirdly, listeners themselves grow, experiencing strange reversals of opinion and judgment in so doing.

For instance, the Schubert C major symphony is for us, now, none too long, and it is a work which towers to the very stars, despite its sequences and its excess of thematic material. It has taken us 20 years of listening at these concerts to feel the sublime greatness of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which, as it is with the exception of the ninth the most substantial, the most closely packed with thought and with romantic emotion of the remaining eight symphonies, was logically the one it took longest to grasp. Perhaps, also, it is the one which the world will take longest to forget. There are symphonies by Schubert, by Schumann, which we could not lose today, although we would have exchanged them, 15 years ago, with great willingness, for a work by Tschalkowsky or Richard Strauss. (Of course there are pages of Strauss one could never spare—for example, the

"Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Tod und Verklärung" and "Till Eulenspiegel." We are the last to yield in our admiration for Strauss, or for the Debussy of "Iberia" as well as "L'Après-midi d'un faune," or for music of Ernest Bloch, or for symphonies and symphonic poems of Jean Sibelius. But, how much, after all, even of this glorious music we refer to, is as chaff in the wind by the side of a Beethoven, a Schubert, a Mozart in a great mood. The C major symphony of Mozart is, after all, a very grand affair. Beethoven's symphonies, in the hands of a real conductor, lose little of their spirituality, their plain brotherhood and humanity, with the year. These things have been said before. They will be said again. They will be hooted in all sincerity by the young fry, and reiterated with savage conviction by their elders. This is only to chronicle, for those who are passing through the writer's stage of 15 and 20 years ago, the experiences and conclusions of an average mind. The effect of these great compositions on the spirit is another matter. It cannot be told.

THE POPS ARE HERE

Tomorrow night in Symphony Hall there will start what promises to be the biggest season of Pop concerts in the 35 years of their history. An orchestra of 80 musicians will present, under Mr. Jacchia's leadership, a record list of popular but worth while programs. Undaunted by the clamp of prohibition, the cafe service at the Pops last season was worked harder than ever before. To an unprecedented number of patrons $15,000 worth of "ginger pop" and the like was served, as against $11,000 worth in the last year of beer. Never were so many special nights dedicated to colleges, clubs, conventions, etc. In each of these respects the Pops will go still stronger this year. To meet the ever-flowing demand for refreshments, a bar is being installed in the large foyer in front of the first balcony. The prices of tables and seats have not been changed. A number of organizations have already arranged to spend some special nights at the Pops. For Monday, May 10, the Boston Chamber of Commerce has requisitioned the entire hall. There will also be Amherst night, Roxbury Latin night, Simmons College, Boston University and Harvard nights; Boston City Club, Commercial Travelers, Professional Women's Club, Graduate Nurses, Euclid Lodge, New England Conservatory, Insurance Society of Massachusetts, and National Bankers' Convention nights. Most of these nights are open to the public. A few dates still remain open for such purposes—but only a few. The programs of this week follow:

MONDAY

Marsch Militaire.....Schubert
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Song without Words.....Tschalkowsky
Fantasia "La Boheme".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Organ Solo, Finale 6th Symphony.....Widor
Mr. Snow
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Hungarian Dance No. 1, in G minor.....Brahms

TUESDAY

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Capriccio.....Scriabin
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Harp Solo, "In Springtime".....Holy
Mr. Holy
Rondo, Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Finale from the Fourth Symphony, Tschalkowsky
Selection, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Waltz, "España".....Waldteufel
Hungarian Dance No. 3, in F major.....Brahms

WEDNESDAY

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Cortege de Bacchus.....Debussy
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Violin solo, Rondo.....Mozart-Kreisler
Mr. Theodorowicz

Serenade.....Schubert
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Hungarian Dance No. 5, in G minor.....Brahms

THURSDAY, Operatic Night

Triumphal March, from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltzes from "The Rose Cavalier".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Tschalkowsky
"Depuis le Jour" from "Louise".....Chapientier
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli

FRIDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Madrigal.....Caccini
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
First Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major.....Liszt
Flute solo:
Romance sans Paroles.....Guilmant
Polonaise.....Possard
Mr. Brooke
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
a. Air de Ballet, b. Feie Boheme.
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschalkowsky
Ave Maria, from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

SATURDAY

French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello".....Anser
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Fantasia, "Metastefele".....Bolto
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Minuet for Strings.....Boccherini
Tarantella, Flute Solo.....Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Three Russian Folk Songs.....Arr. by Jacchia
The Marionettes.....Lacombe
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Tschalkowsky

Agide Jacchia, conductor of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY HALL

MOST SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBERS
REGULARLY ATTEND
THE FAMOUS

POP CONCERTS

AND WILL WANT
TO BE PRESENT AT
THE OPENING NIGHT—MAY 3

PROGRAMME

- | | | |
|---|---------|----------------|
| 1. MARCH MILITAIRE | - - - - | Schubert |
| 2. OVERTURE to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" | - - - - | Nicolai |
| 3. SONG WITHOUT WORDS | - - - - | Tschaikowsky |
| 4. FANTASIA, "La Bohème" | - - - - | Puccini |
| <hr/> | | |
| 5. PRELUDE to "Tristan and Isolde" | - - - - | Wagner |
| 6. "GYPSY DANCE" from "Carmen" | - - - - | Bizet |
| 7. ORGAN SOLO: Finale, Sixth Symphony
(Mr. Albert W. Snow) | - - - - | Widor |
| 8. TEMPEST SCENE from "Othello" | - - - - | Verdi |
| <hr/> | | |
| 9. SELECTION, "Samson and Delilah" | - - - - | Saint-Saëns |
| 10. CANZONE | - - - - | Van Westerhout |
| 11. INTERMEZZO from "L'Amico Fritz" | - - - - | Mascagni |
| 12. HUNGARIAN DANCE No. 1, in G minor | - - - - | Brahms |

TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE

$1, 75c., 50c. ADMISSION 25c. NO TAX

Agide Jacchia, conductor of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY HALL

MOST SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBERS
REGULARLY ATTEND
THE FAMOUS

POP CONCERTS

AND WILL WANT
TO BE PRESENT AT
THE OPENING NIGHT—MAY 3

PROGRAMME

- | | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|----------------|
| 1. MARCH MILITAIRE | - | - | - | - | Schubert |
| 2. OVERTURE to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" | - | - | - | - | Nicolai |
| 3. SONG WITHOUT WORDS | - | - | - | - | Tschaikowsky |
| 4. FANTASIA, "La Bohème" | - | - | - | - | Puccini |
| <hr/> | | | | | |
| 5. PRELUDE to "Tristan and Isolde" | - | - | - | - | Wagner |
| 6. "GYPSY DANCE" from "Carmen" | - | - | - | - | Bizet |
| 7. ORGAN SOLO: Finale, Sixth Symphony
(Mr. Albert W. Snow) | - | - | - | - | Widor |
| 8. TEMPEST SCENE from "Othello" | - | - | - | - | Verdi |
| <hr/> | | | | | |
| 9. SELECTION, "Samson and Delilah" | - | - | - | - | Saint-Saëns |
| 10. CANZONE | - | - | - | - | Van Westerhout |
| 11. INTERMEZZO from "L'Amico Fritz" | - | - | - | - | Mascagni |
| 12. HUNGARIAN DANCE No. 1, in G minor | - | - | - | - | Brahms |

TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE

$1, 75c., 50c. ADMISSION 25c. NO TAX

The Pop Concerts Start Next Week at Symphony Hall, Under the Direction of Agide Jacchia, Conductor. So Far as We Know, This Is the First Interior View to Be Published of One of These Concerts, and Was Taken at the War Camp Community Service Night Last June.

POPS ASE PAY

—
Players to Say to Continue—Anyway
—

ber of the orchestra, whose quired at only some of the now being paid $1450 a year.
ers are now being paid $1650 other members are paid at year and a large number purpose of comparison with stras the length of service aken into consideration. In ra, for the men who care to Pop Concerts as well as the Concerts, there are 40 weeks

In most orchestras the time ent is only from 28 to 30 in only one other orchestra ent for so long a period as on. On the basis of 30 weeks ie annual payment of $1650 is to $55 a week and $1850 is to $61.68 a week; on the basis of service, $1650 is equiva-
5 a week and $1850 is equiva-
5 a week.

I Pop Concerts

more, the trustees are ready n the Pop Concerts for an season of four or five weeks at Labor Day and running ening of the Symphony Con-to pay the musicians during onal Pop season the full sal-hem during the Spring Pop

nd point made clear is, then, resent minimum salaries ap-eight men in the orchestra the opportunity is given to ers to play for four or five weeks in Pop Concerts in and to be paid an additional at service.

the orchestra travels each s allowed $5 a day for his enses. With one exception, res with $4 a day allowed in estras.

mbers of this orchestra have ge of membership in a pen-the amount of payment to n the event of death, to their minor children, depending on service. A substantial portion oney available for pensions

The Pop C
Direction o
Is the Firs
and Was T

SPRING BRINGS "THE POPS"

Trans. — May 4, 1920
Variations of 1920 Upon the Annual Theme of Orchestra and Audience at Play in Symphony Hall

NOT even restricting the gratification of a body's thirst to a "half of one per cent" can quench the desire of Bostonians for the spring season of "Pops," and the beginning of the thirty-fifth year at Symphony Hall last evening was welcomed by an audience which filled every place in the large auditorium. To be more correct, it might be said that three audiences were present: for the floor and balconies twain have each their individuality. On high sit the eager music lovers who would hear a noted orchestra for the little fee which outdoes the "movies" in inexpensiveness and far excels them in satisfactions. One remove below are many austere souls who fret that anyone should be so bold as to speak during the band's playing, who tolerate the smoke but approve it not; they regard the evening as wholly "elevating" and deprecate the intruding pop of cork and movement of service. For yea another audience, the floor contains an assemblage of those who take pleasure in the programme and rejoice along with it the opportunity to sip a "highball" compounded of Mr. Burbank's special berry and ginger ale—the "Pops" were never the resort of the really bibulous—while blowing wreaths of smoke or idly chatting on the chances of Mr. Hoover for the presidency and the prevailing tone of green in spring millinery.

Nonetheless the denizens, so to speak, of the floor are not without discrimination and attentive listening powers. They appreciate the abilities of Mr. Jacchia in conducting so admirably as he did last am Begins New Service of Livermore & Co., Inc.

OR PACIFIC COAST

new steamship service be-and Pacific Coast ports by rborn & Co., Incorporated, ffingham sailed today for Francisco, Portland, Ore.,
New York. The steamer
a Liverpool and Hamburg, sh and general cargo, and 500 tons of cargo, compris-land manufactured goods ional freight will be taken k.

DICTMENT WARRANTS

in Cambridge, Is Charged of Goods Worth Nearly agher, thirty-one years old, nd, was arrested this mornge, on the charge of conarceny of twenty-nine case at $2900, from the Sanborn These goods were recovter by the Boston police.

charged also in indictment

SUGGESTS FALL POPS TO INCREASE PAY

Globe
Feb. 26/20

Pres Cabot Asks Symphony Players to Say Now Whether They Wish to Continue— Orchestra to Go On, Anyway

At the close of the rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, made an address to the musicians in reply to their recent salary demands. He said:

"This orchestra has been maintained for 39 years. It is going to continue to be maintained. This is to be done for the present through the generosity of persons making annual gifts and ultimately through the income of money given as an endowment for the purpose of its continuance. There is no occasion on the ground of such fear for any member of the orchestra to seek a position elsewhere.

"The first point then is, that this orchestra is to be continued with its traditional standards of excellence.

"The orchestra at present is being supported by annual contributions, the total of which is twice as large as the amount paid by Maj Higginson in any one of the first 37 years of its existence. In other words, to support it is now costing more than double what it ever cost before.

Increases Since 1914

"The total of salaries paid to the musicians is today 30 percent greater than it was in 1914.

"In 1918 every musician receiving less than $3000 a year was given an additional payment of $250 a year, regardless of whether he had or did not have a continuing contract at a fixed sum. Furthermore, where contracts expired and new contracts were entered into, so far as possible other increases were given.

"Payments to all musicians receiving less than $3000 a year are distributed weekly throughout the year, the rate of payment being higher during the 40 weeks of the Symphony Concert season and Pop Concert season than in Summer when no services are required of the musicians.

"One member of the orchestra, whose service is required at only some of the concerts, is now being paid $1450 a year. Seven members are now being paid $1650 a year. All other members are paid at least $1850 a year and a large number more.

"For the purpose of comparison with other orchestras the length of service should be taken into consideration. In this orchestra, for the men who care to play in the Pop Concerts as well as the Symphony Concerts, there are 40 weeks of service. In most orchestras the time of employment is only from 28 to 30 weeks and in only one other orchestra is employment for so long a period as that in Boston. On the basis of 30 weeks of service the annual payment of $1650 is equivalent to $55 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $61.68 a week; on the basis of 40 weeks of service, $1650 is equivalent to $41.25 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $46.25 a week.

Offers Full Pop Concerts

"Furthermore, the trustees are ready to carry on the Pop Concerts for an additional season of four or five weeks beginning at Labor Day and running until the opening of the Symphony Concerts, and to pay the musicians during that additional Pop season the full salary paid them during the Spring Pop season.

"The second point made clear is, then, that the present minimum salaries apply to only eight men in the orchestra and that the opportunity is given to the members to play for four or five additional weeks in Pop Concerts in September and to be paid an additional sum for that service.

"When the orchestra travels each musician is allowed $5 a day for his living expenses. With one exception, this compares with $4 a day allowed in other orchestras.

"The members of this orchestra have the privilege of membership in a pension fund, the amount of payment to them, or, in the event of death, to their widow or minor children, depending on length of service. A substantial portion of the money available for pensions

SPRING BRINGS "THE POPS"

Grand. — May 4, 1920
Variations of 1920 Upon the Annual Theme of Orchestra and Audience at Play in Symphony Hall

NOT even restricting the gratification of a body's thirst to a "half of one per cent" can quench the desire of Bostonians for the spring season of "Pops," and the beginning of the thirty-fifth year at Symphony Hall last evening was welcomed by an audience which filled every place in the large auditorium. To be more correct, it might be said that three audiences were present: for the floor and balconies twain have each their individuality. On high sit the eager music lovers who would hear a noted orchestra for the little fee which outdoes the "movies" in inexpensiveness and far excels them in satisfactions. One remove below are many austere souls who fret that anyone should be so bold as to speak during the band's playing, who tolerate the smoke but approve it not; they regard the evening as wholly "elevating" night. They knew the charm of his Schubert, his Nicolai and Chaikovsky, while they asked for more suppleness from his Puccini, quaked at the thunders of his "Tempest Scene" from Verdi's "Otello" and rejoiced lustily in "Carmen" and "The Blue Danube." Mr. Jacchia makes interesting programmes. While resolved for the present to have none of musical comedy, he gives his listeners sufficient variety to prevent their protesting at too "heavy" fare. If criticism were to be offered, it might be queried if seven operatic selections did not make too great a proportion of twelve numbers. The better parts of a symphony orchestra do not necessarily lie in the playing of opera, in which they have obviously none too much training. For that at its best, a master hand is wanted with the baton and surely there is much beside symphonies and operatic music in the library of Symphony Hall.

Four-score men filled the stage last evening, with never a hint of the winter's troubles to mar the flower-bedecked and tree-banked platform. Mr. Jacchia's enthusiasm and vigor brought forth the necessary vivacity from the players and stirred responsive applause from the satisfied audience. Mr. Albert W. Snow's capital organ playing of the finale of Widor's Sixth Symphony provided the fillip of desired solo work and even the weather man condescended to be kind to the opening of Boston's favorite springtime institution.

FRANCES A. GOELL

The Pop C
Direction c
Is the First
and Was T

SUGGESTS FALL POPS TO INCREASE PAY

Globe Feb. 26/20
Pres Cabot Asks Symphony Players to Say Now Whether They Wish to Continue—Orchestra to Go On, Anyway

At the close of the rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, made an address to the musicians in reply to their recent salary demands. He said:

"This orchestra has been maintained for 39 years. It is going to continue to be maintained. This is to be done for the present through the generosity of persons making annual gifts and ultimately through the income of money given as an endowment for the purpose of its continuance. There is no occasion on the ground of such fear for any member of the orchestra to seek a position elsewhere.

"The first point then is, that this orchestra is to be continued with its traditional standards of excellence.

"The orchestra at present is being supported by annual contributions, the total of which is twice as large as the amount paid by Maj Higginson in any one of the first 37 years of its existence. In other words, to support it is now costing more than double what it ever cost before.

Increases Since 1914

"The total of salaries paid to the musicians is today 30 percent greater than it was in 1914.

"In 1918 every musician receiving less than $3000 a year was given an additional payment of $250 a year, regardless of whether he had or did not have a continuing contract at a fixed sum. Furthermore, where contracts expired and new contracts were entered into, so far as possible other increases were given.

"Payments to all musicians receiving less than $3000 a year are distributed weekly throughout the year, the rate of payment being higher during the 40 weeks of the Symphony Concert season and Pop Concert season than in Summer when no services are required of the musicians.

"One member of the orchestra, whose service is required at only some of the concerts, is now being paid $1450 a year. Seven members are now being paid $1650 a year. All other members are paid at least $1850 a year and a large number more.

"For the purpose of comparison with other orchestras the length of service should be taken into consideration. In this orchestra, for the men who care to play in the Pop Concerts as well as the Symphony Concerts, there are 40 weeks of service. In most orchestras the time of employment is only from 28 to 30 weeks and in only one other orchestra is employment for so long a period as that in Boston. On the basis of 30 weeks of service the annual payment of $1650 is equivalent to $55 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $61.68 a week; on the basis of 40 weeks of service, $1650 is equivalent to $41.25 a week and $1850 is equivalent to $46.25 a week.

Offers Full Pop Concerts

"Furthermore, the trustees are ready to carry on the Pop Concerts for an additional season of four or five weeks beginning at Labor Day and running until the opening of the Symphony Concerts, and to pay the musicians during that additional Pop season the full salary paid them during the Spring Pop season.

"The second point made clear is, then, that the present minimum salaries apply to only eight men in the orchestra and that the opportunity is given to the members to play for four or five additional weeks in Pop Concerts in September and to be paid an additional sum for that service.

"When the orchestra travels each musician is allowed $5 a day for his living expenses. With one exception, this compares with $4 a day allowed in other orchestras.

"The members of this orchestra have the privilege of membership in a pension fund, the amount of payment to them, or, in the event of death, to their widow or minor children, depending on length of service. A substantial portion of the money available for pensions comes from concerts which the members themselves give for the purpose during each year, a right which is secured to them under their contract.

"The members of the orchestra are entitled, according to length of service, to death benefit and disability payments under group insurance paid for by the trustees.

"In other orchestras contracts are made only from year to year. In this orchestra they may be and usually are made for two to three years at a time. In no orchestra has there been a greater permanence of employment for a man of proved artistic ability than in this orchestra.

Increase Asked Impossible

"On Feb 6, 1920, a large proportion of the orchestra united in a written request for an increase in compensation of each member, stating that 'any increase less than $1000 a year would be futile,' and asking for a reply not later than Feb 20, 1920.

"Feb 14, on behalf of the trustees, the president met the entire orchestra as a group and pointed out that the increase which was insisted upon as a minimum would require contributions from the public of $100,000 a year in addition to the present contributions of $100,000 made for running the orchestra, or that, if a permanent fund was raised to maintain the orchestra, it would require $4,000,000 instead of $2,000,000, and that in the absence of such gifts from generous citizens, either annually or to an endowment fund, it was impossible to grant the request.

"He further stated that some increase in salaries, such as had been given in previous years, would be possible by revising the prices of tickets to the concerts and that that matter had for some time been under consideration by the trustees.

"He stated that in the case of members whose contracts were expiring, and in the case of members then receiving the minimum pay, and in the case of the basses, even though they had continuing contracts, the matter of salaries would be gone over. Before closing the meeting he stated he would post definite hours when he would be glad to confer with members as to their salaries. This was done.

Glad to Meet Committee

"It is suggested by some members of the orchestra that it might be advisable to have the members select a committee of three, one from the brass section, one from the wood wind and one from the string, to advise with the members of the orchestra and the trustees to promote the general good of the entire orchestra, but not to pass upon the artistic merits of any member, that being properly a matter for the conductor. This suggestion is entirely satisfactory to the trustees. Indeed, they will be glad at any time to consider with individual members of a committee of the orchestra any matter affecting the general or individual welfare of its members.

"To sum up: Those members whose contracts are about to expire are requested to notify the management at once whether they wish to continue as members of the orchestra. If they do, the details of their new contracts will be taken up forthwith. All others who have any statement which they wish to make are requested to make such statements to the management now. It is important for the trustees to know without delay to what extent, if at all, there are any places to be filled in the orchestra so that they may select the best personnel for any such places, because, in any event, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be carried on and its great qualities maintained."

MORE ORCHESTRA MEMBERS SIGN UNION APPLICATIONS

A number of additional members of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday filled out applications for membership in the union of musicians affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, it was announced by Carl E. Gardner, publicity chairman of the committee of players. Mr Gardner said that every member of the orchestra at the rehearsal expressed sympathy with the union affiliation and, while pledges were not received from all of them, it was predicted that the orchestra will be 100 percent organized within a few days.

The committee expects to receive from Judge Frederick P. Cabot a copy of the salary list of the orchestra. It will go over the list and figure out just what increases were granted that brought the total to 30 percent, as stated by Judge Cabot.

It is claimed that many of the higher salaried artists received big increases, some as high as 75 percent, while some of the others received less than 30 percent.

ENDOWMENT FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Trans. — Feb. 20/20
A Way Out of Present Difficulties—The Wisdom of a Test of the Public—More Manœuvring for Position—The Flonzaleys and Three Classic Quartets—Programmes in Prospect

NO symphony orchestra in the United States can maintain itself out of the income its concerts yield. If it is to keep a high standard of repertory and performance, it must not over-tax conductor and players with too frequent journeying from its seat, with too many concerts at home and abroad in the short space of the "musical season" in America. Similarly, if it is to hold its public in the cities in which it is regularly heard, the scale of prices for its concerts must not be set higher than is the custom of the hour. If it is to enjoy a desirable, even a necessary prestige, it must employ a conductor of signal ability and pay him well; it must assemble players of proportionate quality and proportionately compensate them; it must have ample opportunity for rehearsal and ample means to command "assisting artists," occasional choruses and other decorations to concerts of the first order. By the test of years, no orchestra so organized, so remunerated and so working from season to season can pay its way, however numerous, widespread and faithful its public may be.

Under these conditions, a symphony orchestra in the United States must be sustained by an individual benefactor who annually pays the deficit between receipts and expenditures; by a body of guarantors who do likewise; or by an endowment, either permanent or assured through a substantial period. In Mr. Higginson's day, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained by a single "patron"; the New York Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Damrosch's—is now so supported by Mr. Flagler. Various guarantors stand ready to provide the New Symphony Orchestra in New York—Mr. Bodanzky's—with necessary funds; most of the symphony orchestras in the Middle West are similarly kept in being; the Boston Orchestra is at present so sustained. In Philadelphia, after no little effort, an endowment fund collected from many subscribers will meet the deficits of Mr. Stokowski's orchestra through a term of years. Beyond these three, no methods for the maintaining of a symphony orchestra in America have borne the test of actual application.

Here in Boston, the Symphony Orchestra flourished when it was sustained by a single "patron." When he withdrew his support, no single man stood ready to succeed him and none is likely to present himself. A board of trustees undertook the control of the orchestra; sundry guarantors, privately pledged, agreed to pay deficits through three seasons. These trustees and these guarantors have met as best they might a rising scale of expenses which keeps annual revenue short of annual expenditure by, approximately, $100,000. Players in the orchestra now ask increases in salary that would add another $100,000 to this deficit. As present costs of living go, as present standards of compensation run in their calling, their request is reasonable, even though gradual adjustment, individual case by individual case, might lower the sum total of these increases. The trustees reply that they have not the income wherewith to meet this expenditure, however moment it may be. The outcome, for the moment is an impasse, which the dictionary defines as a passage open at only one end.

That "open end" may, with reason, be direct request to the community for a permanent endowment for the Symphony Orchestra sufficient to meet present and future vicissitude. The trustees have for months been meditating such a step; they might as advisedly take it as enter upon fresh solicitation of private subscriptions to meet new needs. Either this community, by and large, regards the Symphony Orchestra as an institution worth maintaining—or it does not. Either the public of the Symphony Concerts takes enough pleasure in them to sustain them—or it does not. Either a few individuals care enough for symphonic music in Boston to contribute largely to the continuance of it—or they do not. Either all three categories wish the Symphony Orchestra adequately provided with income according to the needs of the time—or they do not. A canvass of the city and the suburbs for an endowment fund, large enough to assure the future of the Symphony Concerts would clear the air of the uncertainties, the cross-purposes, the temporary expedient that now more or less becloud them. If the endowment or a large part of it were subscribed, then the Symphony Orchestra would be supported, as it should be, by so much of the community as takes pride and pleasure in it. If the outcome were a failure, then the temper of the community toward the Symphony Concerts would at last stand clear and private benefaction could decide whether or not it would continue them for its own satisfaction, from its own sense of obligation.

And Now the Union

The reported application of various players in the Symphony Orchestra for membership in the Musicians' Protective Association—otherwise "the union"—seems no more than a tactical manœuvre in the present controversy with the trustees of the orchestra. If the applicants purpose to leave the Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season, unless their requests are granted, and are now tentatively seeking employment elsewhere, membership in the union is an advantage, even a necessity. They know, moreover, that so long as they do their work and fulfill their obligations at Symphony Hall, no one in authority there will molest them because they have joined the union. If the secession should be general among those who ask higher salaries, tactics would still plausibly explain it. In that case, the union might urge for the increases with whatever influence it possesses, might ask the trustees to accept its rules and scales, might raise obstacles to new comers into the orchestra. As a matter of fact, nineteen out of every twenty men in the Symphony Orchestra care not a turn of their hands for the union, except as a means to aid them toward the higher salaries they are now seeking. In turn, the officers of the union amusingly delude themselves if, and when, they profess any other view of the reported "secession." Fluent "bunk" about "Americanism"—familiar cloak to many a selfish interest—as little serves any of the actual merits of the case.

Symphony Hall.

MUSICAL UNIONS: A PROBLEM

By special correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

NEW YORK, New York—A storm is brewing and may soon break loose here, as a result of sweeping changes both in the rules and in the price lists of the organization which is usually referred to as the M. M. P. U. The full designation of this society, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians, is the Musical Mutual Protective Union, Local 310.

The upheavals in the Boston Symphony Orchestra may ere long be followed by more conflicts between members of this active and important group of musicians and the directors of the New York symphony orchestras. And it is possible that these will be anticipated by a revolt of many New York theater managers against what they—with or without good reason—think unfair demands.

Of Public Interest

Some points at issue are of interest to the public, on which both parties in the expected clash depend for patronage. For, like almost everything connected with the unions, the impending quarrel will react upon the public. When the cost of producing coal or oil goes up, the public pays. And if the cost of producing music should be increased, that portion of the public which loves music in the theater or the concert room may be required to bear unpleasantly hard burdens.

Apart from this, the cause of art may suffer by anything which renders it more difficult to bring music within reach of the supporters of the concerts and the theaters. The public therefore surely has the right to know something of the matters in dispute.

When, nearly 60 years ago, the M. M. P. U. was chartered, it was empowered to make such rules and regulations not be "inconsistent with existing law," to "fix uniform rates of prices" by-laws. At the outset was not over popularly composed, in a great of non-naturalized ally German, or of d foreign sympathies. of the union, as they ll would-be members, American born, to "have intention to become ng to law." The sec- the second article of reads as follows: instrumental perform- ve come to this country s a member (members) or orchestra, or other- be eligible for member- nths after the expiration or engagement with said not mistaken signers under th section of M. M. P. U. in Federation risdictions lo- on travel or the expiration remain longer, shall be re- lon fee ($100). defensible, sayeth not. of internal ey may pre- aging a mu- his orches- At least one ite recently. ve been an-ion of the same article New York s, to become e rules of et an earlier two years the same he question purpose of d what we onal pitch" y pitch (440 tion of the as it stood

Phases e a lawyer to explain ficance of these quota- st, however, to a lay- ems to imply that, for t least, a foreigner, ould or should not be ernessity of earning his eluded from that right

According to the asser- ed forbids m in any where any tch, 440 A.

his innova- ments now e replaced. outlay with cturing in- o be tuned

sues raised

even born Americans, as it would ap-

ter of fact, nineteen out of every twenty men in the Symphony Orchestra care not a turn of their hands for the union, except as a means to aid them toward the higher salaries they are now seeking. In turn, the officers of the union amusingly delude themselves if, and when, they profess any other view of the reported "secession." Fluent "bunk" about "Americanism"—familiar cloak to many a selfish interest—as little serves any of the actual merits of the case.

Symphony Hall.

Thomas Dy
DRY CLEANING and DYING

Expert Dye Work
2207-9 Maple Ave.
Telephone So
Telephone us or write
O. W. THOMAS

Paris DAY
French IRDAY
10673

KODAI

And Everything That G
EARL V. L
226 West Fourth

BARBER Metropo

222 W. THIRD ST. N.

Peerless Curtain

Curtains Called for 1577 West Washin
Home 23136

ARNOLD

Trunks, Bags, Leather Goods
322 West Fifth

GEORGE H. S

Modern Shoe

439 South Hill Street

MEEK'S TIRE & VI

184 So. West
Hartford and Fisk Tires.
Cord—Fabric. J. F. MEEK

J. E. VESTAL TIR

1101 SOUTH HILL ST
New Tires and Renewed

Angelus Bike Shop
bicycles. 317 S. Main S

PLUMBI

EARL R. BROWN

powered to make such rules and regulations as should not be "inconsistent with any existing law," to "fix and prescribe uniform rates of prices" and to adopt by-laws. At the outset, the new local was not over popular. It was composed, in a great measure, either of non-naturalized foreigners, chiefly German, or of citizens who had foreign sympathies. But the by-laws of the union, as they stand, require all would-be members, who are not American born, to "have declared their intention to become citizens, according to law." The second section of the second article of the same by-law reads as follows:

All professional instrumental performers who may have come to this country under contract as a member (members) of a foreign band or orchestra, or otherwise, shall not be eligible for membership until six months after the expiration of said contract or engagement with said orchestra or band.

The third section of the same article further stipulates that, except "during the present state of war," "this union shall not admit to membership musicians enlisted in the United States Army or Navy."

Some Peculiar Phases

It would take a lawyer to explain the exact significance of these quotations. The first, however, to a layman's mind, seems to imply that, for six months at least, a foreigner, whether he should or should not be under the necessity of earning his livelihood, is excluded from that right or privilege.

Moreover, according to the assertion of a well-known New York manager—who assures the writer that he has had evidence of his contention—members of musical locals, other than Local 310, are forbidden to become members of the M. M. P. U. till they have resided in or near New York for six months, and are therefore also, indirectly, debarred from their right, during their six months' probational residence hereabouts, to earn their bread as musicians. In other words, even born Americans, as it would ap-

not mistaken igners under th section of
M. M. P. U.

in Federation risdictions loon travel or the expiration remain longer, shall be re-
son fee ($100).

defensible,
sayeth not.
of internal they may preaging a mu-

his orches-
At least one
ite recently.
ve been an-

New York
s, to become rules of et an earlier
two years the same he question purpose of d what we onal pitch" pitch (440 y pitch of the

as it stood itted to per-any pitch is international

ed forbids
m in any where any tch, 440 A.

his innovaments now
e replaced.
outlay with cturing ino be tuned

sues raised

ter of fact, nineteen out of every twenty men in the Symphony Orchestra care not a turn of their hands for the union, except as a means to aid them toward the higher salaries they are now seeking. In turn, the officers of the union amusingly delude themselves if, and when, they profess any other view of the reported "secession." Fluent "bunk" about "Americanism"—familiar cloak to many a selfish interest—as little serves any of the actual merits of the case.

Symphony Hall.

Thom
DRY

Expert
2207-9 Ma
Telephone
O. W.

And Every
E
226 West E

BARBER Me
222 W

Peerless C
Curtains
1577 W
Home 23136

ARI
Trunks, Bags, 322

GEOI
Modern
439 South Hill S

MEEK'S T
184
Hartford and Cord—Fabric.

J. E. VEST
1101 SOUT
New Tires and

Angelus Bik
bicycles. 31

EARL H

GENERAL AUCTION

COL. C. F. CALHOUN
1911 So. Burlington Ave.

BOOKS BOUG

Choice and rare books a specialty.
DAWSON'S BOOK SHOP, 518

Walters Stenograph

821 HAAS BUILDING
MULTIGRAPHING—NOTARY

LONG BEACH, F

Downs FurnituB

PhonographEN
Records

We exchange.

LONG BEACH FURNITURE
335-341 Pine Avenue
Complete House Furnishgr
New Process Gas Ran

Home 112

QUALITY BOOT

133 PINE AVENUE
Long Beach Agents for
"GROUND GRIPPER"

WALK-OVERS FOR MEN AND

BURKE'S WALK-OVER
239 PINE AVENUE

Horace W. Green
Hardware Com

113-121 E. BROADWAY.

Buffums
The Mercantile
PINE AVE. AT BROADWAY

LONG BEACH, CAL

The maximum of Quality;
in Service; and top always.

S. J. ABRAMS, Fine

Clothes of Quality
at Reasonable Prices

pear—if that manager is not mistaken—may be treated, as foreigners under contract. Part of the sixth section of the second article in the M. M. P. U. by-laws reads as under:

Members of the American Federation of Musicians from other jurisdictions located in this jurisdiction on travel or transfer cards must, after the expiration of six months, if desiring to remain longer, become full members and shall be required to pay the full initiation fee ($100).

Whether this is legally defensible, or the contrary, deponent sayeth not. Such points, of course, are of internal interest. But, in effect, they may prevent a manager from engaging a musician, whom he needs for his orchestra, outside New York. At least one such case has occurred quite recently. No changes in the rule have been announced.

An Arbitrary Ruling

Another change, both in New York and elsewhere, is, it appears, to become part and parcel of the rules of the M. M. P. U. It will upset an earlier rule which had till lately—two years ago—been enforced by the same local, and bears upon the question of musical pitch. The purpose of this change is to discard what we all know as "international pitch" (435 vibrations) for a new pitch (440 vibrations). The ninth section of the third article of the by-laws, as it stood two years ago, reads thus:

No member shall be permitted to perform in any theater where any pitch is used other than low, or international pitch.

The new rule proposed forbids "any member to perform in any theater, band or orchestra, where any pitch is used than 'low' pitch, 440 A. 'United States Standard'."

As a consequence of this innovation, most of the wind instruments now in use, will soon have to be replaced. This means a considerable outlay with much profit to the manufacturing interests. Pianos will have to be tuned higher.

But the most important issues raised by the projected changes in the M. M. P. U. rules deal with the prices to be paid to union musicians. These are the danger points. They affect not only managers of opera houses, but also theatre and concert managers and others. To quote at length from the 660 proposed alterations of the former or present rules would be impossible in a daily newspaper. Many suggestions which have already been discussed by the M. M. P. U. seem to conflict with other suggestions. For example one, demanding an increase of 75 per cent in "the salaries of all musicians employed in grand opera, grand opera stage bands, theaters, vaudeville houses, vaudeville and picture houses, picture houses, hotels, cabarets, dance places, summer resorts and all outside business."

As the writer is informed, it is the intention of the M. M. P. U. to demand $11, in future, of grand opera managements, for each performance of regular or ordinary works in the repertory, and $15 for each performance of a Wagner opera or music-drama. New prices are also to be insisted on for rehearsals. It is assumed, in the most arbitrary way, that to interpret such works as "Falstaff" or "Pelléas et Mélisande" is comparatively easy, while to play "Tannhäuser" or "Lohengrin"—which are based to a great extent on Weber's "Euryanthe"—or "Parsifal" is extremely difficult. There is no hint at any reduction in prices when the musicians have to play such relatively childish and simple scores as those of "Lucia," "L'Italiana in Algeri" and "La Sonnambula."

A Precarious Situation

To so wealthy an organization as the Metropolitan, the new rules, though irksome, may not be prohibitive. But they will doubtless seem more serious to less stable opera houses. They may render impossible the long hoped for realization of all plans for the establishment of a National Opera House. And they can

BOOS BROS.
CAFETERIAS
Hill St. adway 321 West Fifth St.
328 So Broadway

KUS MARKET
STALLS A 5-A 6
ar Delicatessen
STALL C 6
CENTRAL PUBLIC MARKET
adway F 514

EKINS

PROOF STORAGE
SCO—OAKLAND—LOS ANGELES

Grocery Company
SELLS FOR LESS"
GOOD DEPARTMENT STORES
for our Monthly Catalog

S' CASH GROCERY
ALITY AND SERVICE
Hoover St. West 18 Home 2419

LING COMPANY
ng is nt
621 Grand Ave
Phone 62223.
Los Angeles

STATIONERS Art Dealer

Star Hardware Co.
4 STORES

-1147-51 W. WASHINGTON ST.
-2401-3 SO. HOOVER ST.
-857-9 SO. VERMONT AVE.
-203-05 SO. WESTERN AVE.

Siegel & Co.
esses', and Children's Garments
445 BROADWAY

REBUILDING
Eleventh St. 558475.

ROSE linery
Tel. F 486

GLASS
ER OF GOWNS
e 3—Tel. 19657

PAIRING
Reasonable Prices
H. SANDSTROM
Tel. 61117.

BAILEY
Auditor
or Non-Residents
N. Van Nuys Bldg

SIGNS
"ality"
lady submitted.
ertising Co.
—South 3395
Calif.

UNDY
ING CO. nd Service
h Dry Laundry
Pressing
945—23068

laundry
EXCELLED
unset Blvd.
olly 4202

Shoes
WOMEN
AY AND
OR. 4TH ST.

PAINT-UP SEASON
in Street
ORE OF
T COMPANY

ET GARAGE
VICE STATION
REBUILDING

BOSTON, MASS., March 10, 1920.

To the Supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Recent events have produced a condition in the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which calls for a frank statement from the Trustees.

It should be said at the outset that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the Orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the musicians' union. Mr. Fradkin was concert master, and as such had the special duty of maintaining the standards and discipline of the Orchestra. Under such circumstances his conduct was a breach of discipline and a discourtesy to the Orchestra's audience, which, in the light of his contracted obligations, would have required prompt and decisive action by the Trustees at any time.

The question of the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians, through the "Local" known as the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, is not of recent origin. This general problem confronted Major Higginson early in the thirty-seven years of his maintenance of the Orchestra. He took and resolutely held the position that the artistic ideals of the Orchestra he had established required absolute liberty in its management, unhampered from without, to select its members when, where, and for such length of service as the management deemed best, and to be the sole judge of the artistic qualifications of the artists selected; he considered no less essential the untrammelled power to terminate the engagement of any member in case his conduct or musical performance might no longer justify his connection with the Orchestra.

Shortly after the present Trustees assumed the conduct of the Orchestra, this question was raised again. The Trustees made no objection to the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the Federation of Musicians, provided it could be brought about consistently with those ideals of the Orchestra which had become its most cherished traditions. The rules of the Association, as then shown and explained to the Trustees, were not consistent with such ideals. Substantially they provided for the "closed shop":—that is, only members of the Association could play in the Orchestra; no musician could be engaged outside the jurisdiction of the Boston "Local" without its consent; only citizens of the United States or Canada, and those who had taken out their first naturalization papers, could acquire membership in the Association, and therefore in the Orchestra; no artist could be engaged in Europe; contracts could be made only for one year; all obligations must be expressly subordinate to the obligations of membership in the Association. Any exceptions or modifications to these rules, which unmodified

by the projected changes in the M. M. P. U. rules deal with the prices to be paid to union musicians. These are the danger points. They affect not only managers of opera houses, but also theatre and concert managers and others. To quote at length from the 660 proposed alterations of the former or present rules would be impossible in a daily newspaper. Many suggestions which have already been discussed by the M. M. P. U. seem to conflict with other suggestions. For example one, demanding an increase of 75 per cent in "the salaries of all musicians employed in grand opera, grand opera stage bands, theaters, vaudeville houses, vaudeville and picture houses, picture houses, hotels, cabarets, dance places, summer resorts and all outside business."

As the writer is informed, it is the intention of the M. M. P. U. to demand $11, in future, of grand opera managements, for each performance of regular or ordinary works in the repertory, and $15 for each performance of a Wagner opera or music-drama. New prices are also to be insisted on for rehearsals. It is assumed, in the most arbitrary way, that to interpret such works as "Falstaff" or "Pelléas et Mélisande" is comparatively easy, while to play "Tannhäuser" or "Lohengrin"—which are based to a great extent on Weber's "Euryanthe"—or "Parsifal" is extremely difficult. There is no hint at any reduction in prices when the musicians have to play such relatively childish and simple scores as those of "Lucia," "L'Italiana in Algeri" and "La Sonnambula."

A Precarious Situation

To so wealthy an organization as the Metropolitan, the new rules, though irksome, may not be prohibitive. But they will doubtless seem more serious to less stable opera houses. They may render impossible the long hoped for realization of all plans for the establishment of a National Opera House. And they can

BOOS BROS.
CAFETERIAS
Hill St. 321 West Fifth St.
adway 328 So Broadway

KUS MARKET
STALLS A 5—A 6
ar Delicatessen

STALL C 6
CENTRAL PUBLIC MARKET
adway F 514

EKINS

PROOF STORAGE
SCO—OAKLAND—LOS ANGELES

Grocery Company
SELLS FOR LESS"
FOOD DEPARTMENT STORES
for our Monthly Catalog

S' CASH GROCERY
ALITY AND SERVICE
Hoover St. West 18 Home 2410

LING COMPANY

ng is nt
621 Grand Ave.
Phone 62223.
Los Angeles

STATIONERS Art Dealer

Star Hardware Co.
4 STORES

-1147-51 W. WASHINGTON ST.
-2401-3 SO. HOOVER ST.
-857-9 SO. VERMONT AVE.
-203-05 SO. WESTERN AVE.

Siegel & Co.

esses', and Children's Garments
445 BROADWAY

REBUILDING
Eleventh St. 558475.

TY SHOPPE
and made to order ching. 2028 Orange 98.

ROSE
linery
Tel. F 486

GLASS
ER OF GOWNS
e 3—Tel. 19657

AIRING
Reasonable Prices
H. SANDSTROM
Tel. 61117.

BAILEY
Auditor
or Non-Residents
N. Van Nuys Bldg

SIGNS
"ality"
gladly submitted.
ertising Co.

—South 3695
Calif.

UNDRY
ING CO.

nd Service
h Dry Laundry
Pressing
945—23068

laundry
EXCELLED
unset Blvd.
olly 4202

Shoes
WOMEN

AY AND
OR. 4TH ST.

PAINT-UP SEASON
ain Street
ORE OF

T COMPANY

ET GARAGE

RVIC STATION
REBUILDING

BOSTON, MASS., March 10, 1920.

To the Supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Recent events have produced a condition in the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which calls for a frank statement from the Trustees.

It should be said at the outset that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the Orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the musicians' union. Mr. Fradkin was concert master, and as such had the special duty of maintaining the standards and discipline of the Orchestra. Under such circumstances his conduct was a breach of discipline and a discourtesy to the Orchestra's audience, which, in the light of his contracted obligations, would have required prompt and decisive action by the Trustees at any time.

The question of the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians, through the "Local" known as the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, is not of recent origin. This general problem confronted Major Higginson early in the thirty-seven years of his maintenance of the Orchestra. He took and resolutely held the position that the artistic ideals of the Orchestra he had established required absolute liberty in its management, unhampered from without, to select its members when, where, and for such length of service as the management deemed best, and to be the sole judge of the artistic qualifications of the artists selected; he considered no less essential the untrammelled power to terminate the engagement of any member in case his conduct or musical performance might no longer justify his connection with the Orchestra.

Shortly after the present Trustees assumed the conduct of the Orchestra, this question was raised again. The Trustees made no objection to the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the Federation of Musicians, provided it could be brought about consistently with those ideals of the Orchestra which had become its most cherished traditions. The rules of the Association, as then shown and explained to the Trustees, were not consistent with such ideals. Substantially they provided for the "closed shop":—that is, only members of the Association could play in the Orchestra; no musician could be engaged outside the jurisdiction of the Boston "Local" without its consent; only citizens of the United States or Canada, and those who had taken out their first naturalization papers, could acquire membership in the Association, and therefore in the Orchestra; no artist could be engaged in Europe; contracts could be made only for one year; all obligations must be expressly subordinate to the obligations of membership in the Association. Any exceptions or modifications to these rules, which unmodified by the projected P. U. rules deal paid to union n the danger poin only managers also theatre and others. To quot 660 proposed alt or present rules in a daily news tions which ha cussed by the l conflict with otl example one, de of 75 per cent i musicians emplo grand opera st vaudeville house ture houses, pic cabarets, dance sorts and all ou As the writer intention of the $11, in future, of ments, for each lar or ordinary v and $15 for ea Wagner opera c prices are also rehearsals. It is arbitrary way, works as "Falst Mélisande" is while to play "hengrin"—which extent on Web "Parsifal" is ext is no hint at ar when the music relatively childi those of "Lucia geri" and "La S hardly fail to affect the New York plans of even so prosperous an institution as the Chicago Opera Company. One of the chief sufferers by the projected scale of prices in the cases of what are, technically, known as the Class II opera houses, will be the Park Theater, where, for the past year or two, the American Singers, under the direction of William Wade Hinshaw, have been giving performances of the Gilbert & Sullivan operas. Under the old rules of the M. M. P. U., the wages of musicians engaged for the season by Class II houses were, in 1918, $35 weekly for seven performances and in 1919, $42. In the near future they will be $50 (or more), and the manager may be compelled either to reduce the number of musicians in his orchestra—with a corresponding loss in the excellence of the performances—or to abandon his enterprise, which has given pleasure to a host of New York music lovers. The prices to be paid for performances at symphony concerts will be those in force in the case of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Regarding Theaters

At the regular theaters, in the moving picture houses and in the New York restaurants and hotels, large increases will also be demanded.

Another of the rules will call for the doubling of small orchestras in theaters. One consequence of this may and, as many hope, will be the abolition of much wretched entr'acte music. There are times when well-played and well-chosen music helps a play. There are others when it seems a superfluity.

The distressing—and disturbing—rule permitting substitutes, unrehearsed, to play at performances of plays and Class II operas will not be abolished, though it has long been most obnoxious to the managers. Exceptions will be made, though, should the managers, to assure the unity and efficiency of their orchestras, pay each musician an additional $10 weekly.

SPECIALTY SHOPPE to wear and made to order hem titching. 2026 Orange Vilshire 296.

CORA ROSE
Art Millinery
L STREET Tel. F 486

DOUGLASS
ND MAKER OF GOWNS
Promenade 3—Tel. 19657

REPAIRING
rk at Reasonable Prices
J and E. H. SANDSTROM
Street. Tel. 61117.

HERMAN BAILEY
Accountant—Auditor
agement for Non-Residents
e 835, I. N. Van Nuys Bldg

RIC SIGNS
Visuality
sketches gladly submitted.
Advertising Co.
WESTERN)
n Street—South 3695
Angeles, Calif.

LAUNDRY
LEANING CO.

uality and Service
and Rough Dry Laundry
ning and Pressing
c South 945—23068

ood Laundry
AND UNEXCELLED
ive. and Sunset Blvd.
16 and Holly 4202

Over Shoes
AND WOMEN

BROADWAY AND PRING COR. 4TH ST.

UP and PAINT-UP SEASON
South Main Street
PAINT STORE OF PAINT COMPANY

STREET GARAGE
GILL SERVICE STATION
ING AND REBUILDING
Eleventh St. 558475.

BOSTON, MASS., March 10, 1920.

To the Supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Recent events have produced a condition in the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which calls for a frank statement from the Trustees.

It should be said at the outset that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the Orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the musicians' union. Mr. Fradkin was concert master, and as such had the special duty of maintaining the standards and discipline of the Orchestra. Under such circumstances his conduct was a breach of discipline and a discourtesy to the Orchestra's audience, which, in the light of his contracted obligations, would have required prompt and decisive action by the Trustees at any time.

The question of the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians, through the "Local" known as the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, is not of recent origin. This general problem confronted Major Higginson early in the thirty-seven years of his maintenance of the Orchestra. He took and resolutely held the position that the artistic ideals of the Orchestra he had established required absolute liberty in its management, unhampered from without, to select its members when, where, and for such length of service as the management deemed best, and to be the sole judge of the artistic qualifications of the artists selected; he considered no less essential the untrammelled power to terminate the engagement of any member in case his conduct or musical performance might no longer justify his connection with the Orchestra.

Shortly after the present Trustees assumed the conduct of the Orchestra, this question was raised again. The Trustees made no objection to the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the Federation of Musicians, provided it could be brought about consistently with those ideals of the Orchestra which had become its most cherished traditions. The rules of the Association, as then shown and explained to the Trustees, were not consistent with such ideals. Substantially they provided for the "closed shop":—that is, only members of the Association could play in the Orchestra; no musician could be engaged outside the jurisdiction of the Boston "Local" without its consent; only citizens of the United States or Canada, and those who had taken out their first naturalization papers, could acquire membership in the Association, and therefore in the Orchestra; no artist could be engaged in Europe; contracts could be made only for one year; all obligations must be expressly subordinate to the obligations of membership in the Association. Any exceptions or modifications to these rules, which unmodified

by the projected P. U. rules deal paid to union n the danger poin only managers also theatre and others. To quot 660 proposed alt or present rules in a daily newsr tions which hav cussed by the conflict with ot example one, de of 75 per cent musicians emplo grand opera st vaudeville house ture houses, pic cabarets, dance sorts and all ou

As the writer intention of the $11, in future, of ments, for each lar or ordinary v and $15 for ea Wagner opera c prices are also rehearsals. It is arbitrary way, works as "Falst Méliande" is while to play "hengrin"—which extent on Web "Parsifal" is ext is no hint at ar when the musici relatively childis those of "Lucia geri" and "La S

A Precarious Si

To so wealth the Metropolit though irksome tive. But they more serious houses. They r the long hoped plans for the e tional Opera H hardly fail to affect plans of even so pros tution as the Chicago

One of the chief s projected scale of pri of what are, technical Class II opera houses, Theater, where, for t two, the American Sir direction of William have been giving perf Gilbert & Sullivan op

Under the old rule P. U., the wages of m for the season by Class in 1918, $35 weekly for ances and in 1919, $4 future they will be $5 the manager may be to reduce the number his orchestra—with loss in the excellence ances—or to abandon which has given pleas New York music love

The prices to be p ances at symphony c those in force in the c politan Opera House.

Regarding Theaters

At the regular theat ing picture houses a York restaurants an increases will also be

Another of the rul the doubling of sma theaters. One cons may and, as many the abolition of entr'acte music. There well-played and we helps a play. There it seems a superfluity

The distressing—a rule permitting su hearsed, to play at plays and Class II be abolished, though most obnoxious to the ceptions will be made the managers, to assu efficiency of their orch musician an additiona

As to the stage bands, it has been suggested, if settled, that in the future there will be no free rehearsals. If some musicians have their way, there will be none either in the grand opera houses or in the operatic theaters of Class II. On the other hand, the rule forbidding members of the M. M. P. U. to play anywhere and in any circumstances for charitable purposes without being paid full wages may be modified. By a new arrangement, "wherever the M. M. P. U. through its officers grants permission to its members to play at a performance or benefit without remuneration, such services must be paid for at the regular union scale out of the funds of the M. M. P. U."

The projected regulations deal with charges for overtime, allowances for traveling expenses, Sunday performances, extra payments to the contractors who engage orchestras, the time exacted for refreshment intermissions during rehearsals, and other delicate matters. But to go into these would merely be bewildering.

To sum up, before many weeks have passed, the cost of music in New York—and other cities—may be made so high that the already very heavily taxed patrons of the theater and the moving picture houses may be confronted with new charges for their pleasures. Unless, which is by no means quite impossible, the "movie" managers and their brethren of the regular theaters, drop orchestral music altogether.

In a letter which appeared some nights ago in a New York evening paper, a musician, doubtless a member of the union, frankly admitted that next July the M. M. P. U. meant to add 30 to 50 per cent to its old prices.

Without taking sides with either managers or musicians, one may be permitted to ask whether the M. M. P. U. was well inspired when it decided to make music seem a luxury. The public can stand just so much. No more. And one may kill the goose that lays the golden eggs.

BOSTON, MASS., March 10, 1920.

To the Supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Recent events have produced a condition in the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which calls for a frank statement from the Trustees.

It should be said at the outset that the termination of Mr. Fradkin's connection with the Orchestra bore no relation to his activities on behalf of the musicians' union. Mr. Fradkin was concert master, and as such had the special duty of maintaining the standards and discipline of the Orchestra. Under such circumstances his conduct was a breach of discipline and a discourtesy to the Orchestra's audience, which, in the light of his contracted obligations, would have required prompt and decisive action by the Trustees at any time.

The question of the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the American Federation of Musicians, through the "Local" known as the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, is not of recent origin. This general problem confronted Major Higginson early in the thirty-seven years of his maintenance of the Orchestra. He took and resolutely held the position that the artistic ideals of the Orchestra he had established required absolute liberty in its management, unhampered from without, to select its members when, where, and for such length of service as the management deemed best, and to be the sole judge of the artistic qualifications of the artists selected; he considered no less essential the untrammelled power to terminate the engagement of any member in case his conduct or musical performance might no longer justify his connection with the Orchestra.

Shortly after the present Trustees assumed the conduct of the Orchestra, this question was raised again. The Trustees made no objection to the affiliation of members of the Orchestra with the Federation of Musicians, provided it could be brought about consistently with those ideals of the Orchestra which had become its most cherished traditions. The rules of the Association, as then shown and explained to the Trustees, were not consistent with such ideals. Substantially they provided for the "closed shop":—that is, only members of the Association could play in the Orchestra; no musician could be engaged outside the jurisdiction of the Boston "Local" without its consent; only citizens of the United States or Canada, and those who had taken out their first naturalization papers, could acquire membership in the Association, and therefore in the Orchestra; no artist could be engaged in Europe; contracts could be made only for one year; all obligations must be expressly subordinate to the obligations of membership in the Association. Any exceptions or modifications to these rules, which unmodified the Trustees regarded as fatal to the conduct of the Orchestra in accordance with its past standards, were to depend not upon the judgment of the Trustees and Conductor but upon the consent of the Executive Board of the American Federation of Musicians, a board entirely without intimate knowledge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or special interest in its welfare. Under the operation of these rules, a large part of the men who have contributed to the success of the Orchestra, men like J. Adamowski, Bedetti, E. Fiedler, Ferir, Grisez, Jacquet, Kneisel, Krasselt, Laurent, Longy, Neumann, Pourtau, Sautet, Schroeder, Svecenski, Theodorowicz, Wendler, Zach, and many other preeminent artists could not have been engaged without the consent of that committee.

The transfer of authority and responsibility could hardly be more complete. When the radical inconsistencies between the rules of the Association and the standards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were pointed out to representatives of the Boston Local and of the Federation, they expressed confidence that the rules could be modified to meet the exceptional situation of this Orchestra. They subsequently reported their inability to secure the Federation's consent to the necessary exceptions. Thus the matter ended in 1918.

Within the past few weeks, this whole question has again been raised. The desire of some of the Symphony players to join the Federation has been placed upon the ground that their material welfare would thus be promoted. Independently of such affiliation they asked that the salary of each member of the Orchestra should be increased by $1,000. This would involve a total addition of approximately $100,000 a year to the expense of maintaining the Orchestra. The Trustees were obliged to point out the fact that such an increase was beyond any resources now at their command; that since 1914 the salary account, exclusive of the Conductor's salary, had grown from $172,351.01 to $224,169.36 a year; that they proposed to increase their resources available for salaries by an extension of the "Pop Concert" season, by such advance in the price of season tickets as they believed the subscribers would be willing to accept, and by an organized effort, at the most favorable time, to secure a large permanent endowment for the Orchestra.

It must be obvious that membership or non-membership in any musicians' association cannot increase the resources of the Trustees or their ability to pay larger salaries to the Orchestra. It has, however, been suggested that membership in the Federation would permit members of the Orchestra, now debarred from summer hotel and similar orchestras as "non-union" players, to enlarge their earnings. At best this suggestion is applicable to a comparatively small number of our musicians. Frequently a hotel orchestra is made up entirely of Boston Symphony players. When the proposed extension of the Pop Concert season, moreover, is accomplished, the

Symphony Hall,
March 12, 1920.

TO THE

SUBSCRIBERS TO THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS:

Many friends of the Symphony Orchestra have requested an immediate opportunity to testify to their interest in securing its future through a permanently endowed foundation. This attitude means only one thing, that these great audiences realize all that this orchestra has signified. From its inception under Major Higginson it has brought beauty into the lives of our citizens and distinction to our city. The spontaneous desire to help should not be held back to perfect the detailed plan for raising an endowment fund of at least three millions; and accordingly the Trustees will gladly receive at once subscriptions and pledges from all those who believe in the vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and country.

There is annexed a subscription blank which may be signed and left at the box office or mailed to the Treasurer at Symphony Hall.

TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INC.

BOSTON, Mass., March.....1920.

The undersigned hereby agrees to pay the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., for its permanent endowment fund..... dollars on or before.....19....., or in instalments as follows:

$.....on.....19.....
$.....on.....19.....
$.....on.....19.....

Name.....

Address

the acco judg
the boa
Ore
of t suc
Fer
Pou
Zac gag

T mor rule pho
Loc
rule
Ore
the mat

V
rais
Fed wel they be app
Ore suc
tha sala pro exte of s to a sec

I mus or how per and ear sma mac
exte

SYMPHONY HALL

40th Season

1920-1921

24 FRIDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS
24 SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS
BEGINNING OCTOBER 8-9, 1920

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

WITH DISTINGUISHED SOLOISTS

SUBSCRIPTION INFORMATION

This year's subscribers for the series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts have an option until May 1 to retain their seats for the following season of 1920-21.

MEANWHILE, APPLICATIONS FOR SEATS MAY BE MADE BY THOSE WHO WISH TO BECOME SUBSCRIBERS. THESE APPLICATIONS WILL BE FILED IN ORDER OF RECEIPT AND SEATS ALLOTTED AS NEAR THE DESIRED LOCATION AS POSSIBLE SHORTLY AFTER MAY 1.

Season Tickets for 24 concerts, $65, $53, $40, $27, $18.
No tax.

Address all communications to

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager
Symphony Hall, Boston

th ac ju
th
be
On
of su
Fe
Po
Za
ga me ru ph Lo ru

Or
the ma

rai
Fe
we
the
be ap
Or suc
tha sal pro ext of
to sec

I mu or hov per and ear sm mac
ext

SYMPHONY HALL

40th Season

1920-1921

24 FRIDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

24 SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS

BEGINNING OCTOBER 8-9, 1920

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

WITH DISTINGUISHED SOLOISTS

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

SATURDAY, MAY 1st, IS THE LAST DAY TO SUBSCRIBE FOR YOUR PRESENT SEATS FOR
THE CONCERT SEASON OF 1920-1921.

If you wish to secure your seats for next season and have not already signed and returned your renewal card, please call at the subscription department, Symphony Hall, which will remain open until after the concert.

SEATS NOT REENGAGED WILL BE PLACED ON PUBLIC SALE NEXT WEEK.

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

Symphony Hall, Boston

364 370

possible period for such summer engagements will be reduced to about eight weeks, and most of the players feel, with reason, that this is no more than they need as a vacation from the exacting artistic requirements of successive seasons. To lessen the need for such summer engagements, the Trustees, in 1918, made a provision for an annual payment of a summer salary of $250 to all continuing members of the Orchestra whose salary during the concerts is less than $3,000 a year. It was pointed out that for union members there would also be opportunities for additional earnings during the Symphony season. Yet in connection with such suggestions of increased opportunity for summer and other work, it is significant to note that the players who requested an increase of $1,000 a year for every member of the Orchestra expressly urged that no additional concerts be given to defray this increase of salary, on the ground that the additional expense should be borne by the public.

371

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yield to nobody in their desire to see the members of the Orchestra treated with all possible generosity. But the question of their joining the American Federation of Musicians is precisely the same as it was two years ago. Last week the rules of the Association were again shown to the Trustees. The rules are the same now as they were in 1918. They present the same conflict of authority. For the judgment and discretion of a board of trustees, who have accepted the obligation to maintain at the highest possible level of artistic excellence a distinguished local and national institution, these rules, unchanged, would substitute the judgment of the Executive Board of the American Federation of Musicians, a body with whom the musical supremacy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be, and probably ought to be, of an importance quite secondary to the welfare of the Federation.

The Trustees of the Orchestra have for their chief concern its continuance and development as the splendid instrument of art and civilization into which it has grown through its nearly forty years of existence. Their concern is for the exceptional, the best; the concern of the Federation is, of necessity, for the general, the average. The Trustees believe that in a conflict between the rules representing these two ideals, they cannot accept the second, and that the upholding of the first will make in the long run not only for the higher standards of art but for the better interests of the members of the Orchestra.

TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

FREDERICK P. CABOT, President.

FEB 26 1921

VOLUME 40

1920-1921

At the Rear Entrance of Symphony Hall, and a Prime Reason for the Crowd in Front—Pierre Monteux, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. Available for Concerts, Lectures, Banquets, Dances, Conventions, etc.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Fortieth Season, 1920-1921

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Burgin, R. Concert-master.	Hoffmann, J. Mahn, F.	Gerardi, A. Hamilton, V.	Sauvlet, H. Barozzi, S.
Theodorowicz, J.	Berger, H. Hoffmann, E.	Fiedler, B. Leveen, P.	Riedlinger, H. Gorodetzky, L.
Gundersen, R. Pinfield, C.	Kurth, R. Bryant, M.	Murray, J. Knudsen, C.	Stonestreet, L. Siegl, F.
Thillois, F. Goldstein, S.	Tapley, R. Reed, L.	Seiniger, S. Del Sordo, R.	Diamond, S. Erkelens, H.
Deane, C. Messina, S.

VIOLAS.

Denayer, F. Artières, L.	Van Wynbergen, C. Shirley, P.	Grover, H. Fiedler, A.	Mullaly, J. Gerhardt, S.	Kluge, M. Welti, O.
-----------------------------	----------------------------------	---------------------------	-----------------------------	------------------------

VIOLONCELLOS

Bedetti, J. Schroeder, A.	Keller, J. Barth, C.	Belinski, M. Fabrizio, E.	Warnke, J. Stockbridge, C.	Langendoen, J. Marjolle, L.
------------------------------	-------------------------	------------------------------	-------------------------------	--------------------------------

BASSES.

Kunze, M. Gerhardt, G.	Seydel, T. Frankel, I.	Ludwig, O. Demetrides, L.	Kelley, A. Girard, H.
---------------------------	---------------------------	------------------------------	--------------------------

FLUTES.

Laurent, G.
Brooke, A.
Amerena, P.

OBOES.

Longy, G.
Lenom, C.
Stanislaus, H.

CLARINETS.

Sand, A.
Vannini, A.

BASSOONS.

Laus, A.
Mueller, E.
Bettoney, F.

PICCOLO
Battles, A.

ENGLISH HORNS.

Mueller, F.
Speyer, L.

BASS CLARINET.

Mimart, P.

CONTRA-BASSOON.

Piller, B.

HORNS.

Wendler, G.
Lorbeer, H.
Hain, F.
Gebhardt, W.

HORNS.

Van Den Berg, C.
Hess, M.

TRUMPETS.

Mager, G.
Mann, J.
Perret, G.
Kloepfel, L.

TROMBONES.

Hampe, C.
Adam, E.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L.

TUBA.

Adam, E.

HARPS.

Holy, A.
Delcourt, L.

TYMPANI.

Neumann, S.
Kandler, F.

PERCUSSION.

Rettberg, A.
Ludwig, C.

Burkhardt, H.
Zahn, F.

ORGAN.

Snow, A.

CELESTA.

Fiedler, A.

LIBRARIAN.

Rogers, L. J.

FILMED AS BOUND

Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. Available for Concerts, Lectures, Banquets, Dances, Conventions, etc.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Fortieth Season, 1920-1921

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Burgin, R. Concert-master.	Hoffmann, J. Mahn, F.	Gerardi, A. Hamilton, V.	Sauvlet, H. Barozzi, S.
Theodorowicz, J.	Berger, H. Hoffmann, E.	Fiedler, B. Leveen, P.	Riedlinger, H. Gorodetzky, L.
Gundersen, R. Pinfield, C.	Kurth, R. Bryant, M.	Murray, J. Knudsen, C.	Stonestreet, L. Siegl, F.
Thillois, F. Goldstein, S.	Tapley, R. Reed, L.	Seiniger, S. Del Sordo, R.	Diamond, S. Erkelens, H.

VIOLAS.

Denayer, F. Artières, L.	Van Wynbergen, C. Shirley, P.	Grover, H. Fiedler, A.	Mullaly, J. Gerhardt, S.	Kluge, M. Welti, O.
-----------------------------	----------------------------------	---------------------------	-----------------------------	------------------------

VIOLONCELLOS

Bedetti, J. Schroeder, A.	Keller, J. Barth, C.	Belinski, M. Fabrizio, E.	Warnke, J. Stockbridge, C.	Langendoen, J. Marjollet, L.
------------------------------	-------------------------	------------------------------	-------------------------------	---------------------------------

BASSES.

Kunze, M. Gerhardt, G.	Seydel, T. Frankel, I.	Ludwig, O. Demetrides, L.	Kelley, A. Girard, H.
---------------------------	---------------------------	------------------------------	--------------------------

FLUTES.

Laurent, G.
Brooke, A.
Amerena, P.

OBOES.

Longy, G.
Lenom, C.
Stanislaus, H.

CLARINETS.

Sand, A.
Vannini, A.

BASSOONS.

Laus, A.
Mueller, E.
Bettoney, F.

PICCOLO

Battles, A.

ENGLISH HORNS.

Mueller, F.
Speyer, L.

BASS CLARINET.

Mimart, P.

CONTRA-BASSOON.

Piller, B.

HORNS.

Wendler, G.
Lorbeer, H.
Hain, F.
Gebhardt, W.

HORNS.

Van Den Berg, C.
Hess, M.

TRUMPETS.

Mager, G.
Mann, J.
Perret, G.
Kloepfel, L.

TROMBONES.

Hampe, C.
Adam, E.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L.

TUBA.

Adam, E.

HARPS.

Holy, A.
Delcourt, L.

TYMPANI.

Neumann, S.
Kandler, F.

PERCUSSION.

Rettberg, A.
Ludwig, C.

LIBRARIAN.

Rogers, L. J.

ORGAN.

Snow, A.

CELESTA.

Fiedler, A.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1920-1921.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PAGE

- BALAKIREFF: "Islamey," Oriental Fantasy (orchestrated by Alfredo Casella), December 17, 1920
- BAX: "In the Faery Hills," symphonic poem, December 17, 1920
- BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1, C major, Op. 21, January 21, 1921
Symphony No. 6, F major, "Pastoral," Op. 68, March 25, 1921
Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93, October 8, 1920
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72, October 29, 1920
Overture, "Dedication of the House," Op. 124, December 17, 1920
Concerto, C minor, No. 3, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 37 (MISCHA LEVITZKI), February 11, 1921
Concerto, G major, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra (ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN*), April 1, 1921
- BERLIOZ: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, October 15, 1920
"Romeo Alone: Grand Fête at the Capulets" from "Romeo and Juliet," March 11, 1921
- BINGHAM: Passacaglia for orchestra,† January 21, 1921
- BLOCH: Two Poems: "Winter," "Spring," April 29, 1921
- BRAHMS: Symphony, D major, No. 2, Op. 73, February 25, 1921
Symphony, E minor, No. 4, Op. 98, November 12, 1920
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, D minor, Op. 15 (HAROLD BAUER), October 15, 1920
Concerto for violin, D major, Op. 77 (RICHARD BURGINT†), December 17, 1920
- BRUCH: Concerto for violin, No. 1, G minor, Op. 26 (ISOLDE MENGES), January 14, 1921
- CARPENTER: Suite from the Ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta," February 25, 1921
- CHABRIER: Overture to "Gwendoline," February 18, 1921
- CHADWICK: Dramatic Overture, "Melpomene," April 1, 1921
- CHARPENTIER: "Depuis le jour" from "Louise" (HULDA LA-SHANSKA), January 28, 1921
- DEBUSSY: "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques, January 14, 1921
- DELIUS: A Dance Rhapsody, December 23, 1920
- DUKAS: "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," April 22, 1921
- DVORÁK: Symphony No. 2, D minor, Op. 70, January 28, 1921
- ENESCO: Symphony, E-flat major, Op. 13, October 15, 1920
Roumanian Rhapsody, A major, Op. 11, No. 1, November 19, 1920

FOOTE: Suite, E major, for string orchestra, Op. 63, April 8, 1921
 FRANCK: Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue (orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné),  October 8, 1920
 "Les Djinns," symphonic poem for piano (E. ROBERT SCHMITZ) and orchestra (after Victor Hugo), * January 21, 1921
 Symphony, D minor, April 29, 1921
 GILBERT: Indian Sketches, † March 4, 1921
 GRIFFES: "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after Coleridge), December 31, 1920
 HAYDN: Symphony in G major, "Military" (B. & H. No. 11), January 14, 1921
 Concerto, D major, for violoncello (JEAN BEDETTI†), March 11, 1921
 HILL: Poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after Poe), † October 29, 1920
 D'INDY: "La Queste de Dieu," descriptive symphony from "Légende de Saint-Christophe," Act II.,  December 23, 1920
 KALINNIKOFF: Symphony No. 1, G minor,  April 1, 1921
 LALO: Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," December 31, 1920
 LEKEU: Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-songs of Anjou,  October 8, 1920
 LISZT: "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem No. 2, October 8, 1920
 "Orpheus," Symphonic Poem No. 4, March 11, 1921
 LOEFFLER: Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine), March 25, 1921
 MALIPIERO: "Impressioni dal Vero," Suite No. 1,  December 23, 1920
 MASON, D. G.: "Russians," five songs for baritone (REINALD WERRENATH*) and orchestra, Op. 18,  November 19, 1920
 MASON, S.: Rhapsody on a Persian Air for orchestra with piano-forte obbligato† (STUART MASON, * pianist), April 22, 1921
 MENDELSSOHN: Symphony No. 3, A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, March 4, 1920
 Octette for Strings, E-flat major, Op. 20, November 26, 1920
 MILHAUD: Orchestral Suite No. 2,  April 22, 1921
 MOZART: Symphony, C major (K. No. 425), November 19, 1920
 Symphony, C major, "Jupiter," April 22, 1921
 Overture to "Don Giovanni," December 23, 1920
 Overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," March 4, 1921
 Concerto for two pianofortes, E-flat major (K. 365) (GUY MAIER* and LEE PATTISON*), December 23, 1920
 Concerto in E-flat major for violin* (JACQUES THIBAUD), February 18, 1921
 Air of Pamina* from "The Magic Flute" (HULDA LASHANSKA), January 28, 1921 (sung in Italian)
 "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" (ALICE NIELSEN*), March 4, 1921

"Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni" (ALICE NIELSEN*), March 4, 1921
 RAVEL: "Le Tombeau de Couperin," suite for orchestra,  November 19, 1920
 Valses Nobles et Sentimentales,  March 11, 1921
 RESPIGHI: "Fontane di Roma," symphonic poem,  November 12, 1920; November 26, 1920 -286
 ROGER-DUCASSE: Suite Française, D major, January 21, 1921
 ROPARTZ: Divertissement for orchestra,  October 22, 1920
 SAINT-SAËNS: Concerto No. 2, G minor, for pianoforte, Op. 22 (PERCY GRAINGER), December 31, 1920
 Concerto for violoncello, A minor, No. 1, Op. 33 (ALWIN SCHROEDER†), April 8, 1921
 SCHUBERT: "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4, C minor,  April 8, 1921
 Overture in the Italian Style, C major, Op. 170
 SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 2, C major, Op. 61, February 11, 1921
 Symphony No. 4, D minor, Op. 120, October 29, 1920
 Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra, Op. 54 (BENNO MOISEWITSCH*), February 25, 1921
 SCOTT: Two Passacaglias,  January 28, 1921
 Scriabin: "Le Poème d'Extase," Op. 54, October 22, 1920
 SHEPHERD: Fantasy for piano (HEINRICH GEBHARD) and orchestra, * April 15, 1921
 SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 1, E minor, Op. 39, October 22, 1920
 STRAUSS: "Tod und Verklärung" ("Death and Transfiguration"), tone poem (after Lenau), April 29, 1921
 "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28, November 12, 1920
 Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann,"  opera based on Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," February 11, 1921
 STRAVINSKY: Orchestral Suite from the Ballet "Pétrouchka,"  November 26, 1920
 STRUBE: Four Preludes for orchestra, † November 12, 1920
 TSCHAIKOWSKY: "Manfred" Symphony (after Byron), Op. 58, December 31, 1920
 "Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia (after Shakespeare), April 15, 1921
 VASSILENKO: Epic Poem for orchestra, Op. 4,  April 8, 1921
 WAGNER: Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," October 29, 1920
 Transformation Music and Closing Scene from Act I. of "Parsifal," * March 25, 1921
 Overture to "Tannhäuser," April 29, 1921
 A Faust Overture, January 28, 1921
 WEBER: Overture to "Euryanthe," March 11, 1921
 WILLIAMS: A London Symphony,  February 18, 1921; April 15, 1921 903,

SUMMARY.

The following composers were represented at these concerts for the first time: Bax, Bingham, Kalinnikoff, Lekeu, Mason, D.G., Mason, S., Milhaud, Respighi, Scott, Shepherd, Vassilenko, Williams.

BALAKIREFF	1	LOEFFLER	1
BAX	1	MALIPIERO	1
BEETHOVEN	7	MASON, D. G.	1
BERLIOZ	2	MASON, S.	1
BINGHAM	1	MENDELSSOHN	2
BLOCH	1	MILHAUD	1
BRAHMS	4	MOZART	9
BRUCH	1	RAVEL	2
CARPENTER	1	RESPIGHI	2*
CHABRIER	1	ROGER-DUCASSE	1
CHADWICK	1	ROPARTZ	1
CHARPENTIER	1	SAINT-SAËNS	2
DEBUSSY	1	SCHUBERT	2
DELIUS	1	SCHUMANN	3
DUKAS	1	SCOTT	1
DVORÁK	1	SCRIABIN	1
ENESCO	2	SHEPHERD	1
FOOTE	1	SIBELIUS	1
FRANCK	3	STRAUSS	3
GILBERT	1	STRAVINSKY	1
GRIFFES	1	STRUBE	1
HAYDN	2	TSCHAIKOWSKY	2
HILL	1	VASSILENKO	1
D'INDY	1	WAGNER	4
KALINNIKOFF	1	WEBER	1
LALO	1	WILLIAMS	2†
LEKEU	1
LISZT	2		91

* Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" was played twice.
† Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" was played twice.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME.

BINGHAM: Passacaglia for orchestra, January 21, 1921.
GILBERT: Indian Sketches, March 4, 1921.
HILL: Poem: "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after Poe), October 29, 1920.
MASON, STUART: Rhapsody on a Persian Air, April 22, 1921.
STRUBE: Four Preludes, November 12, 1920 5

BAX: "In the Faery Hills," symphonic poem, December 17, 1920.
MALIPIERO: "Impressioni dal Vero," Suite No. 1, December 23, 1920.

MILHAUD: Suite No. 2, April 22, 1921.

RAVEL: "Le Tombeau de Couperin," November 19, 1920.

ROPARTZ: Divertissement, October 22, 1920.

STRAUSS: Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," February 11, 1921 6

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONIES, SYMPHONIC POEMS, ETC.

BALAKIREFF: "Islamey" (orchestrated by Casella), December 17, 1920.

BLOCH: "Hiver" and "Printemps," April 29, 1921.

CARPENTER: Suite from the Ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta," February 25, 1921.

FRANCK: Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue (orchestrated by Pierné), October 8, 1920.

D'INDY: "La Queste de Dieu" from "La Légende de Saint-Christophe," December 23, 1920.

KALINNIKOFF: Symphony No. 1, G minor, April 1, 1921.

LEKEU: Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-songs of Anjou, October 8, 1920.

RAVEL: Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, March 11, 1921.

RESPIGHI: "Fontane di Roma," November 12, 1920.

SCHUBERT: "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4, C minor (as a whole), April 8, 1921.

SCOTT: Two Passacaglias, January 28, 1921.

VASSILENKO: Epic Poem, April 8, 1921.

WILLIAMS: A London Symphony, February 18, 1921 13

SONGS.

MASON, D. G.: "Russians," Op. 18 (REINALD WERRENATH, baritone), November 19, 1920 1

FRANCK: "Les Djinns" (after Hugo), (E. ROBERT SCHMITZ, pianist), January 21, 1921.

MOZART: Pamina's Air from "The Magic Flute" (HULDA LASHANSKA) January 28, 1921.

SHEPHERD: Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra (HEINRICH GEBHARD, pianist), April 15, 1921.

STRAVINSKY: Orchestral Suite from "Petrouchka," November 26, 1920.

WAGNER: Transformation Music and Closing Scene, Act. I, "Parsifal," March 25, 1921 5

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

BAUER, HAROLD: October 15, 1920, Brahms, Concerto for piano-forte, No. 1, D minor, Op. 15. Sketch
 BEDETTI, JEAN†: March 11, 1921, Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello. Sketch
 BURGIN, RICHARD†: December 17, 1920, Brahms, Concerto for violin, Op. 77. Sketch
 GEBHARD, HEINRICH: April 15, 1921, Shepherd, Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra.* Sketch
 GRAINGER, PERCY: December 31, 1920, Saint-Saëns, Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, G minor, Op. 22
 LASHANSKA, HULDA: January 28, 1921, Pamina's Air* from "The Magic Flute" (in Italian) and "Depuis le jour" from "Louise." Sketch
 LEVITZKI, MISCHA: February 11, 1921, Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, for pianoforte, C minor, Op. 37. Sketch
 MAIER, GUY*: December 23, 1920, with Lee Pattison,* Mozart, Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes (K. 365)
 MENGES, ISOLDE: January 14, 1921, Bruch, Concerto No. 1, G minor, for violin, Op. 26. Sketch
 MOISEIWITSCH, BENNO*: February 25, 1921, Schumann, Concerto, A minor, for pianoforte, Op. 54. Sketch
 NIELSEN, ALICE*: March 4, 1921, Mozart: "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni." Sketch
 PATTISON, LEE*: December 23, 1920, with Guy Maier,* Mozart, Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes (K. 365)
 RUBINSTEIN, ARTHUR*: April 1, 1921, Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, G major, No. 4, Op. 58. Sketch
 SCHROEDER, ALWIN†: April 8, 1921, Saint-Saëns, Concerto for violoncello, A minor, Op. 33. Sketch
 THIBAUD, JACQUES: February 18, 1921, Mozart, Concerto for violin, E-flat major.* Sketch
 WERRENATH, REINALD*: November 19, 1920, D. G. Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra, Op. 18. Sketch

Sopranos: Mmes. Lashanska and Nielsen*

Baritone: Mr. Werrenrath*

Violinists: Messrs. Burgin† and Thibaud; Miss Menges

Violoncellists: Messrs. Bedetti† and Schroeder†

Pianists: Messrs. Bauer, Gebhard, Grainger, Levitzki, Maier,* Moiseiwitsch,* Pattison,* Rubinstein*

The Symphony Orchestra Membership

The only really new man among the leaders of the various sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Richard Burgin, First Concert Master. He is of Polish parentage—a native of Warsaw—and obtained the greater part of his musical training in Russia. During the last 12 years he has served as concert master in the finest orchestras of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia.

Julius Theodorwicz, though only in his second season as second concert master, has been associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years. Prior to his coming to Boston, he was a member of the Kneisel Quartet.

Jacques Hoffmann, of the first quartet of the first violins, is also a veteran member of the orchestra, and was the organizer of the famous Hoffmann Quartet, which, although disbanded, is now being reorganized for the coming season. Besides having played as a brilliant soloist many times, it has been the custom for Mr. Hoffmann and Mr. Theodorwicz to alternate as leaders of the Pops. It is interesting to note that Mr. Hoffmann has a son Ernst Hoffmann, a remarkably talented violinist and pianist, playing in the Symphony Orchestra.

Frederick Mahn, the other distinguished member of the first quartet, was formerly conductor of the MacDowell Club, and has been for over 20 years a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the French Military Band last year Mr. Ferdinand Thillois came to Boston to lead the second violins. Born in Charleville (Ardennes) he took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory and played with the Colonne Orchestra for a long time.

Of the flute players the leader, Georges Laurent, was gleaned from Mr. Messager's Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He took first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1905.

Max Kunze, the leader of the double basses, was prominent as a youth in Dresden, Hamburg and Warsaw. He came to America to play at the World's Fair in Chicago, and has been a member of the orchestra since 1894.

When d'Indy's newest symphony was played at a recent symphony concert, Georges Mager had to be called upon to play the extremely high trumpet passages with his French instrument. Studying the piano and violin as a child, his first Paris Conservatory prize was nevertheless awarded for his proficiency upon the French horn. Possessing good vocal ability, he developed his voice, meanwhile playing trumpet, violin, and viola in the various orchestras of Paris. Abandoning music for the war, he was taken prisoner and for 18 months entertained his countrymen

Oct. 24, 1920

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

BAUER, HAROLD: October 15, 1920, Brahms, Concerto forte, No. 1, D minor, Op. 15. Sketch
 BEDETTI, JEAN†: March 11, 1921, Haydn, Concerto, D violoncello. Sketch
 BURGIN, RICHARD†: December 17, 1920, Brahms, Concerto, violin, Op. 77. Sketch
 GEBHARD, HEINRICH: April 15, 1921, Shepherd, Fantasia, pianoforte and orchestra.* Sketch
 GRAINGER, PERCY: December 31, 1920, Saint-Saëns, Concerto, No. 2, for pianoforte, G minor, Op. 22
 LASHANSKA, HULDA: January 28, 1921, Pamina's Aria from "The Magic Flute" (in Italian) and "Depuis le jour" from "Louise." Sketch
 LEVITZKI, MISCHA: February 11, 1921, Beethoven, Concerto, No. 3, for pianoforte, C minor, Op. 37. Sketch
 MAIER, GUY*: December 23, 1920, with Lee Pattison,* Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes (K. 365)
 MENGES, ISOLDE: January 14, 1921, Bruch, Concerto, G minor, for violin, Op. 26. Sketch
 MOISEIWITSCH, BENNO*: February 25, 1921, Schumann, Concerto, A minor, for pianoforte, Op. 54. Sketch
 NIELSEN, ALICE*: March 4, 1921, Mozart: "Deh vieni con me" from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and "Batti, batti il mio core" from "Don Giovanni." Sketch
 PATTISON, LEE*: December 23, 1920, with Guy Maier,* Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes (K. 365)
 RUBINSTEIN, ARTHUR*: April 1, 1921, Beethoven, Concerto, pianoforte, G major, No. 4, Op. 58. Sketch
 SCHROEDER, ALWIN†: April 8, 1921, Saint-Saëns, Concerto, violoncello, A minor, Op. 33. Sketch
 THIBAUD, JACQUES: February 18, 1921, Mozart, Concerto for violin, E-flat major.* Sketch
 WERRENATH, REINALD*: November 19, 1920, D. G. Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra, Op. 18. Sketch

Sopranos: Mmes. Lashanska and Nielsen*
 Baritone: Mr. Werrenrath*
 Violinists: Messrs. Burgin† and Thibaud; Miss Menges
 Violoncellists: Messrs. Bedetti† and Schroeder†
 Pianists: Messrs. Bauer, Gebhard, Grainger, Levitzki, Maier,* Moiseiwitsch,* Pattison,* Rubinstein*

For the first time in the world's series history, brother played against brother. "Doc" Johnston (left) was first sacker for Cleveland and Jimmy Johnston covered third sack for Brooklyn. (Wide World.)

in the German prison camp by singing and playing to them. He was exchanged and brought home, only to journey to the thick of events in Macedonia. He came to this country with the French Military Band, playing the horn and singing in the same concert. He sang at the Pops, played the viola in the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, and the trumpet this season.

Among the harpists, Mr. Alfred Holy is, perhaps, the first authority on the instrument in this country. Mr. Holy played in Germany and France. He was the favorite harpist upon whom Richter and Strauss relied.

Perhaps no musician in the orchestra is more conspicuous than Mr. S. Neumann, who, perched upon his high stool, has ruled the kettle drums for years. It may be easy to pound sheepskin with large sticks, but to attain utter rhythmic accuracy, to swell and diminish a roll precisely as required, to change the key of your drums in a few seconds—these things are so hard to do, superlatively well that if you are good enough you may bring a swarm of orchestral managers to your feet in short order. Since he was a boy, Mr. Neumann has concentrated upon his drums, and during his life has played professionally nothing else.

Georges Longy enters this season his 21st year as first oboeist of the orchestra. He is considered by many as the greatest living oboeist.

Albert Sand, leader of the clarinet section, was formerly a famous Russian virtuoso. He has been a member of this orchestra for the past six years.

Frederic Denayer enters this year upon his second season as first viola. He has had a long and distinguished record in Europe as a member of the principal orchestras of Paris, and has often been under the leadership of Monteux.

The first horn quartet remains unchanged this year with George Wendler leading for his 12th season. Like Denayer, Mr. Wendler before his appearance in America was leading horn in several of the first orchestras of the continent.

Abdon Laus, leader of the bassoon section, is now entering upon his third season in this capacity.

Carl Hampe is the peer of the trombonists. This year marks his 21st as leader of this section. During the war Mr. Hampe entered the army and did excellent work in organizing bands.

Post Oct. 24, 1920

Max Kunze, the basses, was prominent in Hamburg and Warsaw to play at the World has been a member of When d'Indy's played at a recent symphony Mager had to be called extremely high trumpet French instrument, violin as a child, his prize was nevertheless efficiency upon the good vocal ability, meanwhile playing in the various orchestras ing music for the war and for 18 months

THE PRINCIPALS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FERDINAND THILLOIS MAX KUNZE FREDERIC DENAYER JEAN BEDETTI

The illustrious virtuosi who lead the various sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to its personnel at the opening concerts last Friday and Saturday, are unchanged from past years, except in the case of Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who recently arrived after his long voyage from Norway in time to be present at the first rehearsals for the opening pair of concerts in Symphony Hall.

To lead the string sections in the Orchestra, Ferdiand Thillois came from France to sit at the head of the second violin section in 1918, while Frederic Denayer and Jean Bedetti came likewise from Europe last autumn to be first viola and first 'cello respectively. These two fine musicians have more than confirmed their reputation abroad as worthy to be ranked among the few masters of their instruments now living.

Of longer standing in Boston are Max Kunze, leader of the double basses, and Julius Theodorowicz, second concertmaster whose career in Boston dates back to his participation in the Kneisel Quartet. Alfred Holy, the illustrious first harp, is well known indeed to all who are familiar with the orchestra. The veteran among the wood-wind is Georges Longy, who has been named authoritatively as without peer among living oboists. Alfred Sand, the Russian virtuoso, is now serving his seventh year as first clarinet. The newer comers are Georges Laurent, first flute Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, English horn, who are now in their third season with the orchestra. There are, strictly speak-

GEORGES LONGY ABDON LAUS LOUIS SPEYER ALBERT SAND GEORGES LAURENT

CARL HAMPE GEORGES MAGER GEORGE WENDLER

in, two English horn players, in that Mr. Speyer alternates with Mr. Frederick Mueller, who has played this beautiful wood-wind instrument for many years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and under several conductors.

Of the brass choir, Carl Hampe, as first trombone, is the veteran among the leaders, while George Wendler, as first horn, comes second in length of service. Georges Mager is now serving his second season as brilliant first trumpet. Stefan Neuman is perhaps as familiar as any single member of the orchestra on account of his agility and unerring accuracy upon the kettle drums.

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

Into a Fortieth Year of Symphony Concerts

The Usual Schedule at Home and Abroad, an Orchestra in Full Strength, Promising Programmes, Prospective

Trans. Soloists Sept. 11, 1920

TEN years hence the Symphony Orchestra, half a century old, will enter upon its fiftieth season. As it is the American way to catch at anniversaries, no doubt the occasion will be duly celebrated. Meanwhile the band is beginning, this autumn, a fortieth year with better prospects at home than it has known since the days before the late war. As of old, every seat on the floor and in the lower balcony for the concerts of Friday afternoons has been taken by subscription made in the spring or the summer. Presumably every place in the upper gallery could be as readily sold to subscribers. In fact, the present trustees of the orchestra have been counselled so to sell them and thereby increase revenues in a needy hour. They prefer, however, to follow ancient custom, opening this second balcony on Friday afternoons to all comers at twenty-five cents per head. To do so has been the way of the orchestra "from the earliest times." That it should continue in such course pleases many who help to meet the annual deficits. Possibly those that now swarm into these "rush-seats" would find the Symphony Concerts otherwise beyond their means. However that may be, their favorite places will again be open to them on the familiar terms—not only next season, but probably through many seasons to come.

So do the concerts of Friday afternoon keep vogue; so do many, whose incomes have been harshly reduced in the economic unbalance of the day, willingly pay the mounting price for them. There are pleasures from symphonic music and the Symphony Orchestra not lightly to be resigned. There are quiet loyalties and years of habit. Some curiously prefer afternoon to evening, especially if that evening be Saturday, in concert-going. Suburbia finds journeying to music more agreeable by day than by night. It is ancient and honorable belief that the matinées at Symphony Hall possess a certain social cachet. At the least our faithful Jenkinsons weekly record "those present"—and sometimes forget to check up their standing lists.

None the less, the concerts of Saturday evenings have individuality. As the signs go, the more expert and exacting with music and the performance of music choose them; while the newer public for the orchestra—the sustaining public, may-be, of that fiftieth year—finds at them room and welcome. Again as the signs go, that desirable public is increasing. For, though there are still untaken places in appreciable number for the pending concerts of Saturday, the sum of subscriptions to them is already larger than it has been since Dr. Muck's time. Would a shift of these evening concerts, say to Thursdays, please the public? Some believe that it would in these years of passionate "week-ending" and as passionate pursuit of the theatres on the last day of the week. Yet such a change would upset the viable routine of rehearsals; while the regained subscriptions for Saturday evenings hardly encourage it. So it is that between Oct. 8 and 9 of 1920 and the end of April, 1921, the Symphony Orchestra announces its twenty-four pairs of concerts without departure from routine, but with clearly bettered prospects.

Abroad

These fifty concerts at home—since the two "extras" for the Pension Fund belong

16

...in the schedule—are but half the work of the orchestra for the new year. As usual the remaining fifty-odd will be distributed among many cities. The series at Cambridge, at last with the increased prices long warranted by quality and costs, at Providence, at Worcester, will run familiar course. In spite of the risen charges for travel—and for a band a hundred strong—the occasional visits to other cities of New England, north and south, will be continued and multiplied. Abstractly they are an obligation to the region that sustains the orchestra; concretely they are also profitable to the treasury.

To New York and Brooklyn, to Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the band will go as usual in monthly journeys from November through March. Needless, almost, to say, the cost of these "trips" will rise by thousands of dollars. On the other hand, neither the trials and tribulations of the orchestra in recent years nor the high place that Mr. Stokowski and his forces have gained in four of the five cities, has materially lessened an assured and expectant public. From New York to Washington subscriptions for the new season stand virtually as they have stood for many seasons past. More: these journeys to other eastern capitals of music, this playing before other audiences than those of Symphony Hall, tend to keep conductor and men to their mettle, are an essential part, at home and abroad, of the prestige of the band. Therefore they continue.

Per contra, the annual expedition westward to various cities of the Middle States has been abandoned for the time. The new cost of travel, the recurring strain upon the orchestra both counted against it. Thereby will come more time and energy for fresh and interesting undertakings at home—for, say, the concerts to young people well begun last winter or the renewal of the Symphony Chorus to share with the band the performance of large choral pieces. For Mr. Monteux and all concerned in the ordering of the new season are as ambitious as they are diligent.

A Full Orchestra

Despite superfluous forebodings—the forebodings in particular that the gossip of New York likes to fondle—the Symphony Orchestra has been recruited again to full strength from thoroughly tested and thoroughly promising material. Those who may doubt have only to listen at The Pops to the new flute-player, for example, who succeeds Mr. de Mailly. In the solo-part of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Hindoo Song" on Thursday evening, technical ease, brightness and warmth of tone, quick sense of melodic contour and intensity alike commended him. Strange as it may seem in sundry quarters, there are able and desirable orchestral musicians quite willing to forsake the precious Union for work at Symphony Hall. Reluctant as the elderly are to believe it, the present infusion of young blood into the orchestra, especially in the string-choirs, is much to its advantage. Before the secession of last March, it was on the way to look—and sometimes to be—as middle-aged as its audiences. Mr. Monteux has been patient in the quest and exacting in the sifting of new men. Mr. Jacchia and others have aided him. Before long a new concert-master will have crossed the sea who, until he sits in his place, must be nameless. A quiet expedition to western Europe has yielded other recruits; various bands in the United States have also contributed them. As of old, the orchestra of 1920-21 will be a cosmopolitan body.

It remains for Mr. Monteux, when he sets to rehearsals and concerts at the beginning of October, to fuse these forces new and old, to assimilate them to a pliant and sensitive routine, to make them responsive instruments to music, to each other, to him. How skilful and stimulating, ambitious and tireless he is in such a task, he proved last spring when he up-built the orchestra from the confusion into which the secession plunged it, and so did it a service that none other conductor from Henschel through Rabaud had excelled. Now calmer days, ampler time, an alert and tranquil "personnel," a freer opportunity generally, await him to remove the inevitable scars. To the utmost of his abilities, to the height of his fine standards, he will do so.

Prospective Programmes

Similarly in the choice of programmes Mr. Monteux will enjoy a freer range than was his lot last season. Le bonhomme Rabaud may have been highly "spiritual"; but he was not exactly widely read or widely curious in symphonic music. He was a provincial of Paris, quite content with what he had heard there, quite persuaded that the narrow routine of Messieurs Chevillard and Pierné was the beginning and the end of programme-making. Hence he traversed the more frequent and more eloquent symphonies of Beethoven; chose his other "classics" by like rule of thumb; had his inning with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and "Antar"—the patois of "artists' rooms" calls them "sure-fire stuff"; laid quick hand upon the "old-reliables" of modern French music like Chabrier's "España" and Dukas's tale of the wetted sorcerer. By long-standing precedent of the Symphony Concerts, biennial performance at most is the portion of these pieces. Therefore Mr. Monteux might repeat none of them last season. This year they will be at his disposal to the amplifying of his programmes on the classic and the semi-classic side, in interesting revelation of his way with "battle-horses" of the concert-hall.

Mr. Monteux, however, is widely read, curious and ambitious with symphonic music. Contrary to present Parisian habit, he is a true cosmopolitan among conductors. He has accepted wholeheartedly the fine tradition of the catholicity of the Symphony Concerts. He is laudably eager to make known the new work of new men. The rising generation of Italians, preferring symphonic to operatic music, interests him, and he has pieces by Malipiero, Respighi and, possibly, Tommasini, in mind for prospective programmes. He has turned a kindly eye upon the younger Englishmen, indecently overlooked in American concert-halls, and from them, as report runs, he has chosen for performance Vaughan Williams's renowned "London Symphony" and other promising music. In France last summer, the composers who have succeeded to Debussy and Ravel as innovating individualists, properly attracted him, and the public of Symphony Hall will listen next winter to Milhaud and, maybe, some of his brethren.

With characteristic discrimination, Mr. Monteux sets store by the two most individual American composers—Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Carpenter. Each has written a symphony, too long unrepeatable since Boston first heard it. Before long also, Mr. Carpenter will have drawn a Suite for the concert-hall from his ballet, "The Birthday of The Infanta." Wherever he is, Mr. Monteux does not forego his explorations. Now that he is in town again, he is at his daily studies in the library of Symphony Hall. There, it is said, he is traversing the symphonies of Sibelius, with an eye to possible performance of the baffling fourth or the clanging second. By this time, too, he can hardly overlook the well-filled shelf labeled R. Strauss. How well "Don Juan" or "Til Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote" would suit Mr. Monteux's abilities! Only those resolved to fight the late war through their natural lives and, doubtless, into the next world as well, can raise malevolent and altogether non-musical objection to these acknowledged masterpieces. Strauss will have place on Mr. Bodanzky's programmes in New York this season, upon Mr. Toscanini's in New York and Boston, both; probably on Mr. Stock's and Mr. Stokowski's as well. Is there a valid reason why his music should not be restored to the Symphony Concerts? There is a public hungry for it.

"Assisting Artists"

So much for orchestra and programmes.

17

There are also "soloists"—a baker's dozen of them, if Messrs. Maier and Pattison in a concerto for two pianos are to be counted as a twain that is one flesh and the new concert-master added to the advertised list. Except Mr. Bauer and Mr. Levitzki among the pianists and Mr. Thibaud of the three violinists, not one has previously been heard in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. Except Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud again, with Miss Nielsen now added among the singers, every one is of the newer generation in American concert-halls. For the most part, thus, an inning of youth, vexing perhaps to the elders accustomed to jog complaisantly through a round of "old favorites," but an inning also of well-tested and well-established youth. Run down the list, the rather superabundant list, of pianists. Mr. Bauer, of course, and especially in his chosen piece, the first concerto of Brahms, needs no bush. Grant him, even, to the "old-timers." (But of the deservedly risen youth are Mr. Levitzki, heard first at the Symphony Concerts and loudly applauded in the autumn of 1917; Mr. Grainger, a vivid personality of the concert-hall, if ever there was such, an individualist through and through, a poseur, if the detractor likes, but an interesting poseur; Mr. Rubinstein, the virtuoso in excelsis, the musician pur sang, who lives, moves and has his being in his piano and the pieces he plays upon it; Messrs. Maier and Pattison, bringing into Symphony Hall for the first time in recent years music for two pianos, and a merit therein stretching from Boston to Paris. Not quite so young in years is Mr. Moiselwitsch, the Anglo-Russian, but he was newcomer to America last season and then and there sealed himself as meet companion for symphony orchestras.

So, also, with the violinists, too few rather than too many, and the singers. Mr. Thibaud is in Mr. Bauer's happy case, an established master even in the days of Kreisler, Ysaye and Heifetz, a musician no less than a violinist of rarely fine and rarely personal fibre. Miss Menges is youth again—and youth that has struck its fire of temperament from London as far east as Dresden, as far west as New York.

Possibly the singers, Mr. Werrenrath and Miss Lashanska aside, are a more questionable list. Over him the most sceptical need have no scruple. Time and again in Boston, in concerts of his own, in concerts of choral music, he has given proof of a musical intelligence, an artistic honesty, a range and mastery of vocal means, a penetrating and projecting imagination that set him high in his generation. He has served the Symphony Orchestra in various choral concerts, timely, he is now to companion it in regular course. In Miss Lashanska, in turn, young ability has ripened into a rich young prime. If she has been more extolled by private report than public performance, that report, for once, seems not to mislead. As for the other two, Miss Nielsen seemed last spring to have renewed and refined qualities of voice and song that for a while mischance and mistake clouded. She is destined for music of Mozart and of old she sang it artfully and charmingly. At her ambitious best and her artistic ease, Mme. Stanley may also prove worthy of a place in the Symphony Concerts.

So run the decorations of the new season at Symphony Hall. For the most part they promise to be pleasing ornaments, grave or gay. Yet accessories they remain to an orchestra that may reasonably anticipate a year of untroubled recovery and firm-set progress and to a conductor whose quality, on many sides and however it may be finally judged, has flowered in signal service.

H. T. PARKER

40TH SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN

Valuable New Members in String Section Increase
Orchestra's Strength

PROGRAM FOR THIS WEEK'S CONCERTS

Herald — Oct. 7, 1920

By PHILIP HALE

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concert tomorrow afternoon. The orchestra has been strengthened by the addition of valuable new members, chiefly in the string section. This season there will be ten double basses instead of eight. There is a new flute player, replacing the regretted Charles de Maillay.

In spite of the malicious statements that have been published in New York, the orchestra is today of the high standard that made it famous in the past years. Only members that could easily be spared, with one or two exceptions, deserted the orchestra last season. The places of these exceptions have been more than adequately filled. The sale of seats has been gratifyingly large. There are no seats purchasable for the Friday concerts, and the subscription sale for Saturday nights is far greater than it has been in the preceding years.

The program of the concerts this week is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, No. 8; Lekeu, Fantasia on two folk tunes of Anjou; Franck, Prelude, Chorale and Fugue (orchestrated by Pierne); Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Beethoven's eighth Symphony has been on the program of a Boston Symphony concert beginning the season only once in 30 years. During these years Symphonies of Beethoven have had the honor 19 times. The C Minor was the favorite; next to it the Eroica; then the seventh. The second was played at opening concerts twice; the Pastoral once. At other concerts the symphonies at the opening concert were by Schumann, Brahms, Tchaikowsky, Dvorak and Franck.

The Fantasia by Lekeu and Pierne's orchestral transcription will be performed here for the first time. Lekeu, a Belgian, who died too young, is known in Boston chiefly by his violin sonata. The Fantasia was composed in 1891-92. Pierne's transcription of Franck's noble and familiar piano piece, first played here by Harold Bauer, was brought out at a Colonne concert, Paris, in 1904.

The program of the concerts next week includes Enesco's Symphony, Brahms's piano concerto, No. 1, and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz. Harold Bauer will play the concerto for the third time in Boston with this orchestra.

Stephen Townsend is to reassemble the admirable Symphony Chorus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the production of works by that organization, requiring the assistance of a chorus. Formerly Mr. Townsend held a similar position with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Novelties for Symphony Season

Post Oct. 10, 1920

A suite by Victor de Sabata—Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau"—Rimsky-Korsakoff again—a symphony by the brother of Ysaye, the violinist—other offerings from other lands.

Bright fall mornings and Symphony Hall at the opening of the season go together in the mind, and make one impression which those who hang around this place for various reasons never forget. There is in Symphony at this time a lot of polite bustle, an effect of Spotless Town, and sonorous echoes of the great orchestra which Mr. Monteux has assembled and is rehearsing inside the hermetically sealed auditorium. "The boys" in their offices give you greetings of the season. There is a pervading atmosphere of gentleman-like joy.

Finding yourself in a shadowy corridor you peak in through one of the entrances to the rehearsal hall, though this was "verboten," and is now "defendu." Nevertheless, you sneak over to the door, open it an inch and peak in. Mr. Monteux is seated before at his conductor's stand, picking to pieces, in a preliminary rehearsal, details of the compositions to be performed. It is a maddening experience for the listener outside. He glues his ear to the crack. The orchestra gets going, with all kinds of wonderful effects. The brass comes in with a crash, and the strings soar up over it, when, in the very middle of it all, Monteux raps on his desk and stops the whole business. Go back to letter "H," he says, and again lifts his baton. This is a physical shock, as well as a disappointment. It is as if some great complicated piece of machinery started slowly, and went a little faster, the small wheels moving the big ones, all kinds and varieties of revolutions a minute, the big wheels gathering momentum, and suddenly—Bang! It's a wonder something didn't smash, when all that motion was arrested so suddenly and so violently. Just then an usher or official comes along the corridor and you turn around innocently, and say you are looking for Mr. Brennan.

By and by Mr. Monteux will be through. Then you go up a little flight of stairs to his sanctum—a delightful workroom, simply but sufficiently furnished, in the corner of the building that looks out over Westland and Massachusetts avenues. Monteux is sitting, probably, before a music rack, and on that music rack is another score. He is reading it attentively, with knit brows, as I would read a programme book. He is hearing it as he reads. Figuring out effects, tempi, phrasing of inner parts, and the other endless details of the conductor's extraordinary task. He is holding his first rehearsal. This is where it is held, here in the quiet of the study, with a music rack and a pencil handy, and not in the auditorium with the players. By the time Monteux comes before them, he has every detail of his score and of his task clearly in his head, just as a general has elaborated his plan of battle long before he issues orders for the attack.

It is going to be an interesting season with more novelties than ever. "Let us begin with modern Italy," says Mr. Monteux. "You remember Malapiero's 'Pauses of Silence,' which made such an impression last season, and also when Mr. Rabaud played it before me? I have something else of his, written a little earlier, I think, before 'The Pauses of Silence.' This work, which will be heard here for the first time, is his 'Impressioni dal vero,' a suite of three pieces for orchestra. This Malapiero is, I think, a wonderful young man.

"Then another famous work from the rapidly rising school of young Italian composers, of whom Malapiero is a member, is the 'Fontane di Roma.' This is a tonal description of four celebrated fountains of Rome, the fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton fountain at noon, the fountain of Trevi at midday and the fountain of the Villa Medici at sunset.

"There is also to be played for the first time here a suite in four movements by Victor de Sabata. And here is a suite by my old friend Alfredo Casella, with whom I was a fellow-student at the Paris Conservatoire, 'Le Couvent sur l'Eau.' This suite is dedicated to Mr. Monteux. Casella, he says, is one of the most brilliant, gifted and intellectual of the modern Italians. We who do not know Casella know what an uproar his ultra-modern compositions and his vehemently written manifestos in favor of modern ideas in music have provoked abroad. They led to the dread title and ugly name of 'futuristic' being applied to this composer, who, however," says Mr. Monteux, "cares little or nothing for anything save his convictions and ideals."

This suite is of movements which Casella composed originally for a ballet, which was shown to Mr. Diaghileff of the Russian ballet. Mr. Diaghileff did not undertake the work. Its principal movements are now to be heard in concert form in this suite.

"Then, for Spain," said Mr. Monteux, "I await with anxiety and faith the arrival of a suite by the Spaniard, De Falla."

"And here is Russia. A 'Poeme Epique' of Sergei Wassilenko (op. 4), the first symphony of Basile Kalinnikow. And here is old Rimsky, blessed old Rimsky, the 'May-Night' overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Last but not least here is a crackling orchestral version of Balakirev's famous piano piece 'Islamey,' by again Alfred Casella. That will show you what he can do in the way of virtuoso effects with an orchestra."

He turned to a page where horns and trumpets squawked wildly, and there were sweeping harp glissandi, chattering wood-wind, pounding drums and cavorting strings. "There," he said, "you will hear some noise." A great piece 'Islamey,' and probably still better in a good orchestral version.

"For, Belgium," the conductor went on, "I have the symphony in F major of the brother of Eugene Ysaie; that is, Theodore Ysaie. He was quite a composer. He died about two years ago. His accomplishments were overshadowed by those of the famous violinist. This symphony is dedicated to Charles Martin Loeffler of Boston."

"From France we have, first, a new work by my friend and colleague, Henri Rabaud. It is scenic music from a play, 'Anthony and Cleopatra.' Also two compositions of Pierne, 'Les Cathedrales,' and 'Paysages Franciscains,' and also a 'Divertissement' of Repartz. I shall also revive Debussy's 'La Mer' and the first symphony of Sibelius, which seems his most popular work. I shall likewise play for the first time in Boston Sibelius' third symphony. And if I can get the loan of parts from the Metropolitan, I shall probably perform a concert version of Stravinsky's music to Petrouchka."

Other novelties will be announced. Here's a funny thing, by the way. Some managers of admirable American orchestras, which, however good they believe themselves to be, do not at this day command the prestige in this country of the Boston Symphony, have been voicing their concern for the last two or three seasons, following the Muck business, lest the Boston Symphony should deteriorate from its exceptionally high standards. They said, also, that there were better orchestras in America, better individual players, more brilliant conductors, etc.

But when the strike over wage and union issues arose last spring, and a number of the old players, though more of the young ones, left the Boston orchestra, these same managers or their agents sat down at the stage door of Symphony Hall and fairly pounced on the players the instant they expressed their willingness to sign another contract. Now the New York orchestra which Mr. Bodansky and Mr. Mengelberg will direct announces the engagement of four "premier artists" from the Boston Symphony!

They may be premier in New York, Mr. Press Agent, but they are not and never were "premier" in Boston. Each of the sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it stands today, an orchestra of which the personnel has been revised three times since the war, has, with the exception of the new concert master, Richard Burgin, leaders with long years of service to their credit and to the fame of the orchestra, or else there are new men whom Mr. Monteux brought with him a year ago, men selected for their brilliant accomplishments, and who did not respond to the invitations to strike. Among these are Julius Theodorowicz, second concert master; Ferdinand Thillois, leader of the second violins; Frederic Denayer, first viola; Max Kunze, first double bass; Georges Laurent, first flute; Georges Longy, first oboe; Albert Sand, first clarinet; Abdon Laus, first bassoon; Georges Mager, first trumpet; George Wendler, first horn; Carl Hampe, first trombone; Alfred Holy, harpist; Stefan Neuman, first tympanist.

The membership of the orchestra was last week, 97. This week it will become 102. Five men from the musical union have joined the Boston Symphony.

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

The New York Times of last Sunday quoted an "official note" from the press agent of the National Symphony Orchestra of that city to this effect:

"Internal conditions in the Boston Symphony Orchestra led many to seek new fields, 12 premier players having found places in the National Symphony."

Will this passionate press agent kindly take the trouble to give the names of the 12 "premier" players that left the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Why does he find it necessary to say the thing which is not?

It was also stated in a New York newspaper a few days ago that Mr. Josef Adamowski, who has just returned from Warsaw, is favorably mentioned for the vacant conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Our excellent friend, violoncellist and teacher, Mr. Adamowski, will be the first to smile at this statement. Meanwhile the accomplished Pierre Monteux is preparing the Symphony programs for this season, not realizing that the position is "vacant."

Herald Sept. 17, 1920

Special Plans for Boston

Post Sept. 19/20 Symphony Season

Never has the public manifested a keener interest than in the coming season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will begin October 8 and 9 in Symphony Hall. All seats for the Friday afternoon concerts have been taken by subscription and only a few for Saturdays are still available. A number of special plans are being entertained for as many events of unusual musical importance as the schedule (already crowded) will permit.

There will certainly be given at least a number of Young People's Concerts following the successful experiment of last year. These concerts will enlist the full orchestra and be conducted by Pierre Monteux. They will enable the younger generation of Boston to hear music of direct appeal, but also of high character, and in the finest possible performance.

Mr. Monteux, during his summer's trip to Europe, has found some new scores of high talent which will figure on the coming programmes. Of the younger Italian composers, Respighi di Sabata, Halpiero and Cassella will be represented, and from Spain, de Falla. From France Darius Milhaud, the young artistic revolutionist, and of the older generation, Roger Ducaase, Pierne, Debussy, Franck. An excerpt from a new work of d'Indy, "The Legend of St. Christopher," and a new battle piece by Saint-Saens for organ and orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers," will be heard. Of the younger Russians, Stravinsky and Vassilenko, and of the older Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Kalinnikoff.

Mr. Monteux will also revive works of Sibelius whose music has not been heard here for several seasons. Among native composers there will be Mr. John L. Carpenter and Mr. E. G. Hill. The great classics of enduring fame will, however, have their due place at the Symphony concerts. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann will be duly represented, as well as Liszt and Wagner.

Of the pianists to appear Sergel Rachmaninoff, Joseph Hoffmann and Benno Moisevitsch are prominent.

At still other concerts Madame Luiza Tetrazzini will return to Boston, also Eugene Ysaie, the Belgian violinist, the Isadore Duncan Dancers and Anna Pavlova, the famous dancer of another school, with her brilliant company and large orchestra. The usual pension fund concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also take place on Sunday afternoons.

Four oratorios are to be sung by the Handel and Haydn Society: Handel's "Messiah" on Dec. 19 and 20, Sullivan's "Golden Legend" on Jan. 23, Verdi's "Requiem" Feb. 20, and Horatio Parker's "Hora Novissima" March 27. Notable soloists at these concerts are Inez Barbour, Nevada. VanDerVeer, Morgan, Kingston, Clarence Whitehill, Marie Rappold, Lambert Murphy, Royal Dadmun, Florence Hinkle, Merle Alcock, Reinald Werrenrath, Edward Johnson, Caroline Hudson-Alexander, Louise Homer, Orville Harrold and others who will be announced later.

The usual illustrated travel lectures will be given on Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons, 10 by E. M. Newman and 10 by Burton Holmes. For further information regarding these concerts and lectures, all who are interested are invited to apply to the management, Symphony Hall.

BOSTON IS 'OFF MAP MUSICALLY'

Philip Hale Says Loss of Place Largely Due to Motors and Bridge

CRITIC DISCUSSES SYMPHONY TROUBLE

Herald — Oct. 12, 1920
Philip Hale, dramatic and music critic of The Herald, addressing the Boston Music Publishers' Association last night at the Parker House, declared that Boston, which a score of years ago justly laid claim to being the musical centre of the United States, at present is "off the map musically." He stated that automobiles and bridge whist parties are in a large measure responsible for the present condition.

After alluding to the high position the city occupied in the music world when he first came to Boston in 1899, when the choral societies, the church choirs and other musical organizations were of a character unequalled by those of any other in America—he declared that today we have "only the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Symphony Maligned

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra," said Mr. Hale, "has been damnably maligned and maliciously talked about, not only here, but in New York." With regard to the so-called strike last March by certain members of that orchestra, Mr. Hale characterized Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, as a "hot-headed young violinist," but he also said that there was no question that the chairman of the board of trustees was "woefully lacking in tact."

The attempt at that time to disrupt the Symphony orchestra, he declared, was a result of German propaganda, the inception of the propaganda-spreading campaign being in Germany, but much of the effective work being done by a local man, who spread accounts of higher wages being paid in symphony orchestras in other cities. "There were men in the orchestra," continued Mr. Hale, "who, I'm ashamed to say, did not want to play under a French conductor."

He lamented the decline of the Handel and Haydn Society, which today is "farmed out," and that there is no body of singers which the public will pay money to hear. In order to get a large audience at a choral recital the fact that an important artist has been engaged to appear has to be widely advertised by some enterprising manager.

He recited the names of familiar string quartets which once pleased old Boston audiences, and then asserted that today there are none of such exceptional values.

In order to obtain a sizable audience today at almost any sort of musical recital the word has to be passed on by a society leader, Mr. Hale said, and in these cases a large proportion of those who attend are present, not because they know or appreciate music, but because they have been told by an influential person that they must hear or see so and so. Many of them applaud things that they would have been bored stiff listening to years ago.

Jazz Has Helped

Extreme jazz music has been beneficial in the respect that it has taken many composers out of the solemn rhythm in which they had been working for many years, said Mr. Hale. He also had a favorable word for graphophones, saying that they enabled tired business men to enjoy bits of music they would not otherwise hear. "I pity the man," he added, "who cannot enjoy 'Jasper, I Hear You Calling Me' and 'Robert E. Lee,' for they are infinitely better than the pieces produced by some of you gentlemen."

Music of the future he said rests with the publishers and not with the conductors, and the publishers should support the best and not "get the idea that any one nation has a divine right to music." It is their duty to press the music of every country.

William Arms Fisher, one of the Oliver Ditson Company's composers, was called upon by James A. Smith, president of the association, and referred to the "subtle criticisms" written by Mr. Hale. He said they were "kindly" and yet told the "truth." Winslow Bruce, boy soloist at Trinity Church, and Walter D. Pidgeon, baritone, sang several songs.

ANNIVERSARY OF SYMPHONY

Fortieth Season Opens in October—Large Sale of Seats

Herald — Sept. 12, 1920

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, founded in 1881, now faces its 40th anniversary season, which, as usual, will comprise 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, the first pair to be given on Oct. 8 and 9, and continuing through the following April. So enthusiastic are the patrons of the Symphony concerts that at the time of this announcement all seats for the Friday concerts have been taken by subscription and only a few for Saturday are still to be had. It is indicative of a highly successful and even memorable anniversary that the subscription sales have in no previous summer advanced so rapidly.

Pierre Monteux, who has made such a marked impression by his authoritative and inspiring readings of every style of music, and his ability to obtain results from the musicians under him, will continue as conductor. He is preparing for performance some new scores of unusual interest. During his two months' sojourn in France and England in the early summer he found and has brought back new music from these countries and some works by the younger and bolder generation of Italians as well. Mr. Monteux has an enviable reputation as a program-maker, and his fine taste and catholicity in selection are generally acknowledged.

Soloists for the Season

The soloists to be heard during 1920-21 are in each case different from those of last season. Although a larger number of them than usual are to make their first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra, some are celebrated elsewhere and some are familiar at these concerts.

Harold Bauer, pianist, certainly falls into this category, for his past performances with the orchestra are numerous as well as illustrious. His performance of master concertos may be vividly recalled.

Another pianist less known to our public, but famous indeed in Europe, is Benno Moiseiwitsch, heretofore unheard of with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Coming to this country for the first time last winter, he was among pianists in sensation of the New York season. London and New York have united in ranking him among the highest living masters of his instrument.

Another and younger pianist more familiar to Bostonians is Mischa Levitski, who has played with the orchestra. His rapid advancement is placing him in the forefront of pianists.

Of longer standing with our public is Percy Grainger, who nevertheless has never before played with the Boston Symphony orchestra. The fine qualities of this Australian pianist are too well known here to require emphasis.

Arthur Rubinstein on the other hand is not only new to the orchestra, but comparatively unknown to Boston. He crossed the seas some years ago when a mere boy, and astounded those Bostonians who heard him by his lightning dexterity. He returned to America from Europe last season, and played brilliantly at a concert in Symphony Hall and in a private musicale.

Guy Mader and Lee Pattison working together for several seasons until they have acquired mutual sympathy, have succeeded in creating a fresh general interest in music for two pianos by playing a double concerto.

Master Violinist

To many people no soloist of the coming season will be more welcome than Jacques Thibaud, the master violinist of France, who has been heard several times with the orchestra. His emotional intensity, purity of taste and nobility of style have made these performances memorable.

Another artist who will come to Boston and Boston's orchestra with a very considerable European and also a New York reputation is Isolde Menges, the young English violinist. Making her debut in London in February 1913, she played again and again with different orchestras and in recitals, always with the same brilliant success. During the following autumn and winter she triumphed in various European cities. Then the war came and her famous New York debut in 1916, followed by a tour of Canada.

New Singers

Among singers, Alice Nielsen will be fondly recalled by those who remember the days when the Boston Opera Company was in its prime and she showed marked versatility. Miss Nielsen's voice sounds to particular advantage on the concert stage.

What Miss Nielsen was to the Boston Opera Company, so was Mme. Helen Stanley, dramatic soprano, to the Chicago Opera Company. She has made a number of concert tours during the last few seasons, but has never sung with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Another dramatic soprano who is to sing with the orchestra is Mme. Hulda Lashanska, a particular favorite among the younger singers. A rich and vividly beautiful voice, an unusual interpretive intelligence, a striking personality and presence, bespeaking her Scandinavian descent—these are her endowments and attainments.

The single male singer among the list of soloists is Reinald Werrenrath. Although this young American baritone has sung in opera, he has won and merited a devoted public in this city by the sole means of the concert stage, whether in orchestral concerts, oratorios or recitals of his own. Thus by the quality of his voice and his interpretive skill he has disproved the saying that "opera is the only place for a baritone."

RICH FARE IN PROSPECT

MR. MONTEUX OUTLINES PENDING

PROGRAMMES

Sept. 15, 1920 Trans.

A Wide Range for the Symphony Concerts

Next Season—The Classics in Due Place and With Sundry Rediscoveries—Young Englishmen, "New" Italians, a Risen Spaniard, Promising Parisians, Fresh Russians, in Novel Music A-Plenty—Good Share for Americans as Well

THE present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra respects its tradition of widely ranging programmes. In the days when the strewing of scornful epithets upon any and all Germans was a favorite pastime, it was the custom to call his predecessors narrow-minded. Perhaps they were; yet from the first years of Mr. Gericke through the final years of Dr. Muck, they set and maintained a precedent: The repertoire must be catholic. Whether a piece of music came from French, German, Czech, Italian, Scandinavian, Russian or American pen, whether it was classic or semi-classic, modern or ultra-modern, it deserved performance, so long as it was impressive, interesting or otherwise significant. As presumption went, the public of the Symphony Concerts was no less open-minded, becomingly curious, as well, about newer and innovating composers. The conductors persisted; audiences usually proved worthy of their good name; and so a fine tradition was established, unexcelled in any orchestra at home or abroad. Mr. Monteux, as the scope of his programmes last season proved, received and cherishes it. Personally, moreover, he has the cosmopolitan outlook; his eagerness for novel and interesting music is unabating; he reads new and old scores unceasingly; he is diligent in the exploration of publishers' shelves; he likes nothing better than to upturn an overlooked piece by a classic or a semi-classic composer, to open the way to an unknown and deserving man. In fine, he would make the Symphony Concerts a mirror of the music of our immediate time no less than a glass reflecting the classics in living image. For Mr. Monteux, music is music, according to intrinsic desert, whatever the nationality of the composer, whatever the date upon the sheets. Modestly and wisely, he counts it the obligation of a conductor to seek tactful contacts with composers and publishers rather than to hold them waiting on his door-step. With these ends in view he journeyed to London and Paris last summer; while annually he purposes to renew these European visits.

In such faith and practise Mr. Monteux shaped programmes through his first season as established conductor of the Symphony Concerts. In Boston and in other cities, they pleased the public, maintained the standards of the orchestra, won him just laurels, heartened the youth of all ages to whom the new and strange is not a fearsome thing. In his second season, beginning next month, he intends to make the repertoire yet more variegated and stimulating, so far as twenty-four programmes give him room and there is time and energy for thorough preparation. Daily he is at his studies in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall; soon he will be at the steady work of rehearsals and concerts, both without haste and without rest.

So far as the conductor can accomplish his present plans, English composers from Bantock to Bax will enjoy their first considerable inning at the Symphony Concerts. Four of the "new" Italians, who cultivate symphonic music, will have place. There will be room for the rising Spaniard, de Falla, and for the risen Parisians, Milhaud and Roger-Ducasse. Music of one of the younger Russians, Vassilenko, will be played for the first times in America. An unheard symphony—his third—by Sibelius, the Finn, is in prospect, along with the suite for the concert-hall that Mr. Carpenter has assembled from his ballet, "The Birthday of The Infanta," and a new tone-poem by Mr. Hill, suggested by Poe's gruesome tale, "The Fall of The is by no means exhausted. Upon Mr. Monteux's music-rack is the overture to his opera, "A Night in May;" accessible in New York is the suite chosen and sewn together from another opera, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan" in the composer's rich vein of fantastic legend. Near neighbor to these Russians, as the land, though hardly the spirit, goes, is the Finn, Sibelius, none of whose music has lately been heard at the Symphony Concerts, persistently as Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck gave it vogue. Both overlooked his third symphony. Mr. Monteux will undertake it. The clanging and familiar first also tempts the conductor.

And the Americans to whom Mr. Monteux has long lent a receptive ear? Two of their pieces for which he waits have already been specified—Mr. Carpenter's ballet-suite and Mr. Hill's tone-poem. Add to these, if a performance can be arranged, Mr. Arthur Shepherd's concerto for piano and orchestra, a much-praised music among his fellow composers; a revival of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and of Mr. Carpenter's gay feat of ingenuity and humor, "Adventures in A Perambulator"; certain extremely modern "sketches"—no more than six minutes long—by an obscure New Yorker, discovered by Mr. Monteux; and a deserved repetition of the late Mr. Griffes's "Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," and the more imaginative American voices will not go unheard at Symphony Hall through the winter.

To complete the circle the Germans. From them the classics—Bach and Mozart as already recited; Beethoven in at least two symphonies and sundry miscellaneous pieces; the symphony of Schubert aforesaid, another from Schumann; the fourth symphony of Brahms; the usual modicum of Wagner in the concert-room. Finally, hope of Strauss in the finer-fibred tone-poems. Mr. Monteux does not lack admiration or zest for them. Like the rest of us, he is curious to discover how lapse of years and change of taste have affected impression from them and pleasure in them. He is well aware that other conductors purpose to bring them back to American concert-halls. From their fortunes and from the public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston he awaits a cue. As a cosmopolitan musician, he is vallant for Strauss; as a Franco-American conductor, he would also be discreet.

H. T. PARKER

IN BOSTON TO JOIN SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin, New Concert Master Will Start Rehearsal Work Today

HAS WON FAME IN NORTHERN EUROPE

Richard Burgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived in Boston from Norway yesterday, will sit this morning at the left of Conductor Pierre Monteux when he lifts his baton for the first rehearsal in preparation for the opening of the season, Oct. 8 and 9.

Although born in Warsaw and of Polish parentage, Mr. Burgin has spent the greater part of his musical career in Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, where as concert master, he won widespread fame.

Lotti His First Teacher

At the age of five he became acquainted with the violin, his original teacher being Lotti, who, with Kreisler, was a fellow-pupil with Massart, the French teacher of the Wieniawski school. When 13 years old he came to this country and in New York attracted considerable attention by his concerts in Carnegie Hall. It was in that city that he first heard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, attending one of the orchestra's performances in New York. This, however, is his first visit to Boston.

In 1908 he began four years of training under Leopold Auer at Petrograd. Then followed a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia, during which he played both as concert master and soloist. He has played under Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likewise under Richard Strauss and Schnevoigt, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm.

While in Stockholm he organized the "Richard Burgin Quartet," and also formed the Philharmonic Society of Christiania, a notable quartet, which played 12 concerts a season.

House of Usher." From the classics, likewise, Mr. Monteux is minded to rediscover to his hearers at Symphony Hall Schubert's "Tragic Symphony," by way of variation from the endlessly repeated "Unfinished" and Ninth; the gay overture to Mozart's opera, "Il Seraglio" and his prelude to "Don Juan"; and two overlooked concertos of Bach to be played as ensemble pieces—one with violin, flute and piano for outstanding instruments and one with the organ in like place.

Two symphonies by English composers stand high on Mr. Monteux's list of new pieces—Vaughan-Williams's "London Symphony" and Bantock's symphony, "The Hebrides." No music in the larger forms by the younger Britons has been more applauded than this "London Symphony," reaction in tones to the life, atmosphere and stimulus of the Britons' city. In a sense it is "the piece of the hour"; for in America next winter it will be heard in Boston, New York and Chicago. In recent years Bantock's symphony has made the round of English concert-rooms. The aspect and the spirit of those wild islands in the North Atlantic kindled the composer to the music. The melodic material he has drawn from the islanders' folk-tunes. To one of the youngest and most individual of English composers Mr. Monteux has also given ear—Arnold Bax—and one or another piece of his symphonic music is fairly certain to gain place on the conductor's programmes. He likes, too, the vigor, the onrush, the eminently British quality of John Ireland.

Orchestral scores by four of the "new" Italian composers now lie upon Mr. Monteux's desk—Respighi, di Sabata, Malipiero and Casella. The piece by Respighi is in current vogue a "tone-picture" of four of the familiar fountains of Rome. It has been already played in America by Mr. Stock's orchestra in Chicago and, if memory serves, by Mr. Damrosch's in New York. Sabata's music is a suite of poetized sights and sounds in the country. From Malipiero, whom Mr. Monteux encountered and liked last June in Paris, he has received the two parts of the "Impressioni dal Vero," each in three divisions and again "tone-picturing" in the composer's highly imaginative fashion. One set at least of these "Impressioni" will be played at the Symphony Concerts next winter and after Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio" of two successive seasons, anticipation warms to them. By common consent Casella is vivid and pungent master of harmonic and instrumental means. He loves, too, a large fervor of expression, a red fire of movement. It has lately pleased him to score for full orchestra, utilized to the utmost, Balakirev's glowing, fantastic piano-piece, "Is-lamey." It will make vivid, sonorous end to one of the conductor's pending programmes. Another piece, altogether Casella's own, also awaits his hand, "The Convent by the Water," suite, if recollection does not slip, from a highly fanciful piece of the theatre.

Little by little a younger generation of Spaniards, almost wholly unknown to American ears, has made way into the concerts of Paris and London. Of one of them, Turina, Mr. Monteux thinks but poorly. Another, de Falla, he appraises highly. Accordingly, the public of the Symphony Concerts is to hear an orchestral suite from his pen for which his songs, as sung hereabouts by Mme. Gauthier or Miss Janacopulos, raise expectation.

The younger Parisian to whom Mr. Monteux inclines for promise become performance, is Darius Milhaud, barely known in America by a quartet for strings occasionally played by "The Flonzaleys." He has written not a little music that sounds merely eccentric; he also wrote recently a suite abounding in fancy and charm. As soon as it is played at the Colonne Concerts, next winter, in Paris, the score will be sent to Boston. Little known here is the music of Roger-Ducasse, one of the elder Parisian youngsters so to say. The conductor has in hand what he counts the most characteristic example of it—a tone-poem of spring. His fellow-conductor, Monsieur Pierné has provided him with another novel piece—a prelude to "The Cathedrals," poem of French fortitude and French glory when war assailed these shrines. Once upon a time Bernhardt brought it to the stage and Pierné provided the music. In degree and in unhackneyed pieces, the elder French composers will also have their turn on Mr. Monteux's programmes—Debussy, for example, with "The Sea"; d'Indy with "A Summer Day on the Mountain"; Franck with the tone-poem, "The Djinn," in which a piano bears considerable part, and a transcription from piano to orchestra of the Prelude, Choral and Fugue, made likewise by Monsieur Pierné.

Vassilenko is the younger Russian chosen for place among the conductor's rising composers and the piece in his "Epic Poem," medieval in suggestion, utilizing the liturgical music of his country. Kallinnikov, an older Russian composer, who has occasionally figured upon programmes in America, has also provided a symphony new to Bostonian ears. To Stravinsky Mr. Monteux, after their long collaboration with Mr. Diaghilev's ballet, instinctively turns. From "Petrushka"—the mimodrama of puppets at a Russian fair, seen and heard of old in Boston—the composer once drew a suite for the concert-hall. The conductor believes he can reproduce it. And the music of Rimsky-Korsakov

BURGIN NEW SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER

Last Friday rehearsals were begun by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the conductor, in preparation for the opening concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Richard Burgin, celebrated Russian virtuoso, who is now concert master of the orchestra, arrived in Boston after a long voyage in time to be at his place at the left of the conductor on Friday morning.

The opening program now under preparation will begin with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—the so-called "Little Symphony" with the fantastic Scherzo, burlesquing the metronome, which had just been invented at the time of its composition. The newest work at the opening pair of concerts will be the orchestral fantasy by Guillaume Lekeu, the noted French composer of the Franck school. Caesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue recently scored for full orchestra by Gabriel Pierné, will also be played, and, for a brilliant closing piece, Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Although Richard Burgin's training has been largely in Russia, and a considerable part of his professional career has been confined by stringent conditions in eastern Europe to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, he is a native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage. Through 12 years he has made his mark as the finest concert master in that part of the world, leading the string sections of the premier orchestras in the larger cities of these countries. He revealed extraordinary talent at the age of 5 and came to America when 13 years old, playing in Carnegie Hall, New York. He has never been to Boston before, although at that time he heard a performance in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra. His tuition took place, for the most part, in Russia, where he first studied under Lotti; and in 1908 he began four years of training at Petrograd under the great violin teacher, Leopold Auer. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came just before his time; Toscha Seidel came later, while Jascha Heifetz was his fellow-pupil and friend. He then made extensive concert tours through several countries, playing notably as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and other cities. He played as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society

RICHARD BURGIN
New Concert Master of the Boston
Symphony Orchestra

orchestra and the Christiania Philharmonic Society orchestra. He played as soloist in the first public performance of the violin concerta Sibelius, under the supervision of the noted composer.

On another occasion he played Glazounoff's concerto, the composer conducting.

Mr. Burgin has served as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch. Likewise, under Richard Strauss, at a Strauss festival in Stockholm, and under Schneevoght, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm and the Philharmonic orchestra of Christiania. Mr. Burgin has conducted this noted orchestra on several occasions, and he also instituted a quartet from its ranks, which toured from city to city, playing 12 concerts each year. Even more celebrated was the Burgin quartet of Stockholm, in which also he played first violin. Herald Oct. 3, 1920

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

THE SYMPHONY CHORUS TO BE RE-ASSEMBLED

Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Bach's Magnificat and Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" Announced for It Next Season—An Unkind View of Mr. Loeffler and Boston—New Chamber-Pieces—A French "Tristan"—Why the Chicago Opera Forsakes Us

FOR once good auguries have not failed and the Symphony Chorus is to be reconstituted for next season, presumably in the numbers and the quality that distinguished it when it was first assembled in the musical year of 1917-18. By right of work well done, raising his prestige at home and spreading it to other cities, Mr. Stephen Townsend will again be the chorus-master. From him a circular letter has gone out to the former members of the chorus, the first and significant sentence of which runs: "I have been requested by the conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, and the manager, Mr. W. H. Brennan, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to reassemble the Boston Symphony Chorus in preparation for important and interesting works to be performed in the coming season of 1920-1921." These "works," as the letter soon specifies, are Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Bach's Magnificat, and Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." The Choral Symphony was the first music undertaken by the Symphony Chorus in the autumn of 1917. It was memorably sung and played by choir and orchestra under Dr. Muck. In the three years since passed it has not been heard here. The Magnificat, needless, almost, to say, sits high in Bach's churchly music. It is written for chorus and solo-voices; it is planned on an imposing scale; it is, for the most part, one of those hymns of exultation in which Bach excels. For long it has been unknown to Bostonian concert halls. "The Damnation of Faust" speaks for itself. Few choral pieces are so assured as it of an expectant public; few better keep a chorus to its mettle; while in such pictorial and characterizing music, with a clear savor of the theatre, Mr. Monteux should shine.

Presumably these concerts of choral music will fall outside the regular series of Symphony Concerts. To give room for orchestra and chorus in such numbers as the Choral Symphony and "The Damnation of Faust" exact, the stage must be extended into the auditorium—an impossible change on a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening; when the first rows of the parquet are occupied by subscribers. Berlioz's "dramatic legend" will fill one evening (with a possible repetition, as of old, on a Sunday afternoon), while, apparently Beethoven's symphony and Bach's hymn will divide another concert or part of concerts. There is no reason to doubt the response of the personnel of the original chorus, so far as it is now available, to Mr. Townsend's invitation. It enjoyed its work; it reaped no little praise for it. With the prestige of orchestra, chorus-master and conductor and the interest of the pending plan, new recruits in sufficient numbers will hardly be lacking. Mr. Townsend's abilities in such work are already proved at home in Boston, in New York and Philadelphia as well; Mr. Monteux is a practised hand with choral music. Under these happy auspices the trustees of the orchestra resume a work that rounds, diversifies and enlivens its activities. For to such music as the Choral Symphony and "The Damnation of Faust" an orchestra and a chorus, such as they only can provide, are essential. Thus also between the Symphony Chorus under Mr. Townsend and the Harvard Glee Club under Dr. Davison, choral singing, in the artistic sense, will be alive again in Boston.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

POPS

EVERY NIGHT (EXCEPT SUNDAYS) 8-11
ORCHESTRA OF SYMPHONY PLAYERS

POPS

AGIDE JACCHIA, Conductor

POPULAR PROGRAMS
TOMORROW—OPERATIC NIGHT; FRI., SEPT. 17—WAGNER PROGRAM
Table Seats, $1 & 75c; 1st balcony (reserved), 75c & 50c. Admission, 25c (no tax).

POPS IN SEPTEMBER

Trans. — Sept. 5, 1920
A "Fall Series" Well Begun at Symphony Hall—Balconies Versus Tables—Familiar Pieces Familiarly Played

By the signs of last evening, in September no less than in May or June, there is an audience for The Pops. It was as numerous as ever in the two balconies at Symphony Hall, where the listeners merely sit and hear as at any other concert; while on the floor it filled most of the tables. To the frequenters of them the frequenters of the balconies have long been a mystery. Pops are not Pops for the habitués of the floor, unless they can smoke at will, choose among the "refreshments" and chatter when desultory conversation seems more interesting than music. The faithful of the balconies may do none of these amusing things, seemingly care little for them. Sedately but with evident satisfaction, they listen to twelve orchestral pieces, variously chosen, variously played. Their only departure from the routine of concert-going is a bite or a sup in the longer intermissions. Yet by and large, they are the most dependable public of The Pops. Most of the table-folk resort to Symphony Hall for the pleasure of an evening lazily spent against a musical background and with various non-musical hors d'œuvres for seasoning. In contrast, they of the galleries seem interested in the music for its own sake, are mildly exacting over the quality of performance. Apparently this public has firm liking for miscellaneous concerts of orchestral music, not to severe of programme. Would it flock to them, say in winter, and with the whole concert-room as the balconies of Symphony Hall now are? No one knows, no one can know, until some one risks the test. It would be an interesting, possibly a fruitful, experiment.

To leave speculation—a somewhat smaller orchestra than "The Pops" of the spring assembled sat on the stage yesterday. It sufficed for the pending programme; but as yet it is not too well-balanced in the string choirs. They, rather than the woodwind or the brass, lack the numbers and the volume of tone that through the next week returning players, back from "summer jobs," will daily increase. Here and there new faces dotted the band—evidently of the men who are to swell the Symphony Orchestra to full ranks through the "regular" season. As it was, Mr. Jacchia had these forces well in hand; they played elastically as an ensemble; while he himself led with his usual zest for broad contrast, full-voiced orchestral melody and clear rhythm. With operatic and symphonic pieces, Mr. Jacchia takes the vigorous way; yet with lighter numbers he keeps a pretty ease and smoothness of progress. For the most part the "old stand-bys" of many a Pop concert filled the list—the overture to "William Tell," fragments of Grieg's music to "Peer Gynt," Chaikovsky's "1812," Chabrier's glowing "España," operatic "fantasies" from "Lohengrin" and "Cavalleria Rusticana," with extra pieces as well liked and familiar. Only a waltz of Strauss and the overture to "Tannhäuser" seemed to be missing. Later in the week, doubtless, they will return to usual place. Like children with stories, the public of The Pops often prefers what it already knows by heart. Moreover, in or out of the concert-hall, familiar things make the better welcome.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

CLOSING WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

THE POPS AND BRAHMS

His Horn Trio Slips Into a Programme and Is Well Played—Other Incidents

IN Mr. Ernest Hoffmann, now joining his father among the first violins at the Pop concerts, the Symphony Orchestra has a very capable pianist. In the present series of concerts the playing of the celesta has fallen to him and he has handled the little instrument with much skill, notably in the Fantasia from Leon's "L'Oracolo" last Friday. On other occasions he has provided the piano accompaniment for solos, and last night he made possible the performance of a movement from Brahms's Trio for violin, horn and pianoforte, Opus 40—a novel item for a Pop programme. Companioning him were Mr. Jacques Hoffmann and Mr. Hess. The piece, which has been rather neglected here of late, was a great favorite of Mr. Knesel and judging from the Finale played last evening it would be well worth hearing. However insensitive Brahms may have been to the individuality and characteristic voice of other instruments he had a peculiar regard for the horn and his writing for it was unfailingly sympathetic and effective. A note in the score suggests that in this trio it may be replaced by a 'cello or viola, but the galloping figure on which this finale is based would be quite unsuited to either instrument. The movement was brilliantly played and in response to the applause the three players added to the programme arrangement of Rakhmanov's half exotic Serenade.

More or less accustomed numbers filled the rest of the concert. For novelty it included a Processional March by Edwin L. Turnbull of the department of music at Johns Hopkins University, formal and sonorous, and the Finale of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony—the latter, of course, new only to the Pops. Such impulsive, strongly rhythmical music suits Mr. Jacchia well and it would be a pleasure to hear from him the first movement as well. For contrasting Viennese waltzes there were Lehar's "Gold and Silver" and the older "Vienna Beauties" of Ziehrer. The former is sensuous and effectively orchestrated, but in the latter is the true Viennese swing which somehow eludes the moderns. Even Richard frankly aping Johann could not quite achieve it.

W. S. S.

Sept. 19, 1920
ms Arranged Nights

necessity of reparations for the on of the Boston
the Pop concerts
mphony Hall will after next week.
efore, will be the nights of the com-place on Friday,

ms College will be nd interpolate their

of the week, and however, will be ursday, the 23d.
ers are still being the exact selecwhich, it is surly differ from re-

Y.
Ganne
ul Galatea" Orient"
Strauss
Bizet
VIII."
Saint-Saens
Sibelius
ummer"
Herbert
Tschalkowsky
Thomas
Handel
Elon
czy"
Berlioz
AY.

Turnbull
Suppe
Lehar Ball"
Verdi
Lohengrin"
Wagner
from Trio...
Brahms
rn, M. Hess; piano.
id"
Massenet
b, "New World"
Dvorak
erly"
Puccini
Schumann
Ziehrer
er"
Sousa

March from "Tannhauser"
Overture to "La Forza del Destino"
Verdi
"Ave Maria"
Bach-Gounod
Fantasia, "La Tosea"
Puccini
Suite, "Nutteracker"
Tschalkowsky
(a) Overture Miniature; (b) Dance de la Fee
Dragee; (c) Trepak.
Violoncello Solo, "Melodie"
Gluck
Mr. J. Keller.
Danse Symphonique
Wing
Overture to "Sakantala"
Goldmark
Procession of the Sardar...
Ippolito-Ivanoff
"Largo" (with organ)
Handel
Waltz, "España"
Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries...
Wagner

TUESDAY.

ee" (with organ). Elgar Frage of Figaro". Mozart
(Reve Angelique)...
Rubinstein
nd Delilah". Saint-Saens
Grieg
(b) Anrita's Dance, (c) In untain King.
thedral from "Lohen-
Wagner
ce...
Brahms
King Lear"...
Little
Verdi
W. S. Smith
atiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
rards...
Halvorsen

WEDNESDAY.

est Night.
tance"
Elgar
atiful Blue Danube"
Strauss
"Dubinushka"
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Verdi
hapsody...
Liszt
World" Symphony...
Dvorak
III., "Lohengrin"
Wagner
"1812"...
Tschalkowsky
Tschalkowsky
(with organ)...
Rubinstein
Mountain King"
Grieg
auser"
Wagner

THURSDAY.

College Night.
ictory"
Ganne
ello"
Auber
Waldteufel
lasses up," words by H.
The Royal Purple," H. C.

ore"
Verdi
D major...
Brahms
Rubinstein
arence P. Brown, '09;
S. Potter, '10.
Tschalkowsky
en at Play"
Van Westerhout
rs"
Volstedt
III., "Lohengrin"
Wagner
Washington Gladden, '59

FRIDAY.

ng Night.
March from "Tannhauser"
Wagner
Overture to "La Forza del Destino"
Verdi
"Ave Maria"
Bach-Gounod
Fantasia, "La Tosea"
Puccini
Suite, "Nutteracker"
Tschalkowsky
(a) Overture Miniature; (b) Dance de la Fee
Dragee; (c) Trepak.
Violoncello Solo, "Melodie"
Gluck
Mr. J. Keller.
Danse Symphonique
Wing
Overture to "Sakantala"
Goldmark
Procession of the Sardar...
Ippolito-Ivanoff
"Largo" (with organ)
Handel
Waltz, "España"
Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries...
Wagner

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

Branch Exchange Telephones, Ticket and Administration Offices, Back Bay 1492

Boston Symphony Orchestra

INCORPORATED

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FORTIETH SEASON, 1920-1921

Programme of the First Afternoon and Evening Concerts

FRIDAY at 2.30 o'clock, SATURDAY at 8.00 o'clock
OCTOBER 8 and 9

WITH HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE
NOTES BY PHILIP HALE

COPYRIGHT, 1920, BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INCORPORATED

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Inc.

FREDERICK P. CABOT	President
GALEN L. STONE	Vice-President
ERNEST B. DANE	Treasurer

ALFRED L. AIKEN	FREDERICK E. LOWELL
FREDERICK P. CABOT	ARTHUR LYMAN
ERNEST B. DANE	HENRY B. SAWYER
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE	GALEN L. STONE
JOHN ELLERTON LODGE	BENTLEY W. WARREN

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

CLOSING WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

Herald — Sept. 19, 1920
Special Programs Arranged for Final Nights

On account of the necessity of rehearsing and other preparations for the coming winter season of the Boston Symphony concerts, the Pop concerts now running at Symphony Hall will have to be curtailed after next week. The coming week, therefore, will be the last.

One of the biggest nights of the coming week will take place on Friday, Sept. 24, when Williams College will be present in numbers and interpolate their own songs.

The biggest night of the week, and indeed of the season, however, will be request night, on Thursday, the 23d. Ballots in great numbers are still being counted to determine the exact selections for this program, which, it is surmised, will not greatly differ from request nights of the past.

MONDAY.

March, "Lorraine".....Ganne
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea".....Suppe
Waltz, "Tales from the Orient".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ballet suite from "Henry VIII.".....Saint-Saens
Valse "Triste".....Sibelius
American Idyl, "Indian Summer".....Herbert
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tschalkowsky
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
"Largo" (with organ).....Handel
Whispering of the Flowers.....Eton
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz

TUESDAY.

Processional March.....Turnbull
Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Gold and Silver".....Lehar
Fantasia, "The Masked Ball".....Verdi
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Finale (Allegro con brioso) from Trilo.....Brahms (Violin, J. Hoffmann; horn, M. Hess; piano, E. Hoffmann).
Aragonaise from "The Cid".....Massenet
Finale (Allegro con fuoco), "New World".....Dvorak
Symphony.....Puccini
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Schumann
Evening Song.....Ziehrer
Waltz, "Vienna Beauties".....Sousa
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa

March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
"Ave Maria".....Bach-Gounod
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Suite, "Nutteracker".....Tschalkowsky
(a) Overture Miniature; (b) Dance de la Fee
Dragee; (c) Trepak.
Violoncello Solo, "Melodie".....Gluck
Mr. J. Keller.
Danse Symphonique.....Wing
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolito-Ivanoff
"Largo" (with organ).....Handel
Waltz, "España".....Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

WEDNESDAY.

"The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
(Reve Angelique).....Rubinstein
and "Dellah".....Saint-Saens
(b) Anrita's Dance, (c) In mountain King.
Theatrical from "Lohen-
grin".....Wagner
"The Marriage of Figaro".....Brahms
King Lear.....Little
Verdi
W. S. Smith
Beautiful Blue Danube.....Strauss
Haltersen

THURSDAY.

College Night.
"The Marriage of Figaro".....Elgar
Beautiful Blue Danube.....Strauss
"Dubinushka".....Verdi
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Liszt
"The Marriage of Figaro".....Dvorak
III., "Lohengrin".....Wagner

"1812".....Tschalkowsky
Tschalkowsky
(with organ).....Rubinstein
Mountain King.....Grieg
"The Marriage of Figaro".....Wagner

FRIDAY.

College Night.
"The Marriage of Figaro".....Ganne
"Lohengrin".....Auber
Waldteufel
"The Marriage of Figaro".....H. C.

"The Marriage of Figaro".....Verdi
D major.....Brahms
Rubinstein
Lawrence P. Brown, '09;
S. Potter, '10.
Tschalkowsky
"The Marriage of Figaro".....Van Westerhout
III., "Lohengrin".....Vollstedt
Washington Gladden, '59

College Night.
"The Marriage of Figaro".....Wagner
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
"Ave Maria".....Bach-Gounod
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Suite, "Nutteracker".....Tschalkowsky
(a) Overture Miniature; (b) Dance de la Fee
Dragee; (c) Trepak.
Violoncello Solo, "Melodie".....Gluck
Mr. J. Keller.
Danse Symphonique.....Wing
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolito-Ivanoff
"Largo" (with organ).....Handel
Waltz, "España".....Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

Branch Exchange Telephones, Ticket and Administration Offices, Back Bay 1492

Boston Symphony Orchestra

INCORPORATED

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FORTIETH SEASON, 1920-1921

Programme of the First Afternoon and Evening Concerts

FRIDAY at 2.30 o'clock, SATURDAY at 8.00 o'clock
OCTOBER 8 and 9

WITH HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE
NOTES BY PHILIP HALE

COPYRIGHT, 1920, BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INCORPORATED

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Inc.

FREDERICK P. CABOT	President
GALEN L. STONE	Vice-President
ERNEST B. DANE	Treasurer

ALFRED L. AIKEN	FREDERICK E. LOWELL
FREDERICK P. CABOT	ARTHUR LYMAN
ERNEST B. DANE	HENRY B. SAWYER
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE	GALEN L. STONE
JOHN ELLERTON LODGE	BENTLEY W. WARREN

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

Come

less than in America,
which the action passed
such a play would not
y a kind of "emana-
umably a susceptible
ast, it is pleasure to

THE
The train rolls
with little sleep
In the compart-
persons who see
their papers.
sleeping, while time as best the
ner sits a man
Opposite him woman. The
the blond woman goes on

Too long has Ch in ruralities and in
in a bashful and to his rescue has new supporting cast
Burns, lightweight secretary of George membered success
From Broadway," debut at the Old So
It is a distinctly Ray, and while he like a prizefighter,
the rôle that the au
their doubts of his better to sit back

Come

ess than in America,
which the action passed uch a play would not
y a kind of "emana-
umably a susceptible
st, it is pleasure to

The train roll
with little sleep
In the compart
persons who see
their papers.
sleeping, while
time as best the
ner sits a man
Opposite him
woman. The
the blond woman goes on

FOR M

WEDNESDAY.

"Pomp and Circumstance" (with organ). Elgar
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro". Mozart
"Kamminoi Ostrow" (Reve Angellique). Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah". Saint-Saens
Suite, "Peer Gynt". Grieg
(a) Morning Mood, (b) Anrita's Dance, (c) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohen-
grin". Wagner
First Hungarian Dance. Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "King Lear". Little
Fantasia, "Aida". Verdi
Romance. W. S. Smith
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube". Strauss
Entrance of the Borars. Halvorsen

THURSDAY.

Request Night.
"Pomp and Circumstance". Elgar
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube". Strauss
Russian Folk Song, "Dubinushka". Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aida". Verdi
Second Hungarian Rhapsody. Liszt
Largo from the "New World" Symphony. Dvorak
Introduction to Act. III., "Lohengrin". Wagner
Overture Solennelle, "1812". Tschalkowsky
Marche Slave. Tschalkowsky
"Kamminoi Ostrow" (with organ). Rubinstein
"In the Hall of the Mountain King". Grieg
Overture to "Tannhauser". Wagner

FRIDAY.

Williams College Night.
March, "Father of Victory". Ganne
Overture to "Massaniello". Auber
Waltz, "Estudiantina". Waldteufel
Songs with orchestra
"Come Fill Your Glasses up," words by H.
S. Patterson, '96; "The Royal Purple," H. C.
Taylor, '99.
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore". Verdi
Hungarian Dance in D major. Brahms
Reve Angellique. Rubinstein
Songs with orchestra
"Our Mother," Clarence F. Brown, '09;
"Yard by Yard," L. S. Potter, '10.
Marche Slave. Tschalkowsky
Enfantillage ("Children at Play"). Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows". Volstedt
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin". Wagner
"The Mountains". Dr. Washington Gladden, '59

SATURDAY.

Closing Night.
March from "Tannhauser". Wagner
Overture to "La Forza del Destino". Verdi
"Ave Maria". Bach-Gounod
Fantasia, "La Tosca". Puccini
Suite, "Nutcracker". Tschalkowsky
(a) Overture Miniature; (b) Dance de la Fee
Dragee; (c) Trepak.
Violoncello Solo, "Melodie". Gluck
Mr. J. Keller.
Danse Symphonique. Weng
Overture to "Sakantala". Goldmark
Procession of the Sardar. Ippolito-Ivanoff
"Largo" (with organ). Handel
Waltz, "Espana". Waldteufel
Ride of the Valkyries. Wagner

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

Branch Exchange Telephones, Ticket and Administration Offices, Back Bay 1492

Boston Symphony Orchestra

INCORPORATED

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FORTIETH SEASON, 1920-1921

Programme of the First Afternoon and Evening Concerts

FRIDAY at 2.30 o'clock, SATURDAY at 8.00 o'clock
OCTOBER 8 and 9

WITH HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE
NOTES BY PHILIP HALE

COPYRIGHT, 1920, BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INCORPORATED

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Inc.

FREDERICK P. CABOT	President
GALEN L. STONE	Vice-President
ERNEST B. DANE	Treasurer

ALFRED L. AIKEN	FREDERICK E. LOWELL
FREDERICK P. CABOT	ARTHUR LYMAN
ERNEST B. DANE	HENRY B. SAWYER
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE	GALEN L. STONE
JOHN ELLERTON LODGE	BENTLEY W. WARREN

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

40th SEASON, 1920-1921

SYMPHONY HALL

BEGINNING OCTOBER 8-9

24 FRIDAY AFTERNOON 24 SATURDAY EVENING
SYMPHONY CONCERTS BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOISTS

HAROLD BAUER
HELEN STANLEY
REINALD WERRENRATH
GUY MAIER and
LEE PATTISON

PERCY GRAINGER
ISOLDE MENGES
HULDA LASHANSKA
MISCHA LEVITZKI

JACQUES THIBAUD
BENNO MOISEWITSCH
ALICE NIELSEN
ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN

OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED

For the Friday Afternoon Concerts all reserved seats have been subscribed.
For the Saturday Evening Concerts a few desirable seats are still available.
Season tickets, 24 Concerts, $65, $53, $40, $27, $18 (no tax). Now on sale at Symphony Hall.

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, AT 8 P.M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 98

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio
- II. Allegretto scherzando
- III. Tempo di menuetto
- IV. Allegro vivace

LEKEU.

FANTASIA on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou
(First time in Boston)

FRANCK,

PRELUDE, CHORALE and FUGUE
(Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné)
(First time in Boston)

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 2, Tasso; Lamento e
Trionfo.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

SYMPHONY'S 40TH SEASON

Brilliant Opening Performance—Enlarged Orchestra—Two Novelties

LEKEU'S FANTASIA WINS INSTANT FAVOR

Herald Oct. 9, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began brilliantly yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Lekeu, Fantasia on two Folk-Songs of Anjou; Franck, Prelude, Chorale and Fugue orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne; Liszt, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

In past years it was the custom to write in a quasi-apologetic tone of the first symphony concert of the season: the orchestra had not been together during the summer; or there was a new conductor who was not yet in full sympathy with the players; other excuses, necessary or unnecessary, were invented by lazy reviewers.

Yesterday gave no cause for an apologetic or glibly indifferent review. Yet there were several new members and the program included two unfamiliar compositions. It was good to see so large an orchestra; this body of players will be still further enlarged, for several that have been engaged for the string section will arrive next week, or come too late for the first concert. As for the performance itself, it was one that was characteristic of a well-seasoned, well-disciplined, enthusiastic body of artists. Mr. Monteux and Mr. Brennan have worked a miracle; the city, the country, may still and well be proud of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in spite of the malicious and foolish attempts last season to disrupt it.

The conductor was warmly welcomed, and the great audience manifested every sign of genuine appreciation after the performance of each composition.

Lekeu's Fantasia and Pierne's transcription were played in Boston for the first time. The former was published in 1909; the latter was first performed at a Colonne concert in Paris in 1904.

Our "novelties" are late in arrival. Lekeu, the Belgian, is known here chiefly by his violin sonata, of which Eugene Ysaie, who was interested in him, once said, it is a fine work when cuts are freely made in it. The composer died in 1894, a few months after the production of the Fantasia, when he was only 24 years old. Much was legitimately expected of him. It is not surprising that his Fantasia is not on the whole firmly knit; that some might find even a few crudities in it; that the influence of Wagner in the harmonic scheme is at times recognized; but there is such a freshness of inspiration; there are such pages of genuine beauty and individually poetic feeling, that the premature death of this gifted man is deeply to be deplored.

The more commonplace section of the Fantasia is the first in which the dance scene is portrayed in tones. When Lekeu came to the love music, with the enchanting solo passages for oboe and violoncello, he wrote in a vein of rare tenderness and revealed his imaginative nature. Nor did he for a moment fall into the sensual caterwauling dear to many French composers when they attempt to express "amour." His own taste, and his studies with Cesar Franck and Vincent d'Indy saved him from this pitfall. This love-section contains both rapturous and exquisite pages, while the close has peculiar harmonic and orchestral charm. The Fantasia met yesterday with instant favor. We do not remember in the course of thirty years an unfamiliar composition that was so heartily and spontaneously greeted.

Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue has been played here by many pianists. Pierne's transcription is a brilliant example of skilful, intelligent, one might say, reverent instrumentation; yet there are some of us who prefer the naked nobility of Franck's composition to the sumptuous orchestral dress with which Pierne has clothed it. And so the simple air of Handel's Xerxes seated beneath the plane tree is far more moving than the swollen transcription known as "Handel's Largo."

There was a sound performance of Beethoven's Symphony. The concert ended with Liszt's flamboyant "Tasso," which, with the exception of the leading theme in its simplest form, and possibly the minuet episode, is stuffed with bunkum. The apotheosis, especially, is a noteworthy example of Liszt's circus-sawdust and blatant pump. How far is this Liszt from the composer of the "Faust" Symphony and the songs; even from "Mazeppa" and the Mephisto waltz!

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Enesco, Symphony in E-flat major; Brahms, piano concerto, No. 1 (Harold Bauer, pianist); Berlioz; overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUPERFINE

Opens 40th Season
With Display of Virtuosity

Post ——— Oct. 9, 1920
BY OLIN DOWNES

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday, an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring, or else Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-20.

TONE RICH AND BRILLIANT

The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings, and it would be invidious at this time to make detailed comparison of the exquisite solo playing of various members of the wind chorus. Above all—and a great test, anyhow, of the true quality of an orchestra—was the delicacy, the tonal beauty and fulness of "pianissimo" passages.

Most of the programme was familiar. There was one novelty in the form of a virtuoso interpretation of Lekeu's Fantasy for orchestra founded on two folk-themes and a "programme" not printed in the original score of the work. But this programme is supplied on the fly-leaf of a four-hand arrangement. It is a tale, a fantasy, of youthful festivity and passion. The walls rock to the dance, as they do when Lenau's Mephistopheles fiddles for Faust and his partner. The youth and maiden disappear from the crowd. There is a love scene in the midst of nature.

Exciting and Mystical

We had as soon not have been bothered with this programme. The music, if somewhat lacking in formal balance and cohesion, as it impressed the writer at a first hearing, is in itself sufficiently exciting, imaginative and frequently mystical in its sensuousness. The Lekeu of haunting pages of chamber and music is found again in mysterious interludes interrupted by wild recurrences or reminiscences of the dance. The transformation of the principal dance themes—there are two folk-themes, but one greatly predominates the work—are more than ingenious, more than "clever," show true creative power.

No wonder the audience applauded this performance of an effective and exacting work by Mr. Monteux and his men, who were called to their feet to acknowledge, with their conductor, the applause.

Caesar Franck Transferred

And yet, by the side of this work, rather tentative, with all its interest and subjectivity, was another which by virtue of its formal strength and grandeur make Lekeu's composition almost amateurish. This was the "Prelude Chorale, and Fugue" of Caesar Franck, originally for the piano, in an orchestral version by Gabriel Pierne. The composition proved one of the few works for piano which do not seem swollen and distorted at the hands of the orchestra. The ideas are so big, the form so extended, the utterance so lofty and inspired. There is a nature in this music, a mood, not a whit less sensitive and intimate than that of Lekeu, yet these moods are captured and perpetuated for all time in a form as powerful and enduring as a mountain range.

The orchestration of Pierne is astonishingly in good taste, in absolute sympathy with the colors as well as the moods in the composer's mind. Anybody, today, can dress up a piece of piano music and give it orchestral clothes which it does not know how to wear, and which look out of place on it. But here, with Pierne, was the characteristic shadowy richness and gorgeousness of Franck. It is a masterpiece of coloring.

Intelligently Scored

Take the chorale, and think of the glowing, transparent tone qualities of the upper instruments which include, if memory serves, some of the woodwind, a harp, a celesta, and then add the vague and sombre colors of other instruments in deep registers of the orchestra which form the background for the swaying chorale. The censer-like chorale, with the bell of the celesta ringing far, far up, as if in the very topmost niche of some cathedral!

Saying which, and admitting the absolute genius of the accomplishment, we say we prefer this superb composition in its original form, as Franck wrote it, for the piano. This may be pure prejudice. Probably it is, in view of the perfect realization of Franck's idiom with instruments, the clarity which may be obtained by strings, but never by a piano, in the fugue, the matchless splendor of the climaxes when taken up by the brass.

Beethoven's Eighth

The programme opened with Beethoven's 8th symphony, one of the four of the nine symphonies of Beethoven which remain artistically complete and proportionate—as the 9th symphony is not—and as yet secure from ravages of time. These 4 are the 3d, the 5th, the 7th and the 8th. Mr. Monteux showed himself thoroughly in accord with the Beethovenish virility and humor of the whole work.

Of course musicians will always discuss the right tempo of the first part of the third movement. But no one will discuss the wondrous singing of the wind instruments of the orchestra in the trio of this movement, or the general clarity, excellence, animation of the performance.

SMOOTH OPENING FOR THE SYMPHONY
Capacity Audience to Hear
Remodeled Orchestra

Lekeu's Fantasia, Franck's 'Prelude'

Among the Novelties

Globe ——— Oct. 9, 1920

Nothing at yesterday's Symphony concert, the first of the new season, showed that the orchestra experienced unprecedented difficulties last year. The usual capacity audience displayed the usual enthusiasm for a performance which averaged as well as first concerts of other seasons by an orchestra with no vacant places in it, led by an excellent conductor.

All the subscription seats for the Friday series were sold long since, and fewer than usual of the Saturday seats remain available. The rush seats, too, were filled yesterday without the aid of a soloist to account for the fact. The croakers who have been saying that the Boston Symphony was done for were egregiously mistaken.

The quality of the new players is superior on the whole to that of the men they replace, who, with two or three exceptions, will never be missed. The ensemble playing will be somewhat bettered as the season progresses, doubtless, but that has invariably occurred in former years.

The Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, called "little" because it is shorter and less profound than the others, demands an unerring precision and delicacy in performance if it is to make its full effect on the listener. It has not the overwhelming emotional power which hides all minor surface faults at a hearing of the Fifth or "Eroica." Yesterday a slight unevenness in attacks and an occasional lack of proper subordination which allowed wrong groups of instruments to stand out momentarily were noticeable. These faults are inevitable at the first concert after a long vacation period.

Of the two novelties, Lekeu's Fantasia is the more admirable. It is the work of a young master, who died at 24, written under the influence of his teachers, Franck and D'Indy, yet not without its own originality and power.

Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue" is among the best-known modern piano pieces. We doubt whether its composer would have approved of Pierne's arrangement for orchestra. Beethoven once said that no one could transfer satisfactorily a work originally conceived in terms of one medium to another.

Liszt's showy but empty "Tasso" had a fire and verve in it which atoned for the few minor blemishes. All in all, yesterday's concert was a triumph for all concerned, especially for Mr. Monteux, whose patient zeal made it possible. Next week Harold Bauer will play the piano part in Brahms' First Concerto. The other numbers are Enesco's Symphony and Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN OLD-NEW ORCHESTRA BEGINS A NEW SEASON

Jan. 1. Oct. 9, 1921
The Band Refilled with Youthful and Cosmopolitan Recruits—Present Qualities
Well Reflecting the Conductor—Lekeu's
Fantasia for Novel and Notable Piece—Liszt in True Eloquence, but Dubious and Debatable Beethoven

IN the interests of the hour, at the first Symphony Concert of the fortieth annual series, the orchestra, yesterday afternoon, stood above all else. As it gradually assembled on the stage of Symphony Hall, it was soon clear that, according to promise, conductor and manager had quietly and efficiently refilled the decimated ranks of last spring. The present roster of the band numbers ninety-seven musicians in Boston and at work. To these, five more, now under engagement, will be added, raising the full force of the orchestra to 102—the amplest "personnel" in its history. When the second part of the programme mustered nearly the whole band, observant frequenters of the concerts quickly discovered that it was more youthful in aspect than for many a year. Fortunately the secession of last spring removed not a little elderly and cumbering "deadwood," too long permitted to linger lest the governing powers should seem hard-hearted. As fortunately conductor and manager have sought and found newcomers in young prime, and by such fresh blood the Symphony Orchestra, like any other organized body tending to become static and institutional, is the gainer. A glance at the page of the programme-book listing this "personnel" was equally inspiring. Here was a German, there a Frenchman, next an Italian; a little further an American; hard by a Hollander, an Englishman, a Czech, a Slav; then, say, a Pole; and, finally, to fill the measure, a Greek and also an Irishman. In all the long past, never has the orchestra been more various, more cosmopolitan, in the nationality of the members. Clearly only individual fitness has weighed in the refilling of the band. Again the trustees have taken the way of wisdom; again Mr. Monteux as choosing conductor, has proved his rare and signal breadth of mind; again Mr. Brennan, manager and co-operator in these things, has had thought only of the best interests of the band. For the time at least, perhaps for a long future every open or secret desire to nationalize the orchestra, to make it narrowly French, German, American, what not, has been frustrated. As it should be, it is as broad-spreading and cosmopolitan as the art of music it serves. Once again, in "personnel" as in programmes, it asserts its high and fine tradition of catholicity. In equal measure, the trustees and Mr. Monteux have maintained it and thanks and praise from the frequenters of the concerts should go out to them.

Of the quality of the orchestra thus refilled, it is too early to speak either with detail or with certainty. Especially in cities to the Southward, envious detractors, still smarting under years of fruitless rivalry, like to descant upon the decline of the band. Over-zealous partisans at home are as prone to declare that it is again at its best estate. Both assertions err by excess; since, in sober and ascertainable fact, from the concerts of 1918-19 through the first concert of this new season of 1920, the band has seldom risen so high and still more seldom fallen so low as these zealots respectively contend. As it was yesterday, it had been in rehearsal through no more than a week; the newcomers have had barely time to find themselves, become accustomed to strange surroundings, feel out their fellows and their chief; while for a first occasion on Monday, they experienced the public to which they will minister. In the merest common sense, the refilled orchestra is necessarily at beginnings.

Yet a few inferences seem clear and safe. Already the new-old orchestra is responsive and sensitive to the conductor. Most of the intractables to a new dispensation, who occasionally hampered Mr. Monteux last year—rather by inertia than overt act—have departed; while the spirit they represented has altogether vanished. The orchestra is at one with a conductor who deserves its every loyalty and sensibility. It not only hears and obeys; it does both with sympathy and zest. Furthermore, there is no doubting that the string choir plays, at the conductor's will, with an exceeding vitality, incisiveness, precision and power of tone; that the wood-winds and the horns keep old sensuous quality and finesse; that the brass does not lack large sonority; that to the familiar virtuosi of recent years are to be added such newcomers as Mr. Burgin as concert-master, and Mr. Amerena as third flute; that among the recruits are young musicians of proved skill and as clear promise. For the time the shortcomings are a tendency to power rather than to plasticity, to vigors at the expense of delicacy, especially in finely-matched euphonies, to sweep in preference to shading. The rhythmic vigor, the songful warmth, the ardent progress of the orchestra commend it. As yet it is not so fortunate in modulation, in supple advance through long gradients of tone.

To write these sayings is also to write that in not a few of these respects, the orchestra is already taking voice and color from Mr. Monteux himself. He and it were at their best when they unrolled the tonal panorama, sounded the romantic heights and depths of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." Their performance was like a spectacle upon the theatre of the imagination. Out of the incisive beginning rose the sombre and distraught figure of the poet Liszt would summon; the motif and measures that would sing his woes pierced the ear and in degree touched the heart; Mr. Monteux struck fire in the flash from the music of Tasso's pride; the courtly division of the tone-poem was smiling and gracious; the finale of glorification swelled with pomps and power. It was Liszt's music made music-drama, alive anew with romantic ardor that new times and tastes have been known to leave threadbare. Once again illusion was born of it. As many a time last winter, Mr. Monteux's instincts of the opera house heightened and deepened his version of symphonic music.

In good case, too, were conductor and orchestra with Monsieur Pierné's arrangement for a new medium of Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue. Being practised conductor, applying for such purpose the resources of instrumental choirs—and not unmindful at need of effect upon an audience—he has made the transcription with craftsman's skill, but hardly with the flashes of divining and recreating imagination that Mottl, for example, when the mood was on him, could bring to like work. As it seemed in a single hearing, the arrangement tended to prolong the appreciable lengths of Franck's piano-piece; while the music spread over a full orchestra seemed also to spread thin. The listening faculties again followed the long ascendant line of the music richly unfolding, cunningly and imaginatively interlaced. They perceived anew Franck's signal and distinctive ability to make serene rhapsody mount from the earth and cleave the heavens. Yet both Monsieur Pierné and Mr. Monteux missed gradations of this ascent, modulations of music and mood, finely attuned relationships that such pianists as Mr. Bauer readily discover in the original piece. Father Franck was aware of the various media for music, skilled and sensitive to them. When he wrote this Prelude, Choral and Fugue, he knew, as his own homeliness of speech might put it, "what he was about." Yet the transcription was not uninteresting; while Mr. Monteux and, especially, his string choir were incisive and rhythmic in the Prelude and the Fugue, capable of sustained and expansive instrumental song in the Choral and of large, uppled sonorous climax at the end.

Again Lekeu's Orchestral Fantasia summoned the finer, the more characteristic powers of conductor and band. In itself and in performance the piece stirred the audience to the heartiest applause of the afternoon, warm as it had been when Mr. Monteux first came to his place and warm as it was to be at the end of "Tasso." Indeed, the wonder was that the Fantasia had never before been played at the Symphony Concerts. The two "folk-songs of Anjou" lying behind the Fantasia are, as they should be, but means to a work of the composer's imagination. From one Lekeu derives the motif whence upsprings the music of his nocturnal dance of peasants—sharp-set, keenly rhythmed, beating high and glad, yet with a hint of that which is heard remote and darkling. To the other folk-song Lekeu owes the motif germinating the music of the lovers' longing as they stray from the dance into the sweetness of nocturnal solitudes à deux.

The Fantasia becomes work of the imagination in the half-fantastical, half-homely thrill that Lekeu imparts to this music of the dance; only a little less, since no demon is present, than the like thrill in Liszt's "Mephisto-Waltz." It is such work again when the motif of amorous longing penetrates the music of revel, infuses itself, as it were, into the chosen pair. Again imagination speaks out of the music when the dance-motiv, rising and falling, seems to follow them into the woodland shades, until at last the music of desire melts it into itself. And the Fantasia ends—in the stilled intensities of a solitude and a passion needing no speech.

Throughout, Lekeu's workmanship is no less imaginative and even more individual. Seldom with his measures of dance or of desire does he succumb to the mere rhetoric of sumptuous and sonorous music-making—an easy rhetoric in his youth of the late eighties and the early nineties. Everywhere else he plies the economy and directness of musical means dear in our day to Ravel and twenty other composers. Everywhere else he writes a lean-bodied, fine-fibred, keen-edged music of this our particular time—nakedly graphic of the dance, pitched low but deep with the lovers' desire, tingling upon ear and imagination when either impulse haunts the other. Had Lekeu lived he would have been now in his fifty-first year. By the token of this Fantasia, of his chamber-pieces, of other fragments, what music might he not have written. And Death took him in his youth—barbarous, unthinking Death.

As the Fantasia was written, so also was it played with Mr. Monteux's fine instinct for a graphic music that his own imagination can visualize, with more than his usual sensibility. There remains, then, for courteous quarrel only his and the orchestra's version of the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the little, the gay, the almost freakish symphony, with which the composer whiffed away a time by no means untroubled. Now, as some of us read and feel this music, rightly or wrongly, it is light, playful, fanciful, almost Mozartean, asking a sprightly, sensitive, adroit hand in the conductor, an equal animation, finesse and elegance in the orchestra. The nicest of modulations should flick it like sunshine; play of motifs should dart and flash; the long, fine lines of the composer's design should be gracefully, sportively graded. Above all, the tone of the orchestra should be as light and transparent, as variously inflected as the music itself. Even when the rhythm is deliberately and humorously monotonous as Beethoven willed, the beat should be of the lightest; while gamesome and gay as of high spirits, should be the harmonic twist and turns, the prancing chords of the Finale. Beethoven could be gay—and boisterous, as sundry music proves. He could, also, as in this symphony in F major, be gay and nimble.

Agreed that throughout the symphony, Mr. Monteux's pace was as lively as ear or fancy could wish; that the third movement might even have gained, in contrast to its neighbors, by a little slower gait and a little rounder progress. Agreed also that he missed none of the contrasts leaping out of the music to eye and ear. Agreed further that he knows and feels his Beethoven when wood-winds or horns sing under and through the nervous strings; when a racing Finale halts and opens for a jet of warm song. Even so, was not the tone of the orchestra needlessly thick and hard in the first movement and the progress through it superfluously strenuous? And where, where was the elastic modulation, as it were in flow of gayety, which this Allegro clearly invites? Mr. Monteux took the Finale at a dashing pace, but he could not or he would not escape too solid tone, too sharp and reiterated emphases. Both haunted it, while lightness, brightness, elegance came not. Such grace and flow again evaded the conductor and orchestra in the minuet, delicately and minutely as he sought to weave it. And where was the inflections that should play over the second movement and make it sound like to the sight of sunshine among leaves when the breeze touches them? Again Mr. Monteux was consciously exact, deliberately suave, assiduously artful. Time and again, in the year that Boston has known him, in the very music yesterday of Liszt and Lekeu, he has been an interesting, eloquent, persuasive, even a stimulating conductor—but not, not in the symphonies of Mozart or Haydn or in this little symphony of Beethoven.

H. T. PARKER

SYMPHONY BILL WELL PLAYED

Opening Concert Reflects Brilliance of Boston Orchestra;

French Numbers Given

Adv. By FRED J. McISAAC. Oct. 9, 1920

The fortieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall in the usual unceremonious manner in which Symphony seasons begin. There was a capacity audience, and I understand that the subscription this season is the best for several years.

Pierre Monteux is again the conductor. Mr. Beagin, the new concert master, who comes from Scandinavia, occupied the chair so curiously vacated by Fradkin last season. Fradkin was the first American concert master. They went back to Europe for his successor.

PLAYS BEAUTIFULLY

There were many new faces in the band, also; and of course the old reliables. With such men as Theodorowicz, Hoffman, Gerardi, Denayer, Mullaly, Schroeder, Barth, Keller Seydel, Longy, Lenom, Laurent, Brook, Vanini, Sand and Kloeppel remain; the Boston Symphony is not fundamentally disturbed.

Naturally we were all interested to hear how the reconstructed orchestra would sound. Considering that it was the opening concert of the season, and that a score or so of the men were new, it sounded beautifully. No orchestra in America can approach it yet. To be sure it is not the band it was in 1914, but the gap between the old Boston Symphony and all other orchestras was so wide that the orchestra could be shattered worse than it has been, and still be supreme.

FANTASIA CHORUS

The program yesterday was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. I have never enjoyed Beethoven as interpreted by Monteux, and yesterday's performance was no exception. I think he reads passion and fire into these scores at the expense of their sweetness, elegance and grace.

There were two interesting French numbers on the program. The first was a symphonic fantasia by Lekeu, played for the first time in Boston. Lekeu was a young Frenchman who died a generation ago at the age of twenty-four as a result of eating bad ice cream. He might have been a very great composer if he had lived. This fantasia is supposed to picture a rustic dance from which two lovers steal to spoon in the moonlight. It had atmosphere, passion and the aroma of a Summer moonlight night and it pleased the audience mightily. It was performed with exquisite care by Mr. Monteux.

Next came an orchestral setting by Gabriel Pierné of a prelude, choral, and composed for the piano by Cesar Franck. Pierné caught very well the orchestral method familiar to those who know the Franck symphonies. The work itself is too long, like most Cesar Franck things, but has its moments of austere grandeur and magnificence. The familiar tone poem of Liszt, "Tasso," was finely performed at the end of the program.

Oct. 9, 1920

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

Specialty for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The first concert of the fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on the afternoon of October 8, 1920. The following was the program:

Beethoven Eighth Symphony
Lekeu Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou
Franck Prelude, Chorale and Fugue (orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné)
Liszt Tasso

The program happily combined the novel and the familiar, the Fantasia by Lekeu and Pierné's orchestral arrangement of the Franck piece being played for the first time in Boston. Of Beethoven's Symphony little need be said. If not one of his greatest, it is one of the most charming, and served well as an opening piece for the season.

Due respect having thus been shown to the classics, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra next turned their attention to the most interesting part of the afternoon's program—Lekeu's Fantasia. This is no trivial potpourri of folk tunes, contrived in the manner of Saint-Saëns and his imitators, no mere series of variations and contrapuntal contortions often clever, sometimes interesting, but rarely creating a mood, an atmosphere.

This Fantasia is a closely knit, skillfully developed symphonic movement. The fact that the thematic material is based on folk song is of secondary interest. The obviousness is filled with a poetic and refined beauty which sharply distinguishes it from the rough, uncouth yet realistic portrayal of folk scenes to which we are too often subjected. Of particular beauty are the closing pages, and the passages for oboe, cello and viola solo. The orchestra played with evident enthusiasm for the work.

There are orchestral transcriptions of piano pieces which are often recreative and bring out new and unexpected beauties, as for example, Weingartner's arrangement of Chabrier's Bourrée Fantasque, played in Boston last season. Piano pieces which sound well in orchestral dress are usually those which, although given to the world in pianistic form, were probably conceived by the composer in the orchestra's idiom. Franck's Prelude Chorale and Fugue are too pianistic to make their full appeal in orchestral versions. Pierné's arrangement is cleverly made; indeed, the piano version is often rather too literally transferred to the orchestra. Only occasionally does he catch the mysticism of the music, as in the bass-drum strokes in the Chorale. More often he does the obvious thing, as any clever pupil might do in a similar exercise. It must be confessed that arrangements of this character seem futile, apart from their value as exercises and examples for a class in orchestration.

Liszt's Tasso is not one of his most familiar orchestral compositions, nor mlin Pianoforte

yet one of his greatest. Still it is effective, and although all the composer's well known methods of procedure are in evidence the work is of more than passing interest.

The orchestra has undergone many changes during the past year. On the whole these changes seem to be for the better. It would perhaps not be altogether just to mention at this time an occasional roughness of tone, an occasional lack of precision. These slight imperfections will no doubt disappear in the course of the season. The orchestra did its best work in Lekeu's Fantasia. Here was flexibility and great beauty of tone, giving promise of what is to come in the next few weeks.

A BOSTON SYMPHONY MEMBER

Charles de Mailly, Flute Player, Was Native of Paris—Had Been a Member of the Local Organization Since 1915
Charles de Mailly, flute player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was buried from Waterman's Chapel in Roxbury, Thursday afternoon. The body was taken to Forest Hills for interment.

Mr. de Mailly died of paralysis. He was filling a summer engagement at Portsmouth, N. H. Mr. de Mailly was a native of Paris, France, where he was born twenty-six years ago. His parents were Charles and Suzanne (Bretton) de Mailly, both natives of the French capital. He studied under some of the best teachers in his native land, and, on coming to America, joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915. He had distinguished himself as a member of the wood-wind choir, and was often heard both during the winter symphony season and during the "Pops" as a soloist. His home was at 3 Durham street.

PERSONALS

EARLY AMONG JUNE WEDDINGS

Music Will Be a Notable Feature at Marriage Next Tuesday of Miss Hazel Newell L'Africain to Julius Theodorowicz, a Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the first of the many weddings which will mark next month will be the marriage, on Tuesday, June 1, of Miss Hazel Newell L'Africain, of Medford, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. N. L'Africain of that city, to Julius Theodorowicz, the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The wedding is to take place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. William G. Williams, 69 Evans road, Brookline, the latter the bride's aunt. The service, at half-past three o'clock, will be performed by Rev. Thomas C. Richards, pastor of the Mystic Congregational Church in Medford.

Miss L'Africain will have as her maid of honor and only attendant, her sister, Miss Ruth A. L'Africain. There will be no best man and no ushers, as the small reception to follow the ceremony will be informal and for merely the members of the families and a very few intimate friends.

The wedding has been planned to be as simple as such an occasion may be, but there will be special music, since eight fellow-members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wishing to honor Mr. Theodorowicz and the bride, have volunteered their services in a programme which will be out of the ordinary for a wedding.

Miss L'Africain's engagement to Mr. Theodorowicz was announced early in March. She has been prominent in musical work as a cellist of acknowledged ability and as a member of the American String Quartet. Her father is bandmaster of the 101st Infantry Band and long has been well known in musical life.

Mr. Theodorowicz came from Poland to this city about a score of years ago to join the Symphony Orchestra and he has remained a member of that organization ever since that time.

Following the wedding next Tuesday, he will take his bride on a wedding journey by automobile, with Lake Placid as their objective point. They are to be at that resort in the Adirondacks for the next four months.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, AT 8 P.M.

ENESCO,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, op. 13

I. Assez vif et rythmé

II. Lent

III. Vif et vigoureux

BRAHMS.

CONCERTO for Pianoforte, No. 1, D minor, op. 15

I. Maestoso

II. Adagio

III. Rondo: Allegro non troppo

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE. "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23

Soloist:

HAROLD BAUER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

yet one of his greatest. Still it is effective, and although all the composer's well known methods of procedure are in evidence the work is of more than passing interest.

The orchestra has undergone many changes during the past year. On the whole these changes seem to be for the better. It would perhaps not be altogether just to mention at this time an occasional roughness of tone, an occasional lack of precision. These slight imperfections will no doubt disappear in the course of the season. The orchestra did its best work in Lekeu's Fantasia. Here was flexibility and great beauty of tone, giving promise of what is to come in the next few weeks.

A BOSTON SYMPHONY MEMBER.

Charles de Mailly, Flute Player, Was Native of Paris—Had Been a Member of the Local Organization Since 1915

Charles de Mailly, flute player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was buried from Waterman's Chapel in Roxbury, Thursday afternoon. The body was taken to Forest Hills for interment.

Mr. de Mailly died of paralysis. He was filling a summer engagement at Portsmouth, N. H. Mr. de Mailly was a native of Paris, France, where he was born twenty-six years ago. His parents were Charles and Suzanne (Bretton) de Mailly, both natives of the French capital. He studied under some of the best teachers in his native land, and, on coming to America, joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915. He had distinguished himself as a member of the wood-wind choir, and was often heard both during the winter symphony season and during the "Pops" as a soloist. His home was at 3 Durham street.

PERSONALS

EARLY AMONG JUNE WEDDINGS

Music Will Be a Notable Feature at Marriage Next Tuesday of Miss Hazel Newell L'Africain to Julius Theodorowicz, a Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the first of the many weddings which will mark next month will be the marriage, on Tuesday, June 1, of Miss Hazel Newell L'Africain, of Medford, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. N. L'Africain of that city, to Julius Theodorowicz, the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The wedding is to take place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. William G. Williams, 69 Evans road, Brookline, the latter the bride's aunt. The service, at half-past three o'clock, will be performed by Rev. Thomas C. Richards, pastor of the Mystic Congregational Church in Medford.

Miss L'Africain will have as her maid of honor and only attendant, her sister, Miss Ruth A. L'Africain. There will be no best man and no ushers, as the small reception to follow the ceremony will be informal and for merely the members of the families and a very few intimate friends.

The wedding has been planned to be as simple as such an occasion may be, but there will be special music, since eight fellow-members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wishing to honor Mr. Theodorowicz and the bride, have volunteered their services in a programme which will be out of the ordinary for a wedding.

Miss L'Africain's engagement to Mr. Theodorowicz was announced early in March. She has been prominent in musical work as a cellist of acknowledged ability and as a member of the American String Quartet. Her father is bandmaster of the 101st Infantry Band and long has been well known in musical life.

Mr. Theodorowicz came from Poland to this city about a score of years ago to join the Symphony Orchestra and he has remained a member of that organization ever since that time.

Following the wedding next Tuesday, he will take his bride on a wedding journey by automobile, with Lake Placid as their objective point. They are to be at that resort in the Adirondacks for the next four months.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, AT 8 P.M.

ENESCO,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, op. 13

- I. Assez vif et rythmé
- II. Lent
- III. Vif et vigoureux

BRAHMS.

CONCERTO for Pianoforte, No. 1, D minor, op. 15

- I. Maestoso
- II. Adagio
- III. Rondo: Allegro non troppo

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE. "Beuvenuto Cellini," op. 23

Soloist:

HAROLD BAUER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

Harold Bauer, Famous as a Pianist, Has Played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra More Often Than Any of the Soloists of the Coming Season. He Was Considered an Infant Prodigy with the Violin, but on the Advice of Paderewski Devoted Himself to the Piano.

BAUER ASSISTS AT SYMPHONY

Herald Feb. 16, 1920
Masterly Performance Is
Given by Pianist at
Afternoon Concert

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK ANNOUNCED

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Harold Bauer, pianist, assisted. The program was as follows: Enesco, Symphony in E-flat major; Brahms, Pianoforte Concerto No. 1; Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

This concert, although it evidently gave the great audience pleasure, does not call for laborious comment. The three compositions were more or less familiar, yet it is doubtful whether the first movement of the Roumanian-Parisian symphony would be fully grasped after several performances: it is so complex in the working of inner voices; nor are the motives with the possible exception of the chief theme, of such a salient character that they compel admiration. The second movement is beautiful in its melancholy mood, its gravity that is not austere, its emotional depth. The Finale is spirited and without any too deliberate endeavor on the part of the composer will inevitably provoke hearty applause, when it is played as spiritedly as it was played yesterday. Enesco, a singularly accomplished musician; a violinist and a pianist; as a composer has his own idiom, although he has said that the influence of Wagner and Brahms is shown in his works. This idiom is not easily grasped, any more than the idiom of Debussy, or of the Scriabin of the later years.

Mr. Bauer's devotion to the first piano concerto of Brahms is equalled only by that shown in the Micawber family on a certain memorable occasion. No, Mr. Bauer will not forsake this concerto of Johannes. He played it here 20 years ago, when he first appeared as a pianist in this country. He played it again in 1914. And he has written about it and his fondness for the granitic work. It is true that he plays it uncommonly well; one might say, better than it deserves, for it is far inferior to the second concerto, and for the most part is intolerably long drawn out and dull. The masterly performance only brought out the inherent dryness and forbidding nature of too many pages. Only in the Adagio is there a poetic breath.

A brilliant performance of Berlioz's overture, now nearly 100 years old, brought the concert to a close. How fresh it sounds today! More modern than many orchestral works composed during the last 20 years.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next week is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony in E Minor No. 1; Guy Ropartz, Divertissement (first time in America); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

The management announces that in future late-comers will be admitted during the performance of a symphony only after the first movement. The doors will be closed during the pauses between the other movements.

WHY BAUER PLAYED BRAHMS' CONCERTO

Harold Bauer had sentimental reasons for playing Brahms' D Minor Pianoforte Concerto last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He made his American debut with the same orchestra and playing the same Concerto 20 years ago, Nov. 30, 1900.

"I was extremely anxious about my debut in America," he said, "for I had gathered a high opinion about the American public and about the Boston public in particular. Moreover, I came over with but a single engagement—to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and subsequent engagements would naturally depend upon the success of that. I did not choose a more brilliant concerto, not wishing to appear too ambitious for my years before my new public. I rejected the idea of playing a Beethoven concerto, because they had been played so often before. Accordingly, I hit upon Brahms, and anxiously wrote to Mr. Gericke, then conductor of the orchestra, asking his sage counsel. From Mr. Gericke came a polite 'Yes.' Arriving in Boston, I found that the music of Brahms stirred up bitter controversy in many quarters, but I was received warmly by the critics, and about subsequent engagements there was no trouble whatsoever."

Harold Bauer, Famous as a Pianist, Has Played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra More Often Than Any of the Soloists of the Coming Season. He Was Considered an Infant Prodigy with the Violin, but on the Advice of Paderewski Devoted Himself to the Piano.

BAUER ASSISTS AT SYMPHONY

Herald Feb. 10, 1921
Masterly Performance Is
Given by Pianist at
Afternoon Concert

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK ANNOUNCED

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Montoux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Harold Bauer, pianist, assisted. The program was as follows: Enesco, Symphony in A-flat major; Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 1; Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

This concert, although it evidently gave the great audience pleasure, does not call for laborious comment. The three compositions were more or less familiar, yet it is doubtful whether the first movement of the Roumanian-Parisian symphony would be fully grasped after several performances: it is so complex in the working of inner voices; nor are the motives with the possible exception of the chief theme, of such a salient character that they compel admiration. The second movement is beautiful in its melancholy mood, its gravity that is not austere, its emotional depth. The finale is spirited and without any too deliberate endeavor on the part of the composer will inevitably provoke hearty applause, when it is played as spiritedly as it was played yesterday. Enesco, a singularly accomplished musician; a violinist and a pianist; as a composer has his own idiom, although he has said that the influence of Wagner and Brahms is shown in his works. This idiom is not easily grasped, any more than the idiom of Debussy, or of the Scriabin of the later years.

Mr. Bauer's devotion to the first piano concerto of Brahms is equalled only by that shown in the Meiwasser family on a certain memorable occasion. No, Mr. Bauer will not forsake this concerto of Johannes. He played it here 20 years ago, when he first appeared as a pianist in this country. He played it again in 1914. And he has written about it and his fondness for the granitic work. It is true that he plays it uncommonly well; one might say, better than it deserves, for it is far inferior to the second concerto, and for the most part is intolerably long drawn out and dull. The masterly performance only brought out the inherent dignity and forbidding nature of too many pages. Only in the Adagio is there a poetic breath.

A brilliant performance of Berlioz's Overture, now nearly 100 years old, brought the concert to a close. How fresh it sounds today! More modern than many orchestral works composed during the last 50 years.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next week is as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C Minor No. 1; Chopin, Repertoire; Divertissement (first time in America); Berlioz, "The Poem of Gertrude."

The management announces that in future late-comers will be admitted during the performance of a symphony only after the first movement. The doors will be closed during the pauses between the other movements.

WHY BAUER PLAYED BRAHMS' CONCERTO

Harold Bauer had sentimental reasons for playing Brahms' D Minor Piano Concerto last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He made his American debut with the same orchestra and playing the same Concerto 20 years ago, Nov. 30, 1900.

"I was extremely anxious about my debut in America," he said, "for I had gathered a high opinion about the American public and about the Boston public in particular. Moreover, I came over with but a single engagement—to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and subsequent engagements would naturally depend upon the success of that. I did not choose a more brilliant concerto, not wishing to appear too ambitious for my years before my new public. I rejected the idea of playing a Beethoven concerto, because they had been played so often before. Accordingly, I hit upon Brahms, and anxiously wrote to Mr. Gerike, then conductor of the orchestra, asking his sage counsel. From Mr. Gerike came a polite 'Yes.' Arriving in Boston, I found that the music of Brahms stirred up bitter controversy in many quarters, but I was received warmly by the critics, and about subsequent engagements there was no trouble whatsoever!"

BAUER'S ART AMAZES AT SYMPHONY

Post ——— Oct. 16, 1920
Master Pianist Plays
Brahms' D Minor
Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

The D minor concerto of Brahms is the most Scandinavian music that can be imagined. Music of northern nature and northern gods, who might thus contend on the mountain tops. This work was given a remarkable performance by Harold Bauer as pianist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The other compositions on the programme were Enesco's symphony in E-flat, an early work, of a noisy character, and Berlioz' overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini."

RUGGED AND BEAUTIFUL

It is no wonder that the audience applauded and repeatedly recalled Mr. Bauer. He has played this concerto, which is too rarely heard, before with the Boston Symphony. Doubtless his conception of the music continues to broaden and deepen with the years. Certainly this is one of the compositions which have no limit of wonder for the listener. It seems with every hearing—at least at the hands of this pianist—that the music is more rugged, dramatic and grandly beautiful.

As one of the few examples of really great and enduring art, this concerto has at once the boundless energy and the underlying vast repose of nature. Especially, be it noted again, northern nature. The first theme, stark, heroic, Scandinavian, leaps out of the orchestra with much of the shattering force, the blinding energy of the lightning flash. Theme clashes against theme. The orchestra is full of gray and storm. Yet there are other episodes entirely congruous with the composer's idea, of the most lofty and poetic beauty, as sudden marvellous vistas might be seen between the lifting of clouds or the lines of cragged peaks.

Has Right to Play It

A frightful task for a pianist! And one of the distinctions of Mr. Bauer's performance is that it never sounds that way! Strength, virtuosity, tonal loveliness go hand in hand. His sense of instrumental ensemble and his profound knowledge of his score make him one of the very few who have the right to interpret this music. Nor should Mr. Monteux's superb conducting go unmentioned. Two admirable musicians collaborated with memorable results. Thank heaven that the concerto is so hard to play, that it looks so ungrateful to the pianist anxious to make a quick, superficial success. He will leave it alone, as he should. Where this music is concerned only great artists should apply.

Enesco's Work Noisy

Enesco, the Rumanian, was 25 when he composed his symphony. To those who have ever tried to write any music for orchestra this accomplishment on the part of a young man of 25 speaks for itself. It is enormously difficult to write any symphony at all. Having said this, it is fair to add that the symphony is not particularly worth hearing. It has by no means the individuality of mood and idiom that the suite, op. 9, possesses. It is thickly, brassily orchestrated in the first and last movements, showing unmistakably the influence of Brahms, whom we greatly prefer in his undiluted state, with an occasional admixture of a modern French ninth or a bouquet of augmented chords. Most of the instruments are going all the time. There is so much counter-point, so muddily arranged, that half the time you are scratching your ear trying to find out which melody is the principal one in the tonal mass. The form of first and last movements is deadly orthodox.

The movement which remains in the memory is the second, in which, after some dark chords sprung from the underground caves of the Nibelungen, some music that is legendary and melancholy is heard—music which offers more than a foretaste of the later Enesco, a man who, when he speaks his own musical language in his own way, arrests the attention of the writer and communicates certain artistic impressions which are not communicated by any other modern composer.

SYMPHONY CONCERT Trans. ——— Oct. 16, 1920 FROM ENESCO, THROUGH BRAHMS, TO BERLIOZ

Orchestra, Conductor and, in Particular,
Mr. Bauer in the Vein — The Roumanian's Music of Native Wildness—The German's Cool Charm and Musing Voice in His First Piano-Concerto—The Parisian's Overture of the Opera House

MOST things worked together for good, and also for pleasure, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. The programme was relatively long, since it could hardly be otherwise with Brahms's piano-concerto in D minor upon it, and as further happened an uncommonly lengthy intermission. There must be contrasting pieces to this many-paged and generally exacting Concerto, if the audience is to be primed before it and soothed after it. Mr. Monteux chose Enesco's symphony in E-flat, unheard at Symphony Hall through five years, and a "standard" overture, Berlioz's to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini." Both invite the conductor's familiar abilities and accord with the present progress of his refilled orchestra. "To a resolute intellectual scrutiny," as Mr. Shaw used to say, when he felt the oats of his own superiority, the symphony may not yield too much. Yet it "sounds"; the first and the last divisions move ardently, vigorously at moments tumultuously; while the slow section between is surcharged with a melancholy hungry for expression. Enesco can ply rhythm, lay on color, sharpen contrast, intensify mood. So also can Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with him. The composer likes to fling about sonorous, largely hewn masses of tone, to upbuild broad climaxes, to proceed in sharp transitions. So also does the conductor; while the band, as it now is, readily answers to both. Sombrely moves the slow division and all concerned readily sustain its quality. Of kin in time and degree is Berlioz's overture.

Displayful passages for single instruments or groups of instruments recur, and our orchestra does not lack adept and alert virtuosi. The music moves impetuously, abruptly or else halts the while for orotund song. All is motion, color, sharp effect and broad impression. Mr. Monteux, in and out of the opera house, excels in such music and is bringing his orchestra to like excellence—the more quickly, the more easily, for the new concert-master's obvious zest for both. Already it is possible to discover Mr. Bergin's incisive bowing, broad phrasing, quick sense of rhythm and generally communicating energy stimulating the string choir.

Brahms's concerto is, of course, music of another voice. In the progress of it sensitive ears readily discovered the lack of middle tints in the orchestra's present shading, of middle force in its present gamut of power, of fine modulations, gradients, euphonies, of the golden glow that is halo upon orchestral tone and that even Brahms, once called the muddy in such things, often hears in imagination and forthwith summons. But these are the virtues of a band at summit of perfections and not in eager and loyal advance toward them. Let them come, as time and tide bring them. Besides, there were compensations. Mr. Monteux, being intelligent over every sort of music, abides by the precedent set by Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck with Brahms—the tradition—since it has now become such—of pre-voiced, mettlesome, keenly rhythmed and warmly colored performance. The four horn-players, moreover, had only to meet once more Brahms's imagination for their instruments with their own sensibility.

There was also Mr. Bauer—in his own particular dominion, so to say, when a piano-concerto of Brahms is to be played. Be it the first, as it was yesterday, or the second, as it was nearly five years ago, there is no pianist now traversing "these concertos" to match him in such music save only Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Bauer has the perceiving mind and the revealing hand. Thereby he opens the design of Brahms, and the clearer when it is abstruse or intricate. Mr. Bauer has the divining mind and the communicating touch. Thereby he enters into Brahms's musical thought and poetizing moods and imparts them, feelingly to hearers. The pianist possesses the selective faculty and the discriminating finger. Therefore, he does not play the long concerto as though every measure in it were of equal worth and impression. He is unemphatic with tonal paragraphs that Brahms himself knew were only filling; he does not labor over measures that cannot and will not "sound." For this concerto in D minor dates from no more than the twenty-seventh year of the composer's young age.

Finally, Mr. Bauer is sensitive and secure master of the voice of the piano. He never forces it; he never turns it mechanical; always, unless a composer absolutely defeats him, he keeps it musical and individual. His touch can traverse all the gradation of tone; his imagination ranges over the whole palette of color. Neither exposition nor song, neither play of figures nor play of ornament, baffles him. Incandescent he seldom is; but this concerto of Brahms does not exact that quality; while always he is luminous. He knows out of himself the passion that is quite as much of the mind as of the heart; he can transmit and enhance it—and this is the passion of Brahms in the piano-concertos. With reason, conductor, orchestra and audience rose to such a pianist, so achieving no mean task.

So much for record of performance that largely or finely touched the music in hand. Yet that music, even when it was as familiar as Berlioz's overture, kept intrinsic interest as well. Professionally "thoughtful people"—a priggish and pestilent brood—do not set much store by Enesco's resounding symphony. They say, with reason, that the music lacks large and firmly knit substance; that it neither scales heights nor plumbs depths of reflection and emotion; that it is prone to substitute power for passion; that it less advances, intensifies, cumulates musical thought, feeling and design than threshes about from key to key, rhythm to rhythm, color to color, mood to mood. It is not necessary to deny those reproaches, which in the main seem sound, in order to enjoy what Enesco manifestly accomplishes. Before this symphony, indeed, better is it for the listener to be unregenerate and pleased than pedantic and free.

Agreed that there are measures in the first movement wherein Enesco seems to be groping for the next turn of the musical way; wherein his tonal fabric not only sags, but also falls apart. None the less, it is easily possible to enjoy the rhythmic verve, the sonorous voice, the rich color, the restless progress of the music. As often in Enesco composing, native wildness is in it, a pulse of race not so long ago frankly barbaric—the inspiring, the illudg quality that, for the life of him, neither the reflective Brahms nor the imaginative Debussy—for convenient examples—could summon. There is bound to be too little of it in music of a twentieth century—unless, like Enesco's, it is written to a background of Roumanian hills, or, like Sibelius's in an environment of Finnish forest.

Recall—since it first seizes the ear and then lingers in the memory—the motif of the horns, pervading, indeed maintaining, Enesco's slow division. The exotic tang, the tang of that Balkan Europe that is a welter of races still wild at heart and in imagination, clearly savors it. Melancholy drenches it, a melancholy that soon deepens into intense longing, as though all the home-sickness in the world burrowed within it—the malady of the imagination, as their music and poetry seems to say, that most besets these races, at once restless and cribbed. It can still seize Enesco's spirit, though his body be remote in Paris, and intensify this slow song with sombre fires. Enesco lavishes harmonic and instrumental color upon the music. They deepen atmosphere and illusion.

Of a piece with the rest of the symphony is the rhapsodic finale. For the most part, a Czech, a Roumanian, a Hungarian, writing music of large design and dimension, must rhapsodize or founder. Because Enesco is Enesco, he must set his strings whirling and racing, catch up and fling about motifs and fragments of motifs from the rest of the music, recall those, three, notes of the sorrowing horns; then smother them in loud fanfares; and leap on, shout on, from sonority to sonority. There is, or there ought to be, a barbaric streak in each of us, under the veneers of civilization and cultivation. Enesco's music in this symphony, as in many another of his pieces, sets it throbbing.

And the foil to Enesco—to reverse the process suggested at the beginning of this review—is the Brahms of the concerto in D minor. Once more was Mr. Monteux astute, even imaginative, programme-maker. Brahms has his fervors no less than Enesco—in the entrance and proclamation, for example, of the second motif in the "majestical" movement, in not a little of its progress through the music. Yet they are grave fervors, more reticent than Enesco's more concentrated, maybe running deeper. The voice of mourning rises out of Brahms's slow division, as the voice of melancholy unfolds from Enesco's. The Roumanian of our day is more poignant than the German of the middle years of the last century; but not for him is the gaining of the note of exaltation that stirs out of the music of Brahms, though he be no more than at the end of his twenties. Brahms laments by himself with an accent of nobility in his tones; Enesco, as an Irishman might say, "keens" so that all ears may hear. Enesco's finale rhapsodizes; Brahms's—because such a temperament as his cannot help it—takes thought even of lively spirits.

As with the matter, so with the manner of the two pieces—and with due allowance for the difference in end and task. Where Enesco must strike fire, Brahms is content with cool charm, as with many a purling passage for the piano or well-fused euphony between it and the orchestra. There are lovely details in this concerto when Mr. Bauer plays it. Enesco, when Mr. Monteux seconds his energies, prefers the broad or the sharp stroke. If Enesco, as at moments in his first division, is groping and inconsequential, Brahms can match him with arid spots even when he would be "majestical." Yet when Brahms at last flows and sometimes for long, how warm and deep, how serene and secure is the current of even this youthful, this obviously studied, music! Therein, though in young work and young years, is the sign of the master to ripen and endure. Enesco, in the symphony, set alight in many of us, a smouldering native wildness. Brahms brushed it away, stirring minds, at moments even sinking (and also singing) into hearts. There is heat in white fires as well as in red.

Foil again in Berlioz's overture. The opera that it preluded, "Benvenuto Cellini," has been seldom enough staged—nowhere for long, indeed, except under Mottl at Carlsruhe and Munch. But hardly are we hearers past the first rhetorical pause and into the crotund measures of the Cardinal than straightway we are in the theatre. Enesco's Roumanian wilds vanish; far away is the meditative seclusion of Brahms. Hold for the rushes of the Rouman folk—and their fitful moods—up and down the music. Hold for the fanciful tune of the mimes, of the brave, warm melody of Cellini taking thought of his mistress. Hold for Berlioz, splashing this way and that in all sorts of romantic excitements; yet somehow finding the exact timbre, rhythm, modulation, color, to speed everything home to us listeners. Even "the mere opera-goer" much chastised, yet ever resilient figure, would rejoice in the songful tumult, the endless ardors of this overture, though the rest of "Benvenuto Cellini" might bore him off to the nearest "Palais de Danse." . . . Yes: there was good sport, if the phrase may be forgiven of Brahms, at the Symphony Concert yesterday.

H. T. PARKER

Concerts in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert took place on October 15. The following was the program: Enesco...Symphony in E flat major, op. 13
Brahms...Concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in D minor, op. 15
Berlioz...Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" op. 23

Harold Bauer was the pianist.

Enesco's symphony has been played in Boston, but once previously. The impression created at that performance was confirmed. It is undoubtedly worthy of a place beside the greatest of modern works of this character. The technical skill displayed in its construction and the logical development of the thematic material are remarkable; yet all this learning serves only as a medium for expressing the deep poetic content of the work. The slow movement, particularly, is full of original melodic and harmonic ideas and there are many touches of skillful orchestral coloring. The first and last movements, the latter being the most difficult to understand of the three, are brilliant and exuberant. The symphony deserves more frequent

Mr. HAROLD BAUER was born at London, April 28, 1873. (His father was German by birth, his mother English.) He began his career as a violinist, a pupil of Pollitzer, who formed him in many ways. He played in public when he was nine years old, and for several years he gave concerts with his sisters, Ethel, a pianist, and Winifred, a violinist. The Musical Times reviewed a concert given April 17, 1888, and spoke of him as an "efficient pianist; but his ability chiefly displays itself on the violin." In 1892 he decided to be a pianist, and as such he is almost wholly self-taught; for the lessons from Paderewski were few, and Mr. Bauer does not call himself Paderewski's pupil. In 1893 Mr. Bauer made his debut as a pianist in Paris, which he calls his home. He journeyed through Russia with the singer Nikita. He has given recitals in Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, Austria, Sweden, Brazil, and other countries of South America, and in Australia; chamber concerts in Europe and America, and he has played with many orchestras.

knows out of himself the passion that is quite as much of the mind as of the heart; he can transmit and enhance it—and this is the passion of Brahms in the piano-concertos. With reason conductor, orchestra and audience rose to such a pianist, so achieving no mean task.

So much for record of performance that largely or finely touched the music in hand. Yet that music, even when it was as familiar as Berlioz's overture, kept intrinsic interest as well. Professionally "thoughtful people"—a priggish and pestilent brood—do not set much store by Enesco's resounding symphony. They say, with reason, that the music lacks large and firmly knitted substance; that it neither scales heights nor plumbs depths of reflection and emotion; that it is prone to substitute power for passion; that it less advances, intensifies, cumulates musical thought, feeling and design than threshes about from key to key, rhythm to rhythm, color to color, mood to mood. It is not necessary to deny those reproaches, which in the main seem sound, in order to enjoy what Enesco manifestly accomplishes. Before this symphony, indeed, better is it for the listener to be unregenerate and pleased than pedantic and free.

Agreed that there are measures in the first movement wherein Enesco seems to be groping for the next turn of the musical way; wherein his tonal fabric not only sags, but also falls apart. None the less, it is easily possible to enjoy the rhythmic verve, the sonorous voice, the rich color, the restless progress of the music. As often in Enesco composing, native wildness is in it, a pulse of race not so long ago frankly barbaric—the inspiring, the illudng quality that, for the life of him, neither the reflective Brahms nor the imaginative Debussy—for convenient examples—could summon. There is bound to be too little of it in music of a twentieth century—unless, like Enesco's, it is written to a background of Roumanian hills, or, like Sibelius's in an environment of Finnish forest.

Recall—since it first seizes the ear and then lingers in the memory—the motif of the horns, pervading, indeed maintaining, Enesco's slow division. The exotic tang, the tang of that Balkan Europe that is a welter of races still wild at heart and in imagination, clearly savors it. Melancholy drenches it, a melancholy that soon deepens into intense longing, as though all the home-sickness in the world burrowed within it—the malady of the imagination, as their music and poetry seems to say, that most besets these races, at once restless and cribbed. It can still seize Enesco's spirit, though his body be remote in Paris, and intensify this slow song with sombre fires. Enesco lavishes harmonic and instrumental color upon the music. They deepen atmosphere and illusion.

Of a piece with the rest of the symphony is the rhapsodic finale. For the most part, a Czech, a Roumanian, a Hungarian, writing music of large design and dimension, must rhapsodize or founder. Because Enesco is Enesco, he must set his strings whirling and racing, catch up and fling about motive and fragments of motive from the rest of the music, recall those, three, notes of the sorrowing horns; then smother them in loud fanfares; and leap on, shout on, from sonority to sonority. There is, or there ought to be, a barbaric streak in each of us, under the veneers of civilization and cultivation. Enesco's music in this symphony, as in many another of his pieces, sets it throbbing.

And the foil to Enesco—to reverse the process suggested at the beginning of this review—is the Brahms of the concerto in D minor. Once more was Mr. Monteux astute, even imaginative, programme-maker. Brahms has his fervors no less than Enesco—in the entrance and proclamation, for example, of the second motive in the "majestical" movement, in not a little of its progress through the music. Yet they are grave fervors, more reticent than Enesco's more concentrated, maybe running deeper. The voice of mourning rises out of Brahms's slow division, as the voice of melancholy unfolds from Enesco's. The Roumanian of our day is more poignant than the German of the middle years of the last century; but not for him is the gaining of the note of exaltation that stirs out of the music of Brahms, though he be no more than at the end of his twenties. Brahms laments by himself with an accent of nobility in his tones; Enesco, as an Irishman might say, "keens" so that all ears may hear. Enesco's finale rhapsodizes; Brahms's—because such a temperament as his cannot help it—takes thought even of lively spirits.

As with the matter, so with the manner of the two pieces—and with due allowance for the difference in end and task. Where Enesco must strike fire, Brahms is content with cool charm, as with many a purling passage for the piano or well-fused euphony between it and the orchestra. There are lovely details in this concerto when Mr. Bauer plays it. Enesco, when Mr. Monteux seconds his energies, prefers the broad or the sharp stroke. If Enesco, as at moments in his first division, is groping and inconsequential, Brahms can match him with arid spots even when he would be "majestical." Yet when Brahms at last flows and sometimes for long, how warm and deep, how serene and secure is the current of even this youthful, this obviously studied, music! Therein, though in young work and young years, is the sign of the master to ripen and endure. Enesco, in the symphony, set alight in many of us, a smouldering native wildness. Brahms brushed it away, stirring minds, at moments even sinking (and also singing) into hearts. There is heat in white fires as well as in red.

Foil again in Berlioz's overture. The opera that it preluded, "Benvenuto Cellini," has been seldom enough staged—nowhere for long, indeed, except under Mottl at Karlsruhe and Munich. But hardly are we hearers past the first rhetorical pause and into the cotund measures of the Cardinal than straightway we are in the theatre. Enesco's Roumanian wilds vanish; far away is the meditative seclusion of Brahms. Hold! for the rushes of the Rouman folk—and their fitful moods—up and down the music. Hold! for the fanciful tune of the mimes, of the brave, warm melody of Cellini taking thought of his mistress. Hold! for Berlioz, splashing this way and that in all sorts of romantic excitements; yet somehow finding the exact timbre, rhythm, modulation, color, to speed everything home to us listeners. Even "the mere opera-goer" much chastised, yet ever resilient figure, would rejoice in the songful tumult, the endless ardors of this overture, though the rest of "Benvenuto Cellini" might bore him off to the nearest "Palais de Danse." . . . Yes: there was good sport, if the phrase may be forgiven of Brahms, at the Symphony Concert yesterday.

H. T. PARKER

Concerts in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert took place on October 15. The following was the program:

Enesco...Symphony in E flat major, op. 13

Brahms...Concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in D minor, op. 15

Berlioz...Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" op. 23

Harold Bauer was the pianist.

Enesco's symphony has been played in Boston, but once previously. The impression created at that performance was confirmed. It is undoubtedly worthy of a place beside the greatest of modern works of this character. The technical skill displayed in its construction and the logical development of the thematic material are remarkable; yet all this learning serves only as a medium for expressing the deep poetic content of the work. The slow movement, particularly, is full of original melodic and harmonic ideas and there are many touches of skillful orchestral coloring. The first and last movements, the latter being the most difficult to understand of the three, are brilliant and exuberant. The symphony deserves more frequent hearing, as it is one of those works whose beauties are not readily grasped. Beside the warm colors of the symphony and Berlioz's overture the Brahms concerto (dare we say it?) seemed dull. All of Mr. Bauer's varied pianistic art, of which he gave freely, failed to make it interesting. The orchestra played with beauty of tone and phrasing, the occasional defects noticeable in last week's concert having been eliminated.

ist:

BAUER

ten minutes after the Symphony

alin Pianoforte

50

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 22, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, AT 8 P. M.

SIBELIUS.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in E minor. op. 39

I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico

II. Andante ma non troppo lento

III. Allegro

IV. Finale (Quasi una Fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto

ROPARTZ,

DIVERTISSEMENT for Orchestra

(First time in America)

SCRIABIN.

"LE POÈME DE L'EXTASE" ("The Poem of Ecstasy") op. 54

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

3D SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Work by Sibelius Filled with Melancholy of Rugged Nature

BRILLIANT PLAYING
STIRS ENTHUSIASM

Herald — Oct. 23, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony, No. 1; Ropartz, Divertissement (first time in America); Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy.

Any one who did not meet Sibelius when he was in this country, judging his character from his music, might think him an austere, reserved, rather forbidding person, rejoicing only on a dreary moor, baring his breast to the storm, towering proudly in loneliness. He is not a bit Byronic, nor is he a lover of solitude; he is genial, if not gregarious, interested in human affairs; at the same time one recognizes his sturdy personality.

Those rhapsodizing over his music, attribute its characteristics to the natural scenery of his native land, and the dreariness of a Finnish winter, but the travelers have told us that Finland is by no means so desolate a country as the fireside and library tourists would have us believe. Neither a country nor a composer's mood at the time of composition inevitably affects his whole work. In the dead of a northern winter he may put southern Italy into glowing tones; sick at heart, he may write vivacious strains. Many instances of these contrasts in the history of music might be cited. Nevertheless the "milieu" of a composer may well affect him in a measure. Unfortunately there has been no Sainte-Beuve to examine into the development of this or that composer, and there are many that dispute the theory of Buckle concerning climatic influence.

No doubt Sibelius has submitted to the spell of sagas and legends. Their romantic nature would appeal to him. He has found inspiration in the "Kalevala," in the folk-music of Suomi. It has been said that this folk-music has been "penetrated with melancholy" from the earliest times; but the folk-music of other lands has often been melodically sad, minor in mode or key, when the words were gay; while the most solemn, the most mournful of funeral marches, the Dead March in "Saul," is in the traditionally exultant key of C major.

This symphony of Sibelius, played yesterday for the fifth time, is superbly melancholy; the melancholy is that of a strong and rugged nature; there is no trace of Brahms's pessimism; there is no shrieking hysterically against Fate as there is in the music of Tschaiakowsky. (Some one should write "On Austerity in Music." Gluck's is classically Grecian; D'Indy's is remote but noble; the austerity of Delius is inclined to be dry; that of Brahms is too often crabbed.) Then, too, there is a wildness akin to savagery in the symphony that is pleasing. There is something elemental in the work; savage but not barbaric; elemental but not crude. One realizes that Sibelius was terribly in earnest; but this earnestness was well controlled. And as true virility includes tenderness; as the strong man may also be a dreamer of dreams and see visions, so in this symphony there are pages of peculiar beauty, unalloyed with sensuousness.

Scriabin, too, is a modern, with an idiom of his own. If his poem is the expression of ecstasy, we prefer moderate rapture, or even indigo bloom. He may in his last years have been a deep thinker, a philosopher, with ideas derived from Pantheism and Theosophy; in this "Poem of Ecstasy," for which he wrote a poem in swollen verse, we find little music. There is constant endeavor, tortured straining to say something, and when the thoughts finally come to life as by the Caesarian operation, they seem withered, stunted, crippled. To us this music is nerve-rasping, ear-stabbing, impotent. As Charles Lamb found books that are not books, so there are musical compositions that are not music.

The Divertissement of Ropartz is an ingenious treatment of a lively theme, agreeable but not important, answering the requirement of an old Greek: that music should inspire a gentlemanlike joy. The Divertissement is musically sound and aesthetically pleasant.

The playing of the orchestra was brilliant. The symphony and performance of it made a profound impression. Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically recalled more than once. He had evidently taken great pains in the preparation of Scriabin's "Poem" and the results were evident. It is necessary to hear occasionally the orchestral works of this composer, for there are some, besides an English Doctor of Music, who already rank him among the immortals.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4; Hill, Poem "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after Poe)—first performance; Beethoven, "Leonora" overture No. 3. Mme. Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria "In-felice!" and Tatiana's Letter scene from Tschaiakowsky's "Eugene Onegin."

SENSUAL MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy" Superbly
Played

Post ——— Oct. 23, 1920
BY OLIN DOWNES

Orchestral music of uncommon interest made the programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, the first symphony of Sibelius, a new divertissement for orchestra, played for the first time in America, by Guy Ropartz, and Scriabine's "Poem de l'Extase."

DISPLAY OF VIRTUOSITY

The performances were of extraordinary brilliancy. Never has the orchestra played so well so early in the season. It was not only Mr. Mager, player of the difficult first trumpet part in Scriabine's work, who distinguished himself during that performance. It was every section and every solo player of the organization. There had been no such interpretation of Scriabine's music here, though it was conducted both by Mr. Fiedler in 1910 and Dr. Muck in 1917. The music had never been so clear, nor had its passionate and rhapsodical career been so fortunately conveyed.

Some do not like this "Poeme de l'Extase" at all. Others, and the writer among them, listen to it with keen interest, but strong reservations. Others are wildly enthusiastic. Everyone was stirred by the performance yesterday. The music?

Written by Master

It is a composition which will not down. One thing is now clearly understood, thanks largely to Mr. Monteux's reading, as well as to increased familiarity with the work—it is made with a master hand, not formally according to so-called "classic" standards, but with an extremely definite concept in the composer's mind, with a clearly perceived and irresistibly approached climax, which is one of the most brilliant in modern orchestral music. Whether you like it is another thing. But this is music of extraordinary workmanship and of a tonal physiognomy, so to speak, which, once heard, is not readily dismissed from the mind or forgotten.

The poetic programme of the work has roughly three divisions outlined by the composer in a long and strange poem. (a) "His (the composer's) soul in the orgy of love." (b) "The realization of a fantastic dream." (c) "The glory of his own art." This programme finds a musical prototype in a long, very gradual, masterly progress from a soft opening to the final outburst, most effectively planned and fulfilled.

Amazingly Orchestrated

No one can question the composer's sincerity. You do not strike out a new idiom like this unless there is a driving sincerity, an uncompromising determination to discover a new path, back of your pen. There is unquestioned originality of invention, themes that are like no other men's themes, that are labelled "Scriabine" in letters for those who run to read. Perhaps there is derivation from Chopin, but one's impression is essentially that of a completely new, confident voice. And there is the amazing orchestration which drips color.

But the things which determine an individual's opinion of an important work of art are after all less facts than matters of personal temperament and disposition. Each of us knows of certain composers of whom he says: "It may be fine, but I don't like his tunes." We do not like the tunes of this "Poeme de l'Extase," ready as we are to pay tribute to their unusual curve, their frequent harmonic pungency and their wonderful adaptability to the poetic purpose. And we do not like the spirit of the music.

Erotic and Sensual

The music is erotic and sensual. True, sensuality in greater or lesser degree is inherent in art. In this place we are personally repulsed by it, and we understand for the first time the ire of revered seniors of criticism at whom we used to wonder when they exclaimed passionately against the lewdness of a Strauss or even a Berlioz. They meant it. They abhorred their music so intensely that they were willing to fight it all their lives. Are we getting old? We don't like these tunes; we sicken of the languorousness, the hot-house intensity of this music, and we are repelled by its general flambuoyancy.

Perhaps it seemed wilder and more lurid because of the dry-as-dust "Divertissement" of Ropartz which preceded. This may have been "divertissement" for scholar and technician like Ropartz, in its incessant juggling with a particle of tune. For most of us it was a deadly bore, an emptiness exposed the more forcibly by the other virile compositions.

Sibelius' Symphony

The Sibelius symphony—a composer who stands lonely and incomparable today, whom no one can imitate, whose works reflect in the most grand, sombre and dramatic manner northern nature, northern rebellion against sullen skies and fate; a symphony of the elements, a defiance of this puny age by a Northman reborn to his people. This work was applauded until the orchestra rose to its feet with the conductor. There was even greater enthusiasm for the music of Scriabine.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. ——— Oct. 23, 1920
SIBELIUS, SKRIABIN AND A BAND
RENEWED

An Afternoon of Tonal Power, Splendor and Finesse, of Large or Fine Excitements—From Both Composers Music Like None Other in Our Time—Ropartz for Middle Piece and Point of Repose—Conductor and Orchestra

THE first two Symphony Concerts of the autumn were interesting, gave pleasure. The third, yesterday afternoon, rose to splendor of impression, evoked ardor of response. Few latecomers disturbed the progress of Sibelius's first symphony; scarcely a listener departed before the last note of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" had sounded. The symphony, long admired but unheard through four years, held the audience tense, until applause, doubled and redoubled, for music, conductor and, finally, the orchestra, relaxed that tension. The tone-poem similarly engrossed and illuded those that heard; the sensitive auditor, indeed, could feel his fellows thrill to the manifold and penetrating progress of the music. In turn and kind, the contrasting middle piece —Ropartz's ingenious and amusing "Divertissement," played for the first time in America—agreeably engaged ear and fancy. Above the stage, up and down the auditorium, the atmosphere was electric—even on a Friday afternoon in Boston. The orchestra struck communicating fire, and in the heats of it added new virtues to old. Not only did it play with familiar richness and power of tone, with large sweep and impinging emphasis and contrast. It played also—and for the first time as re-filled band—with quick, fine impulse to modulation, gradient, transition; with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs. In measures within the "Divertissement"—music, often, of suave, pliant elegance—it regained feeling for euphony, ear and hand for shimmering tone—not the least of its ancient glories. Once more, in this piece by Ropartz, came the phrasing among the strings and the wood-winds that in time past was like the human voice in song.

The beginning of Sibelius's symphony advance in that nervous, plastic, cumulating progress which is spur to ear and imagination. Skriabin's tone-poem moved in the endless quiver of sensibility, the incessant darting of white fire, until it coalesced in surge of ecstatic climax, that are the passion of the music. Out of it as well sprang the incisive harmonies or rose the ethereal phrases that are Skriabin's ardors of sensation and expression for once fulfilled in tone. Yet the fitful reverberations, the restless rhythms, the long range of Sibelius's symphony lay equally within this imparting power—the darksome and storming Allegro, the pale and penetrating Andante, the clumping Scherzo, the plunging, screaming Finale. The composer himself could hardly have heard in imagination a sharper edge upon the violins, a larger vigor in the basses, a voice more wan and piercing in oboes and clarinets, a richer sonority in the horns, a more ominous or frenetic drum-beat.

So did the orchestra, severally and collectively distinguish itself. With such zest, imagination and scope of characterizing power did the conductor enter into the music of the day. These three weeks Mr. Monteux has been making ready his new band; yesterday it emerged in the quality to which at last he has brought it and which he bids fair further to enrich. Outside Beethoven's Eighth Symphony he has not failed in duty to the pieces before him. Yesterday, however, the chosen numbers stirred him as—with the orchestra—he made them stir his hearers. If New York two weeks hence is to know the Boston Orchestra of 1920 as it really is, it should hear it in Sibelius, Skriabin, Ropartz.

Yet the chief glory of the concert remained with the composers; since it was they who imagined and fashioned the music so conveyed and enhanced. No doubt this first symphony in E minor is early Sibelius in quality as in date. In many a measure, at many a turn, it no more than anticipates the unique voice, the stark and seething power that the second symphony fulfils; while both are far from the tonal speech, yet more stripped and poignant, of the fourth symphony and of the little known fifth of which Mr. Burgin tells. Yet this music twenty years old though it be, is of Sibelius and no other. It teems with his characteristic procedures—the sharpened strings, the penetrating and hollowed wind-choir, the clangorous brass, rolling drums and clashing cymbals. Now the harmonies are acrid, again pungent. The rhythms shift and shift and shift again. Fitful and keen are the modulations. The climaxes suddenly surge and as suddenly shatter. The motifs generating the music are naked, sinewy. Sometimes they are bleak; again they are pale; yet once more, they rumble or shriek. They contend in wild chromatic tumults—hear the first Allegro or the Finale of this symphony in E minor. They eat cut their hearts in song—listen to the measures of the clarinet in the preluding, to the melodies that haunt the Andante. From the first measure of the symphony to the last, stern and firmly set is the design of the whole; exact and unsparing are the means.

Has composer of our time, even Debussy himself, written a more personal music? Yet it is more than personal. The tempests that toss the first and the last division are fierce winds of the north. The shrieking dissonances, the transitions that shudder and bite, sound also in these northern gales; while through them, perchance, out of old legend clang the Vikings smiting shield with sword. The storm stills; rifts cleave the black heavens, and pale and pungent and melancholy sounds the song of the Andante—the pathos of distance, restless still. The skies brighten; the folk come forth, sport rudely, heavily, while aloof the brooding bystander softens into day-dream. A musician's music, a poet's music, music of a race, a region, of a north that cries, stings and with scornful gesture flings away the soft-coated, mealy mouthed south—of such is this symphony of Sibelius. He who does not thrill to it is sunk chin-deep in that supine mildness, that dead inertia, which is worse than trespasses and sins.

As unique in kind and impression though less sustained in quality is Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." It follows "The Divine Poem," music of exploration and liberation. It precedes "The Poem of Fire" ("Prometheus"), music of freedom gained for imagination and powers mastered for expression. As it was natural for Skriabin in his earlier piano-pieces to walk in the ways of Chopin, so equally in this middle tone-poem does he still use at need Lisztian harmonies and timbres; invoke Wagnerian sequences, modulations, climax; up pile final diatonic sonorities like a Russian Strauss. Enough and more than enough remains of Skriabin and of him alone—not merely in occasional chords foreshadowing the mystical note he was so to weave into his later music; or in new harmonies ethereal, iridescent; or in phrases gleaming upon the ear, dissolving into the air. These are indeed of Skriabin, the unmistakable genius of the later Sonatas, Preludes and Studies and there best to be heard and felt.

More characteristic is "The Poem of Ecstasy" in the supersensibility, the ardor of expression, the half-sensuous, half-spiritual longing and elation that together glow out of the music. There is hardly a mind, a temperament, an imagination or a voice among the composers of our time—let us not lose our way and our heads among the classics—so sensitive as Skriabin's. He quivers to the faintest, he vibrates to the deepest, tremor of sensation or vision, of desire, delight, despair. When he writes this music of sensibility, be it for orchestra or piano, it is as though his was a spirit of air and fire. The air pulses to the lightest beat, the fire glows white and lambent. Of such are the measures of eager longing, of palpitating ascent into ecstasy with which his poem begins and mounts. Of such are the phrases upon which his music at fullest climax of a sudden opens, as though for the instant his spirit knew in ineffable beatitude.

There, and much more than in sweeping and sundered climax, does Skriabin fulfill his passion for expression. As an inner glow quickens his sensibility, so an inner force renews his expressive ardors. Driven by them he would have his music palpitate in radiance upon the air. Divided by them, he now courts simplicity, again complicates complexity. The ardors spur, and he flings the orchestra into surging climax. The ardors pierce, and measures of a felicity for which there is no word entrance the ear, enkindle the rarest of voluptuous or spiritual sensations. Of this two-fold voice and substance, desire and fulfillment, is this "Poem of Ecstasy." Hear it, if the listener choose, as music sopped in sensuous longings, and sensuous fulfillment, music, almost, of sensuous delirium. Hear it, again, as music drenched in spiritual aspiration, ardor, ecstasy. (The psychologists have often proved the kinship of such transports.) Whichever it be, or both unconsciously mingled, "The Poem of Ecstasy" remains music throbbing with a sensibility that is close to pain, devoured by a passion that is consuming fire. Except in "The Divine Poem" and in the "Prometheus" of Skriabin himself there is no music that these days know like to it.

Between Sibelius of the symphony and Skriabin of the poem, Ropartz of the "Divertissement" was as point of rest and soothing. Two motifs breed the music. One outflows in gentle musing charm—light French melancholy and light French handling adroitly blended. The other soon sings in livelier, warmer measures—Gallic animation of mood plus Gallic brightness of speech. Fancifully, as the "Divertissement" proceeds, Monsieur Ropartz draws his measures from the one, the other or both motifs. Fancifully, aptly, elegantly he devises arabesque and figure, touches in harmonic or instrumental color, pliques or pleases, smiles gayly or opens pensive eyes. Of old "Divertissements"—or "Divertimenti" as the Italianate eighteenth century oftener called them—graced and amused the salons of princes. Nowadays, as Monsieur Ropartz has amply proved, they may do like office in more democratic concert-halls. To fancy, elegance, the golden mean in the lighter arts, there is no way like the French way.

H. T. PARKER

Portrait bust of the late HENRY L. HIGGINSON

By Bela Pratt

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

C.S. Monitor Oct. 23. 1920

For its third program of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the afternoon of October 22, played Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 in E minor, op. 39; Ropartz's "Divertissement for Orchestra," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," op. 54. Pierre Monteux proved during the lengthy, intricate and highly varied course of the Sibelius symphony that he has his forces well in hand, firm and elastic in response to the slightest shading of his brilliant readings. The pleasure of the audience in the exquisite rendering of the second movement of the symphony was especially marked. In the allegro Mr. Monteux reveled in the hearty mocking humor, and brought the movement to an end with a huddling of pace that was like a fat boy trying to run faster than he possibly could and ending by tumbling down in a sudden inglorious sprawl. The finale, possibly, might have had a greater dignity, but one could not cease to remark the variety of Mr. Monteux's handling of the parts. The Ropartz divertissement had a most lyric and well-prepared performance, with every detail and mass form brought out clearly in a way that could be called inimitable at all times. There is something refreshingly in the prodigious Scriabin tosses forth original thoughts, giving little his themes here and there out of the multitudinous tonal sea, tidbits to the intelligence instead of long, tedious phrases that some composers often repeat tediously. Impassioned of life and nature, unbound by tidy little formulas, but with firm logic all Scriabin's own music seems this music in effect. And it does not depend for its trusting effects upon anything but the consummate handling of its details, which appeared to take it in a fashion than he had done with his pieces, as if he had turned the manuscript lyrics to the wing and soar of blank verse.

Yet the chief glory of the concert remained with the composers; since it was they who imagined and fashioned the music so conveyed and enhanced. No doubt this first symphony in E minor is early Sibelius in quality as in date. In many a measure, at many a turn, it no more than anticipates the unique voice, the stark and seething power that the second symphony fulfils; while both are far from the tonal speech, yet more stripped and poignant, of the fourth symphony and of the little known fifth of which Mr. Burgin tells. Yet this music twenty years old though it be, is of Sibelius and no other. It teems with his characteristic procedures—the sharpened strings, the penetrating and hollowed wind-choir, the clangorous brass, rolling drums and clashing cymbals. Now the harmonies are acrid, again pungent. The rhythms shift and shift and shift again. Fitting and keen are the modulations. The climaxes suddenly surge and as suddenly shatter. The motifs generating the music are naked, sinewy. Sometimes they are bleak; again they are pale; yet once more, they rumble or shriek. They contend in wild chromatic tumults—hear the first Allegro or the Finale of this symphony in E minor. They eat cut their hearts in song—listen to the measures of the clarinet in the prelude, to the melodies that haunt the Andante. From the first measure of the symphony to the last, stern and firmly set is the design of the whole; exact and unsparing are the means.

Has composer of our time, even Debussy himself, written a more personal music? Yet it is more than personal. The tempests that toss the first and the last division are fierce winds of the north. The shrieking dissonances, the transitions that shudder and bite, sound also in these northern gales; while through them, perchance, out of old legend clang the Vikings smiting shield with sword. The storm stills; rifts cleave the black heavens, and pale and pungent and melancholy sounds the song of the Andante—the pathos of distance, restless still. The skies brighten; the folk come forth, sport rudely, heavily, while aloof the brooding bystander softens into day-dream. A musician's music, a poet's music, music of a race, a region, of a north that cries, stings and with scornful gesture flings away the soft-coated, mealy mouthed south—of such is this symphony of Sibelius. He who does not thrill to it is sunk chin-deep in that supine mildness, that dead inertia, which is worse than trespasses and sins.

As unique in kind and impression though less sustained in quality is Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." It follows "The Divine Poem," music of exploration and liberation. It precedes "The Poem of Fire" ("Prometheus"), music of freedom gained for imagination and powers mastered for expression. As it was natural for Scriabin in his earlier piano-pieces to walk in the ways of Chopin, so, equally in this middle tone-poem does he still use at need Lisztian harmonies and timbres; invoke Wagnerian sequences, modulations, climax; up pile final diatonic sonorities like a Russian Strauss. Enough and more than enough remains of Scriabin and of him alone—not merely in occasional chords foreshadowing the mystical note he was so to weave into his later music; or in new harmonies ethereal, iridescent; or in phrases gleaming upon the ear, dissolving into the air. These are indeed of Scriabin, the unmistakable genius of the later Sonatas, Preludes and Studies and there best to be heard and felt.

More characteristic is "The Poem of Ecstasy" in the supersensibility, the ardor of expression, the half-sensuous, half-spiritual longing and elation that together glow out of the music. There is hardly a mind, a temperament, an imagination or a voice among the composers of our time—let us not lose our way and our heads among the classics—so sensitive as Scriabin's. He quivers to the faintest, he vibrates to the deepest, tremor of sensation or vision, of desire, delight, despair. When he writes this music of sensibility, be it for orchestra or piano, it is as though his was a spirit of air and fire. The air pulses to the lightest beat, the fire glows white and lambent. Of such are the measures of eager longing, of palpitating ascent into ecstasy with which his poem begins and mounts. Of such are the phrases upon which his music at fullest climax of a sudden opens, as though for the instant his spirit knew ineffable beatitude.

There, and much more than in sweeping and sundered climax, does Scriabin fulfill his passion for expression. As an inner glow quickens his sensibility, so an inner force renews his expressive ardors. Driven by them he would have his music palpitate in radiance upon the air. Divided by them, he now courts simplicity, again complicates complexity. The ardors spur, and he flings the orchestra into surging climax. The ardors pierce, and measures of a felicity for which there is no word entrance the ear, enkindle the rarest of voluptuous or spiritual sensations. Of this two-fold voice and substance, desire and fulfillment, is this "Poem of Ecstasy." Hear it, if the listener choose, as music sopped in sensuous longings, and sensuous fulfillment, music, almost, of sensuous delirium. Hear it, again, as music drenched in spiritual aspiration, ardor, ecstasy. (The psychologists have often proved the kinship of such transports.) Whichever it be, or both unconsciously mingled, "The Poem of Ecstasy" remains music throbbing with a sensibility that is close to pain, devoured by a passion that is consuming fire. Except in "The Divine Poem" and in the "Prometheus" of Scriabin himself there is no music that these days know like to it.

Between Sibelius of the symphony and Scriabin of the poem, Ropartz of the "Divertissement" was as point of rest and soothing. Two motifs breed the music. One outflows in gentle musing charm—light French melancholy and light French handling adroitly blended. The other soon sings in livelier, warmer measures—Gallic animation of mood plus Gallic brightness of speech. Fancifully, as the "Divertissement" proceeds, Monsieur Ropartz draws his measures from the one, the other or both motifs. Fancifully, aptly, elegantly he devises arabesque and figure, touches in harmonic or instrumental color, piques or pleases, smiles gayly or opens pensive eyes. Of old "Divertissements"—or "Divertimenti" as the Italianate eighteenth century oftener called them—graced and amused the salons of princes. Nowadays, as Monsieur Ropartz has amply proved, they may do like office in more democratic concert-halls. To fancy, elegance, the golden mean in the lighter arts, there is no way like the French way.

H. T. PARKER

Portrait bust of the
Bj

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

C.S. Monitor Oct. 23, 1920

For its third program of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the afternoon of October 22, played Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 in E minor, op. 39; Ropartz's "Divertissement for Orchestra," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," op. 54. Pierre Monteux proved during the lengthy, intricate and highly varied course of the Sibelius symphony that he has his forces well in hand, firm and elastic in response to the slightest shading of his brilliant readings. The pleasure of the audience in the exquisite rendering of the second movement of the symphony was especially marked. In the allegro Mr. Monteux reveled in the hearty mocking humor, and brought the movement to an end with a huddling of pace that was like a fat boy trying to run faster than he possibly could and ending by tumbling down in a sudden inglorious sprawl. The finale, possibly, might have had a greater dignity, but one could not cease to remark the variety of Mr. Monteux's handling of the parts. The Ropartz divertissement had a most sympathetic and well-prepared performance, with every detail and mass of the form brought out clearly in a rendering that could be called interesting at all times. There is something hugely refreshing in the prodigal way Scriabin tosses forth his emotional thoughts, giving little hints of his themes here and there out of a tumultuous tonal sea, tidbits to pique the intelligence instead of long, fully stated phrases that some composers too often repeat tediously. Impressions of life and nature, uncramped by tidy little formulas, but having a firm logic all Scriabin's own—such seems this music in effect. And because it does not depend for its large thrusting effects upon anything like meticulous handling of its details, Mr. Monteux appeared to take it in a freer fashion than he had done with the other pieces, as if he had turned from circumscribed lyrics to the throb, swing and soar of blank verse.

58

Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Monteux of 31 Dwight street, Brookline, are receiving congratulations on the birth of a son,

As Mr. Monteux will produce here an orchestral work by Arnold Bax, the following review by the London Daily Telegraph of that composer's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra, produced at the Promenade concert Sept. 23, is interesting: "Of a work so intricately fashioned as this—it consists of theme, six variations, and an intermezzo, all closely wrought—one cannot pretend to give anything like a faithful impression after a first hearing. The theme itself is grave in character, but in the very first variation it undergoes such transmutation of mood and character that one is quickly puzzled. In the earlier portion of the work the music seems to be writhing in an effort to express something, becoming at times exceedingly impetuous and emphatic without gaining in coherence. Anon it becomes tranquil, but only to become obscure, the composer seeming, as it were, to practise the intensive cultivation of side-issues. This is not to suggest that there are no lucid moments; there are many. It is the continuity of those moments that is difficult to follow. Mr. Bax achieves something nearly approaching a thrill in the third variation, which is labelled 'Strife,' but it is a thrill that quickly gives way to the predominant feeling of perplexity. One noticed passages of beautiful orchestral colouring in the fourth variation, 'The Temple,' and in the intermezzo, which occurs between the penultimate variation and the final, 'Triumph,' something of that magical spell which genius only can throw over us. A moment only, and it was gone. We are grateful for such a work as this; it is the achievement of one who has truly arrived. But we must hear it many times again or possess the score—it is still in MS.—before declaring judgment."

ORCHESTRA TO BE AT FUNERAL Post — Oct. 23/20. Services for Symphony Hall Treasurer Today

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this afternoon at the funeral of Frederick Gould Roby, treasurer at Symphony Hall, who died suddenly at Symphony Hall last Thursday afternoon. The funeral services will be held at the Mt. Auburn Chapel today at 3 o'clock and burial will be in the Mt. Auburn cemetery.

For a quarter of a century Mr. Roby has been treasurer of the hall, acting first as treasurer at the old Music Hall, the original home of the orchestra. Previous to that time he had been employed by the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. In his long connection with the orchestra Mr. Roby had become known to its notable conductors and to many leading musical artists who as soloists appeared with the Symphony Orchestra. He was widely known among the regular patrons of performances in Symphony Hall.

While it had been known by his associates that he was suffering with heart trouble no special anxiety had been felt regarding his condition and his death was very unexpected. He was 57 years old and a native of Cambridge, where he made his home until a few years ago when he moved to the Back Bay to be near Symphony Hall. He is survived by the widow.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FOURTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 29, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Leonore No. 3, op. 72

HILL,

POEM for Orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher"
(after Edgar Allen Poe)
(First Performance)

MENDELSSOHN, ✓

ARIA, "Infelice"

TSCHAIKOWSKY, ✓

LETTER SONG, from "Eugen Oniegin"

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120

- I. Andante; Allegro
- II. Romanza
- III. Scherzo
- IV. Largo; Finale
(Played without pause)

Soloist:

HELEN STANLEY

Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Monteux of 31 Dwight street, Brookline, are receiving congratulations on the birth of a son.

As Mr. Monteux will produce here an orchestral work by Arnold Bax, the following review by the London Daily Telegraph of that composer's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra, produced at the Promenade concert Sept. 23, is interesting. "Of a work so intricately fashioned as this—it consists of theme, six variations, and an intermezzo, all closely wrought—one cannot pretend to give anything like a faithful impression after a first hearing. The theme itself is grave in character, but in the very first variation it undergoes such transmogrification of mood and character that one is quickly puzzled. In the earlier portion of the work the music seems to be writhing in an effort to express something, becoming at times exceedingly impetuous and emphatic without gaining in coherence. Anon it becomes tranquil, but only to become obscure, the composer seeming, as it were, to practise the intensive cultivation of side-issues. This is not to suggest that there are no lucid moments; there are many. It is the continuity of those moments that is difficult to follow. Mr. Bax achieves something nearly approaching a thrill in the third variation, which is labelled 'Strife,' but it is a thrill that quickly gives way to the predominant feeling of perplexity. One noticed passages of beautiful orchestral colouring in the fourth variation, 'The Temple,' and in the intermezzo, which occurs between the penultimate variation and the final, 'Triumph,' something of that magical spell which genius only can throw over us. A moment only, and it was gone. We are grateful for such a work as this; it is the achievement of one who has truly arrived. But we must hear it many times again or possess the score—it is still in MS.—before declaring judgment."

ORCHESTRA TO BE AT FUNERAL Post Oct. 23/20. Services for Symphony Hall Treasurer Today

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this afternoon at the funeral of Frederick Gould Roby, treasurer at Symphony Hall, who died suddenly at Symphony Hall last Thursday afternoon. The funeral services will be held at the Mt. Auburn Chapel today at 3 o'clock and burial will be in the Mt. Auburn cemetery.

For a quarter of a century Mr. Roby has been treasurer of the hall, acting first as treasurer at the old Music Hall, the original home of the orchestra. Previous to that time he had been employed by the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. In his long connection with the orchestra Mr. Roby had become known to its notable conductors and to many leading musical artists who as soloists appeared with the Symphony Orchestra. He was widely known among the regular patrons of performances in Symphony Hall.

While it had been known by his associates that he was suffering with heart trouble no special anxiety had been felt regarding his condition and his death was very unexpected. He was 57 years old and a native of Cambridge, where he made his home until a few years ago when he moved to the Back Bay to be near Symphony Hall. He is survived by the widow.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FOURTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 29, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, AT 8 P.M.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Leonore No. 3, op. 72

HILL,

POEM for Orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher"

(after Edgar Allen Poe)

(First Performance)

MENDELSSOHN,

ARIA, "Infelice"

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

LETTER SONG, from "Eugen Oniegin"

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor. op. 120

I. Andante; Allegro

II. Romanza

III. Scherzo

IV. Largo; Finale

(Played without pause)

Soloist:

HELEN STANLEY

FOURTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 29, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 30, at 8.00 o'clock

Owing to the sudden illness of Mme. Stanley, a change in the programme has been made necessary. Instead of the arias by Mendelssohn and Tchaikowsky the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" will be played.

4TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Herald — Oct. 30/20

First Performance of "Fall of House of Usher"
Is Impressive

COMPOSER CALLED FORTH BY APPLAUSE

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Leonora Overture, No. 3; Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (first performance); Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4. Wagner's music was substituted for two arias which should have been sung by Mme. Helen Stanley. She was prevented from singing by a sudden attack of tonsillitis.

Henley says in the preface to his collection of English lyrics: "After Keats there is no fresh note until we hear from over the Atlantic, the artful, subtle, irresistible song of Poe; the New Music which none that has heard it can forget." It is a question whether Poe was ever more musical in his poems, even in "The Haunted Palace," than in his prose "Shadow" and "Silence," and in certain tales. Yet composers have been tempted to translate his verbal music into tonal. They have been greatly daring.

Poe himself said: "Give musical expression any undue decision, imbue it with any very determinate tone, and you deprive it at once of its ethereal, its ideal, its intrinsic and essential character. It now becomes a tangible and easily appreciable idea, a thing of the earth, earthy." Mr. Hill did not fall into the error of attempting in his symphonic poem to follow Poe's marvellous story scene by scene, from the visitor's first view of the house and the tarn to the final tragedy. The composer's aim was to give an impression of the mood in its terrifying crescendo. If this music had no title, the hearer would not necessarily think of the tale, but the music would suggest the expression of fear, of wild mental perturbation, of something tragically sinister; it would hint in the very beginning at impending doom. This Mr. Hill has achieved without descending to sensational treatment. He has said that he associated the two themes with the melancholy Roderick and the slowly dying Madeline. In his use of the themes we recognize the unhappy Usher, tortured by the terror, which at first vague, becomes at last a horrid certainty; while the music for the sister, the lady Madeline, expresses admirably her ghost-like character; her shadowy apparition, even before she was entombed. Nor in the introduction of musical realism, the description of the house, falling to end forever and inevitably the tragedy of the last inmates, does Mr. Hill cease to be musical.

This tone poem is to us an imaginative work, conceived and carried out in the spirit of Poe. It does not rival the supreme art shown in the construction of the tale itself; if it does not inspire the same feeling of mysterious horror: if the musical falls below the verbal felicity of expression. The answer is that the tale itself is music, and in this field Poe is "lonely and incomparable," as Swineburne said of Coleridge.

If there is to be adverse criticism, one might wish away a certain ornamentation of figures, filigree, especially for the wood-wind, that seem on one hearing incongruous, foreign to the prevailing mood.

The performance was poetic and impressive. The composer was obliged to acknowledge the applause.

The interpretation of the familiar, but never too familiar, overture was exceedingly dramatic. Mr. Monteux gave a fine reading of the "Tristan" music. It was a pleasure to hear again the symphony of Schumann, with its lovely lyricism. The first movement and the finale were played in true virtuoso spirit, but the two middle movements are the ones in which the genius of Schumann is more clearly disclosed.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Nov. 5, 6, will be as follows. Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4; Strube, Four Preludes (first performance); Respighi, "Fountains of Rome," (first time in Boston); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

NEW WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Hill's Poem After Poe
Given First Public Performance

Poe ——— Oct. 30 '20
BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry Burlingame Hill's symphonic poem, after Poe, "The Fall of the House of Usher," was played for the first time at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, announced to appear, was suddenly taken ill, so that the programme was entirely orchestral. It opened with Beethoven's 3d Leonore overture, and included, in addition to this and Mr. Hill's work, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony.

HINTS AND SUGGESTIONS

Mr. Hill's music is not any slavish attempt to give tonal suggestions or illustrations of episodes of Poe's poem. Mr. Hill's is too sensitive an intelligence to attempt such a thing. He has attempted to convey mood. He hints, as he explains himself in a programme note, at the figure of Usher's sister, Madeleine, and this is the most salient, the most emotional passage of his work.

He suggests elsewhere the fate that hangs over the haunted castle, the wildness of the night, not a melodramatic wildness, but a wildness as intense as it is unreal, and at last the destruction of the thematic castle, which sinks in a harmonic tarn.

Reading again the haunting tale of Poe, one wonders, in the first place, how a composer would have the courage to attempt a musical synthesis of its moods, and then one wonders how a man who could compose at all could avoid being inspired to composition by this supreme work of art.

Thus the man who invokes the spirit of Poe and then essays music faces tremendous odds. Poe has already made music. To add more music to his is to try to transmute one art into another, in a place where it would be about as easy to transmute silver into gold. And then the composer has to complete and fulfill the needs of the imagination which have been awakened in the reader.

It may be possible to do this. It is not singular to us, however, that, as we receive a first impression, Mr. Hill has failed. Or perhaps we do not fully grasp his purpose. He has written, in our estimation, with feeling which is poetic, but which hardly reaches the heights of wild fantasy and the stab of the beauty, so strange, so macabre, of an incomparable tale.

For the rest, Mr. Hill has achieved beautiful orchestration, distinguished alike by its fineness of touch and its certainty of method, modern harmony, a warm gleam of human, tragic beauty in the musical portrayal of the doomed Madeleine, very well placed in the composition, very apposite to the musico-poetic conception. But there we stop. For us, the composition lacks the commanding force, the powerful stamp of an all-condemning fate which is inherent in every line of the legend. It is artistic. There are moments of forboding of omen when the bass drum pounds on the heart. Yet we are left cold.

The performance of Beethoven's overture was not distinguished by exceptional eloquence or beauty of tone. It was good, leaning toward mediocrity. The "Tristan" music had been prepared on short notice. A certain roughness was inevitable, but the Liebestod was played with feeling and a musician's knowledge of the color possibilities of the score.

Schumann's D minor symphony is an exquisite fancy, fragile, peculiarly intimate. It seems strange that a great orchestra could be so personal. And Mr. Monteux has long ere this shown his special understanding of Schumann.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. ——— Oct. 30, 1920
FOR THE MOST PART FAMILIAR PIECES

Disabled Mme. Stanley and Substituted Wagner—"Leonore" and "Tristan" Side by Side—New Token of Mr. Monteux's Progress—Schumann, Song and Spring—Mr. Hill's New Tone-Poem—Music of Mind to Mind

WITH Madame Stanley denied to the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon—as she will be again this evening—because laryngitis had deprived her of the voice of song, the Symphony Concert became a concert of the orchestra unassisted and the programme, with one exception, a programme of familiar pieces. Under Mr. Monteux's final revision, it began with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture; proceeded with the novel number of the day, Mr. Hill's "Poem," suggested by Poe's tale of "The Fall of the House of Usher"; continued with the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's opera of "Tristan"; ended with Schumann's songful and swinging symphony in D minor. So re-fashioned, it was a programme, as the applause testified, to pleasure an audience that, being normal, likes to hear anew what it gratefully and familiarly remembers, and likes the experience the better, when music and performance stir many a listener as surely did Beethoven's and Wagner's music, and as in measure did also the glowing, joyous measures of Schumann.

No doubt Mr. Hill's tone-poem was somewhat baffling to many a hearer. But as the resigned now say, what else is there to expect of these modernists, whether they descend from Paris or merely come across the bridge from Cambridge? Still more of a modernist with Poe fantastic and fatalistic, graphic and gruesome, behind him? Happily it is the way of the resigned as well as of the curious and content to clap hands; and it was good to see Mr. Hill called to the stage, though a little less heartily, as memory went, than after the fancy and charm of his "Stevesoniana" two seasons ago.

Best of all, to those who, unashamed, hold the Symphony Concerts dear, was the evidence alike with Wagner's prelude and Beethoven's overture of the progress not only of the orchestra but of the conductor no less. Scarcely a leader of the Symphony Orchestra but has left it a deepened, broadened, more receptive, more eloquent musician. Wide was the gulf separating the Gerlicke of the later from the Gerlicke of the earlier years. Dr. Muck was well reputed conductor when he came first to Symphony Hall; he was eminent conductor when he, finally, departed thence. Now, with Mr. Monteux precedent and progress bid fair to hold. A year ago, when he was first heard in these fragments of "Tristan," the advance through the prelude of the measures of desire lacked nervous, sensitive modulation, concentrated and cumulating intensity. Yesterday, they quivered and glowed with the Wagnerian tremor of passion that may hardly be satiated, that will not be stilled. Especially in the string choir a more sensitive orchestra now answers to Mr. Monteux, but from him as well as it came this fine new ardor. Of old Mr. Monteux missed a little of the calm beauty that begins the musical miracle of Isolde's death-song. Yesterday, there were glow and mystery. Last autumn the climax lacked depth and majesty. Now the orchestra yields the conductor a full-throated richness of tone and he makes it molten.

So, again, with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, new from the leader's hand. Mr. Monteux "read" it—tame word!—as the music-drama in concentrated epitome that it is; he missed none of the picturing or dramatizing imagery; he kept every tonal strand alive and in supple motion. He and the orchestra charged with beauty Beethoven's measures of instrumental song. They swirled with the composer through tumultuous fervors. Only with Schumann's symphony did the impression now and again return that conductor and band might be more sensitive to modulation. But Schumann, possibly the more for his poetic ardor, writes thickly in parallel pattern, as it sometimes seems, of contrapuntal strands.

It was stimulating no less to hear Beethoven's overture and Wagner's prelude almost side by side, and each a masterpiece in kind. If ever there was a sensuous music, after it has tortured the measures of desire out of the measures of death and fate, it is this preface and proclamation to "Tristan." The modulations tingle, the harmonies glow, the instrumental colorings suffuse or pierce. Passion not so much wings as drenches period upon period—and passion that Isolde's death-song transfigures into a veritable music of deep and golden flame. From end to end Wagner is writing, tone-poem of the senses. In contrast the Beethoven of high heroic mood. For him no lush harmonies, stinging modulations, sensuous tang. Instead the large fervors, the tragic crisis, the tempestuous rejoicing of nobler ardors, nobly sung. Through all the glories of the prelude to "Tristan" Wagner never quits this sensuous earth. Beethoven on the wings of this "Leonore" overture scales emotional, dramatic, musical heavens.

Below, in the symphony in D minor strides Schumann singing and mastering, rather than persuading, the orchestra to his voice and mood of song. No doubt, as the books say, Schumann wrestled with counterpoint when he set to a symphony and took thought of the resourceful and adroit Mendelssohn over the way. No doubt he struggled also with the distribution of instrumental voices and they sometimes entangled him in toils. Yet in this fourth symphony as in the first symphony of the joys of spring or the second of musing happiness, outpour himself he would and did in song. It is the distinction and the glory of this song that quickly come the moods and each mood possesses Schumann, as the Irish say, entirely. He is tender, as in the introduction, that the sooner he may be buoyant. He is musing and melancholy as in the slow movement, that he may speed the quicker into gayety and fancy. He is fain in this music to write a symphony of breathless intensities, song upon song, counterpoint or no counterpoint, and he succeeds—the more, yesterday, for Mr. Monteux's answering verve. It is rhythm that wings the music. Eighty years ago the concert-master in Leipzig "liked the swing" of this fourth symphony. It swings still.

Beyond doubt or peradventure Mr. Hill is expert composer. He is studious of form; he takes thought, shaping, subduing it to his poetizing, his illuding purposes. Chaste, not wanton, are his freedoms with it. Mr. Hill is studious of musical procedures, especially of the procedures of our time. He has learned the secrets of modulation, harmonic background and suggestion, play of instrumental voices. Again he takes thought and applies such resource in his own way to his own ends. He does not press into the forefront of innovation; no more does he tag behind in the inertia of formula. The terseness, incisiveness, directness, concentration, economy of not a little music, here and now, especially when Ravel looks over the composer's shoulder, spoke yesterday out of his tone-poem. Yet the most orthodox may not deny that he develops his motifs, weaves his musical web from them, is never content to dress and redress them in "mere" harmonic and instrumental vesture. If his music has atmosphere, yet also has it body. While it suggests, it is also self-contained.

Mr. Hill designed his "poem" to summon the imagery of Poe's tale, "The Fall of the House of Usher." From the music in kind and degree, as from the printed page was to exhale sense of gaunt solitude, fear-some preoccupations, spirits stretched and wrenched, doom that echoes afar, draws nearer, is fulfilled and leaves no wraith behind. Music may convey such illusion, gain the morbid sensibility of Poe's imagination and Poe's word and progress upon the printed page. Mr. Hill takes thought and perceives the necessities of such a tone-poem—perceives, reflects; chooses and applies the means to the desired end. The listener's mind hears, agrees, responds. But the interchange, the process on both sides, seems chiefly mental. Does not a tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," ask something more and something different?

H. T. PARKER

HILL'S "USHER" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Cable Oct. 30/20
Brilliant Performance by the Orchestra

Beethoven, Schumann and Wagner
Contribute to Program

Helen Stanley, announced as soloist for yesterday's Symphony concert, was unable to appear on account of illness. Mr. Monteux replaced her two arias by the familiar version for orchestra alone of the Prelude and "Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." This change was not altogether fortunate for the novel piece of the afternoon, Mr. Hill's "The Fall of the House of Usher," which was sandwiched between two masterpieces of the first order. Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture and the excerpts from "Tristan."

It is always a severe test for new compositions to be performed at the same concert with any of the better works of Beethoven, Bach or Wagner. Many in the audience are likely to feel that these masters have already said with greater force all that almost any newcomer has to offer. It is moreover peculiarly difficult for a modern composer who employs, as most of them do, Wagner's idiom, to compete with "Tristan."

Heard under other circumstances, the individuality of orchestral color and the coherent presentation of musical ideas in "The Fall of the House of Usher" would doubtless have made a deeper impression. Mr. Hill's music is well made. He is a connoisseur of orchestral effects. He is not without imagination. Yet yesterday the new piece left an audience eager for its Beethoven and Wagner politely apathetic.

Schumann's Symphony in D minor, famous in musical history as one of the earliest examples of the cross-quotation and interweaving of themes between movements, sounds as though it had been composed for the pianoforte and then, rather laboriously, orchestrated. One cannot help feeling that if the admirable material it contains had been used for another set of "Symphonic Etudes" the results would have been more completely satisfying. Schumann, like Poe and Heine, had an imagination incapable of long sustained flights.

The performance of all these works had a brilliance and verve which atoned for an occasional lack of absolute precision in detail. Particularly noteworthy was the exquisite solo work of the new concert master, Mr. Burgin, in "The Fall of the House of Usher." He obviously excels either of his immediate predecessors, Yitek and Fradkin.

There are no concerts next week. The program for Nov. 12 and 13 includes Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and new pieces by Gustav Strube and Respighi.

SYMPHONY GIVES FOURTH CONCERT

Yesterday afternoon marked the fourth concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A delightful program was well interpreted by the musicians.

It is an easily comprehended fact that Mr. Monteux is a director possessed of great broad-mindedness and one who presents the works of all composers with equal feeling and skill. One would hesitate to say that he excels in any particular form of interpretation in that he attains such perfection in all, but, if there is one form it is the Operatic Overture.

Yesterday, Miss Helen Stanley was to have been the soloist with the orchestra, but her sudden illness made necessary a change in the program. The first number was the Overture to Beethoven's Opera "Leonore," the added number the "Prelude and Love-Duet" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Mr. Monteux's interpretation of both these numbers was gloriously brilliant.

The first performance of a "Poem for Orchestra," by Edward Burlingame Hill was given. This composition was inspired by Edgar Allan Poe's story "The Fall of the House of Usher." The composer says that his purpose was to present a personal impression of its atmosphere and a desire to attain a coherent and logical presentation of musical ideas reflecting Poe's melancholy and powerful imagination. Mr. Hill has succeeded well for the composition is full of the moody morbidness that characterizes Poe's writings. Mr. Hill attended the performance and received the warm applause of the audience in person.

The last number was Schumann's "D Minor Symphony," number 4. This Symphony is in four movements. Schumann requested that his work always be played without pauses and its splendid performance as rendered by the orchestra yesterday as Schumann intended.

There will not be another concert until Nov. 12, as the orchestra is to go out on tour next week.

C. S. Monitor Oct. 30, 1920

The fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on the afternoon of October 29, served to bring to a first performance Edward Burlingame Hill's poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," after Edgar Allan Poe. Mr. Hill has long been recognized as the possessor of a fluent orchestral technic. In many of his compositions an agreeable fancy is to be found, notably in his "Stevensoniana" Suite, played here last season. "The Fall of the House of Usher," however, to be adequately portrayed musically, requires a more vivid imagination, a quicker emotional response to the wild romanticism of Poe's gloomy tale than Mr. Hill seems to have at his command. To be sure, there is by intention no attempt to follow the story scene by scene. The composer avows his purpose to suggest the "atmosphere of the story as a whole," to quote his own words as stated in the program book; yet in this very respect the work seems to fail most signally. The chief motive lacks in character, and in place of leading to interesting developments, gives rise merely to wearisome repetitions. The orchestral coloring, at all times skillfully contrived, rarely succeeds in being more than obvious. It must be confessed, in spite of one's admiration for the composer's many excellent qualities, that in this work he is not in his proper element. The orchestra gave a painstaking and carefully prepared performance and there was considerable applause. The remainder of the program consisted of Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, the Prelude and Love-Death to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

More Novel Pieces from Mr. Monteux—
The Reconquest of New York—A Rising
Generation in Paris—Malipiero Again—
Orchestral Concerts in Theatres

From Oct. 28/29
NEXT week the Symphony Orchestra will go for the first time this season to New York, Philadelphia, and the other cities southward to which it makes monthly visits. It will not be heard again in Boston until Friday and Saturday, Nov. 12 and 13. Then Mr. Monteux's programme will traverse Brahms's fourth symphony; four Preludes by Mr. Strube, of old violinist in the orchestra, now chief of a conservatory in Baltimore; a tone-picture, "The Fountains of Rome," by the "new Italian," Respighi; and Strauss's scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Conductor and orchestra were eloquent last year in Brahms's first symphony; they should not be less so in the fourth. For long it has been Mr. Strube's custom to hand his new pieces to the Symphony Orchestra for first and deserving performance. Respighi's music—a symphonic poem in form and not too "modern" in substance and manner—pictures "the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn; the Triton Fountain at morn; the Fountain of Trevi at midday, and the Fountain at the Villa Medici at sunset." As for Strauss, in the concert-hall, as in most other places, the war is overpast.

Since in New York the Symphony Orchestra has in measure to reconquer its public of old, Mr. Monteux has wisely decided to disclose it first in the music of our own time in which, rather than in the classics, it now excels. Thus, his first programme for New York traverses Sibelius's symphony in E minor played last week in Boston, Lekeu's Fantasia and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." Similarly on his second programme he has set Enesco's symphony, Mr. Hill's tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher" and, for older pieces, Pierné's orchestral arrangement of Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue and Berlioz's romantic overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Casella's "Italian Rhapsody" has become, thanks to Mr. Jacchia, a relatively familiar piece at the Pop Concerts in Boston. Last Tuesday, however, an audience in New York heard it for the first time from Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. With reason Mr. Aldrich wrote of it in The Times:

The music is graphic, imaginative. There is apparently no definite programme, no depiction of scenes, but a succession of moods, sullen gloom, passion, mad delirium, powerfully evoked and sustained. The orchestral coloring is often striking, novel in effect. It is work of a strong hand certain in its touch. The performance was a brilliant one.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, AT 8 P. M.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 4, op. 98

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Andante moderato
- III. Allegro giocoso
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato

STRUBE,

FOUR PRELUDES for Orchestra
(First Performance)

RESPIGHI,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Fontane di Roma,"
("Fountains of Rome")

The Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn. The Triton Fountain at morn. The Fountain of Trevi at mid-day. The Villa Medici Fountain at sunset.

STRAUSS,

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned Roguish manner. in Rondo form for full Orchestra, op. 28

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

More Novel Pieces from Mr. Monteux—
The Reconquest of New York—A Rising
Generation in Paris—Malipiero Again—
Orchestral Concerts in Theatres

Trans. — Oct. 28/29
NEXT week the Symphony Orchestra will go for the first time this season to New York, Philadelphia, and the other cities southward to which it makes monthly visits. It will not be heard again in Boston until Friday and Saturday, Nov. 12 and 13. Then Mr. Monteux's programme will traverse Brahms's fourth symphony; four Preludes by Mr. Strube, of old violinist in the orchestra, now chief of a conservatory in Baltimore; a tone-picture, "The Fountains of Rome," by the "new Italian," Respighi; and Strauss's scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Conductor and orchestra were eloquent last year in Brahms's first symphony; they should not be less so in the fourth. For long it has been Mr. Strube's custom to hand his new pieces to the Symphony Orchestra for first and deserving performance. Respighi's music—a symphonic poem in form and not too "modern" in substance and manner—pictures "the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn; the Triton Fountain at morn; the Fountain of Trevi at midday, and the Fountain at the Villa Medici at sunset." As for Strauss, in the concert-hall, as in most other places, the war is overpast.

Since in New York the Symphony Orchestra has in measure to reconquer its public of old, Mr. Monteux has wisely decided to disclose it first in the music of our own time in which, rather than in the classics, it now excels. Thus, his first programme for New York traverses Sibelius's symphony in E minor played last week in Boston, Lekeu's Fantasia and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." Similarly on his second programme he has set Enesco's symphony, Mr. Hill's tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher" and, for older pieces, Pierné's orchestral arrangement of Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue and Berlioz's romantic overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Casella's "Italian Rhapsody" has become, thanks to Mr. Jacchia, a relatively familiar piece at the Pop Concerts in Boston. Last Tuesday, however, an audience in New York heard it for the first time from Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. With reason Mr. Aldrich wrote of it in The Times:

The music is graphic, imaginative. There is apparently no definite programme, no depiction of scenes, but a succession of moods, sullen gloom, passion, mad delirium, powerfully evoked and sustained. The orchestral coloring is often striking, novel in effect. It is work of a strong hand certain in its touch. The performance was a brilliant one.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, AT 8 P. M.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 4, op. 98

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Andante moderato
- III. Allegro giocoso
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato

STRUBE,

FOUR PRELUDES for Orchestra
(First Performance)

RESPIGHI,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Fontane di Roma,"
("Fountains of Rome")

The Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn. The Triton Fountain at morn. The Fountain of Trevi at mid-day. The Villa Medici Fountain at sunset.

STRAUSS,

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned Roguish manner. in Rondo form for full Orchestra, op. 28

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

M. PIERRE MONTEUX

tion, had genuine, powerful energy and sustained. The orchestral coloring is often striking, novel in effect. It is work of a strong hand certain in its touch. The performance was a brilliant one.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, AT 8 P. M.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 4, op. 98

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Andante moderato
- III. Allegro giocoso
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato

STRUBE,

FOUR PRELUDES for Orchestra
(First Performance)

RESPIGHI,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Fontane di Roma,"
("Fountains of Rome")

The Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn. The Triton Fountain at noon. The Fountain of Trevi at mid-day.
The Villa Medici Fountain at sunset.

STRAUSS,

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned Roguish manner. in Rondo form for full Orchestra, op. 28

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

PLAYS MUSIC OF MODERNISTS

Symphony in Fifth Concert Gives Composition of Respighi and Strube

BRILLIANT READING OF STRAUSS'S "TILL"

Herald — Nov. 13, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Strube, Four Preludes for orchestra (first performance); Respighi, "Fountains of Rome," symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Strauss, "The Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mr. Strube, who has been the teacher of composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music at Baltimore since 1913, when he left the Boston Symphony Orchestra, modestly describes his Preludes as "little." It is true that they are short, but he employs as great an orchestra as if he were writing a symphonic poem portraying the reign of Anarchy or the Last Judgment. It is hardly necessary to add that the Preludes are ultra-modern in spirit and expression.

Mr. Strube started out 35 years or more ago to write serious music in the approved German conservatory manner. He then followed orthodox routine. Some years later he was fascinated by the music of Cesar Franck, Vincent d'Indy and other Frenchmen, regarded as heretics by the conservatories of his fatherland, the more so as these composers were then merely names in Germany, but as they were French, it was only reasonable to suspect them of atrocious, criminal debauchery in music. Mr. Strube has a receptive mind; his horizon broadened; his taste grew more fastidious; he experimented boldly, and he, too, without losing his solid acquisitions, joined the ranks of the ultra-moderns.

These four Preludes are interesting, especially to those who have followed the development of the composer. Of the four, the second, which is of a pastoral nature, and the third, in minuet form, have the most decided character and are the most engrossing. There are charming melodic and orchestral effects in the pastorate, while the minuet has the requisite delicacy and grace. The other movements made a less favorable impression. They seemed less spontaneous, vaguely impressionistic.

Respighi's purpose in uniting his symphonic poem was to express "sentiments and visions" suggested to him by four of Rome's fountains. "Contemplated at the hour in which their character is most in harmony with the surrounding landscape, or in which their beauty appears most impressive to the observer." It was a daring undertaking. How easy it would have been for him to fall into aqueous monotony! He has triumphed gloriously. Not only has he given a particular effect of color and atmosphere to each fountain; he has without any attempt to "Biederize" music, given unity and continuity to Italian impressionism. He has not been literal or too realistic; he has heard, seen and written as a poet enamoured of his city.

Modern in his harmonic scheme, a master of ultra-modern instrumentation, he has not forsaken melodic figures, the melody that is the Italian's birthright, and still makes a universal appeal. The harmonic devices are as his natural idiom; nowhere do we see him deliberately girding up his loins, and with knotted brow and sweat starting at every pore, saying: "I, too, will show them how modern I can be." His instrumentation is now effectively discreet, now gorgeously rich, never wildly and incongruously fantastical. Throughout the work there is the revelation of marked individuality. It is a pleasure to add that the superb performance and the worth of the music itself were fully appreciated by the great audience.

What a pity it is that Brahms in his fourth symphony did not stop after the second movement! The triangle and the piccolo do not relieve the clumsy dreariness of the Scherzo; the Finale, with the exception of a few variations, as the solemn passage for trombones, is a sad falling off from the first Allegro. Mr. Monteux gave an admirable reading of the work, bringing out clearly the innumerable details—and more than once Brahms is found treading water—sparring for wind—if the phrase may be allowed—without checking the musical flow. It was good to hear "Till Eulenspiegel" again. Would that Strauss had always written in this spirit of the true artist! The brilliant performance, as brilliant as any we remember under any other conductor, brought an end to a brilliant concert, a concert that was not too long.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for the concerts of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major (K. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra (Reinold Werrenrath, singer); Ravel, "Couperin's Tomb," suite for orchestra (first time in America); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

Monitor — Nov. 13, 1920

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given on November 12, was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4 in E minor; Straube, four preludes; Respighi, "Fontane di Roma," symphonic poem; Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel." It was an interesting and novel program, well played. Strube's preludes were given their first performance anywhere and Respighi's symphonic poem was played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Strube's preludes are fragmentary, of necessity in small and limited form; yet the great masters have contrived to say much in little. A work is not to be judged by the number, of pages in the score. Some of Chopin's preludes out-value, in the opinion of many musicians, some of Beethoven's entire sonatas. The value of a composition in such compact form lies in what it suggests and not in what it actually says and it is just in this very respect that Mr. Strube seems ineffective. His material is good and it is presented with the mastery of technical means for which he is well known. The imagination of the listener is not at once excited by some striking idea; and just as the hearer is beginning to grasp the mood of the piece the music stops. Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" did not serve to introduce anything particularly original, either in the way of musical ideas or orchestral coloring. It seems to be skillfully scored for the orchestra. It has little melodic interest or harmonic variety.

NEW WORKS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Italian Pieces and Four Preludes by Gustave
Strube

Post — Nov. 13, 1920

A programme of very exceptional interest was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was performed for the first time in Boston the highly imaginative and decorative composition of the modern Italian, Respighi, "The Fountains of Rome," four impressionistic pieces bound together by ingenious musical devices, and entitled, respectively, "The Fountain of Valle Giulia at Dawn," "The Triton Fountain at Noon," "The Fountain of Trevi at Midday," "The Villa Medici Fountain at Sunset."

PRELUDES BY STRUBE

There were also performed for the first time in Boston four preludes for orchestra by Gustave Strube, composer and formerly violinist of the Boston Symphony, music which was very cordially received.

The final number was Richard Strauss' incomparable "Till Eulenspiegel," perhaps of all this composer's work the most perfect, unique in inspiration, in humor, in pathos, irony, and withal a legendary and fairy-like quality.

This work Mr. Monteux led brilliantly and with much sympathy for the composer's thought.

SYMPHONY CONCERT Trans. — Nov. 13, 1920 MANIFOLD MUSIC TO MANIFOLD PLEASURE

Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" in New and Stimulating Voice—Respighi's Ingrating Tone-Poem — Amusing Preludes from Mr. Strube — Brahms, with Thrill from Both Piece and Performance

ALL in the day's work and the day's pleasure music of Richard Strauss was played and heard at the symphony Concert yesterday for the first time since the United States joined the war against Germany. In England, pouring out blood and treasure through five years of that war, his pieces have already regained place upon orchestral programmes, without audible demur. In America most conductors have begun similar restoration or are disposed to begin it—again without discoverable objection. Mr. Monteux is sensitive to the currents of the hour; like most open-minded musicians he warms to the better work of Strauss; he believes in catholic choice of programme; and yesterday, "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" was the final number on his list.

Once more there was neither word nor act of protest. Nobody departed, beyond the usual waifs and strays of four o'clock, before the piece was played; and nobody lingered to applaud it. There was enough clapping to recall the conductor—with an effort; there was not enough to indicate a widespread zest for the tonal adventures of Til. There was too little, in fact, to make return for a performance such as Bostonian ears have been wont to hear. Eulenspiegel, however, has long been musically a baffling fellow, and perhaps Mr. Monteux's version of his rondo puzzled hearers the more. They could hardly have forgotten him in his four years of banishment; and for that reason, maybe, welcomed him back no more warmly. Years before the moods of wartime realigned orchestral repertoires, he was longer absent from Symphony Hall and few outwardly and audibly grieved.

Humor in tones is a perilous thing at a symphony concert, where, by working hypothesis, serious listeners assemble to listen to serious music. No doubt Strauss's piece needs responsive mood, and Mr. Monteux did his best to summon it. Dr. Muck's way with Til's music was to map it, so to say, upon the perceptions of the hearer. The ear heard, the mind perceived every line, inflection, tint and innuendo of the tone-poem. The hearer missed nothing and felt nothing—unless it was the sensations of an ironic bystander, watching this buffoon at his tonal tricks and japes, observing the tonal fate visited upon him, responding to the wit of the tonal narrator. Mr. Monteux took another and quite as plausible a way with the music. He did not diagram it; rather he played it with unflagging humorous gusto, in one long burst of merriment gone half-mad. Hear, the conductor seemed to be saying to his audience, this cheeping, chortling, swaggering knave. Listen to him threshing through his pranks, upsetting the market-place, towing the women, making game of the learned doctors and finally getting his deserts from a pompous court. The hangman's rope twitches; a sigh for him and Til's sport is over, his tale done.

Of course Mr. Monteux made significant details salient, set sharp edge or broad edge to Strauss's measures, but what he seemed to seek and what he surely gained was the grotesque humor, the panoramic flash, the endless zest, vigor and flood of the music. So hearing, we listeners took for granted the fertility of Strauss's invention (as it then was), the aptness and the precision of his projecting means, his ability (as, again, it then was) to fuse form, procedure, imagery and impression into a single unescapable whole. Instead, we smiled at the sound and sight—for it is veritably so—of impish Til; craned our necks, as it were, to watch and relish his buffooneries, crowded into the court-room, saw him die with a touch of regret. We put by Strauss's technical mastery for the sake of his humorous gusto; we forgot to be ironic in the zest of the general merriment. Mr. Monteux did not let the music go quite mad. Perhaps no conductor can safely do that in the face of Strauss's exactions upon the orchestra. Besides what would the bourgeoisie say (who never go even half-mad) if Til and Strauss were so cut loose? Yet the conductor did give the tone-poem a comic heartiness, a gamesome warmth quite as much in accord with it as Dr. Muck's snapping wit and biting ironies. There is no more stimulating sensation at a Symphony Concert than a fresh point of view. And in the hearing of this music in new circumstance, what mattered Strauss's nationality, which, admittedly, in wartime or peacetime sits exceedingly light upon him? Enough that Strauss the individual—and it is the individual who counts in the arts—has written an incomparable music in "Til-Eulenspiegel," that keeps quality and makes impression the world around.

Mr. Monteux appreciates contrast in programme-making and before German Strauss and Flemish Til, he set Italian Respighi and his tone-poem, "The Fountains of Rome." A note lists the four fountains, hints at the mood or the vision each stirred in the composer; yet one and all they have little to do with the music. Mr. Respighi might never have looked upon the fountain in Valle Giulia on the outskirts of the city and yet written his measures of misty dawn with the light creeping into the music and warming it. He might be as far from the fountains of the Triton and of Trevi as were his hearers in Boston, and yet set the sea-folk to sporting in tones, and summoned his sumptuous and sounding pageant of the passing sea-god. Remote from the gardens of the Villa Medici, composer may still know the tremulous light and air, the melancholy mood of sunset and bid his tones evoke them.

All this is pretty fancy, but Mr. Respighi's music, as symphonic music should be, is quite self-contained. He is whole-hearted modernist as he writes, but no perverse, assertive and "advanced" individualist. He plies a full modern orchestra with keen sense of timbres and an adroit hand, for fine-spun yet clear detail. He is not in the least afraid of dissonance when it suits his imaginative scheme; but he is not tireless pursuer of acrid harmonies. He has a Latin instinct for clear design, a Latin feeling for sensuous warmth and charm. His sea-pageant rings richly, pictorially, upon the ear. Large melodic sweep speeds and animates the music. A pensive charm colors the beginning of the tone-poem as though mood and music were brightening with the light. A gentle, musing melancholy exhales from the twilight close. Mr. Respighi finds the suggesting motif; unashamed he deepens and broadens it into persuasive and by no means too original melody. A more ingratiating piece than this tone-poem the Symphony Concerto have not known for long. With one accord the audience rose to it.

The other novel music of the afternoon—Mr. Strube's four Preludes—was amusing in the French sense of the word. There is not a reason in the world why a composer should not write Preludes for orchestra as Chopin wrote Preludes for piano—brief, moody, technically exacting pieces, fantasias as it were in little. Indeed it was happy notion on Mr. Strube's part so to do. And what a good time, as we used to say at school, he must have had in the doing! Fancy free, he can play with the chosen instruments as he does, for example, with the lower tones of the clarinet and the tinkle of the celesta. With a twinkle in his eye, he can write to the learned compiler of the programme-book about a "plain and simple" minuet and then slip intervals into it that would have sadly rasped eighteenth-century ears and even keep an edge for those of the twentieth. It must be fun to make little arabesques in tones for the mere sake of the design, and Mr. Strube takes five minutes of such pleasure in his first Prelude. Remembering, perhaps, how Chopin could be big-voiced and sustained in a Prelude for piano, so is Mr. Strube in his second Prelude for orchestra. The third is the minuet aforesaid with its demure air of tonal innocence. The fourth is Mr. Strube's gay wave of farewell to his audience and to the orchestra with which he has toyed. Bye and large that audience may have taken no particular joy of him, but the knowing in modern ways with harmonies and timbres and pattern-weaving, have had just as good time as he. Once more, blessed are those who take their jobs lightly.

So back to Brahms and to the fourth symphony with which Mr. Monteux began the afternoon. The other day in New York, Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra played one or another of Brahms's symphonies—played it too elegantly for some ears, with too many finicking details and inflections. So doing, as a reviewer or two remarked, they missed the composer's large vigors and forthright progress. If Mr. Monteux, in turn, bears his Brahms to New York, he will at least escape such reproach. He caught the tossing rhythms, the impetuous movement, the wave-like surface, the plastic body of the first Allegro, the pervading ardor that keeps it aglow. The beauty may be grave, but it is also golden. It warms the mind and stirs the heart—the more, yesterday, for the rich tone and the supple precision of the strings, for the sensibility of the whole orchestra and of the conductor as well, to Brahms's dusky—not muddy—instrumental coloring.

Another sort of beauty haunts the unfolding line of the slow movement, while rich again were the tonal body and texture the band gave it. French clarity, French sense of just expression have uses with Brahms no less than with Gallic composers, and how well Mr. Monteux answered to the large, warm voice of the music. The scherzo went for exactly what it is—neither bustle nor flutter but playful vigor of fancy. And again, rich and plastic was the orchestral tone. In turn, the wood-winds, and especially Mr. Laurent at the flute, outdid themselves in the earlier and songful variations of the finale; while further onward, Mr. Monteux wrought a large-voiced Brahmsian tumult. There is a passion in this symphony though it be grave and measured; it has a noble line and voice; a tempered richness clothes it. Mr. Monteux gave it such eloquence, even if he did not altogether sustain the large and manifold outline, rising in tones as may be, in vision an architect conjures up his edifice. Such hint of halt, such momentary choppiness could not much lessen the vitality of the whole. Back came the old thrill in Brahms and thrill, too, as in older days of the band, to such richness of orchestral tone.

H. T. PARKER

FOUR PRELUDES GUSTAV STRUBE

(Born at Ballenstedt, March 3, 1867; now living at Baltimore, Md.)

Mr. Strube has kindly furnished these notes:—

"These little preludes do not need much explanation.

"The first one, Molto allegro, has only one theme which appears after a few measures of introduction and is developed into different little patterns. The character is that of a Scherzo.

"The second one, Quasi adagio, is a little more elaborate. The main theme of a pastoral character is played by the English horn. It is followed by a little development, combined with a new theme and then ended by the reappearance of the first one.

"The third one is in the character of a Minuet, viz., plain and simple.

Mr. Strube, having received his first instruction from his father, who was town musician in his native place, studied for four years at the Leipsic Conservatory,—the violin with Adolf Brodsky, the pianoforte with Alois Keckendorf, and composition with Carl Reinecke and Salomon Jadassohn. He taught at the Conservatory of Music at Mannheim. In 1891 he came to the United States and was engaged as one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He resigned this position in the spring of 1913 to become chief teacher of theory and composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music at Baltimore. For several years he conducted the Popular Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also the orchestral pieces at the Worcester County (Mass.) Music Festivals.

THE PADEREWSKI PRIZES

Mr. William P. Blake, surviving trustee of the I. J. Paderewski Fund for American Composers, offers two prizes for the current year: One of one thousand ($1,000) dollars for a Symphony and one of five hundred ($500) dollars for a piece of Chamber Music, either for strings alone or for pianoforte or other solo instrument or instruments, with strings.

The judges who have agreed to serve are Charles Martin Loeffler, Wallace Goodrich and Frederick Stock.

The prizes are open only to American-born citizens, or to those born in Europe of American parents. The pieces offered must never have been performed in public, and never offered at any previous competition. They must be sent in under an assumed name or motto, with the composer's real name and address enclosed in a sealed envelope sent at the same time. Each orchestral score must be accompanied by an arrangement for the pianoforte for four hands.

The pieces are to be sent to Mrs. Elizabeth C. Allen, Secretary for the Paderewski Fund, at the New England Conservatory of Music, Gainsborough Street and Huntington Avenue, Boston, Massachusetts, between September 15 and September 20, 1921, and no earlier or later. The judges reserve the right to make no award, if the compositions sent in do not seem of sufficient merit to deserve prizes.

The decision of a majority of the judges is to be binding on all parties concerned.

The trustees assume no responsibility for the loss of manuscript while in transit.

74

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SIXTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, AT 8 P.M.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in C major, (Köchel No. 425)

- I. Adagio; Allegro spiritoso
- II. Poco adagio
- III. Menuetto
- IV. Presto

MASON,

FIVE SONGS for Baritone and Orchestra. op. 18.
"Russians"

- a) A Drunkard
- b) A Concertina Player
- c) A Revolutionary
- d) A Boy
- e) A Prophet

RAVEL,

SUITE for Orchestra, "Le Tombeau de Couperin." ("Couperin's Tomb")

- I. Prelude
- II. Forlane
- III. Menuet
- IV. Rigaudon

ENESCO,

ROUMANIAN RHAPSODY in A major, op. 11 .No. 1

Soloist:

REINALD WERRENRATH

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

75

Reinald Werrenrath

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Early Work of Mozart
Given for First Time in Twenty Years

WERRENRATH SINGS SONGS BY MASON

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major (K. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra; Ravel, "Couperin's Tomb," Suite for orchestra (first time in America); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, A major, op. 11, No. 1. Reinald Werrenrath was the singer.

The music by Mozart had not been played at Symphony for 20 years. The neglect is surprising, for, although this work was written hurriedly and before the famous three symphonies with which we are all familiar, it still has life and beauty; it is still a proof of Mozart's delicate sense of proportion; melodically it is eminently Mozartian. Mr. Monteux did not double the wind instruments; he employed those indicated by Mozart and reduced the string choir, a sane proceeding, for thus the music did not lose its character, nor did it lack strength.

The performance was in fine taste, and most euphonious. Strings and the oboes sang; melodic passages of Mozart must be sung as the old Italians understood that word. And of all the masters before Beethoven and of many down to the present time, Mozart demands perfection in performance; he gained beautiful effects with the utmost economy of means.

It is not easy to forget the singer in speaking of Mr. Mason's songs. Mr. Werrenrath was the first to sing them; he has made them his own. What would other baritones do with them? Mr. Mason chose verses of Mr. Bynner and endeavored to emphasize their meaning by the employment of a huge orchestra.

A huge orchestra may be used discreetly in the accompaniment of a song, but it is not necessary either in accompaniment or in a symphonic work to have all the instruments at work all the time, as some composers think, especially the young men of symphonic poems and the post-Wagnerian composers of Germany. Mr. Mason has some lucky strokes in his instrumentation, but too often the voice was covered, nor was this the fault of the singer or of Mr. Monteux.

While the voice part is written frequently as if it were an orchestral instrument, with a disregard for easily sung and effective intervals, there are times when, with a simpler accompaniment, it would be sufficiently dramatic. Mr. Werrenrath's diction, as we all know, is unusually clear and significant, but such taxing demands are made upon him by Mr. Mason, that more than once the text was not intelligible.

Without question, the composer comprehended the spirit of the verses; he was able to differentiate; but the expression of his musical translation was too often labored, and even inconsequential, in spite of the stress and storm, the shouting and the orchestral fury. Mr. Werrenrath's part in the performance was worthy of the highest praise; so, too, was the orchestra's led by Mr. Monteux. The singer re-created Mr. Mason's music: he almost persuaded the hearer that it was inherently dramatic and eloquent. Especially noteworthy was Mr. Werrenrath's interpretation of "A Drunkard," and "A Revolutionary"; while in "A Prophet" he was as fanatical as any Hebrew in the desert or in a voluptuous city, trumpeting the Lord's approaching day of wrath.

Ravel wrote a Suite for piano; a Suite in six movements; each inscribed to the memory of a comrade killed in the war. He transcribed four of these movements for a small orchestra, and with what exquisite art! It was unfortunate for Mr. Mason that the display of this art followed the performance of his orchestral accompaniment. Is it possible that Ravel, giving the title "Couperin's Tomb" to this suite in the ancient manner, or as that great master of the clavecin might write for orchestra today, if he were a colleague of Ravel, infused a peculiar melancholy in two of the dance movements, remembering his dead friends?

The Forlane, for example, was a very lively dance of the gondoliers in Venice; but no one hearing the Forlane of yesterday, played in accordance with Ravel's indication, would have believed this. Charming music is this Suite and it was charmingly performed. It deserved heartier appreciation than it gained, for, musically considered, it was the feature of the concert.

The performance of Enesco's rhapsody was extraordinarily brilliant. It was the fifth time at these concerts, but yesterday the rhapsody was played with a sweep and a dash, with a sense of color and a spirit of rhythmic intoxication that caused all previous performances to seem pale and phlegmatic.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is announced as follows: Mendelssohn, Octet in E flat for strings, Op. 20; Franck, symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; Stravinsky, orchestral suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

NEW WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Reinald Werrenrath Is Soloist at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Jordan Hall, and he sang a cycle of songs, "Russia," by Daniel Gregory, heard for the first time in this city. Ravel's suite, originally composed for piano, and now orchestrated, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," was played for the first time in America.

A little known symphony of Mozart in C major (Kochel No. 425) opened the programme and an amazing performance of Enesco's A major Roumanian Rhapsody brought it to a close.

MR. WERRENRATH'S SINGING

Mr. Werrenrath gave proof again of his remarkable talent, his intelligence, his musicianship, his mastery of his voice which has become more striking every year. The songs of Mr. Mason could hardly have had a more sympathetic, appreciative, enthusiastic interpretation. Fortunate the composer with such an artist to present his work to the public! Unfortunate the public which has to listen to such deadly dull music by a composer!

The audience applauded Mr. Werrenrath very warmly. He would have had an even greater success with better material.

For Small Orchestra

Mozart's symphony was played by an orchestra reduced in numbers so as to be more in consonance with Mozart's instrumentation and style, and the experiment was very successful. Conductors of orchestral concerts in large halls hesitate to reduce a modern symphony orchestra, admittedly too heavy and thick for the fineness and transparency of Mozart's scoring, because they fear the tone will be lost in the large auditorium. It did not prove so yesterday. The performance was as admirable as it was effective, and the symphony should be heard more often.

It may not be the "Jupiter" symphony, which is in the same key. It may not equal the great three symphonies which Mozart wrote and which are played over and over again—the "Jupiter" and the symphonies in G minor and E flat. Nevertheless Mozart did write other symphonies than those three, and nearly everything Mozart wrote has enough genius in it to warrant a hearing. The C major symphony heard yesterday is a delightful work, as it was delightfully played.

It is hard to understand the relation between Ravel's dedication of a suite of four movements in the ancient manner, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," with the war, and brave comrades who died, to whom he has dedicated the different movements. Of the four movements, only the Menuet is grave and melancholy. The other dances are lively and humorous and little miracles of genius and skill.

The more one hears of Ravel the more one marvels at the versatility of his mind, his almost magical technic, and the fact that he never repeats himself in his music, seeming invariably to do extremely well the particular task he sets himself. Here we have a somewhat archaic "Prelude," "Forlane," "Menuet" and "Rigaudon." There is wit; there is irony; there is the wanton employment of extremely dissonant intervals and harmonies which result from them with incredibly piquant effect. Modern in harmonic texture, the music never steps out of its old-fashioned frame, and at times it rises to heights of rare and haunting beauty. Such are the beauties of the sad and retrospective "Menuet" and of the captivating middle section of the "Rigaudon," the section in which Mr. Longy's oboe solo was delivered with incomparable art.

Really Heard for First Time

Finally, there was such a performance of Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody as had not been heard or scarcely hinted at at these concerts. Much, Fiedler, had played the piece repeatedly. It had even gone on "Pop" programme. It had seemed very long, without sufficient contrast or development of its ideas, its folk tunes.

Yesterday it was coherent in its development, exhilarating, intoxicating, maddening, if you like, in the highest degree. It is real peasant music, and like Roumanian folk-music, one theme will have a Slavic twist and another will appear to come from farther away, from Persia or Turkey, let us say. The revel becomes always wilder, and the primitive energy and abandon of the music seizes everyone, as it would seize wild dancers in another land. Then there is the orchestration, the most intriguing, exciting, provocative orchestration, which sets off with sheer genius the musical ideas.

Enesco's music had been played before at these concerts: it was heard for the first time yesterday, and amply deserving by Mr. Monteux and his men was the audience's tribute, tribute not only to an individual performance, but for the wonderful way in which this conductor is developing the orchestra.

SYMPHONY HEARERS GIVEN NOVEL FEAST

Work of Mozart Revived
After 20 Years

There was only one number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert which was not new to nearly everyone in the audience, Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody. The symphony was one of the four Mozart wrote in the key of C major, not the familiar "Jupiter," but an earlier work unheard here since 1900, numbered 425 in the Kochel index.

Mason's "Russians" and Ravel's orchestral version of his piano pieces grouped under the fanciful title "Couperin's Tomb" were both new to Boston.

Mr. Monteux, unlike his predecessors, used for the Mozart an orchestra no larger than those for which the composer wrote. He reduced the number of strings so as to restore the original balance between strings and woodwind. The innovation immediately justified itself by the greater grace and delicacy imparted to the performance, the best Monteux has yet given of an 18th century classic.

Reinald Werrenrath sang the Mason songs as though he were not quite convinced that they had unusual merit. Mr. Mason has been at different times a pupil of Ethelbert Nevin and of Vincent D'Indy. From the latter he has learned a great and intricate variety of orchestral, harmonic and contrapuntal devices for concealing the sort of melodic imagination found in the work of the former. The singer's voice and reputation won him numerous recalls.

Ravel is probably the cleverest composer who ever succeeded in making a little genius go a long way by the aid of a great deal of skill. He reminds one in this respect of Saint Saens, over whom he has nowadays the advantage of employing tricks which have not had time yet to grow stale and commonplace. The "Tomb of Couperin" is a group of four immensely ingenious trifles, which has its full effect only on those observant of the technique employed. The music says almost nothing, but says it with superlative adroitness.

Enesco's Rhapsody is rather crudely entertaining light music by a composer less learned than Mason and less clever than Ravel. It was superbly played, better than we have ever heard it and enthusiastically applauded. But all three of these moderns fade into insignificance beside the genuine power and beauty of Mozart, even in a lesser work.

Next week the orchestra will play an octet by Mendelssohn for string orchestra; the Interlude from Franck's "Redemption"; and, for the first time here a suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

Mr. Monteux's New Music Trans. Nov. 18, 1920

The orchestral novelty of the Symphony Concerts this week is Ravel's Suite, "The Tomb of Couperin," originally published for the piano and subsequently arranged for orchestra by the composer. At least in music, new wine can sometimes be put into old bottles; and that is what Ravel has accomplished in this Suite. The four pieces—Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon—are all in the manner, as the 20th century may imitate it of Couperin and Rameau. The Forlane is a dance of Italian origin not often encountered; it runs in six-eight time and is as the indication Allegretto suggests, of a graceful character. The other pieces need no comment. Ravel's harmony is modern, but with a strongly diatonic cast, and nowhere is he very far from the spirit of his models. His orchestral requirements are modest: two flutes, an oboe and English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, one trumpet, harp and strings—practically the orchestra of Mozart, yet the scoring is that of today. In short, the Suite is adroit, charming music that should give immediate pleasure.

Another new piece—or rather series of pieces—will also be heard, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra, with verse by Witter Bynner, music by Daniel Gregory Mason and Mr. Werrenrath as singer. When he sang them in New York with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last winter, Mr. Spaeth wrote the following note about the songs for The Transcript:

Mr. Bynner's poems, if they can be called such, are couched in the colloquial, conversational style that made the horrors of his "Tiger" so realistic. As in that play, a vein of sardonic humor runs through most of them, something not easily caught in musical terms. The series, which appeared originally in the Metropolitan Magazine, describes in the first person the sensations of a Drunkard, a Concertina-Player, a Revolutionary, a Boy and a Prophet.

Mr. Mason has attempted only here and there to suggest a definite Russian atmosphere in his music for these free-hand sketches. The Russian quality is most marked in the second and third songs. The second ("The Concertina-Player") in particular is built upon a theme which might easily be an actual Russian folk-song, and treated somewhat in the manner of Chaikovsky, with an occasional hint of Musorgsky himself. . . . The aimless wandering of the tramp musician sounds perhaps in the monotonous bass, and the whimsicalities of the monologue are fairly closely followed in the declaration, particularly at the end, when the musician proudly offers this delicious testimony of his powers: "I often play for beggars, and they pay me!"

"The Drunkard" is remarkable chiefly for the cruelly high range of the vocal part. Here the text cries out for a rollicking tune of the folk type, with more regard for rhythmic individuality than accuracy of declamation. "The Revolutionary" has much national atmosphere, but the text suffers from such trite phrases as "Nothing has hurt like your misunderstanding me," and "It would not be so hard." There is a solemn, almost gloomy mood here, which contrasts with the rest of Mr. Mason's music. "A Boy" is picturesque and imaginative, containing the lightest and happiest touches of the series, both in words and in music, yet less significant than some of the others in actual content.

Mr. Bynner saved his flamboyant satire for the final poem, "A Prophet." In this burlesque of religious fanaticism, he makes his hero, after commanding universal suicide in preparation for the end of the world, utter this unique farewell:

I take my leave of you, I lead the way,
Hand me the rope, make sure the noose
will slip,

Forgive me if I have not saved your souls.
And I forgive you for not listening.
My mother I forgive for bearing me,
My father for begetting me,
Mankind for being like me.
So farewell! Receive me, God!

Mr. Mason revels in the opportunities for realistic suggestion in these lines, as well as in the preceding details of "the knife, the gun, the rope," and he hangs his prophet finally with a musical timing of the drop worthy of a Berlioz or a Strauss. Technically this music, like most of the rest, is an impressive feat. A close analysis might disclose the fact that Mr. Werrenrath's interpretation has more to do with the success of the cycle than the work of either poet or composer.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW MUSIC AND A SUCCESSFUL EXPERIMENT

Mozart from a Small and Plastic Orchestra—Ravel Amuses with the Ways of the Ancients—Mr. Werrenrath's, Mr. Mason's and Mr. Bynner's "Russians"—Finally a Blaze of Roumanian Wildness

IN his usual quiet fashion Mr. Monteux has made another change for the better in the ways of the Symphony Concerts. Yesterday afternoon, for the first time, as it seemed, within the longest memory, a symphony of the eighteenth century was played by a relatively small orchestra. It happened to be a symphony of Mozart, written late in his fertile twenties and unheard hereabouts since 1900. According to the practice of his time he scored it for two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettle-drum and strings. According to precedent at Symphony Hall and almost everywhere else, Mr. Monteux should have employed nearly his full string choir and doubled the other parts to cope with this body of tone. Instead, he kept the paired wind instruments of Mozart's design and reduced violins, violas, violoncellos and double-basses until the whole band approximated in numbers and balance a concert-orchestra of the composer's day. It sufficed for sonority in every corner of the hall. It gained a lightness of tone that was truer and more natural voice to the music than sixty strings and a doubled wind choir can possibly be. It achieved a corresponding suppleness of pace, accent, modulation. The symphony moved fleetly, transparently. No longer did unescapable weight of tone stiffen plasticity, over-emphasize turn and transition, cloud harmonic brightness, dull light play with figures. As the symphony sounded to hearers at Linz in 1783, so now, in measure, it entered the ears of Bostonians in 1920. At Mr. Monteux's hands long-standing theory at last became altogether justifiable practice.

Throughout, for the change, the music pleased the more. This little symphony in C major—long a favorite with Mr. Monteux in Paris—has none of the gravity or the latent power of the three symphonies of Mozart's final years. It begins gently, slowly, songfully; the ensuing Allegro brings the zest of graceful invention and plastic progress. The slow movement sings simply, pensively. The Minuet is simpler still and not less gracious. The Finale ripples brightly, swiftly. Always it is as though the ear were taking the pure pleasure of music spun like an embroidery upon the air with fancy to shape it and charm to clothe it. The pleasure was the keener and ampler for the transparency, the pifancy, of the transmitting voices. For once, Mozart's fine and vibrant line was neither thickened nor stiffened; his playful or musing modulations were as little glints upon the surface of the music; figure and arabesque ran light and bright; there was sheen upon the harmonic and instrumental texture of the whole. To gain these qualities and to add to them felicity of pace and rhythm and grace of mood is to summon the simple charm, the musical delight of such a symphony. Mr. Monteux could hardly have made happier experiment.

Set magic upon some composer among the ancients—not Mozart this time, but say Monsieur Couperin of the Versailles of Louis XIV. and the Paris of the Regency. Let that magic possess him for the moment with the ways of the twentieth century in modulation, harmony, instrumental color, while otherwise he keeps his native simplicity, fancy, elegance. How would he have written? Perhaps much as Monsieur Ravel writes in the little suite played yesterday for the first time in America and called "Couperin's Tomb," which, being freely interpreted, is a garland of music wound about that resting-place. Originally, six short pieces for piano were twined into it. Discarding a Fugue and a Toccata, the composer re-made the other four—Prelude, Forlane, Minuet and Rigadoon—for an orchestra hardly larger than Mozart's and appropriately so. In the process Ravel has piled a sophisticated simplicity. He modulates often as with the tips of his fingers. Delicately he sets in characteristic harmonies. Finely he spins the instrumental strands, lays on no more than flecks of light and shade. Everywhere his touch is apt, sure, elegant. There are details of rare finesse and details as well of smiling fancy.

If Couperin hears through the cracks of his tomb, he has reason to be well pleased. "Had I known," he may even say to himself, "so should I have written." With equal reason he may take pleasure in the bright and graceful measures of the Prelude, the rhythmic animation of the lightly springing Forlane as the Venetians named their dance; the formal flow of the minuet, gentle and not too stately; the lively progress of the piping, twinkling Rigadoon. Ravel designs his tonal masquerade after the best models, wears it at happy and pleasurable ease. Yet now and then the familiar lines of his musical figure, so to say, and the sound of his own voice will betray him. Enough that he has been adroit, felicitous, amusing—a little master of playful finesse. Once upon a time he could write sardonic parodies of other men's music. With another turn of the same talent, he now chise's miniatures after Couperin.

Anything but miniatures were the five songs for baritone and orchestra, sung by Mr. Werrenrath, at last called to the Symphony Concerts as no solo voice in a choral piece but as "assisting artist" in his own right. Long since he deserved the call and an audience mindful of his deserts welcomed him warmly, expectantly. His own choice were these "Russians" and before he had proceeded far poet and composer clearly owed him much. The poet is Witter Bynner who wrote these "character-pieces" in free verse after a vivid, sympathetic book about Russia had engrossed and kindled him. In the first "The Drunkard," half fuddled with liquor, muses upon the unhappy state of one denied by his wife the shelter of his own roof. Yet does an inner warmth comfort him. In the second, a "Concertina-Player" sings of a lot by no means without compensations, as he tramps the open road and even beggars throw him coppers for his music. In the third a condemned "Revolutionary" speaks to a father and especially to a mother—too far away to hear—of the love he bears them, of the deep and simple devotion within him. To the mother:

I have no sweetheart except you and earth,
And earth is a strange sweetheart.
It sees me strong and young and beautiful,
Yet has no wish for me.
I must give up, go out.
I who have cared so much!

The fourth is no more than vignette of gray sky, gray geese across it, gray water with a girl's white feet mirrored in it and gray-eyed boy watching, wondering. Last a "Prophet" exuberantly foretells a general doom and gives himself ardently to the sacrifice of a hangman's noose.

So far Mr. Bynner, ironic of humor with his drunkard; fantastic of humor with his prophet; lyric with his gray vision; ironic still, but warming with his tramp-musician; grave and glowing with his devoted prisoner. With the five also is he graphic and concentrated always. Then enter Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason with music that, in scheme, Mahler's "cycles" of songs for voice and orchestra may have suggested. Seemingly he knows as little of Russians at first hand as Mr. Bynner and in his measures a single hearing discovers small trace of Russian idiom outside the song of the concertina-player. Rather he works from the direct suggestion of the verse upon his powers of imagination and characterization in tones. Yet not so much in characterization as in running comment, illustrating, enforcing the progress of each song.

Don Juan springs into being in Strauss's tone-poem; human figures take shape and spirit in the songs of Wolf and Musorgsky. Mr. Mason can do no such office for Mr. Bynner's personages. No more can he illuminate them with Wagner's flashes of divination and projection. What he can do and does do is to mate his music closely to the verse, following the rough contours, heeding the irregular rhythms. At the same time, that music sharpens details as in the final song of the fanatic; widens the vision as when the tramp-musician sings of the sunny open road; sustains a gentle atmosphere as in the lyric in gray; underscores the drunkard's jerky musings; seeks but not quite gains the mingled glow and bitterness of the "Revolutionary's" longings. Various, incessantly, and often graphically Mr. Mason's music is illustrative; yet minute and close-bound to the verse as it so must be, he holds it firmly and elastically together, keeps it in steady motion. Not often is it music of impinging imagination; rather it is music of mental energy and resource conceived, applied with no small will. By so much it is tour de force in kind.

Finally enters Mr. Werrenrath to begin where the others end. Mr. Bynner has sketched the characters; Mr. Mason has lighted and shaded them. It remains for the singer to call them to life, to give them individualizing speech and spirit. Like Mahler, the composer often treats the voice as though it were but another instrument in his orchestra. Mr. Bynner's verse is not readily "singable." Nothing daunted Mr. Werrenrath sets to his declamation. When he has done, drunkard and fanatic, wanderer and prisoner, the boy of the gray day have each lived their moment to ear and imagination. If Mr. Mason has done his feat of illustrative music, still more has Mr. Werrenrath done his of characterization in tones. All his powers of voice, command of song, vigors of imagination join together to this single end and accomplish it. The propulsive force that poet and composer miss he summons. They are heard and noted. He vanishes, while through him these Russians speak.

Another wildness ended the concert—the wildness of Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody. Up and down, forward and back, he whips bare and sinewy motifs. Fiercely and more fiercely beat the rhythms. Modulations bite; suspensions tingle; repetitions drive home. The music crouches for breath, then springs forward again, leaping ever higher. A conductor would be made of stone, an orchestra would be adamant, did they not catch fire from this barbaric blaze. Rather Mr. Monteux and his men flamed with it. He flung it out as though it were the wildest of ballets; they, as in the old days laid on and spared not, as supple and sure as they were stout. No wonder the other two rhapsodies have disappeared as failures. A composer may hardly have more than one such piece within him.

H. T. PARKER

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on November 19 with the following program: Mozart, Symphony in C major (Köchel No. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra, op. 18; Ravel, "Le Tombeau de Couperin"; Enesco, Roumanian rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1. The distinctive feature of this concert was the performance of Mozart's symphony. For it, the orchestra was reduced in numbers. This served to give the work a more intimate appeal, without any crude attempt at archaism. The playing of this small "chamber orchestra" was a marvel of grace and elegance. The phrases were sung with an exquisite sense of proportion and the quality of tone was a delight to the ear. It is without doubt one of the most distinctive things which Mr. Monteux has done in Boston so far. Reinald Werrenrath sang Daniel Gregory Mason's "Russians" for the first time in Boston. They are settings of poems by Witter Bynner. The rough realism of these poems call for the musical genius of the Moussorgsky type to give them an adequate musical interpretation. Mr. Mason's settings, to our way of thinking, fail to catch the distinctive note of the poems.

At a first hearing there seems to be no reason why the music to one poem would not do equally well for another. There are various preludes, interludes and postludes which seem to have no apparent reason for their introduction, as they create no atmosphere and in several cases serve only to hinder the movement of the song. There is much searching for effect in the orchestration, and occasional moments of unusual color are the result. Ravel's suite was played for the first time in America. The material is already familiar in a piano-forte version. In its orchestral form the suite appeals by its whimsical fancy. The interpretation was remarkable for its virtuosity, particularly on the part of the wood-wind instruments. The brilliant orchestration of Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody failed to conceal its harmonic poverty and rhythmic vulgarity.

REINALD WERRENATH

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CHILDREN'S CONCERTS

Harvard — Nov. 23/26
Conductor Monteux Arranging Program for Dec. 7 and 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote the week of Dec. 5 to two concerts, given on the evenings of Dec. 7 and Dec. 9, for the pleasure of the younger generation, instead of giving the regular two concerts in Symphony Hall that week. The experiment was tried last year, and its success was so apparent that the programs will be arranged in much the same way as they were at that time. Their design is to acquaint young persons of Boston and vicinity with symphonic music as played by the full orchestra under its regular conductor.

Pierre Monteux is arranging a program which will represent the finest music in the orchestral repertory, but which will be simple and of direct appeal.

Mr. REINALD WERRENATH, baritone, was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., on August 7, 1883. He went back to Copenhagen with his parents, where they lived for two years, and then returned to Brooklyn. When he was ten years old he began to study the violin, but five years later he turned his attention to singing. His first teacher was his father,* a Danish tenor of high reputation in Europe and this country. Later, young Werrenrath studied with other teachers in this country. Hav-

* George Werrenrath, a native of Copenhagen, having sung in opera and concert in European cities, came to the United States in 1876, when he made Brooklyn his home. Solo tenor of Plymouth Church, he was associated with Theodore Thomas in concert trips and he sang in opera—"Faust," "Der Freischütz," "Lohengrin." His first appearance in Boston was at a Theodore Thomas concert on November 20, 1876, when he sang an air from Handel's "Sosarme" and Clay's "Sands of Dee." It is said that he was the first in this country to give a series of song recitals (February, 1877, with Carl Wolfsohn, pianist). Mr. Werrenrath died at Brooklyn in 1898.

ing attended the schools in that city, he entered New York University. At college he led the Glee Club, and for four years was the conductor of the University Heights Choral Society. He sang in several church choirs. In 1908 he attracted attention by singing the music of Carac-tacus in Elgar's oratorio of the same name at the Worcester (Mass.) Festival. In 1913 he gave recitals in London, Paris, Berlin, and else-where; he again sang in London last summer. He made a tour of the United States with Mme. Farrar in 1915, and a tour to the Pacific Coast in 1918. He was engaged at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1918, and made his début as Silvio in "Pagliacci," February 19, 1919.

He has sung with the leading orchestras of this country.

Mr. Werrenrath gave a concert with Beatrice Harrison, violoncellist, on January 15, 1914, in Jordan Hall; sang in Symphony Hall with Mme. Samaroff on November 15, 1914; with Mme. Farrar on October 30, November 14, 1915. In October, 1917, he gave a recital; on March 26 and April 2, 1918, he sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Bach's Passion Music according to Matthew. On May 2, 1919, he sang at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp" was performed here for the first time. He gave recitals on November 7, 1919, and January 17, 1920; on April 4, 1920, he sang the music of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" at a Handel and Haydn concert; and on October 10 he sang with E. Robert Schmitz in Symphony Hall.

He has composed male choruses and edited the "New Arion" and "Modern Scandinavian Songs."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 26, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, AT 8 P. M.

MENDELSSOHN,

OCTETTE for Striugs in E flat, op. 20

- I. Allegro moderato ma con fuoco
- II. Andante
- III. Scherzo; Allegro leggierissimo
- IV. Presto

RESPIGHI,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Fontane di Roma," (Foun-tains of Rome)

The Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn. The Triton Foun-tain at morn. The Fountain of Trevi at mid-day. The Villa Medici Fountain at sunset

STRAVINSKY,

SYMPHONIC SUITE from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
Piano Solo, RAYMOND HAVENS

- I. Fete populaire de la Semaine Grasse. Danse Russe. Fair in Festival Week. Russian Dance
- II. Chez Petrouchka. (Petrouchka at Home)
- III. Fete Populaire de la Semaine Grasse. Vers le soir. Danse des Nourrons. Danse des Cochers et des Palfren-iers. Toward Evening. Nurses' Dance. Dance of Coachmen and Grooms.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Mendelssohn's Octette

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

Stravinsky
(From a Recent Photograph)

1920

7TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Herald — Nov 27, 1920

Mendelssohn's Octet Displays Remarkable Skill of String Choir

MONTEUX PLEASES IN CHOICE OF PIECES

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Octet, E flat major, op. 20 for the string choir; Respighi, "Fountains of Rome," Symphonic poem; Stravinsky, Orchestral suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka," (first time at these concerts).

Mendelssohn wrote this Octet when he was 16 years old. It was at the time an astonishing feat for so young a man; the Octet still commands respect by the workmanship displayed; the fantastical Scherzo is still heard with great pleasure; the other movements have aged. Would that Mendelssohn had always written in the vein of this Scherzo and of another early work, the overture to "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream!" What might he not have accomplished if he had been poor; if he had not been flattered by adoring family and friends; if he had been knocked about the world and had not been wrapped in cotton-wool? There is the Mendelssohn of the works already mentioned, also the "Hebrides" overture, "The Walpurgis Night," the Scherzo in F sharp minor for the piano; then, unfortunately, there is the mass of music by Mendelssohn, the ineffable prig. His music too often brings to mind the portrait in which he is shown with a billowing ruffled shirt and a huge shirt-pin, already to step into an English parlor or to play for the Prince Consort; or as in the caricature by Aubrey Beardsley with pen in hand, probably about to write to some one about the shocking ballet of nuns in

"Robert the Devil," or to express his horror at the sight of poor little Zerkina undressing and singing before the looking glass in "Fra Diavolo."

The Octet had not been heard at a Symphony concert for many years. It tests the strings and is good practice for them. The performance yesterday was excellent. The city may well be proud of this string choir.

It was a pleasure to hear Respighi's beautiful music again, and Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for answering so graciously the request of many. As a rule, an unfamiliar piece is played once, then put on the shelf and not taken down again for many months, or even some years. This is not fair to the audience or the composer, especially when the idiom of the latter is novel. Mr. Monteux is bringing forward many new works by the younger composers of various countries and various schools, while he does not neglect the old masters. This is wise; this is necessary, unless knowledge with appreciation of music becomes stagnant. Undue familiarity with the great works of the old masters is injurious to them. We hear the symphonies of Beethoven so often that it is not easy to recognize the beauty and the grandeur of the better ones. Haydn, a man of many symphonies, is represented from year to year, only by a few that we knew as children by playing them in four-handed arrangements with a teacher or a maiden-aunt. Weber wrote other overtures than the everlasting three. For many years the younger men have not had opportunity to be heard. How woefully scanty, for example, is our acquaintance with the young orchestral composers of Great Britain! But hearing of an important new work at long intervals is not enough to form a judgment; to confirm a sane opinion, favorable or unfavorable.

Great is Stravinsky, writer of ballet music, and Mr. Monteux is his prophet. No wonder that he wished to perform the music of "Petrouchka," for, intimately associated with the composer, he has conducted the first performance of many of his works and many performances thereafter, and with the composer he chose the pages for concert use.

But the music of "Petrouchka," remarkable as it is with the ballet on the stage, is not so well suited for concert performance as is the music of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird." It is as closely connected with the action, as inseparable, as the music of "Pelleas and Melisande" is with the situations, the dialogue and the emotions. Many pages that amuse or thrill when Petrouchka, the Moor and the Ballerine are playing out the tragedy have no significance in the concert hall; they merely excite surprise, or possibly the indignation of the hopelessly conservative who roll their eyes in ecstasy at the mention of Brahms, and would loudly applaud a smug interpretation of Hummel's piano concerto in A minor. Nevertheless Igor Stravinsky is a man to be reckoned with and his music should be heard—heard more than once. The performance yesterday was brilliant.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week; the orchestra will be away.

On Tuesday Dec. 7, Thursday Dec. 9, and Friday Dec. 10 at 4 P. M., the Young People's Concert will take place.

The program of the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon Dec. 17 and Saturday evening Dec. 18 will be as follows: Weber, overture to "Preciosa"; Brahms, violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Bax "In the Faery Hills," Symphonic poem (first time in America); Balakireff, "Islamey," Oriental Fantasy for piano, orchestrated by Alfred Casella (first time in Boston).

A RUSSIAN BALLET BY SYMPHONY

Post Nov. 27, 1920
Stravinsky "Petrouchka" Creates Very Deep Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ultra-modern music, prefaced by one of the earliest compositions of Felix Mendelssohn, made the programme interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The Mendelssohn composition was the Octet for String's op. 20. It was completed in the composer's 16th year. It served to display the splendid tone of the string choir of the orchestra, and possibly, also, Mr. Monteux played it to take the curse off the peppery discords of the music of Stravinsky's music to the ballet "Petrouchka" which came at the end of the programme.

Between these two compositions stood the supreme offering of the afternoon, the symphonic poem, "Fountains of Rome," by the young modern Italian, Respighi, wisely repeated after its success when performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concerts of two weeks preceding.

NOT HEARD SINCE 1885

Mendelssohn's music has not been heard at these concerts since 1885. It is in four very long and platitudinous movements, of which the scherzo is undoubtedly the best. The orchestra was called to its feet after this performance. The applause must have been for the brilliant playing. It is hard to conceive of any who in this day and age would be stirred by the babbling commonplace of this work.

Stravinsky's music was heard for the first time at these concerts, and the performance was masterly from every standpoint. This is music intended first of all, of course, to go with a stage spectacle.

Extraordinary Originality

Having seen the ballet, which was given a number of times by the Ballet Russe in this city, the music again made a deep impression on the writer, because of its vitality, its dramatic, characterizing power, its rough popular humor, the scraps of Russian folk music so vigorously employed, and the extraordinary originality of both harmony and instrumentation.

How much this music meant to many unacquainted with the stage spectacle, it is not so easy to say. They probably often wondered what it was all about, while other hearers, who had also been beholders, saw before them the riotous throng at the fair in the admiralty market place, the dances of peasants, players, traders and the like; the two organ grinders; the old magician at whose bidding Petrouchka—symbolizing, it is said, the Russian people—dances and mimes; the pains and smarts of Petrouchka, beaten, writhing and groaning, while wind instruments sound discordant; Petrouchka's struggles against the vile Moor, and all his evil; and the fair again, the merriment growing wilder, and finally, in the pale light of the dawn, the ghost of the murdered

Petrouchka, frantically waving its arms over the top of the magician's booth.

Score a Marvel of Genius

The score is a marvel of genius, genius which creates with the certainty and the recklessness and prodigality of inspiration which can do anything with the tonal materials employed. The work hangs together even in the concert-room, without explanatory evolutions and gestures on the stage. The conclusion, the eerie, ghastly music of Petrouchka's end, puts the hearer under a spell, even when he is far from the theatre. Above all, there is felt continually the background of life, the commotion, the bustle, the clattering tongues of the crowd, the wildness and extravagance of drunken dances, of legendary songs shouted out by revelers.

All this is in Stravinsky's music. It was felt, if not wholly apprehended, by many unfamiliar with the scenes of the ballet. Yet it must be admitted that this music loses greatly when transplanted from the theatre to the concert hall.

Respighi's Masterpiece

The imperishable memory of the concert remains that of the masterpiece of Respighi. Here is a beauty unutterably pure, Italian, patrician, a beauty which is the product of centuries of culture and art, and a land where beauty itself finds its valued home.

The work is as original and racial as it is unforced and unerring in the achievement of impressionistic effects by Respighi's wondrous orchestra.

C.S.M. — Nov. 27, 1920

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on November 26 was as follows: Mendelssohn, octette for strings in E flat op. 20; Respighi, "Fontane di Roma"; Stravinsky, orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka."

Does not Mendelssohn's octette suffer in being transferred to a large hall, with each of its eight parts many times doubled? It would seem so on hearing it yesterday. The details of its delicate workmanship were somewhat obscured and the magnified version lost the intimate character of chamber music which is properly associated with the work. Nevertheless, it served as a virtuoso piece for the string section of the orchestra and as such was effective, if in quite a different manner from that intended by the composer. Respighi's "Fontane di Roma," given for the first time in Boston two weeks ago, was substituted for Franck's symphonic piece from the Redemption as originally announced. Would that all important new compositions might thus be repeated. Few worthy compositions can be fully understood at a first hearing. Respighi's symphonic poem is a case in point. Yesterday's hearing revealed unexpected beauties of melody and color and it may confidently be said that the composition is a welcome addition to our orchestral repertory.

Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" is distinctly music for the theater. No doubt the many harmonic barbarities serve to heighten the dramatic action. In the concert room they are often tiresome. There is little thematic interest, little to stir the emotions when the music is played apart from the dramatic action. There are clever orchestral effects, it is almost needless to say. The prodigious command of orchestral technic excites astonishment. It must be admitted that there are occasional poetic moments, as in the final measures of the suite. The program served well to show the virtuosity of the orchestra. Yet it included two works which properly speaking are out of place on a symphony program. Raymond Havens was the pianist in the Stravinsky work, although, as the piano is treated as a purely orchestral instrument, it is to be wondered why his name should be featured when all the musicians of the orchestra distinguished themselves so signally in the interpretation of a difficult and taxing composition.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Mendelssohn's Octette

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 27, 1920

THE GLORIOUS DAY OF "LITTLE PETER"

Stravinsky's "Petrushka" for the First Time in Boston Outside a Theatre—Strange to Say It Gains by the Transfer—Rare Pleasure and Stimulus—Mendelssohn's Octet Alive and Well After Ninety-Five Years—Another Notable Performance—Respighi and the Middle Way

(A noted drawing of Petrushka appears on Page 4 of Part 5)

WHEN Mr. Gericke took leave of the Symphony Orchestra in the spring of 1906, there was a ceremonial concert in his honor with making of speeches, bestowal of wreaths and, in general, what the pious call a laying-on of hands. One speaker congratulated the conductor, his forces, composers and the practitioners of music yesterday, today and forever upon the solace they yielded the tired businessman when he settled into his seat in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening assured, through an hour and three-quarters, of rest and recreation. The compliment was well-intended; but, for obvious reasons, it did not altogether please the retiring Gericke or accord altogether with his deserts. Like Mr. Paur before him, in his final years in Boston, he had opened the door of the Symphony Concerts to the moderns and the ultra-moderns in whose music there is no peace. In succession Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler swung the gate wider, and now Mr. Monteux has timely and wisely thrust it back upon its very hinges. The brief interregnum of Mr. Rabaud, with his easy entertainments for the elderly, brought, possibly, the last respite. For, were the business-man ten times as tired as he likes to profess himself, his repose of old time in Symphony Hall would not be proof against the Roumanian Rhapsody of Enesco, the suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushka," Casella's version for orchestra of Balakirev's "Islamey." Out upon their brazen tongues; for, whether they please or displease the hearer, they do keep him awake and alert. And in three successive pairs of concerts Mr. Monteux has included these disturbers. The rest of the righteous has vanished from Symphony Hall. Yet somehow the present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has never been so able, eloquent and generally praised as he is in these days.

It was a courageous act—the deed of a man who loves his profession, respects its obligations, cherishes an artist's honor—to bring into the concert-hall this suite from "Petrushka." Of course Stravinsky deserves to be heard. No one, unless he is purblind and sodden with dislike, denies the Russian his place among the individualities of music in our time or his influence upon composers of his own generation and probably through a generation to come. And if Stravinsky is to be heard at all in Boston or New York, he must find room in symphony concerts. No Russian Ballet ministers periodically to us as does Mr. Diaghilev's to London and Paris. Yet for dancers and mimes upon the stage of a theatre Stravinsky has written his major orchestral pieces. What, then, is a conductor to do? Accept gladly the suite, heard in Boston last autumn, that the composer himself directed from "The Fire-Bird"; join with him, as Mr. Monteux has done, in the extraction of a suite from "Petrushka"; play from first measure to last, as Mr. Monteux did in Paris, as upon some fortunate day he may do in Boston, the whole of "The Rite of the Spring." Behind as well waits "The Song of the Nightingale."

Yet for this very suite from "Petrushka" many a hearer—perhaps composer and conductor too—waited with foreboding. For, if ever music for danced and mimed "burlesque scenes" was close knit to the action and the aspect of the stage, it is this music of Stravinsky. At beginning and end it is charged with the sights, the sounds—the very smells as some say—of a steaming Russian fair. No fête d'élite in the French of Petrograd; no more a peasant merry-making—only a cheap, common, sordid "side-show" on a Shrove Tuesday, frequented by servants, hawkers, "barkers," "shysters" and a few of their betters with a taste or a passing inclination for "low company." The music is redolent of this crew—moves, halts, dances, whirls, murmurs, shouts with them. It is as graphic of every passing incident. Note, even yesterday in Symphony Hall, the soft, clumsy clump-clump-clump of the dancing bear led across the scene. Listen—and the whole audience Friday smiled as it heard—to the rival hand-organs. Open wide the ear to dance piled, as it were, upon dance.

Akin is the music of the puppets—of the little-Peter-doll who is Petrushka, of the pink-cheeked Ballerina, of the Blackamoor who—shame upon her!—is her accepted lover. Does Petrushka, tortured by jealousy and longing, grope and tear and push at the walls of his box? The music twitches with both his physical and his spiritual agonies—twitches and also records the futility of them. Does the fatuous Blackamoor play with a cocoanut? The music shares his silly pastime. In prances the Ballerina to her smudgy lord and the orchestra plays her penny-trumpet tune. At one moment, it is grieving wistfully—and with a ghostly twitch—for Petrushka foully murdered; the next and there he is—no less in the orchestra than on the parapet of the booth—grimacing and teetering at the old showman—and all humanity. For what are we but like puppets of our fate?

An impossible music—it is easy to say—in the concert-hall. Yet there it was yesterday and there it will be this evening—in nearly every measure self-contained, closely knit, graphic, richly amusing, once and again piteous, always penetrating and exciting, a more individual music in fibre, texture, color, process than ever it seemed in the theatre. And all this with no more aid from tabulated divisions, a programme-note and memories recalled than Mendelssohn exacts for numbers to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Of course, Mr. Monteux was wise in what to include and what to exclude for the concert-hall, and Stravinsky may well countersign him. He began with the music that sets the scene of the fair, whipping and bubbling with bustle, din and stew. He did not overlook the celebrated incident of the hurdy-gurdies. The snare-drum rattled to call the folk to the show-man's booth and forthwith the three puppets spun through their folk-dance.

Next and briefly music to the scene in Petrushka's box—his twitching tortures, gropings, clawings, the wistful little dance he sketches wherewith to win the Ballerina to sympathy and love—this and the futility, the irony of it all. Then, with the whole scene in the Blackamoor's box omitted, back to the fair as darkness descends, snow falls, the crowd thickens, and the dances become more boisterous. There is way for the bear, and a tinkle at least of the drunken merchant's concertina. Then the nurses', the coachmen's the grooms' dances and the wild orchestral whirl of all three. Here, obviously, was the lunging, plunging close. Mr. Monteux has too much artistic scruple, is too loyal to Stravinsky, to halt there. On he goes to the piteous measures of "little Peter's" death for love's sake, and a page further to the ironic grimace with which, as is usual among both human and puppet-kind, such tragedies end.

What a music heard thus self-contained and stripped of every distraction of the theatre—a music of power, beauty, imagery, illusion, irony, fantasy as the composer for the instant wills—a music of the utmost individuality and economy of means! Power welds the three dances of the fair by night until the air leaps and glazes with them, and a breathless orchestra shouts, gasps and shouts again.

Only in "The Rite of Spring" does Stravinsky make rhythm pound harder or colors flare more sharply. Beauty touches the little dance of Petrushka's wistful imagining, the piteousness of his cruel end. He is more, not less, plausible and poignant when his wired arms and legs twitch, his blunt fingers fumble, his sawdust aches in the music rather than in Mr. Nijinsky's or Mr. Massine's miming. In tones rather than in the flesh his final grimace is the more ironic, fantastic, haunting. There is more humor in the contending hurdy-gurdies heard and not seen. A man awkward in a bear-skin lends no aid to the clump-clump-clump of the music. The rattle of the snare-drum is enough to open the showman's booth. So forth and so onward. By every token of yesterday the music of "Petrushka" is self-contained, self-sufficient. Not an illusion, an impression, a quality, that it yields in the theatre disappears or deteriorates in the concert-hall. Instead all are quickened.

What a music again in the mere facture! At every turn the means are as economical as the effect is sure and complete. A chord provokes an emotion; a sequence of chords, an illusion. From a motif of three or four notes upsprings a whole dance. In our day there is no such master of the power of rhythm as is Stravinsky; and none to excel him in the bite and flare of the primary harmonic and instrumental colors. The sharp edge, the pungent phrase are his familiars. He seems to hear the orchestra as so many individual voices with which he may work his will severally, not in traditional choirs or in coordinated groups; while none but him—and the commentators are endless—has ever fathomed his marvellous manipulation of them. Even in him it may be half divination.

And the performance? Enough that there would have been no such impressions, no such illusion, had not Mr. Monteux in a familiar field and the orchestra in an unfamiliar, outdone themselves separately and collectively after days and nights of unsparing work. Again the band can pulse with rhythm, glow with color, run the gamut from finesse to force. In turn, Mr. Havens, as he should, cut sharp and struck hard with the piano-part. Since the day of Liszt's "Faust," the Symphony Concerts have not known so glorious an hour as this afternoon of "Petrushka."

Yet Mendelssohn gave pleasure—the Mendelssohn of the octet for strings, A. D. first place, in 1920 this Mendelssohn of Symphony Concerts in thirty-five years, with parts distributed as though it were piece for two string-orchestras. In the first place in 1920 this Mendelssohn of the octet is preferable to the Mendelssohn of the symphonies and most of the overtures; to any and all Mendelssohn except him of the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." In the second place, Mr. Montoux and most of the string choir were no less on their mettle with the octet than they were soon to be with "Petrushka." So played in relatively few spots has the music worn bare, thin, antiquated. The slow movement suffers most such impairing. Yesterday it seemed pale, slender, sentimental, prettyfied, like to a "Song without Words," beside the warm vigor or the fleet fancy of the other divisions. Not even the songful violoncellos at the beginning, the full-voiced middle measures, the wistful coloring of the violas could reanimate it.

On the other hand, the flash and flicker, the dart and ripple of the scherzo defy the years. Not even in the fairy-music to Shakespeare's comedy has Mendelssohn been more light and sure of finger, fleet and fecund of fancy. Hand in hand trip animation and delicacy. In the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" a wind choir was at the composer's command. Here in the octet, and not in the scherzo alone, he can ingeniously suggest, and with only strings, the contrasting colorings of wind instruments. (After all the imaginative and suggestive manipulation of harmonies and timbres did begin somewhat before our blessed musical time). As the strings yesterday played this scherzo, lightly, fleetly, as fine-spun, iridescent web, they seemed ready even for Berlioz's Mab and sylphs. Neither the finale nor they lacked rhythmic animation; the spring of the beginning, the little rushes of one part upon another, pleased the listening fancy; the whole came and went in plastic, polished progress.

Nor is Mendelssohn merely weaving counterpoint and spinning figures in the first movement. There is a fine edge to his first motif; before he has done with the working, he has struck fire, the more for the incisive violins of yesterday. The gentler theme renews this warmth. Rarely in the whole course of the movement does Mendelssohn merely fill staves becomingly. Youth and zest spur him; a fine instinct, an eager hand write. Again a revival worth the making, and an end to doubt of the precision, pliancy, sensibility, range in tonal warmth and tonal color of the renewed string choir. It can glint and it can glow. Nor has Mr. Montoux himself in this elder music often been so sensitive to inflection and undulation. The limpid Mendelssohn has his Gallic kinships.

As good fortune would have it between Mendelssohn and Stravinsky stood Respighi and his music of the Roman fountains, happily repeated within a fortnight in lieu of the banalities of Franck's "symphonic piece" about a redeemed Hardingesque world. Between a classic octet and ultra-modern "burlesque scenes," this modern tone-poem with nearly all the virtues of the golden mean. Respighi pleases the scholars, the connoisseurs, by well proportioned, contrasted and flowing design, apt workmanship, play of meditative mood and pictorial fancy, the richness, the lustrousness, the sensuous quality that should dwell in a music of the South. By these latter virtues, by clear tone-picturing, melodic warmth, grace or sonority of utterance—and all not too unfamiliar—he pleases the general ear. There is charm in this music of Roman waters and gardens and vigor also when it becomes sea-piece and pageant. Safely walk composers in the middle way and, with Respighi's quality, successfully as well. H. T. PARKER

Trans. — Dec. 6, 1920
New York and Mr. Montoux's Music

At their concert in New York on Saturday afternoon last, Mr. Montoux and the Boston Orchestra played the "symphonic suite" from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka," heard at home a week ago. In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel writes of piece and performance as hereunder and most of the reviewers in New York were substantially of his mind:

In its place—which means in the theatre and as an accompaniment to pictures and action—this music is quite the most extraordinary composition with which we are familiar. But as music pure and simple there is little of it which has qualifications for the concert-room. That little is summed up in Stravinsky's treatment of Russian folk-tunes, or melodies based on those tunes. The rest is mere grotesquerie which may amuse; in fact, it does that, but must also bewilder all those who listen to it without having gone through the experience of witnessing the comically pathetic or pathetically comic pantomime in the theatre. It served yesterday to display Mr. Montoux's appreciation of the score and the skill of the orchestra; both in an eminent degree. The performance was admirable, thrilling indeed. The vertiginous movement of the music written to delineate the confused bustle of a Russian multitude in enjoyment of a fair was almost dizzying. The device is one of Stravinsky's early inventions; we knew of nothing like it previous to the advent of his piece called "Fireworks."

In a different manner the fine muscularity of the body of string instrument players which Mr. Montoux has enlisted was brought into notice by the performance of Mendelssohn's Octette. When a composition designed for intimate performance by a group of solo instruments is transferred to a large band the question whether or not it has gained or lost in effectiveness always comes to the fore in the minds of experienced listeners. Yesterday the transformation seemed justified in the first movement, with its large lines of joy and jubilation of splendid color effects in the middle voices; but in the andante we missed the individual utterances which are native and essential to chamber compositions.

Symphony Hall.

Ravel's suite, "Couperin's Tomb," played at the preceding concert of Thursday evening likewise excited the curiosity of the reviewers in New York. Mr. Aldrich for The Times thought well of it: "Nobody," he writes, "who has ever heard the music of Couperin would mistake Ravel's manner for his, and the title is probably fanciful. . . . The four movements, however, are quite characteristic of Ravel. The Minuet and the Rigaudon have each a curious charm of their own, the Rigaudon a decorous gayety. The harmonization is of Ravel's acid sweetness in his less pronounced manner, stimulating and refreshing. The orchestra is used with much delicacy and grace of sound; the oboe gives it characteristic color." Mr. Krehbiel also yielded to the charm of the suite, but he resented what he calls "Ravel's strenuous effort to avoid the obvious."

Post Boston Symphony Nov. 25/20

Since the coming week will be occupied by the second Southern trip of the orchestra, and the following week by Young People's concerts, the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18. At these concerts Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will for the first time play as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His number will be the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major. Pierre Montoux will open the concert with Weber's overture to the opera "Preciosa." Two new works to be played on this occasion are the Gaelic symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy Hills"), and Balakireff's pictorial "Is-lamey," arranged into an "Oriental Fantasy" by the noted Italian composer of the younger generation, Alfred Casella.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes.

Mason & Hamill

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

BOSTON—SYMPHONY—HALL

Tonight at 8

Philadelphia—Academy of Music, Mon., Nov. 29, at 8:15. Soloist—Jean Bedetti.
Washington—New Nat'l Theatre, Tues. aft., Nov. 30, at 4:30. Soloist—Frances Alda.
Baltimore—Lyric Theatre, Wed., Dec. 1, at 8:15. Soloist—Frances Alda.
New York—Carnegie Hall, Thurs., Dec. 2, at 8:15.
Brooklyn—Academy of Music, Fri., Dec. 3, at 8:15. Soloist—Mary Jordan.
New York—Carnegie Hall, Sat., Dec. 4, at 2:30. Soloist—Jean Bedetti.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns from its second Southern trip, which will occupy the coming week, it will devote the following week to concerts for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation. For the two concerts, which will befall on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 7, and Thursday afternoon, Dec. 9, all seats will be apportioned through the medium of the public schools and settlements of Boston. In order to meet the inevitable large demands from those disappointed in this allotment, a third concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Dec. 10, for which the seats are now on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall.

The same programme will be given at each of these three concerts, since each will have an entirely different public. Each will begin at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and the nominal prices for seats will be 25, 35 and 50 cents. The rule will hold that no adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The object of these concerts, which were so successfully instituted last season, is to acquaint our young people with the finest symphonic music as played by the full Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor. Pierre Montoux has compiled a programme which will represent the best music in the orchestral repertory and yet be of direct appeal. He has further planned his programme to reveal in turn the different instruments in the orchestra by the incidental solos which occur in the scores.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

EIGHTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, AT 8 P.M.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE, "Dedication of the House," op. 124

BAX,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "An Sluagh Sidhe," ("In the Fairy Hills")
(First time in America)

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO in D major for Violin and Orchestra,
op. 77
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio
III. Allegro giocoso

BALAKIREFF,

ORIENTAL FANTASY, "Islamey"
(Orchestrated by Alfred Casella)
(First time in Boston)

Soloist:

RICHARD BURGIN

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Bax's Symphonic Poem

NOTICE. The Evening Concert of next week will be given on Thursday, December 23, at 8, instead of Saturday, December 25. The Afternoon Concert will be given at the usual time, Friday, December 24, at 2.30

Arnold Bax

FADED TEXT

EIGHTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

"In the Faery Hills," Bax,
Is Interesting Feature of Program

CHRISTMAS WEEK PLANS CHANGED

Herald Dec. 18, 1920

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture, "Dedication of the House"; Bax, "In the Faery Hills" symphonic poem (first time in America); Brahms, Violin Concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Balakireff-Casella, "Islamey" (first time in Boston.)

Beethoven was born 150 years ago this week. Pious homage was paid him at this concert by the performance of an overture, not one of his best. There was an interest attached to the performance, for the overture was the first piece on the program of the first concert given by this orchestra (Oct. 22, 1881.) There was a time when the overture was popular in Boston. Mr. Gericke was fond of it, but it has not been played at these concerts since 1909. Here and there are reminders of the greater Beethoven, but the music is interesting chiefly because it shows the influence of Handel for whom Beethoven had the liveliest admiration. The few measures that introduce the main body of the overture might be transitional measures from any concerto of Handel; while the fugal pages are often in the manner of that master, and the theme is eminently Handelian. There are pages in which Beethoven cut loose and wrote at his own will. The introduction was played with the requisite pomp and ceremony. The fugal section was performed brilliantly.

The name of Arnold Bax is little known here, yet he is a second composer. Born in London, and educated there, he went as a young man to Ireland, where he fell in with the writers of the "Irish Renaissance," the myths and legends of Ireland. The romantic folk lore obsessed him, nor did a visit to Russia and subsequent life in London free him from the spell. For a time the poetry of Swinburne gave him musical ideas, but he soon returned to his first love. In this symphonic poem he endeavored, according to his own story, "to shadow forth the atmosphere of mystery and almost of terror with which the Irish people regard their faery compatriots." The middle section was inspired by a passage in W. B. Yeats's "Wanderings of Oisín."

Although this symphonic poem is somewhat diffuse; although there are passages here and there that seem extraneous, unnecessary, Mr. Bax has succeeded admirably in the one great demand put upon him: he has reproduced in tones what Matthew Arnold described as "the Celtic aerialness and magic." The music is fanciful, not fantastical; it is poetic. There is the glamour of the strange, wild legends. There is the wistful sadness of the old folk songs. At times one would think that Mr. Yeats had written the music; the Yeats of the earlier years, before he began to revise his poems; before he became self-conscious and finical. Mr. Bax has been neither realistic nor is he a slave to impressionism. He is not afraid of well-defined melody, even when it might be mistaken for a folk-song. In his suggestion of "the good people," he does not hark back to Weber, Mendelssohn or Berlioz. He writes as though the Sidhe had come from a hill at twilight to hear his music, and hearing it, they had sung and harped to him other strains for his pleasure and advantage.

Balakireff's "Islamey" was long regarded as the most difficult composition in the literature of the piano. We have heard pianists of the first rank play it and were not impressed, save by a passage that might have been written for Balakireff's "Thamar." Casella's version for orchestra is as difficult, probably more difficult, for the players, than the piano piece is for pianists. Has the music itself gained in effect through the orchestration? We doubt it. With the exception of the theme for English horn and the treatment of it, there is vertiginous monotony. The dizzy, mad whirling is without sufficient relief in orchestral color. To play the fantasy is a tour de force. Yesterday the orchestra was a virtuoso.

Brahms's violin concerto cannot be ranked with his first and third symphonies, his "Tragic" overture, some of his chamber music and songs. The music in the second movement before the entrance of the solo violin is beautiful.

The oboist, Mr. Longy, and his co-mates brought out the beauty in full. The rhythm of the Finale at the beginning is inspiring. As a whole, the concerto is granitic and forbidding; at times frankly dull. Yet violinists play it. The concerto has been on the program of this orchestra in Boston 14 times, and nine different violinists have been applauded vigorously by the faithful Brahmsites, big and little, palpitating in the family pews. It is possible that the applause on some occasions was a tribute to the endurance of the violinist.

Mr. Burgin, the excellent concert master of the orchestra, the 10th violinist to play this music at a Symphony concert, gave a thoughtful, intelligent, one might say, intellectual performance. The music itself is never sensuous, it is seldom if ever emotional. When there is beauty, as in the Adagio, the beauty is of a contemplative nature. Mr. Burgin was warmly welcomed; he was imperatively recalled many times.

The concert will be repeated tonight. As next week Saturday is Christmas day, the concert that usually takes place Saturday night will be on the night of next Thursday. The afternoon concert will be on Friday, as is customary. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Overture to "Don Giovanni"; Concerto in E flat major for two pianos (Messrs. Maier and Pattison); d'Indy, "The Search After God"; descriptive symphony from the opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher" (first time in Boston); Malpiero, "Impressions from Nature," Suite I, 1, The Blackcap; 2, The Woodpecker; 3, The Owl (first time in America); Delius, Dance Rhapsody (first time at these concerts).

BAX TONE POEM PLAYED IN BOSTON

Dec. 18, 1920

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on December 17, was as follows: Beethoven, overture "Dedication of the House," op. 124; Bax, symphonic poem, "In the Faery Hills"; Brahms, concerto for violin and orchestra; Balakireff, "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

Beethoven's overture had not been performed at a Boston symphony concert for 11 years. It must be admitted that this apparent neglect is not wholly undeserved. It is most certainly not one of Beethoven's most inspired works, and yet it is not unworthy of an occasional hearing. Experienced concert goers are apt to become restive when forced to listen to these revivals, but their appearance from time to time on programs is of salutary effect, if only to give a proper perspective for the judgment of more agreeable compositions.

Of supreme interest was the symphonic poem of Arnold Bax which was played for the first time in America. It is one of the few opportunities Boston has had of hearing the compositions of the new English school. Previous to Mr. Monteux's advent as conductor of our concerts, the extreme neglect of modern music was to be deplored. Since his assuming the conductorship, however, we are beginning to learn that the art of music has progressed, and that there are composers in England, France and Italy, as well as in Germany, who have something to say and the technique to say it in an original and interesting way.

This symphonic poem is one of the most imaginative of the modern works that we have heard up to the present. It immediately evokes an atmosphere of fairyland, of mystery, of far off times. We are immediately, from the first measure in fact, transported to another world, the magic world of Irish legend and fancy; and this impression is kept up throughout the piece without ever becoming tiresome and without apparent effort. There are no pages of "filling in"; no moments of apparent marking-time. The work is one spontaneous flow of inspiration from beginning to end. The orchestration, while original, seems to be evolved naturally from the musical ideas themselves, and is never forced. A second hearing of the piece is to be hoped for in the near future.

Mr. Richard Burgin, the new concert-master of the orchestra, chose the Brahms concerto for his first appearance as soloist at these concerts. After the graceful, imaginative music of Bax, this concerto seemed heavy-footed and labored. Mr. Burgin might have chosen a more interesting medium for the display of his evident talents as a violinist, or at least it so seemed to us. He possesses a clean technique and a small and rather unsympathetic tone. Yet his playing was in many ways meritorious. His presence is unaffected and he is undoubtedly a serious, painstaking artist. Casella's transcription of Balakireff's "Islamey" is effective. It served to bring an interesting and well-balanced program to a brilliant close.

BURGIN EFFECTIVE IN VIOLIN CONCERTO

Balakirev's "Islamey" Is Given by Symphony

Beethoven and Bax Divide Honors in Remainder of Program

Globe — Dec. 18, 1920

Richard Burgin's thoughtful and polished playing in the Brahms violin concerto and Casella's ingeniously boisterous orchestration of Balakirev's piano piece, "Islamey," were the most remarkable features of yesterday's Symphony concert.

Mr Burgin, to judge by the warmth of the applause, has already many admirers among those who have followed his admirable playing as concert master of the orchestra since he came here last October. He played with the delicacy and restraint which Brahms' music more than that of almost any other composer demands. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were rather too heavy-handed and clumsy with the accompaniment.

Orchestrated versions of piano pieces are usually less effective than the originals on which they are based. It is impossible for an orchestra to do what the pedal on the pianoforte does with the overtones. The strings and percussion, on the other hand, can secure better and more subtly graded accents than are possible on the piano.

Casella, who is a concert pianist as well as a master of the resources of the modern orchestra, wisely tried to express Balakirev's ideas in terms of the new medium instead of endeavoring to make the orchestra sound like a piano. The result far surpasses Balakirev's piano version in brilliance, energy and color.

Arnold's Bax' "In the Faery Hills," the other novelty, contains the material for an effective little piano piece spread rather thinly and pretentiously through a long symphonic poem. The harmonies are often in questionable taste; dissonant, but still squashy and trite. The orchestration is colorless.

Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," added belatedly to the program to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth, which most other orchestras have devoted whole programs to celebrating, was given a sloppy and lifeless performance. The music, written somewhat in the style of Handel, may not be Beethoven's best, but it would sound nobler and more imaginative if played with absolutely precise attacks, balanced crescendos and an occasional nuance.

Mr. Monteux had too evidently spent most of his pains at rehearsals on securing the requisite dash and fire in "Islamey" and in trying to galvanize Br Bax' music into a semblance of sustained life.

Next week the evening concert has been shifted on account of the holiday from Saturday to Thursday at 8. The afternoon concert will be given at the usual hour on Friday. The soloists are Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will play a double piano concerto by Mozart. There are three other unfamiliar numbers, D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu", Malpiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" and delius' "Dance Rhapsody." The only familiar piece will be Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni."

BURGIN IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Concert Master Displays Sterling Equipment as Violinist

Post — Dec. 18, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was soloist at the concert given by Mr. Monteux and his men yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Burgin played the Brahms violin concerto. There was played for the first time in America Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the fairy hills"); for the first time in Boston, Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakireff's picturesque piano piece, "Islamey," and the programme opened with

182
Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House."

BURGIN'S MASTERLY PLAYING

In other cities leading orchestras are giving complete Beethoven programmes in recognition of the 150th anniversary of that composer's birth (Dec. 16, 1770). At the Boston Symphony concerts thus far Beethoven's 150th anniversary is represented by an inferior overture, a composition representative in only a superficial way of the characteristics of the greatest master of symphonic composition the world has yet seen.

Mr. Burgin, playing a concerto which will never be popular, made a deep impression by his performance of it. As is well known, this Brahms concerto is practically a symphony with an extensive solo violin part. As such it was interpreted with thought always for its great lines and the interdependence of the violin and the orchestra.

Such a virile, sincere, enthusiastic interpretation of this work has not been heard for a long time at these concerts, where the Brahms concerto frequently figures on the programmes.

Mr. Burgin is not a violinist of ultra-refinements or sophistications. His playing is always exceptionally straightforward, manly and in a noble spirit. One could hardly think of a violinist better equipped by talent and by temperament for this concerto. Everyone responded to the conviction and the mastery of Mr. Burgin's performance. Everyone realized as perhaps they had not realized before the broad and melodic character of the first two movements, responded to the stirring gypsy rhythms of the finale and understood clearly the gradual development from initial motives of a whole great structure of tone.

The tone poem of Bax is an exquisite and fanciful thing. The opening is in the manner of an Oberon's horn, which transports one to unearthly regions. And what is more haunting than the middle section, the melancholy song heard over the accompaniment of harps, the song of the mortal asked by the Sidhe to sing a song of human joy—a song so sad that hearing it the fairy folk wept in sorrow and anger. Throughout the composition there obtains the atmosphere of fantasy greatly enhanced by the mysterious and beautiful effects of the orchestra.

As for Casellas' orchestration of "Islamey," it is a wonderful box of tricks, and it is more, too. It is the fulfilment of the extravagant ideas of the composer which a piano is inadequate to convey. If you doubt it try yourself to play "Islamey" on your piano, then desist, go to Symphony Hall and rejoice, as the orchestra, boiling and crackling with a thousand wild effects, goes hurtling like a howling dervish to the conclusion.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Dec. 18, 1920

BEETHOVEN, BRAHMS, BALAKIREV,
BAX, BURGIN

An Anniversary in Wise Moderation—A Concerto for Violin to Endure, and Also Enjoy—Contrasting Exercise of Young Moderns—Orchestral Sound and Fury for Its Sake and Fairy-Picture Finely Woven

SERVICES are like sins; they may be of omission as well as commission, and Mr. Monteux surely did the public of the Symphony Concerts, a service of omission when he made no "Beethoven Programme" to celebrate the hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the composer's birth. Beethoven was born on or about Dec. 16, 1770; wherefore on or about Dec. 16, 1920, crowd three of his symphonies into a single concert, or else be content with one and set it in a circle of his overtures, concertos and occasional pieces. A pleasing warmth diffuses itself over conductor, players, "assisting artists." Are not these numbers "repertory," so requiring little and none too assiduous preparation? Audiences listen tranquilly to the regular thing in the regular way. Good old Beethoven sounding the same in their ears (for the most part) yesterday, today and forever! Reviewers, especially when they have turned their sixtieth birthdays and live in New York, put to print "reverent" commonplaces that were stale in the earlier years of Victoria the Good. Incidentally they deplore "the degeneracy" of a day in which composers, exactly like Beethoven in his own time, dare to write their own music in their own way—to the wrath of the Pharisees, to the wholesome joy of publicans and sinners. So at a sesqui-centennial—imposing Latin words—is Beethoven affirmed as an "institution" and so are symphony concerts glorified as repositories of "the best models."

There is another way with Beethoven which Mr. Monteux wisely follows. Those who likewise walk in it do not regard the composer as an "institution"; while they leave dates, anniversaries and all that to the learned compilers of programme-books. In their innocence and ignorance these dissenters believe the best of Beethoven's music perennially vital, stirring, enjoyable. To them it is fresh, significant, engrossing, to be heard with a will and a thrill. Therefore they would not have it played too often, until it is routine alike to conductor, orchestra and hearers. They would not have it confined to a few stock-pieces in annual or biennial round according to "the tradition." They would hear the masterpieces, as they heard the third "Leonore" overture a month ago, unexpectedly, as it were, after long intervals, in animating and vivid performance, as though Beethoven had written it no longer ago than last summer. They would, also, hear the music in which Beethoven is not the master, yet in degree Beethoven still. So they enjoyed the overtures to "King Stephen" and "Prometheus," resurrected last year and again yesterday the revived overture of 1822 with the clumsy title, "Dedication of the House." Of course, it is a "pièce d'occasion," written on commission to keep the pot boiling according to an ancient and by no means dishonorable human custom. Nonetheless, the ample stride, the tonal pomp of the beginning are interesting to hear with Beethoven lording himself Handel-like through his music-making. Handel likewise is the following fugue which is also music-making—several paces near mechanics. Rightly, however, for a ceremonial occasion a ceremonial music.

Yet let none of the musically scrupulous believe that the classics were yesterday neglected. To the contrary, Mr. Monteux is a skilful and conscientious balancer of programmes. If we listeners were to have Bax and Casella, yet also had we Johannes Brahms. . . . Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 77—as some would say in length, breadth and thickness. Possibly it is somewhat late in the day to repine under the piece. Somehow the violinists have persisted these forty years in the playing of it, even violinists of widely different temperaments. Somehow conductors have found recurring room for it; somehow, and not always drowsily and perfunctorily, audiences hear and applaud. It is quite true that for long measures in the concerto Brahms is thinking his way along and by no means hiding the process. Now and again also this thinking halts or sags and the resulting music is stencil and mechanics. The motifs out of which the first movement springs are dry motifs little touching the imagination, while the orchestral measures cloud the solo-part oftener than they set it in relief.

Yet from the thick sheaf of pages rises that which stirs the performing violinist and which has been known to stir the sympathetic listener. However dry Brahms could be, he remained architect in tones, and in the first division of this belabored concerto, pillar by pillar, story by story, from foundation to pediment, he is rearing a musical edifice. The expanding lines impress, the adjusted proportions interest, the touches of ornament please, violinist and auditor join with the composer in the act of creation, even to the fricze of the cadenza and the long breath of satisfaction and completeness with which the songful melody finally returns. And the other two divisions are restful respite from these toils of ear and mind. The contemplative beauty of which Brahms still remains master among the moderns, with which he is almost always poet, glows soft and clear out of the slow movement against the autumnal tints of the orchestral background. And in the finale the grave, the bearded, the fat and spectacled Johannes is by no means impervious to the light flash of rhythm, to the motif tossed, caught and tossed again. Did he not write certain Hungarian Dances with a certain animation and something more? No; the concerto for violin is not mere Brahms and mere classic; the "thoughtful" people who hear it "with reverence" cannot altogether wizen it; even "the degenerates" who love their ultra-moderns may find a pleasure in it.

The violinist yesterday was Mr. Burgin, eager to prove new merit to an audience and orchestra that already knows him as a concert-master animating and steadying his fellow-players of the string choir. Possibly, indeed, Mr. Burgin was too perceptibly eager. It was good that he should do his utmost with the music; not so good that outwardly and visibly he should show this striving. By all means the inner fire, the powers stretched taut, but may not the audience better hear these things in the voice of the music that see them in the bearing of the player? So middle age counsels in its dull way and forgets the fine pleasure from Mr. Burgin of a violinist young to the eye, young to the ear, who really cares and is not ashamed to show his caring. Not a technical pitfall of the concerto trapped him and by chance or design Brahms opened many. Throughout the accuracy of his playing never wavered. His tone was clearness itself, a mirror to the course and the inflections of the music through the first movement; warm and gently lustrous in the slow song, bright and light in the finale. As yet it lacks heights, depths, subtleties and so is truly characteristic of Mr. Burgin himself. With the violin and with the concerto he kept to the golden and pleasurable mean of skill, understanding, sensibility and what is called "expression." So far he is no very individual violinist. Enough for him for the present to be unclouded voice to the music and to his own fine devotions and sincerities.

So to the moderns of the afternoon one of whom asks no more than short shrift. Mr. Casella, if readers are to believe half a page of the programme-book, is a glutton for work. When he is not conducting, he is composing; when he is not composing he is teaching; or else he is writing for what senators—a queer lot—call the public prints, or he fills an odd moment with the arrangement of some one's music in a medium for which that some one did not choose to write. Balakirev preferred to make his "Islamey" a piano-piece; the diligent Casella would have it also "Oriental Fantasia for Orchestra." The transforming process seemingly consisted in the copying of some of the figures, progressions and other idiosyncrasies of Balakirev's own symphonic poem, "Thamar," and the liberal application of a full modern orchestra when it is reiterating rhythms, splashing on instrumental and harmonic color and in general threshing through a wilderness of modulation. Mr. Casella lays on and spares not. Individually, by groups, by choirs and en masse the orchestra does feats of strength and agility. "Islamey" itself is caught under, tossed up, whirled about until there is no breath left in its or anyone's else body. Apparently Mr. Casella has mistaken the bannered hosts of Balakirev's imagining for a concourse of dervishes in the practice of their energetic calling. He has also forgotten a motto for the title-page, say Shakespeare's line about sound, fury and significance.

Bax's tone-poem, "In the Fairy Hills," is music of far different voice and mood, design and suggestion. Rare is his imagination and fine his skill in the use of individual instruments or of slender choirs for the character and the color they may lend. As with many a modernist in these things, his touch is divining, sparing, sure. As rare and fine is his sense of the imaginative prompting, the illusion that harmonic background, modulation and progression may work. In a sense, in this particular piece, he is all for the magic of music to summon vision, for the veils it may drape around it. The texture of his tone-poem is accordingly soft, misty, glamorous. Yet there are moments in which the music plainly has ribs to give it frame; when it runs clear in melodic contours, when more than rhythm unifies and more than chords fasten it. For these modernists are as solicitous for form—for their form—as ever were the ancient or the classical. Only they will not move by prescribed process or travel in orthodox ruts. As their ears and fingers are finer with instruments and choirs, so are they more finely tempered as to form and unity.

In fact Bax is so sedulous for both that sometimes he makes his choice of ways and means too obviously in public. He spreads them, as it were, before his hearers and so becomes diffuse as one unwilling to discard the better for the best, to forego quite all that he might have used. Even so the magic of the music is but seldom dimmed or stayed. It sounds—and the sea-mists rise over the cliffs of the deep inlets to wreath the brown hills, to spin wisps into the valley. It sounds—and the mists and all the air rustle gently with the trooping of the fairy folk. The mists glimmer faintly; shimmer deeper; above the rustlings and the whirrings stir the fairy voices, now plaintive, now joyous, remote, unearthly. The spell deepens; it is as though it possessed those that see and hear. There are shiver, wonder and darkness and silence. What Bax was minded to summon his music brings.

H. T. PARKER

Richard Burgin

Concert-Master of the Symphony Orchestra 1920-21

Polish by birth; Russian by training under Auer; first violinist to Nikisch and Strauss; admired virtuoso in Slav and Scandinavian countries.

Symphony Hall.

Mr. RICHARD BURGIN was born in Warsaw on October 11, 1892. At the age of eight he studied with Lotto, later with Joachim in Berlin, and from the years 1908 to 1912 with Leopold Auer in Petrograd. His first public appearance was at the age of eleven as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society on December 7, 1903. He came to New York in 1907 and spent a year and a half in this country, playing as soloist with Arnold Volpe's orchestra in Carnegie Hall in 1907 and in two recitals of his own in Mendelssohn Hall in the same year. He also played at the New York College of Music on April 3, 1908. In Eastern Europe he played, as soloist and in recitals, at Petrograd, Kieff, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen, and other cities. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society, and the Stockholm Concert Society. As concertmaster he has served under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Nikisch, likewise as concertmaster under Richard Strauss, Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, and under Sibelius in Helsingfors. He played Sibelius' Violin Concerto in Gothenburg, Stockholm, and Christiania under the supervision of the composer. At Stockholm and Christiania he was assistant teacher to Auer in 1916-17. In Christiania he led a string quartet, and in Stockholm formed the Burgin Quartet, which toured regularly from city to city, giving twelve recitals a season. In the fall of 1920 he became concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He played in Boston for the first time in a concert with Mr. De Gogorza, baritone, in Symphony Hall, on November 18, 1920 (Tartini's "Devil's Trill" sonata, Sarasate's "Carmen" Fantasia, and smaller pieces).

Soloist:

RICHARD BURGIN

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Bax's Symphonic Poem

NOTICE. The Evening Concert of next week will be given on Thursday, December 23, at 8, instead of Saturday, December 25. The Afternoon Concert will be given at the usual time, Friday, December 24, at 2.30

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

NINTH PROGRAMME

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 23, AT 8 P.M.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24, AT 2.30 P.M.

MOZART,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Don Giovanni"

MOZART,

CONCERTO for two Pianofortes in E flat
(Köchel, No. 365)

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Allegro

D'INDY,

DESCRIPTIVE SYMPHONY, "La Queste de Dieu"
("The Search for God") from the Opera "La Legende de Saint Christophe," Act II.
(First time in Boston)

MALIPIERO.

SUITE No. 1, "Impressioni dal Vero," ("Impressions from Nature")
I. Il Capinero, (The Blackcap)
II. Il Picchio, The Woodpecker
III. Il Chiu, (The Owl)
(First time in America)

DELIUS,

DANCE RHAPSODY

Soloists:

GUY MAIER and LEE PATTISON

Chickering Pianofortes used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

GUY MAIER, Pianist

Lee Pattison

SYMPHONY IN NINTH CONCERT

Messrs. Maier and Pattison,
Pianists, Assist in Admirable Program

MALPIERO'S SUITE NEW TO AMERICA

Herald Dec. 24/20

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteaux, conductor, took place Thursday night. The concert was repeated yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart, Overture to "Don Giovanni" and Concerto for two pianos (K. 365); d'Indy, "The Search for God"; Malpiero, "Impressions from Nature," Suite No. 1 (The Blackcap; the Woodpecker; the Owl); Delius, A Dance Rhapsody. The pianists were Guy Maier and Lee Pattison.

We write with reference to the concert of yesterday.

After a spirited performance of the overture to the opera that, in spite of the years, is to be ranked with "Pelleas and Melisande" as the supreme achievement of lyrically dramatic art, widely different as the operas are in form and in expression, Messrs. Maier and Pattison gave an admirable performance of Mozart's Concerto in E flat. The Herald has more than once extolled the ensemble playing of these musicians. Yesterday they not only displayed the qualities that have excited praise in cities of this country, Paris and London; they also showed their nice appreciation of the Concerto's character. There was no attempt to modernize the music, to give it incongruous, destructive importance. They accepted the music as it is, suave, tender and also lightsome, and played as Mozart wished; for he once wrote that music should always "sound," meaning that it should be euphonious; and he demanded of a pianist that running passages should flow like oil.

D'Indy's descriptive symphony from his opera, "The Legend of Saint Christopher," was played for the first time in Boston; Malpiero's Suite for the first time in America; the Rhapsody of Delius for the first time at these concerts.

As d'Indy is a devout Catholic, zealous in the observance of religious rites and ceremonies, it was natural that the legend of Christopher should appeal strongly to him. This symphonic music is played before the second act, after the narrator has told of the giant's search for the king of heaven. The giant visits kings and emperors; he questions conquerors of the battlefield; he asks His Holiness the Pope himself; they all tell him in turn that they are not the king of heaven; then, weary and sorrowful, he goes back to his native land.

It has been said, it is said today in New York, that the music of d'Indy is only cerebral; that it is never emotional. To some, yes to many, this reproach may seem just. His music has often an aristocratic character that is forbidding; it is often austere, as if the composer stood proudly aloof. He does not wear his heart on his sleeve. Yet who can hear his second symphony and this descriptive symphony, not to mention other works by him, without feeling that Vincent d'Indy is profoundly, nobly emotional. "The Search for God" is necessarily episodic, as there must be musical expression of each guest of the giant; but here is no panoramic music, no music for films; even without the story in mind, the music would be impressive, whether it portrays the pomp of potentates, the fury of battle, or the joyous bells and the exultation of the faithful on the feast day of the Resurrection. No, d'Indy here is not cold and repelling. His heart beats as warmly for humanity as did the heart of his master Cesar Franck.

Malpiero's Suite is a delightful little work, with interesting and poetic ideas, deftly expressed by the instruments. His scheme of orchestration seems to be his own; nor is he in his harmonic scheme an imitator. They are little pieces, these impressions received from the three birds, but there is more fancy in them than in many huge symphonies and pretentious symphonic poems. How discreet, yet how telling is his employment of instruments! Each has its significance. Mr. Monteux, who conducted throughout skillfully and con amore, is to be heartily thanked for bringing out noteworthy modern compositions.

The Rhapsody of Delius was performed here by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1916. It then seemed inferior in construction and interest to his "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," which are in the repertory of the Boston Sym-

PIERRE MONTEUX. Conductor

GUY MAIER. Pianist

Lee Pattison

SYMPHONY IN NINTH CONCERT

Messrs. Maier and Pattison,
Pianists, Assist in Admirable Program

MALPIERO'S SUITE
NEW TO AMERICA

Herald Dec. 24/20

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteaux, conductor, took place Thursday night. The concert was repeated yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart, Overture to "Don Giovanni" and Concerto for two pianos (K. 365); d'Indy, "The Search for God"; Malpiero, "Impressions from Nature," Suite No. 1 (The Blackcap; the Woodpecker; the Owl); Delius, A Dance Rhapsody. The pianists were Guy Maier and Lee Pattison.

We write with reference to the concert of yesterday.

After a spirited performance of the overture to the opera that, in spite of the years, is to be ranked with "Pelleas and Melisande" as the supreme achievement of lyrically dramatic art, widely different as the operas are in form and in expression, Messrs. Maier and Pattison gave an admirable performance of Mozart's Concerto in E flat. The Herald has more than once extolled the ensemble playing of these musicians. Yesterday they not only displayed the qualities that have excited praise in cities of this country, Paris and London; they also showed their nice appreciation of the Concerto's character. There was no attempt to modernize the music, to give it incongruous, destructive importance. They accepted the music as it is, suave, tender and also lightsome, and played as Mozart wished; for he once wrote that music should always "sound," meaning that it should be euphonious; and he demanded of a pianist that running passages should flow like oil.

D'Indy's descriptive symphony from his opera, "The Legend of Saint Christopher," was played for the first time in Boston; Malpiero's Suite for the first time in America; the Rhapsody of Delius for the first time at these concerts.

As d'Indy is a devout Catholic, zealous in the observance of religious rites and ceremonies, it was natural that the legend of Christopher should appeal strongly to him. This symphonic music is played before the second act, after the narrator has told of the giant's search for the king of heaven. The giant visits kings and emperors; he questions conquerors of the battlefield; he asks His Holiness the Pope himself; they all tell him in turn that they are not the king of heaven; then, weary and sorrowful, he goes back to his native land.

It has been said, it is said today in New York, that the music of d'Indy is only cerebral; that it is never emotional. To some, yes to many, this reproach may seem just. His music has often an aristocratic character that is forbidding; it is often austere, as if the composer stood proudly aloof. He does not wear his heart on his sleeve. Yet who can hear his second symphony and this descriptive symphony, not to mention other works by him, without feeling that Vincent d'Indy is profoundly, nobly emotional. "The Search for God" is necessarily episodic, as there must be musical expression of each guest of the giant; but here is no panoramic music, no music for films; even without the story in mind, the music would be impressive, whether it portrays the pomp of potentates, the fury of battle, or the joyous bells and the exultation of the faithful on the feast day of the Resurrection. No, d'Indy here is not cold and repelling. His heart beats as warmly for humanity as did the heart of his master Cesar Franck.

Malpiero's Suite is a delightful little work, with interesting and poetic ideas, deftly expressed by the instruments. His scheme of orchestration seems to be his own; nor is he in his harmonic scheme an imitator. They are little pieces, these impressions received from the three birds, but there is more fancy in them than in many huge symphonies and pretentious symphonic poems. How discreet, yet how telling is his employment of instruments! Each has its significance. Mr. Monteux, who conducted throughout skilfully and con amore, is to be heartily thanked for bringing out noteworthy modern compositions.

The Rhapsody of Delius was performed here by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1916. It then seemed inferior in construction and interest to his "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," which are in the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; far inferior to his beautiful "Summer Garden." In this Rhapsody there is too little rhapsodic glow. The dancers, as the English, according to the old saying, take their pleasure sadly. There is a reserve, almost a melancholy, that characterizes much of this composer's music. His idiom is still strange to us.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Tchaikowsky, "Manfred" Symphony; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Saint-Saens, Piano Concerto G minor, No. 2 (Percy Grainger, pianist); Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

PLAYED FOR FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

Symphony Performs
New Works-Trio

Soloists

Post Dec. 24, 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

Because of Christmas-tide, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which would ordinarily have occurred on Saturday night, was given yesterday evening. The same programme will be performed this afternoon at the customary matinee in Symphony Hall. This programme consists of Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni"; his concerto for two pianos and orchestra, in E-flat, played by Guy Maier and Lee Pattison; "The Search for God," from Vincent d'Indy's sacred opera, "St. Christopher"; "Impressions of Nature," Suite No. 1, by Malapiero, and Delius' "Dance Rhapsody." The compositions by d'Indy and Malapiero were played respectively for the first time in Boston and the first time in America.

D'INDY'S WORK A FEATURE

The feature of this concert was the superb dramatic and symphonic piece of d'Indy. This piece relates the search of Auferus for the Kingdom of Heaven. "He went over the whole earth, visiting the most powerful kingdoms, thinking to find what he sought in the palaces of kings. And the monarchs replied, 'I am not the King of Heaven.'" Auferus went to the great wars. He prostrated himself before the Holy Pontiff, only to receive the same answer. At last, discouraged by seven years wanderings, Auferus returned to his native land.

When d'Indy's opera was performed in Paris, June 6, 1920, the tale of the search and the martyrdom of Auferus is presented in a series of connected episodes and each musical episode is prefaced by spoken narrative on the stage. The music heard last night would have gained in significance, perhaps, under such circumstances. Yet it is such noble music, music so virile in texture, so emotional and lofty of word, that it made a tremendous effect.

Music of the Warrior

We do not know any music which Mr. D'Indy has composed in late years which comes near this piece for sustained inspiration and power. The musical idiom is very strictly that of the old scales and the austere harmonic feeling of medieval times. In this idiom D'Indy is pre-eminently at home. The music never steps out of its medieval frame. It is as the war-song of a Christian warrior of old wandering the world questing for God.

There is musical reference to "the great wars," there is noble pomp and circumstance. The orchestra blazes with color, yet this color is never sensuous or soft. It is radiant or it is hard like steel. It is music mailed and capable, the music of a warrior of the faith. The development of the ideas is as original as it is masterly. It is not conventionally symphonic at all, and old devices like the cannon fit admirably a touching melody in the manner of plain song. Then, too, the piece is so coherent as a whole.

Deliberate and Designed

This music interfered a little with one's receptivity to the impressionistic nature sketches of Malapiero, of which the third, a nocturne, made the best impression at a first hearing. But this music is for the writer far below, in artistic value, the same composer's "Pauses of Silence" heard at the Boston Symphony one and two seasons ago. That music is the mature expression of an exceptional mind. The music of Malapiero heard last night seems deliberate and designed in its impressionism. More worthless, however, was the Delius Dance Rhapsody, a series of variations on an English or Irish dance tune, which variations become tiresome stunts on the part of a composer who is never unconscious of himself.

Messrs. Maier and Pattison gave an admirable performance of Mozart's concerto. They played with a beautifully developed sense of ensemble, with balance of tone, and coordination with the orchestra. They played with sparkle and a lively rhythm, with crisp clarity and precision of attack. In the slow movement, following the lead of the composer, they touched greater depths. The whole performance, technically and musically, was one which put the little known double piano concerto before its audience in a rarely favorable light.

There was much enthusiasm throughout the evening, and recalls for the soloists.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MOZART, MODERNS AND A NOTABLE
NEW PIECE

An Orchestral Fragment from d'Indy's
"Saint Christopher" Proves a Superb
Music—"Impressions of Nature" and a
New Side to Malapiero—"Back to Mozart" and Not in Vain

MOZART and the moderns divided the evening—the concerto in the Symphony Concert of last E-flat for two pianos, seemingly the one evening. Both were interesting, and only piece available when paired virtu- whereas neither he nor they are joined with an orchestra. Years always so. By the virtues of contrast each ago Mr. Randolph and Mr. Hutcheson enhanced the merit of other—desirable circumstance, likewise, if we are to believe, Boston; the other day Mme. Samaroﬀ and as the books tell us, that the current of Mr. Gebhard undertook it in New York; music flows unbroken yesterday, today yesterday Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison and forever. It is good to hear the classics had their turn. It is music almost of an when they are not so familiar as to be improvising Mozart. Possibly he spent coated thick with routine, when they are days or a full week in the making of it, not so rare as to seem like curiosities whereas, according to legend, the overture lifted from a case in a museum, dusted, to "Don Juan" was written in a single varnished and set, as it were, upon rather night. Yet, as his unique way was, tottling pins. Nobody nowadays expects pains, if there were any, did not dim or to hear in the theatre the overture to Mo- stiffen spontaneity. The melodies spring zart's opera, "Don Juan." In its present state this "capital of music" prefers to receive "lyric-drama" in dribblets from primi donne making money and losing reputation as entertainers on Sunday afternoons. Not too often has the overture been repeated at the Symphony Concerts. There, indeed, like many another prelude of the opera house, it seems to lead nowhere. The hearer, again as the books say, must take it as self-contained. Fortunately at the back of nearly everyone's head is some notion of Don Juan, his fortunes and his fate. If there were not few can be so dull as to hear without responding ear and mood the threatening chords, the sombre, mysterious figures of Mozart's first measures. A little orchestra he used, as we say in these days of an hundred players, a relatively small orchestra gave him voice yesterday, but with it and with what economy he gained his ends. In the distant year of grace, 1787, atmosphere (as the present word goes) and illusion were quite possible in music. They are not nearly so modern discoveries as some of us believe. After all it is the individual imagination and not the implements or what the wise call "the time-spirit" that makes the music.

Again, when Mozart goes forward more swiftly and lightly, is the Don Juan rising from page and orchestra a whit less vivid than the Don Juan whom Strauss flings out of his tone-poem on the canvas of our ears and minds in the panoply of modern harmonic and instrumental color, in the light and shade of modern romantic feeling? Is he less glowing, less conquering figure, less in amorous prowess or unearthly fate? Hardly, if only we think of Mozart's overture as the tone-picturing that it really is, yesterday, today and forever; if only on this particular occasion Mr. Monteux had played this Allegro, as the formalists call it, less urgently and more plastically.

Music of another sort was the Mozartean rarity of the evening—the concerto in the Symphony Concert of last E-flat for two pianos, seemingly the one evening. Both were interesting, and only piece available when paired virtu- whereas neither he nor they are joined with an orchestra. Years always so. By the virtues of contrast each ago Mr. Randolph and Mr. Hutcheson enhanced the merit of other—desirable circumstance, likewise, if we are to believe, Boston; the other day Mme. Samaroﬀ and as the books tell us, that the current of Mr. Gebhard undertook it in New York; music flows unbroken yesterday, today yesterday Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison and forever. It is good to hear the classics had their turn. It is music almost of an when they are not so familiar as to be improvising Mozart. Possibly he spent coated thick with routine, when they are days or a full week in the making of it, not so rare as to seem like curiosities whereas, according to legend, the overture lifted from a case in a museum, dusted, to "Don Juan" was written in a single varnished and set, as it were, upon rather night. Yet, as his unique way was, tottling pins. Nobody nowadays expects pains, if there were any, did not dim or to hear in the theatre the overture to Mo- stiffen spontaneity. The melodies spring lightly into being and forthwith charm by flowing grace, pensive fancy, or deft sparkle. The variations and the modulations seem the intuitions of the instant. From the tips of Mozart's fingers fall delicately the orchestral background and accompaniment. The simplicity, fancy, elegance, serenity of the whole music seem inexhaustible second nature in the composer. The hearer, too wonted to the strivings of these our days, basks in them.

If ever there was music of the gossamer of tone it is this concerto and, like light glinting gently through it, is the interplay of the two voices. The one pianist completes the melody that the other has begun; or lets his fellow sing it, while he weaves his garlands of arabesque.

Back figures more there a hal More Maier their have b and se rable Figure fancy pulse With t smiling tison unity respon divided feel it spirit- and e ers bu and e compl all we again.

Not celved the n ture," for th danzk ago in black and drums lar pi tone-p lar e is sur with dellne Wagr fried. figure it flai til th ing th shimi

Malipiero's own poetry of this summer woodland—a clear and simple poetry withal. Then the poetry of silent night in woodland dusky and still. For it Malipiero discovers melody, simple, low-voiced, suffused with dim harmonies; shadowy of color—music that may have sounded in his ear as from long vista felt rather than seen. Again, the woods of autumn, the conventional mood of melancholy, with a touch of convention (as musical convention goes in these days) in the expression of it. This first "impression" may pass for preluding. The other two affirm anew the sensitive temper, the sensitive hand of Malipiero. He can summon his own beauty and suggestion into musical speech; he can also use, as some have doubted, a spirit, ~~spoke~~ unfettered and unclouded. There is more than one resemblance between his "Saint Christopher" and Wagner's "Parsifal." Not the least is the equal impression of old design and deeply set purpose at last and altogether fulfilled.

The outcome, in this symphonic fragment, with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra adding their own eloquence, is music that less persuades by beauty than commands by power. There is superb largeness of substance; there is a stripped might of march and movement. Down the winds of time, blow the echoes of battles, in old legend. Far yet near stir the tonal pomps of kings and pontiffs keeping high and holy festival. Here and there sound the voices of the vicars and the lords whom God, in those days, set over men. These things come and go; while the great longing in the heart of the slave for the King of Heaven ever haunts the music, as in undertone; while in overtone, go the wonder, the beauty, the power of that celestial presence. Let the pedants pick their way into the occasional Wagnerian suggestion—for d'Indy cannot escape the master who, hardly less than Franck, swayed his younger prime. Let them seek out also for delight or derision what some will call the "medievalism" of "Saint Christopher." The power, the exaltation remain and both are the rarest of qualities, whatever be the other glories, of composers in our particular day. For the most part they bask in their gardens. D'Indy prefers his high tower.

H. T. PARKER

(Photograph by Horner)

The Revived and Newly Constituted Hoffmann Quartet

J. Hoffmann, First Violin; C. Barth, Violoncello; L. Artieres, Viola; E. Hoffmann, Second Violin

lightly into being and forthwith charm by flowing grace, pensive fancy, or deft sparkle. The variations and the modulations seem the intuitions of the instant. From the tips of Mozart's fingers fall delicately the orchestra's background and accompaniment. The simplicity, fancy, elegance, serenity of the whole music seem inexhaustible second nature in the composer. The hearer, too wonted to the strivings of these our days, basks in them.

If ever there was music of the gossamer of tone it is this concerto and, like light glinting gently through it, is the interplay of the two voices. The one pianist completes the melody that the other has begun; or lets his fellow sing it, while he weaves his garlands of arabesque. Back and forth they toss variations and figures; ornament from the one suggests more ornament from the other, and lo! there is a cadenza. And so forth through a half hour of seeming improvisation.

Moreover, Mozartean as Mozart were Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison face to face across their two pianos. Their tone—for they have but one—was limpid and light, bright and sensitive. Their fingers were inseparable when the melody flowed from them. Figure and ornament kept Mozartean fancy and grace, seemed the common impulse of the instant in the two virtuosi. With the composer they shared serene and smiling elegance. Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison have attained more than a flawless unity of touch and tone, more than a like responsiveness when the piece in hand divides their voices. They perceive music, feel it, play it as with a single mind and spirit. The eye sees two pianists; the ear and every other perceptive faculty discovers but one. Yesterday, moreover, a third and essential voice—Mozart's own—was as completely fused with theirs. Through it all went a hint of miracle—Mozart's way again.

Not in garden but in woods Malipiero received the sensations out of which he made the music of three "Impressions of Nature," played in Boston by Mr. Monteux for the first time in America, as Mr. Bodanzky played the other three two months ago in New York. The names of birds—blackcap, wood-pecker, owl—label them and beyond mistaking. The wood-pecker drums intermittently through his particular piece. In fact, however, all three are tone-pictures in little, according to familiar exercise of our composing youth. It is summer in the woods and they are astrife with light and life. Malipiero writes no delineative music after the example of Wagner in the familiar scene in "Siegfried." Rather, he finds a rhythmic figure (as Musorgsky liked to do) and sets it flashing here, there and everywhere until the music becomes a sunlit web quivering in the bright air. The background shimmers: the motion never halts. It is Malipiero's own poetry of this summer woodland—a clear and simple poetry withal. Then the poetry of silent night in woodland dusky and still. For it Malipiero discovers melody, simple, low-voiced, suffused with dim harmonies; shadowy of color—music that may have sounded in his ear as from long vista felt rather than seen. Again, the woods of autumn, the conventional mood of melancholy, with a touch of convention (as musical convention goes in these days) in the expression of it. This first "impression" may pass for prelude. The other two affirm anew the sensitive temper, the sensitive hand of Malipiero. He can summon his own beauty and suggestion into musical speech; he can also use, as some have doubted, a relative simplicity of means.

Finally, the composer of constriction, the Delius, whose music even in a "Dance Rhapsody" is never so articulate as his imagination would make it. He would improvise bravely upon a well-rhythmed, readily manipulated motive. He would make it dance; he would make it sing. But no sooner does he set the dance in motion than somehow beclow its feet as by excess of tension; while no sooner does he sign than cloudy harmonies descend upon the ring. Only with a mighty effort toward the end does he finally set his motive free. The gods of music have been cruel to Delius. Imagination they gave him and then denied him speech.

D'Indy led the moderns—the d'Indy of the one fragment from the music-drama of Saint Christopher that it is possible to transfer to the concert-hall—a symphonic poem, in brief rather than in little, that is epitome, in the second act, of the journey of the slave who was to be martyr, up and down the world in quest of the King of Heaven. Of course, it should be the obligation of the Metropolitan Opera House to set on the American stage this "Legend of Saint Christopher," with which an illustrious composer would crown his career, in which he has written as only he in our time writes. By the token, moreover, of this symphonic fragment, he would not fail upon the ears, the minds, the hearts of hearers. The music is masterfully made, with the fertility in invention and resource; the ever unfolding unity that are d'Indy's intent and desire fulfilled. Into music he would transmute mediæval legend and often out of these pages rise the modes, the accents of mediæval psalmody. None the less, being of these days and of his own voice and manner, d'Indy impregnates them with modern sonorities, sharpens them with twentieth-century dissonance, enriches them with the harmony and the color of a later time. Learning, wisdom, resource aid in the process, but a veritable divination guides it. Seemingly in this music of his final years, the loftiness, the austerity of d'Indy's mind and spirit speak unfettered and unclouded. There is more than one resemblance between his "Saint Christopher" and Wagner's "Parsifal." Not the least is the equal impression of old design and deeply set purpose at last and altogether fulfilled.

The outcome, in this symphonic fragment, with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra adding their own eloquence, is music that less persuades by beauty than commands by power. There is superb largeness of substance; there is a stripped might of march and movement. Down the winds of time, blow the echoes of battles, in old legend. Far yet near stir the tonal pomps of kings and pontiffs keeping high and holy festival. Here and there sound the voices of the vicars and the lords whom God, in those days, set over men. These things come and go while the great longing in the heart of the slave for the King of Heaven ever haunts the music, as in undertone; while in overtone, go the wonder, the beauty, the power of that celestial presence. Let the pedants pick their way into the occasional Wagnerian suggestion—for d'Indy cannot escape the master who, hardly less than Franck, swayed his younger prime. Let them seek out also for delight or derision what some will call the "mediævalism" of "Saint Christopher." The power, the exaltation remain and both are the rarest of qualities, whatever be the other glories, of composers in our particular day. For the most part they bask in their gardens. D'Indy prefers his high tower.

H. T. PARKER

G. Francesco Malipiero

116

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, AT 8 P. M.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

"MANFRED" SYMPHONY, op. 58.
(after Byron's Dramatic Poem)

- I. Manfred's Wanderings and Despair. Lento Lugubre; Moderato con moto; Andante; Andante con duolo.
- II. The Fairy of the Alps. Vivace con spirito; Trio l'istesso Tempo.
- III. Pastorale: Andante con moto
- IV. The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte; Manfred's Death. Allegro con fuoco; Andante con duolo; Tempo primo; Largo

GRIFFES,

"The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan."
(after the Poem of S. T. Coleridge)

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO No. 2 in G minor for Pianoforte, op. 22

- I. Andante sostenuto
- II. Allegretto scherzando
- III. Presto

LALO,

OVERTURE to "Le Roi d'Ys"
("The King of Ys")

Soloist:

PERCY GRAINGER

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

117

Percy Grainger, the Australian Pianist, Will Play This Winter for the First Time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston Public Knows Him Well Because of His Settings of Folk Songs.

GRAINGER SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Restore Tschaikowsky to Place on the List

BY OLIN DOWNES

The variety and interest of Mr. Monteux's programmes continuing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony; Griffith's symphonic poem, "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and, with the assistance of Percy Grainger, pianist, Saint-Saens' G minor concerto, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

TSCHAIKOWSKY WELCOME

Mr. Monteux has conducted comparatively few compositions of Tschaikowsky—is Tschaikowsky waning in the concert hall?—and his choice of the "Manfred" symphony, or fantasia, which has not been heard at these concerts for many years, was a welcome one. Writing this work, Tschaikowsky is Russian "Manfred" himself, and we would listen willingly to this long, picturesque, dramatic composition, if only to hear again the superbly tragic theme of "Manfred," so ominously intoned at the opening of the work, so nobly flung out against the tumultuous tonal background of the conclusion.

Other Beauties in Work

But there are other pages. There is the movement in which Tschaikowsky suggests the appearance of the Witch of the Alps in the waterfall, which remains, in these days of virtuoso instrumentation, a fascinating passage of scoring, and other rages, in which Tschaikowsky shows his Slavic passion for the picturesque. Above all, there is the haunting beauty and poignancy of the dialogue with the ghost of Astarte. Well, there are those who look with condescension on this composer Tschaikowsky. They talk about his over-emotionalism, his unrestrained revelations of self, his tonal mannerisms and excesses, his difficulty in mastering symphonic form. This fact remains: as no other Russian, with the possible exception of Moussorgsky, who could never have filled a canvas the size of the "Manfred" symphony, Tschaikowsky can rise to an occasion.

Puts Other Writers to Shame

He may flag at moments when exigencies of form embarrass him. But confront him with a dramatic moment, and he will portray Manfred with a theme as Byronic as Byron. Give him such a situation as that which follows the orgy in the Palace of Arimenes, in Byron's poem, and Tschaikowsky will match it with his music. He will match it in a way you will never forget. He will put most of the composers of his day, not only composers of Russia, but of all Europe, to shame by the fervor, the sincerity, the flaming intensity of his utterance.

There was occasion again, listening to "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn," to lament the untimely taking off of Charles Tomlinson Griffes, the young American of great genius who was just finding himself in his art when he died. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn" had, in fact, barely become known and recognized for its work when there came to an end a career of extraordinary promise.

Mr. Grainger's Playing

Then, at the hands of Mr. Percy Grainger, as fluent a pianist as he is a composer, a performer born to play this popular work, the Saint-Saens G minor concerto, with its astonishingly grand opening and its astonishingly superficial progress, rattled to its end.

A less noted composer, in a less pretentious manner, does something which stirs us far more—ala in the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

Percy Grainger, the Australian Pianist, Will Play This Winter for the First Time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston Public Knows Him Well Because of His Settings of Folk Songs.

GRAINGER SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Restore Tchaikowsky
to Place on the List

BY OLIN DOWNES

The variety and interest of Mr. Monteux's programmes continuing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony; Griffith's symphonic poem, "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and, with the assistance of Percy Grainger, pianist, Saint-Saens' G minor concerto, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

TSCHAIKOWSKY WELCOME

Mr. Monteux has conducted comparatively few compositions of Tchaikowsky—is Tchaikowsky waning in the concert hall?—and his choice of the "Manfred" symphony, or fantasia, which has not been heard at these concerts for many years, was a welcome one. Writing this work, Tchaikowsky is Russian "Manfred" himself, and we would listen willingly to this long, picturesque, dramatic composition, if only to hear again the superbly tragic theme of "Manfred," so ominously intoned at the opening of the work, so nobly flung out against the tumultuous tonal background of the conclusion.

Other Beauties in Work

But there are other pages. There is the movement in which Tchaikowsky suggests the appearance of the Witch of the Alps in the waterfall, which remains, in these days of virtuoso instrumentation, a fascinating passage of scoring, and other pages, in which Tchaikowsky shows his Slavic passion for the picturesque. Above all, there is the haunting beauty and poignancy of the dialogue with the ghost of Astarte. Well, there are those who look with condescension on this composer Tchaikowsky. They talk about his over-emotionalism, his unrestrained revelations of self, his tonal mannerisms and excesses, his difficulty in mastering symphonic form. This fact remains; as no other Russian, with the possible exception of Moussorgsky, who could never have filled a canvas the size of the "Manfred" symphony, Tchaikowsky can rise to an occasion.

Puts Other Writers to Shame

He may flag at moments, when exigencies of form embarrass him. But confront him with a dramatic moment, and he will portray Manfred with a theme as Byronic as Byron give him such a situation as that which follows the orgy in the Palace of Arimenes, in Byron's poem, and Tchaikowsky will match it with his music. He will match it in a way you will never forget. He will put most of the composers of his day, not only composers of Russia, but of all Europe, to shame by the fervor, the sincerity, the flaming intensity of his utterance.

There was occasion again, listening to "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn," to lament the untimely taking off of Charles Tomlinson Griffes, the young American of great genius who was just finding himself in his art when he died. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn" had, in fact, barely become known and recognized for its work when there came to an end a career of extraordinary promise.

Mr. Grainger's Playing

Then, at the hands of Mr. Percy Grainger, as fluent a pianist as he is a composer, a performer born to play this popular work, the Saint-Saens G minor concerto, with its astonishingly grand opening and its astonishingly superficial progress, rattled to its end.

A less noted composer, in a less pretentious manner, does something which stirs us far more—ala in the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

1. 1921

TENTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Percy Grainger, Pianist,
Assists in Impressive
Program

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S "MANFRED" HEARD

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tchaikowsky, "Manfred" Symphony; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor, No. 2 for the piano; Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Percy Grainger was the pianist.

The "Manfred" symphony had not been played at these concerts for nine years. In no one of Tchaikowsky's important works is the composer's labor more apparent. He was practically hounded to the task by Balakireff, who sketched a program for him in 1882, told him what he should and should not do, assuring him that Byron's tragedy as a subject for a symphonic poem had contemporaneous interest, "for modern humanity is such because it knows not how to preserve its ideals."

The performance yesterday was impressive and brilliant. The French musicians and critics have for some years not been over-friendly towards Tchaikowsky's music. It does not appeal to them so much as the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff or that of Borodin, or even that of Balakireff. Perhaps Tchaikowsky's mannerisms, never more noticeable than in this symphony, annoy them; the endless repetition of a negligible phrase by various solo instruments or groups of instruments; a certain coarseness in choice of thematic material; his tendency to shriek his emotions; a gloomy atmosphere, which he breathed as a man. Yet, now and then, in "Manfred" there are eloquently Byronic moments. Manfred and Astarte are strongly portrayed by their respective themes. Scorn, remorse, despair are thundered forth, while the memory and the vision of Astarte are expressed with a tenderness, now human, now unearthly that we find in Tchaikowsky's letters when he pours out his soul in confidence. The second movement, "The Fairy of the Alps," with its tonal representation of the cataract, and the final bacchanal show the influence of Berlioz. Tchaikowsky is no more fortunate in a musical orgy than Berlioz was in his finale of "Harold in Italy"; but for his finale the former found contrasting measures of a sepulchral solemnity that he alone could imagine; measures that speak of the tomb and the end of all desires; hopeless, desolate measures, as those in the first and last movements of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

"The symphonic poem of Griffes, played for the first time at a concert of this orchestra a little over a year ago, when the composer was suffering in body, unable to pay for the copying of the orchestral parts, and thus taxing what strength was his, teaching by day and working far into the night that his "Kubla Khan" might be ready for performance, brought vividly to mind the loss to the world by his untimely departure. For here is music of genuine fancy, music that by the thought and the expression reveal individuality and the soul of a poet. Nor was this composer guilty of abusing pseudo-Orientalism; he heard music that might have stirred the revellers beneath Kubla's pleasure dome.

Mr. Grainger played the familiar concerto in a delightfully musical manner. Not relying solely on fleetness and brilliancy, he gave a finely conceived and detailed performance of the first movement, too often read in a perfunctory manner by pianists impatient to show what they "can do" later when insistent demands are made on technical proficiency. And so, well-worn as the concerto is, yesterday it had fresh life, nor was the workmanship displayed by the composer the only attractive feature of the music itself.

The concert was too long, yet who would have missed Lalo's overture or Mr. Monteux's interpretation of it?

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week is as follows: Schubert, "Overture in C-Major," in Italian style; Hadyn, "Military Symphony"; Bruch, "Violin Concerto, G-Minor, No. 1"; Debussy, "The Sea." Isolde Menges will be the violinist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. Jan. 3, 1921
CHAIKOVSKY'S "MANFRED"; ALSO
REAL MUSIC

The Commonplaces, Seldom Relieved, of a Tedious Piece — Mr. Griffes's "Kubla
Khan" Renews Its Magic—Mr. Grainger, Glorifies a Concerto by Saint-Saens, and Throughout the Orchestra Shines

CHAIKOVSKY is the ogre of the Symphony Concerts. Many frequenting them wish to hear his music, hear it seldom, are disappointed, speak their desires and their chagrin to each other and to the powers that be at Symphony Hall. On the other hand, every conductor of the orchestra, since Mr. Fiedler's day, has disliked Chaikovsky's music and made no secret of his distaste. Dr. Muck was ill at ease with the Russian's pieces; believed himself unresponsive and dull in actual performance; would have none of the three latter symphonies (except "The Pathetic" at Pension Fund concerts); and compromised with the desire of the public by far separated revivals of a suite or a tone-poem. Since Chaikovsky is rarely heard at orchestral concerts in Paris, where orthodox and unorthodox look askew at him, Mr. Rabaud knew him not. Mr. Monteux, in turn, inclines little to his music, but with his usual fairness and openness of mind, appreciates the hankering of many for it. Having set The Pathetic Symphony on a Pension-Fund programme, he began to cast about for a piece to be played in the regular course of the concerts. Upon neither the fourth nor the fifth symphony, both long unheard in Boston, upon none of the suites or the fantasias, did his choice finally fall, but upon "Manfred: Symphony after Byron's Dramatic Poem," last audible in Symphony Hall from the hands of the admiring Fiedler in 1911.

Accordingly, "Manfred" was played at the Symphony Concert of last Saturday and rapt was the attention, long and loud the applause, particularly when orchestra as well as conductor stood to receive it. Numerous are the partisans of Peter Ilitch—usually with their forties well behind them—and vociferous as well. Yet in many an ear of 1921 the music itself sounded, for the most part, trite and tedious, coarse and common. A darksome, clumping motif rumbles out Manfred's despairing woe and is led through tonal tortures and tonal thunders. A motif, sensuously sugared, songfully thickened, evokes Astarte from his visions—the familiar formula, the easy antithesis, of Chaikovsky symphonic, silthering up and down the orchestra or purring "intensely" through it. And lo! there is a first movement!

Next a scherzo—saving grace to the whole piece so long as Chaikovsky is busy with the flickering rhythms, the glinting harmonies, the rainbow of instrumental color, wherewith he would suggest the Fairy of the Waterfall. By so much fancy, if not imagination, serves him in this "Manfred Symphony." Soon, however, return the hero's and the composer's dolorous dumps. They are not slow to descend upon the conventional "pastoral" stuff of the third movement. Manfred "does take on awful," as the colored woman said of her distressed husband; but three-quarters of the symphony are done. Sound and fury begin the final division—an "orgy" in the palace of a Prince of Darkness who stupidly mistakes din for debauchery. Then a ghostly interlude—Astarte in apparition—where, for the second time in the whole music, Chaikovsky forsakes formula for illusion. Finally, sixty long minutes from the beginning, the grim measures of Manfred's dissolution. They are appropriately lugubrious; they stage death; but with naught in them of the passage from despair into nothingness, wringing ear and spirit at the end of The Pathetic Symphony.

There Chaikovsky, deeply, almost fiercely, imagining, cuts to the quick. Here he tolls at a formula of romantic music à la Berlioz and of romantic poetry à la Byron. The fashions of both change and we, fickle mortals, change with them. Only by effort of will may we stir nowadays to Manfred in verse or tones, and the impulse must come from the vesture around him. Neither Byron nor Chaikovsky can weave it for the eyes and ears of the twentieth century. In verse, in spite of the Englishman's poetic energy and pictorial richness, Manfred, mooning, posturing, is the spent rocket of a dead-and-gone romanticism. In tones of the Russian, if no. of Schumann, he is mere formula worked when, with the exceptions already noted, the composer's imagination was dry and his hand mechanical. A common Manfred is a bore and Chaikovsky's Manfred is common.

Then began the real music of the evening—with Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," timely repeated after the first hearings of last season, for intrinsic desert no less than as memorial to a composer who might have long adorned American music, had Death, the hateful, passed him by. With this very piece he has appreciably enriched it. For here is the very poetry of tones. Out of parting harmonic mists rises Coleridge's palace of dream—and there is magic in the line and pulse of the music. Around gardens blossom, fountains flow—and sunlit is the melody, rippling the modulations. There is festival within—and dance-rhythms rise and fall while near and far the instrumental voices clang. Magic again—and upon palace, garden, fete, the harmonic veils descend. Of old they warmed; now they chill. A perfect music in degree and kind is this tone-poem, because everywhere the formal progress and the poetic and pictorial suggestion go hand in hand effortless; because everywhere well chosen and individual means accomplish the desired end; because from first measure to last Mr. Griffes evokes and sustains one of the most evasive of moods—the mood of magical vision; because the beauty and the fineness of his measures are born of as fine and beautiful an imagery. There are in American music Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Carpenter. There was—the more the pity—Mr. Griffes. And a public that fourteen months ago covered "The Pleasure-Dome" with applause, somehow on Saturday heard it coldly.

Possibly the audience felt surer of the estimable Monsieur Saint-Saëns in a concerto fifty years old, with Mr. Grainger as pianist—for fresh token of the more enlightened policy now prevailing at the Symphony Concerts in the choice of soloists. In the Higginsonian day, 'round and 'round went the "good old stand-bys." Blessed were they because hearers knew exactly what to expect. Now youth, as youth in the concert-hall goes, has entry—Helfetz and Spalding, Levitzki and Ornstein, Mr. Werrenrath and Miss Braslau—and seldom has this youth defaulted anticipation. Once more Mr. Grainger fulfilled it. The life of this concerto in G minor is rhythmic verve, and the pianist was adept and unflagging. It is crystal-clear music, and he was limpid and crisp of tone without a hint of dry exposition or hardness of touch. Throughout Saint-Saëns is both fanciful and elegant—without those traits the pedants would surely have scorned the Allegretto as "trivial"—while Mr. Grainger was as playful and polished as though he had never cultivated the marimba or written, if memory does not slip as to title, a corn-stalk march.

And the best of all the pianist's abilities was precisely the ability that the concerto most needed. Whatever the music before him, he animates it, makes it sound as if he and the composer were improvising it upon ears and perceptions hearing it, in the illusion of the instant, for the first time. How sure, simple, felicitous seemed Saint-Saëns's means!

Franksome was the Presto, with the liveliest of modulation in pace and accent. The Allegretto charmed by gayety and sheen of progress. The more sedate first movement gained warath, grace, pellucid phrase, rhythmic ardor. Mr. Grainger is unashamed of high spirits in the concert-hall, albeit within he measures and masters them. Saint-Saëns, dry old juggler with tones, as he often seems nowadays, should bless him for them.

With the overture to Lalo's opera, "The King of Ys," the concert ended and once more the "new" orchestra gave proof of its new powers. The violoncello, the oboe, the clarinet sang as voices in music-drama; now the band felt the rhythmic impetuosity of Lalo's measures, again suffused them with his sentiment, or anew caught his martial fire. Yet it had excelled no less in Chalkovsky's rainbow-like Scherzo; while, as Mr. Monteux rightly willed, it spared not with Manfred's rude musical melodrama. As well within their powers lay the filmy texture of Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, the bright rhythms, the smiling euphonies of Saint-Saëns's concerto. A real orchestra plays again at Symphony Hall, and more and more it becomes a sensitized instrument.

Items and Announcements

Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in a second concert for its Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, and with the long and eagerly desired "Wagner Programme." It will be interesting to see how a cosmopolitan conductor like him chooses it and what mettle the band displays in it. To ask for Wagner in the opera house in the Boston of 1921 is to cry for the moon. (The director of the Metropolitan smiled the smile of gentle scorn when some one asked him the other day whether he might bring his company hither next spring!) But Wagner in the concert-hall is a deal better than no Wagner at all.

By another token even the old men are resigning themselves to the end of the war. Two weeks hence, Mme. Menges is to play at the Symphony Concerts a concerto of Bruch for violin—and by free and unmolested choice. Now the aged Bruch, like other men of his years the world over, said in war-time many a peevish, false and foolish thing about "the enemy." Some hereabouts noted them, chose to be vindictive, and by ulterior influences compelled Mr. Spalding (who happened to fight in that same war) to abandon a concerto of Bruch that he wished to play at the Symphony Concerts a year ago last October, as they had previously constrained Miss Braslau to withdraw a piece of his music that she wished to sing with the orchestra. Mr.

Symphony Hall.

Monteux and public sentiment generally have happily made an end of these futillities. Bellicose invective and concertos for violin hardly seem related things.

Orchestra and conductor departed last evening upon the usual monthly journey southward. In Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, Mr. Cortot, the familiar pianist, will assist them, playing Saint-Saëns's concerto in F major in which he was once heard here with the Conservatory Orchestra of Paris. The same cities are to hear Casella's version of Balakirev's "Islamey," to be played likewise in New York along with the other novel numbers of recent concerts in Boston—the fragment from d'Indy's "Saint Christopher"; Bax's tone-poem, "In the Fairy Hills"; Malipiero's "Nature-Pieces" and Mr. Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." Schumann's symphony in D minor, Brahms's in E minor and Chalkovsky's "Manfred" are distributed through the programmes.

H. T. PARKER

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor BOSTON, Massachusetts — At its tenth concert on December 31 the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the following program: Tchaikowsky, "Manfred" symphony op. 58; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Saint-Saëns, second concerto for pianoforte in G minor; Lalo, overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." Percy Grainger was the pianist.

Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" has not been heard here in some years and is something of a novelty for that reason. The freshness of the themes and the brightly colored orchestration are remarkable still. For all its morbid wailing, its fretfulness, its pure and unashamed melodrama, this music shows the unmistakable marks of genius. The performance was above criticism. Mr. Monteux's understanding of the score was perfect. He played it sincerely, in the true romantic manner.

Griffes' "Kubla Khan," played for the first time a little over a year ago, did not produce a different impression than on that occasion. The composer has well assimilated the means of expression adopted by composers of the present time. It is artfully constructed music, picturesque, effective, and at certain moments expressive. There is a noticeable absence of a distinctive, personal note, however.

Would that Mr. Grainger had chosen another and more novel concerto. One associates him with less hackneyed, familiar music. His reading was remarkable, nevertheless, for its rhythmic life and fire. His performance was without affectation, sincere, in the spirit of the music. Lalo's Overture is agreeable music, a useful piece for rounding out a program. The playing of the orchestra throughout the afternoon was particularly beautiful in tone and phrasing.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

Boston—Symphony Hall—Tonight at 8

Soloist, Percy Grainger

Philadelphia—Academy of Music, Mon. Jan. 3, at 8:15. Soloist, Alfred Cortot.

Washington—New National Theatre, Tues., Jan. 4, at 4:30. Alfred Cortot.

Baltimore—Lyric Theatre, Wed., Jan. 5, at 8:15. Alfred Cortot.

New York—Carnegie Hall, Thurs., Jan. 6, at 8:15, and Sat., Jan. 8, at 2:30.

Brooklyn—Academy of Music—Fri., Jan. 7, at 8:15. Alfred Cortot.

Springfield, City Auditorium—Sun., Jan. 9, at 3.

Hartford, Parsons Theatre—Mon., Jan. 10, at 8:15. Soloist, Piastro.

124

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

ELEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 14, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, AT 8 P.M.

SCHUBERT,

OVERTURE in the Italian Style in C major, op. 170

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in G major, "Military, (B.&H.No.II)

- I. Adagio; Allegro
- II. Allegretto
- III. Menuetto; Trio
- IV. Finale: Presto

BRUCH,

CONCERTO for Violin, No. 1, in G minor, op. 26

- I. Prelude: Allegro moderato
- II. Adagio
- III. Allegro energico

DEBUSSY,

TROIS ESQUISSES SYMPHONIQUES, "La Mer"

- I. De l'aube a midi sur la mer (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean")
- II. Jeux de vagues, ("Frolic of Waves")
- III. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer, ("Dialogue of Wind and Sea")

Soloist:

ISOLDE MENGES

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

125

Isolde Menges, the Young English Violinist, Came to This Country with a Great Reputation. This Praise Was More Than Confirmed by Her Performance in New York. She Will Appear in Boston for the First Time This Winter.

SYMPHONY PERFORMS "THE SEA"

Debussy's Work Easily
Feature of Its Concert

Post Jan. 15, 1921
BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Isolde Menges, violinist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions were: Schubert's Overture in the Italian manner; Haydn's Military symphony, and Debussy's three pieces for orchestra, which go under the collective title of "La Mer."

DEBUSSY THE FEATURE

The performance of this music of Debussy was for some the feature of the concert. Not but what Mr. Monteux led a superb performance of a delightful and insufficiently known symphony of Haydn, not but what Schubert's overture in the manner of Rossini entertained the audience hugely. But the crown of the concert was Debussy's impressionistic score, which was given by far the best performance thus far heard in this city.

As to the permanent value of this music, one hesitates after many hearings in coming to a conclusion. Debussy's sea is as baffling as the sea itself, in its many moods. These moods, or these sounds of the sea, are miraculously echoed by Debussy's orchestra.

Marvelous Orchestration

The orchestration of this composition seems almost past compare. It is wonderful in every way and in every department of the orchestra. If one took the scoring for the woodwind choir alone, the woodwind choir without strings or brass or even percussion to help it out, one would be fascinated. In fact, some times we wonder if fewer strings than those of the standard symphony orchestra of today, with the retention of the standard number of wind instruments, would not make even a more effective performance. We have heard this music in the smaller spaces of Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, where the wood showed more than it does in the spaces of Symphony Hall, and the effect was wilder, more eerie, more uncannily of the sea. But what is true of the woodwind is likewise true of the strings and other divisions of the orchestra. Debussy writes for one as for all, with complete mastery.

In Debussy's orchestra the winds whisper, the waves crash, sirens sing strange songs. But in spite of all this tonal magic the music seems to lack the grip and the unity of conception which make so wonderful for example, the earlier and less mature music of the movement, "Sirens" from the three orchestral nocturnes. In that movement is the essence of "La Mer," and the Nocturne is much less sophisticated, much less fussed over, while simple and wonderful ideas, put very modestly, tell with becoming brevity, an unforgettable tale.

Best Way to Enjoy It

The way to take "La-Mer"—and one could not help taking it that way during the sympathetic and engrossing performance of Mr. Monteux—is perhaps to listen to each measure for what it is, to immerse oneself in its sheer tonal beauty and wonder; to forget all instinctive demands for some kind of a form, some kind of an artistic structure; to meet the composer half way, not to reflect that this sound might represent a wind that was shaking the shutters as well as a wind disturbing ocean depths, to take Debussy's word for it that this is the sea and revel in the fantasy with the composer. Thus Wilde lamented the decay of the art of lying. To him every artist was a liar, a man who invents something which is not so, and his greatness to be measured by the quality of his yarn. Let us listen to Mr. Debussy, artist-liar, with Isolde Menges, the Young English Violinist, Came to This Country with a Great Reputation. This Praise Was More Than Confirmed by Her Performance in New York. She Will Appear in Boston for the First Time This Winter.

SYMPHONY PERFORMS "THE SEA"

Debussy's Work Easily
Feature of Its Concert

Post Jan. 15, 1921
BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Isolde Menges, violinist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions were: Schubert's Overture in the Italian manner; Haydn's Military symphony, and Debussy's three pieces for orchestra, which go under the collective title of "La Mer."

DEBUSSY THE FEATURE

The performance of this music of Debussy was for some the feature of the concert. Not but what Mr. Monteux led a superb performance of a delightful and insufficiently known symphony of Haydn, not but what Schubert's overture in the manner of Rossini entertained the audience hugely. But the crown of the concert was Debussy's impressionistic score, which was given by far the best performance thus far heard in this city.

As to the permanent value of this music, one hesitates after many hearings in coming to a conclusion. Debussy's sea is as baffling as the sea itself, in its many moods. These moods, or these sounds of the sea, are miraculously echoed by Debussy's orchestra.

Marvelous Orchestration

The orchestration of this composition seems almost past compare. It is wonderful in every way and in every department of the orchestra. If one took the scoring for the woodwind choir alone, the woodwind choir without strings or brass or even percussion to help it out, one would be fascinated. In fact, some times we wonder if fewer strings than those of the standard symphony orchestra of today, with the retention of the standard number of wind instruments, would not make even a more effective performance. We have heard this music in the smaller spaces of Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, where the wood showed more than it does in the spaces of Symphony Hall, and the effect was wilder, more eerie, more uncannily of the sea. But what is true of the woodwind is likewise true of the strings and other divisions of the orchestra. Debussy writes for one as for all, with complete mastery.

In Debussy's orchestra the winds whisper, the waves crash, sirens sing strange songs. But in spite of all this tonal magic the music seems to lack the grip and the unity of conception which make so wonderful for example, the earlier and less mature music of the movement, "Sirens" from the three orchestral nocturnes. In that movement is the essence of "La Mer," and the Nocturne is much less sophisticated, much less fussed over, while simple and wonderful ideas, put very modestly, tell with becoming brevity, an unforgettable tale.

Best Way to Enjoy It

The way to take "La-Mer"—and one could not help taking it that way during the sympathetic and engrossing performance of Mr. Monteux—is perhaps to listen to each measure for what it is, to immerse oneself in its sheer tonal beauty and wonder, to forget all instinctive demands for some kind of a form, some kind of an artistic structure; to meet the composer half way, not to reflect that this sound might represent a wind that was shaking the shutters as well as a wind disturbing ocean depths, to take Debussy's word for it that this is the sea and revel in the fantasy with the composer. Thus Wilde lamented the decay of the art of lying. To him every artist was a liar, a man who invents something which is not so, and his greatness to be measured by the quality of his yarn. Let us listen to Mr. Debussy, artist-liar, with the understanding that if he will please keep on lying so wonderfully about the sea we will listen to him, promise not to interrupt or ask embarrassing questions as to the accuracy of his tale, but take it for what it is and neither inquire nor speculate as to its probability. But we personally think down deep in our hearts that this music is a little less genuine, less spontaneous and inspired than earlier music of Debussy. It is certain that much of its tonal fascination was the accomplishment of Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra.

The performance of Haydn's symphony showed again what foolish and traditional fallacies historians and students of music, as well as of every other subject under the sun, will maintain. The particular Haydn fallacy is that Haydn was a very proper and respectable composer, an apostle of form for form's sake, and a man without too many elemental human impulses in him. Whereas the truth is that Haydn was an extremely red-blooded man, who danced attendance on a prince only because he had to, but whose heart went out to the people and the fields, which found their way into his lusty, melodious music.

Miss Menges, who was widely applauded, played the Bruch G minor concerto, a conventional though excellently written work, a work which will soon be as dead as the dodo, a work over which Mendelssohn would have shed tears of joy, and pointed it out to Schumann as a model of composition. This work Miss Menges played in a conventional manner with an abuse of vibrato, without individuality, without artistic distinction.

11TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Performance of Debussy's
"La Mer" Poetic and Impressive

ISOLDE MENGES AS SOLO VIOLINIST

Herald Jan. 15, 1924
By PHILIP HALE

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Overture in the Italian style, C-major; Haydn, "Military" Symphony; Bruch, Concerto for Violin, G-minor, No. 1; Debussy, "La Mer." The solo violinist was Isolde Menges, who played with the orchestra for the first time.

The feature of this concert was the performance of "La Mer." There has been five performances before yesterday, but no one of them was so poetic, so impressive. We sometimes wonder if the symphony audience fully appreciates what Mr. Monteux is doing for music in this city; if it fully appreciates his catholicity of taste as shown by his programs; his interest in the work of the younger composers of all nations; his skill as a disciplinarian and as an interpreter of works ancient, modern and ultra-modern. He is a singularly modest man, not one to blow his own horn, not one to make a sensational display; he is not a parlor-lion, seeking to make himself "popular" by gaining the sweet influence of ladies. A man of a refined nature, well-informed, courteous, he is devoted to his art and his family. No conductor since Mr. Henschel has been so fortunate in program-making, and Mr. Henschel as a conductor was the veriest amateur learning his trade at the expense of the orchestra and the audience. It is not extravagant to say that the concerts this season have, on the whole, been the most uniformly interesting in the history of the orchestra; some of them have been the most brilliant. We are fortunate, indeed, that this most musical conductor dwells here and is in command.

Is "La Mer" to be ranked among Debussy's greater compositions? Some years ago M. Louis Laloy, always an admirer of Debussy, welcomed, apropos of "La Mer," what he called a happy change in Debussy's art; at first wholly an impressionist, he came to adopt more ample forms, more precise ideas, a more solid construction, more vigorous rhythms, without losing anything of his finesse or his freshness. It is true that in "La Mer" the developments are largely planned; the three sections might be called the first movement, the Scherzo, and the Finale of a symphony; but this does not make the music any the more beautiful. There is much in the saying of Plotinus that fire surpasses other bodies in beauty because it obtains the order of form "and is the most subtle of all, bordering as it were on an incorporeal nature." There is more intensity, more power in "La Mer" than in the preceding orchestral works of Debussy; there is also the indefinable, entrancing subtlety.

If one says, "But to me the ocean is different from this," the answer is that the ocean is what one sees and feels in its presence. To the sailor the ocean is not so mysterious as it is to the landsman. Quote the famous line of Aeschylus, or poems of Byron, Swinburne, Whitman, to him, and he would find nothing in them. In this music of Debussy is what the word "ocean" suggests to the imaginative. Mr. Jones may long for a prolonged orchestral storm; Mrs. Jones may miss the rocking that she finds in the first movement of "Scheherazade"; to Miss Jones the ocean is only an excuse for showing herself liberally in a becoming bathing suit. The poetry of the ocean, sportive, tender, capricious, ironically jovial, sublime, terrible, escapes this amiable family. What to the three is this music of Debussy?

Whether Schubert's overture was written in mockery of Rossini or in admiration of his genius—the latter hypothesis is the safer—the fact remains that Rossini did the thing much better. (There is an eloquent tribute in the December number of the Chesterian of London by—of all men in the world—Alfredo Casella).

There are perhaps a dozen of Haydn's Symphonies seldom played that would be agreeable to hear. We found the "Military" Symphony, in spite of the admirable performance, for the most part dull. Even the bass drum, the triangle and the cymbals do not save it. Did Haydn introduce these percussion instruments to arouse the three-bottle gentry and the bulbous matrons of London from their slumber?

Miss Menges showed a rich tone and emotional feeling in Bruch's hackneyed, mushy and splurgy concerto. She has, undoubtedly, what so many singers fondly think they have, viz. temperament. It is unfortunate that she has not yet learned to play with greater bodily repose, with authoritative ease and poise.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Franck "Les Djinns," symphony poem for piano and orchestra (after Victor Hugo)—E. Robert Schmitz, pianist—first time at these concerts; Bingham, Passacaglia, op. 10 (first performance); Roger-Ducasse, Suite Francaise in D major.

DEBUSSY'S SEA-MUSIC SAVES AN AFTERNOON

Jan. 15, 1924
Otherwise Mr. Monteux Sets a Dull Programme — Tedious Resurrections from Schubert and Haydn, and Threadbare Bruch—Miss Menges for None Too Interesting Violinist—Mr. Dadmun Proves Singer of Notable Quality

FOR the first time within recollection Mr. Monteux, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, narrowly escaped a dull programme. He had searched out neglected pieces by classic composers—an Overture "in the Italian style" by Schubert, a "military" Symphony by Haydn—and they hardly warranted rediscovery. He had sanctioned Miss Menges's choice of Bruch's first Concerto for Violin as solo-number of the day, and time, change, repetition have worn it threadbare. An audience, quick by habit to applaud the songful Schubert, the melodious, playful, easy-going Haydn, heard the Overture impassively, the Symphony coldly; while through the Concerto, it had quite as many eyes for Miss Menges, who is not usual of aspect, as ears for the music. Salvation came with Debussy's Sea-Pieces, seizing and stirring imagination in themselves and played with high eloquence.

Clearly Mr. Monteux's best and truest field is the modern and the ultra-modern composers. Among their pieces he chooses interestingly, variously, rewardingly. He plays them with penetration, sympathy, revelation, impressing his hearers. He is not, however, a conductor to gild the commonplace, like Schubert's Overture of yesterday or, the other day, Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House." With reason, he avoids the routine of the "classical reperory," since in French clearness of mind, he perceives that it is stalling many a masterpiece. Usually his discoveries on the borders of it have praised him; but not Haydn's "Military Symphony." In a sense, however, it was cynical satisfaction to find Mr. Monteux thus fallible. Week after week, through all one season and half another, he has set programmes for the Symphony Concerts. Hardly one of them has failed to interest from beginning to end—a unique record in the forty years of the orchestra. In the descent of yesterday, came the humanizing touch. If a conductor never slips, by the same token—usually—he never rises.

In Schubert's Overture, the virtuosi of the wood-wind choir sang pretty Italianate measures in glamoring tones of smooth, rich sensuous texture. Of themselves and of Mr. Monteux, they gave these measures long-breathed, curving, Italianate phrasing. Now the strings set in background; again they darkened or brightened the song; yet again they interrupted it with rushing figures. Toward the end came the inevitable crescendo "of the Italian style" in the days of Rossini and through the first half of the nineteenth century. Even then, the scornful called it a "gallopade." The discreet Schubert escapes this reproach—in tameness. So did he do his duty to a fashion in music at Vienna in the year of grace 1817; while a hundred years later at Boston, an audience as dutifully heard him—and, probably, with as little inner glow of satisfaction.

Better, however, Schubert Italian than Haydn military—if to be military consists in an Allegretto in a subdued march-rhythm with light claps of the cymbals and light taps upon the bass drum to accent it. Add thereto a Finale similarly pointed and broken by a modest trumpet-call and the martial Haydn is complete. Unfortunately, putting on this panoply, he puts off more familiar, more desirable graces. There is no heartiness, no sprightliness in the first movement, not much invention, few sprightly strokes, only music-making to fill the profitable commission of the estimable Johann Peter Salomon. The veiled march of the second movement needs more than the "military" trimmings to escape as routine composition. A connoisseur of Haydn might hardly pick the Minuet from a hundred others written all in the day's work in the Vienna or the London of his time. The lusty, fanciful sportive Haydn of many a Finale distinctly drags his usually skipping feet, takes refuge in a trumpet-call. Good old Haydn the simple, the charming yesterday, today and forever; but when charm flies out of the window, as in this Military Symphony, the simplicity draggles near to commonplace. Those who obstinately set all "the masters" above every human frailty will say that Mr. Monteux failed to catch the flavor, the accent of the music. But was there any such—except of a commission fulfilled by the faithful Haydn working rain or shine?

Poor old Bruch snapping and snarling at "the enemy" through the war, while with more reason he might have reviled the fate overtaking his violin-pieces! Naught else of his music survives outside Germany and hardly there. No longer do "Odysseus," "Arminius" and his other blends of sentiment and sonority, workmanship and effect, stir even the musical backwaters of this world; while before his Concerto or his Scottish Fantasia the expectant hearer merely asks nowadays what the violinist is likely to make of it. In spite of symphonic pretence and of many ingenuities, down they have come to the level of Ernst's and Vieuxtemps's and Wieniawski's concertos and fantasias, as merely "grateful music for the violinist." As he or she plays them so are they—suave Adagios, florid or finical "passage-work," glinting Finales. And Miss Menges played the Concerto well enough. Her technical means sufficed, even if her ear and fingers were not always quite unerring. Her tone flowed warmly, pliantly. It is full-bodied, bright of texture, if not always exactly edgeless. In a richer music, it might be sensuous and sumptuous. Without apparent effort Miss Menges did Bruch's feats of skill and agility; added tremors of tone to his sentimental song, which is hardly necessary; projected his bolder phrases, his more energetic rhythms. The regular thing in the regular way—but always with the lurking suspicion that, given a stranger, more imaginative and higher-pitched music, there would emerge a violinist with individuality, with even a propensity for the fantastical. To the eye the English Miss Menges may look Greenwich Village and its equivalent in London which is Chelsea. Yet in her aspect is hint of something more and rarer. Possibly Bruch is only her sop to the musical bourgeoisie.

Finally, to efface all that had gone before, the Sea-Pieces of Debussy. Nowhere has he stretched so ample a canvas, filled it with so large a tonal design. Those who would have him a maker of miniatures forget that, for once at least, in this sea-music, he is also a master of architecture. There are symphonic scope and sweep, expansion and cumulation in "La Mer." Steadily the first "sketch," as he chooses to call it, broadens and deepens. The pale sea, the calm sea of the misty dawn gains color, motion, force. In the music is impetus, driving, irresistible. Again in the third "sketch," wind and sea soon cease murmuring; swiftly they become voices of power. The waves surge upward; the gusts descend to meet them; reverberant are their voices. Between, for contrast in a far-flung music, the curling and the rippling of the waters when they play with each other and the sun and the breeze.

Like a fresco—and no miniature—in tones is this music. The rhythms beat strongly; full-voiced is many a modulation; the harmonic background is stretched tense; the chords ring large; often the instrumental coloring is bold and sharp; always there is motion. In his own grand manner may Debussy write, if he choose, and in it he has designed and fashioned the sea-pieces. Large as it is, it is still his own, because everywhere, out of rhythm, harmony, timbre, modulation, he is still weaving a characteristic imagery and atmosphere. Here in tones is the sea as light traverses it, plays upon it, transforms it—the sea sombre, the sea radiant, the sea in countless aspects between. Here also and by like means and in like medium are manifold moods of the ocean—inert at the beginning, then stirring into changeful life and aspect; at play in the intermezzo; uprearing its might in the Finale. Here, besides, in tones are the voices of the sea when the wind caresses or whips it into speech—from whisper to thunders. Of course, there are minute strokes; Debussy would not be himself did he not make them. Yet on the instant they fall as details into the might and magnitude of the whole. Mr. Monteux missed nothing in the music. He sustained its formal substance; he released its imagery. For the first time not a few of his hearers knew a Debussy grandiose.

H. T. PARKER

Symphonic Smoke

There is no smoking-room at Symphony Hall, but by the signs of last Saturday evening, the management, unlike that of any other house of public entertainment in Boston, now permits smoking in the corridors. Everywhere, through the intermission at Mr. Toscanini's concert, men were promenading, cigarette in mouth, smoke in the air. The vapors were so thick and omnipresent that they drove some back to their seats, even penetrated the auditorium. Within municipal regulation, the management is a law to itself in such things; but it might considerably reserve one corridor for those, especially women, who dislike smoke-wreaths. Or was it merely lax with the throng that Mr. Toscanini attracted? By more than one sign, discipline in the house-staff at Symphony Hall needs stiffening.

Boston Notes

Specialty for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts — The eleventh program of the Boston Symphony, given on January 14, was as follows: Overture in the Italian style in C major op. 170; Haydn, "Military" Symphony; Bruch, Concerto for Violin in G minor op. 26; Debussy "La Mer." Mr. Monteux's revival of Schubert's Overture was not a happy thought. The Overture is hopelessly dull and old-fashioned; it is not even characteristic of Schubert himself; it is Schubert masquerading in the guise of Rossini and Company; his masquerading is but poor stuff, lacking that touch of humor so necessary to the successful assumption of another's personality. The Italian mannerisms are in evidence without the saving qualities.

There is little to be said of Haydn's "Military" Symphony. To our way of thinking Haydn wrote several symphonies of greater musical interest. No doubt in days gone by the sound of triangle, drum and cymbals amused, perhaps even astonished, the audience. There were many in the audience of yesterday who derived evident pleasure from this clear, limpid, artless, tiresome music. Due respect must be paid to the "classics."

Isolde Menges was the soloist in the Bruch concerto. She played with full, rich tone, excellent rhythmic sense and clear technic. Her phrasing was musical and she more than fulfilled every demand which the timeworn concerto made upon her. Are there no new concertos for the violin, worthy of a hearing? Even Bruch has written one fully as interesting as the one played yesterday, yet seldom heard. Debussy's "Sea Pieces" closed the program. Mr. Monteux is probably the finest and most authoritative interpreter of such music in America at the present time. He revealed new beauties in these sketches. He created the mood and atmosphere so necessary for their proper effect. His interpretation was stimulating to the imagination. There were many delicate touches of color, many clever bits of orchestral technic, many beautifully drawn phrases throughout the performance.

132

Miss ISOLDE MENGES, violinist, was born at Brighton, England, in 1894. Her father, George Menges, a German, taught the violin; her mother, an Englishwoman, taught the violin and the pianoforte. Miss Isolde was instructed at a very early age by her father. She gave a recital in her father's house at Brighton when she was three years and seven months old, playing a few pieces on her little fiddle. When she was eleven years old she took additional lessons for about a year of Leo Sametini. Early in January, 1908, she played in Germany with marked success. In 1909 she entered the Imperial Russian Conservatory of Music at Petrograd and remained there three years as a pupil of Leopold Auer. Her first appearance in London was at the Queen's Hall on February 4, 1913, when she played Tschaikowsky's Concerto, Lalo's Rhapsodie Espagnole, and three smaller pieces. The Brighton municipal orchestra was conducted by Lyell-Tayler.

Her success thereafter throughout Great Britain and on the European Continent was great. In the fall of 1916 she came to the United States under the management of Maud Allan, the dancer, and played in this country for the first time at New York on October 21, 1916: Brahms's Concerto and Lalo's Rhapsodie Espagnole. Ernest Bloch conducted the orchestra, and his own "Hiver-Printemps" was then performed.

A recital in Boston for January 15, 1917, was announced, but the engagement was cancelled. Her programme included Brahms's Sonata in D minor (with Richard Epstein, pianist), Bach's Chaconne, Saint-Saëns's Havanaise, and pieces by Handel-Hubay, Handel-Harty, Gluck-Manen, Fiocco, and Brahms-Joachim.

133

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWELFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major, op. 21

- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
- II. Andante cantabile con moto
- III. Menuetto; Allegro molto e vivace; Trio
- IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace

BINGHAM,

PASSACAGLIA for Orchestra, op. 10
(First Performance)

FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Les Djinns," for Piano and Orchestra

[First time at these Concerts]

Piano Solo, E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

ROGER-DUCASSE,

SUITE FRANCAISE, in D major

- I. Ouverture; Très décidé
- II. Bourrée; Pas vite et très rythmé
- III. Recitatif et Air; Très declamé. Plus lent; lentement
- IV. Menuet vif; Très décidé; Tranquille

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

12TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Franck's "The Jinn" Interpreted with Eloquence and Passion

SCHMITZ AT PIANO
POETIC VIRTUOSO

Herald Jan. 22, 1921
By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program read as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Franck, "The Jinn," symphonic poem for piano and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Bingham, Passacaglia for orchestra (first performance); Roger-Ducasse, Suite Francaise. E. Robert Schmitz was the pianist. Yesterday afternoon the order in which the pieces by Franck and Bingham were played was reversed.

Franck's symphonic poem was heard here really for the first time. It was played at a Chickering Production Concert in 1909, but the attendant circumstances were not favorable and the music made little impression. Franck was never strongly influenced by oriental legend or color. He wrote a song, "The Emir of Bengador," with words by Mery, interesting in itself, in the oriental way as it was then musically understood. There was an illustrated title page showing the conventional eastern potentate addressing the conventional light of the harem. Mr. Gardner Lamson sang the song at his recital nearly 30 years ago; the first song of Franck's that was heard in Boston. It was the first time that Franck's name was on a program of any concert in this city.

One is not accustomed to associate this composer with the musical expression of the Satanic. He reached a sublime height of mysticism in pages of "The Beatitudes" and thus stood with Palestrina and the Spaniard Tomas Luiz de Victoria; his mysticism was warmed by his sympathy with poor humanity; but when he attempted in "The Beatitude" to portray in tones Satan and all his host, he wrote music that reminds one of Meyerbeer at his worst. The wonder is that he chose Victor Hugo's "Jinn" for the subject of a symphonic poem. Nevertheless he succeeded far better here in demoniacal expression than in his symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman." M. d'Indy has said that "The Jinn" is not properly speaking a musical adaptation of Hugo's "lozenge" and is not "very closely connected with the subject." It is true that the music is not panoramic; it is not an interlinear translation; but it is charged with the spirit of Hugo's wild verses. There is a dramatic, one might say melodramatic intensity to it that is not to be found elsewhere in Franck's compositions. There is more than the suggestion of the supernatural; there are the hellish voices of the dread visitors with their breath of flame, their murderous wings. In the relieving passages there is still the shudder of anxiety, of fear, until the cries die away in the flight of the dark swarm; and town, sea, sky are again at peace.

The performance of this music was Hugoesque. Mr. Monteux gave an eloquent and passionate interpretation; the orchestra was a supreme virtuoso; Mr. Schmitz's playing of the piano will long be remembered. Twice now at Symphony concerts he has been as one of the orchestral players. May we not hope to hear him soon in a concerto where he will have the dominating role? Few pianists that come to Boston can vie with him as poetic virtuoso and emotional musician.

Mr. Bingham, an instructor in theory and composition at Columbia University, has written a set of variations in the form of a Passacaglia, but not in the old and orthodox manner. The theme, proclaimed by a trumpet, is modified rhythmically; there are many changes in tonality and harmonization; in one instance, at least, there is development. Mr. Bingham, modest as a man, is by no means timid as a composer. He dares at times to use a thunderous speech, to be bold with the brass section, to prepare unexpected combinations of timbres. The Passacaglia is interesting in many ways; it argues well for his future—though he is by no means a beginner in composition. As the work was heard yesterday, the instrumentation occasionally seemed thick and ineffective, as if the musical ideas were not clearly brought out. The work was favorably received. Mr. Bingham, with refreshing modesty, did not rush to the platform; he left his seat on the floor only to bow.

There was a delightful performance of the symphony, one that the fastidious Mr. Gericke, lover and master of proportion and euphony, would have applauded. A brilliant reading of the French Suite brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2, D minor; Cyril Scott, Two Passacaglias (first time in Boston); Mozart, Pamina's Air from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise"; Wagner, a Faust overture. Mme. Hulda Lashanska will then sing in Boston for the first time.

MID-SEASON CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Work of American Given—Schmitz,
Pianist, Soloist

Post Jan. 22, 1921
BY OLIN DOWNES

E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Schmitz played the piano part in Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns." The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's 1st symphony; a "Passacaglia" by Seth Bingham, a young American, an organist and a graduate of Yale University, who was present in person to respond to the applause of his composition, and Roger-Ducasse's "Suite Francaise."

NOT A DISPLAY LIST

The programme was not one calculated to display to the greatest advantage the capabilities of the conductor and the orchestra. The more noticeable was the interest given to compositions which were not of exceptional importance, the musicianly care for detail, the brilliancy and the technical finish, the tonal glory of the orchestra which Mr. Monteux has developed.

Thus Beethoven's early symphony was made arresting because of the unexpected interest of inner parts and of passages which ordinarily sound old-fashioned, if not commonplace. But why any longer play the symphony? The First symphony is not Beethoven. The Second is, and the Third is one of the greatest of the nine. If we want the style of music presented by Beethoven's first symphony why not play Haydn or Mozart, whose G. minor or

C major symphonies are far superior to this one. And yet—there was a day when the opening chords of this first symphony of the youthful Beethoven, chords known and used and introduced with like freedom by inexperienced students of harmony today, were savagely attacked and held up by critics as matter for distrust or ridicule.

Not Franck at Best

Franck's piece is not representative of the composer either. Just why so admirable a musician and so brilliant a virtuoso as Mr. Schmitz should have elected to play this work it is hard to understand. Once in a while there is heard the voice of Franck. Elsewhere it is orchestral racket. When the piano enters with a theme which as a theme of thanksgiving for the passage and the disappearance of the demons of Hugo's poem, we recognize the organist of St. Sulpice.

To say that Mr. Schmitz made of his part as much as could be made of it is merely to state the fulfilment of expectation. But again, why the selection? At best the piano part of "Les Djinns" is an obligato part of a symphonic work and not a concerto, while the work is not a work in itself worth while.

Bingham's "Passacaglia"

Nor can we wax enthusiastic over Mr. Bingham's "Passacaglia." It is brilliantly scored and in that way effective. But we cannot feel that the composer feels natural in this music. It seems mathematically planned. The theme of the Passacaglia appears fussed over. It offers certain facilities for development and variation which the composer no doubt planned carefully, if not fustily. But where is the spontaneity, or the "developments" which develop as though nothing else could happen under God's shining sun?

One of the best places is a variation in which the harmony is most conventional. Listening to that, one queries whether all this elaborate counterpoint and somewhat d'Indyque d'Indy was one of Mr. Bingham's teachers—this d'Indyque treatment is not unconsciously artificial, unconsciously assumed by the composer of whose seriousness and idealism there can be no doubt. But respectable intentions do not make good music, and this music is respectable enough to have originated in Boston instead of New Jersey. O for a really wild strain from Camden or Passaic! It is true, nevertheless, that the audience called Mr. Bingham twice to his feet, and that he accepted this applause with a pleasure as unfeigned as his modesty.

Ducasse's Suite

After all, the most entertaining and natural music—barring Beethoven—was that of Roger-Ducasse. It is not great music. It is not deep. It relies over much on sequences and other musicians' tricks. But it has movement, life, rhythm, gaiety which is French.

It is clearly written and orchestrated in a frequently piquant manner. And it was beautifully played by Mr. Monteux and his men.

FRANCK'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

"Les Djinns" Played for the
First Time in Boston

Beethoven, Bingham and Roger-Ducasse Also in Program

Franck's "Les Djinns," a symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, suggested by the poem of Victor Hugo, was performed for the first time at the Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, heard here as soloist last season, played the piano part. The piece was an experiment to test the possibilities of the piano as an orchestral instrument. Franck did not intend it as a concerto.

Mr Schmitz respected the composer's intention in subordinating his part in the performance. His staccato is too brittle, lacking in vigor. The music is groping toward an orientalism it does not succeed in suggesting. It is not in the class with Franck's Symphony, or his violin sonata.

Seth Bingham's Passacaglia is somewhat in the spirit of Franck's organ pieces. Mr Bingham, like his teacher, D'Indy, has not learned to write as few notes and as few parts as possible. His counterpoint and his orchestration are often thick and muddled. The musical ideas in his Passacaglia are of considerable interest.

One wondered whether the composer did not think in terms of the organ, as Schumann thought in terms of the piano and then arrange his ideas for orchestra. The audience seemed favorably impressed. One would like to hear more of Mr Bingham's music. It is individual and imaginative in conception.

Roger-Ducasse undertook to crystallize the practices of modern French composers in his "Suite Francaise." The result certainly strikes an average between Massenet and Faure. If Beethoven, whose "First Symphony" began the program which M. Roger-Ducasse's piece ended, had merely wanted to reduce Haydn, Mozart and others now forgotten to a neat and effective musical formula, called perhaps a "Viennese Suite," it seems doubtful if his fame would have lasted to our day.

Instead, he did revolutionary things, such as persistently accenting off beats, even in his "First Symphony," which caused the conservatives to make unkind remarks about "confused explosions of the outrageous effrontery of a young man."

He later did greater and more daring things which have made it a fashion to call this symphony badly diluted Haydn. It is still agreeable music to listen to, especially when played with the skill and taste shown yesterday by Mr Monteux and the orchestra.

The twelfth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on January 21 was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major; Bingham, Passacaglia (first performance); Franck, "Les Djinns"; Roger-Ducasse, Suite Francaise. E. Robert Schmitz played the piano part in the Franck piece. Monteux Jan. 22, 1921

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Beethoven symphony was the outstanding feature of the afternoon. He never sought to imbue the music with an importance foreign to it. All was grace and lightness, and this work of Beethoven's youth, so full of promise of the great genius to be revealed in the compositions of his maturer years, was presented with all the freshness and charm so native to it.

Bingham's passacaglia for orchestra is a magnified exercise in counterpoint. It inspires awe when one reflects on the immense amount of labor involved in the writing of it. If the object of music is to display mathematical ingenuity, this passacaglia is undoubtedly an important composition. Those who look for something more in music will probably find it but dry stuff indeed. Why, in a country so full of poetical ideas and impulses as America, do so many of its native composers seek their inspiration in the abstruse contrapuntal of Reger and his followers? Bach, the greatest contrapuntist of them all, contrived to express emotion in spite of his counterpoint. But then, scarcely one of Bach's fugues would pass muster in a conservatory as an example in "the strict style." The Suite Francaise by Roger-Ducasse is agreeable music. It is facile, sounding no great emotional depths, and brilliantly orchestrated. Franck's "Les Djinns" was adequately interpreted by Mr. Schmitz. Excellent artist that he is, one regretted that he had not the opportunity to display those qualities, for which he is justly admired, to better advantage.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. Jan. 22, 1924
An Apathetic Afternoon with None Too Interesting a Programme—Mr. Monteux and the Orchestra Excel Themselves with Early Beethoven — Thin-Voiced Franck, Thick-Voiced Bingham, and, Finally, the Clear, Bright Tones of Roger-Ducasse

Not often, within easy recollection, has an audience at a Symphony Concert seemed so indifferent toward conductor, music, and even soloist, as did that of yesterday afternoon. Only at the discovery of Mr. Seth Bingham, thrice called upon to acknowledge the applause at the end of his Passacaglia, was there any display of enthusiasm. For the rest, through Beethoven's First Symphony, which began the concert, through César Franck's "Les Djinns," in which Mr. Robert Schmitz played the accessory piano-part, and even through most of Roger-Ducasse's "Suite Française"—far and away the most interesting music of the afternoon—the apathy continued. Undoubtedly some of this indifference can be laid to the general lassitude occasioned by the thermometer's violent reaction from the recent "cold snap," but the "weather-man" should not be made to bear all the blame. The fact is that Mr. Monteux has a second time put together a rather dull programme—the one really bright spot in it the aforesaid Suite by Roger-Ducasse.

Surely the days of the first of Beethoven's symphonies are numbered, if they are not already told. It was many years ago that Berlioz, one of the most appreciative of all commentators on Beethoven's music, said of the piece, "This is not Beethoven." Nor is it, save in the Minuet, and in certain passages here and there in the other movements. There is a pleasing dignity in the introductory Adagio, once a stumbling block to the pedants because of the tonality of its opening chords, but the Allegro and the amiable Andante are for the most part colorless music, without the light charm, the peasant gaiety of Haydn, the Grecian purity of Mozart, or the robustness and depth of Beethoven himself. The Minuet—it is really a Scherzo—is still fresh and vigorous, though the once celebrated Trio seems now overpraised; and there is a bright cheerfulness in the Finale—though Berlioz found it childish—that still gives a mild pleasure. The performance was in every way admirable—clear, supple, beautifully proportioned and euphonious. Mr. Monteux has never been so fortunate in his reading of the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart as in this symphony of the youthful Beethoven which somewhat resembles them. And so far as the playing of the orchestra was concerned, little that it has done this year has given so happy an augury of a return to its former technical perfection.

Mr. Bingham's Passacaglia received yesterday its first public performance. From the all-informing programme-book we learn that the composer's name has appeared in the concerts of the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society of New York, the Barrère Ensemble and the Little Symphony. Yet for all that he cannot be considered one of the better known among even the younger American composers, and for that reason Mr. Monteux deserves the more credit for giving his Passacaglia a hearing. With every wish to be kind to Mr. Bingham it is not easy to grow enthusiastic over his piece. There is in it an abundant display of scholarship, skill in counterpoint, in thematic transformation and, though to a less degree, in orchestration. It is commendably vigorous and straight-forward, and at times there is a pleasing richness of effect—and yet the breath of life seems not to be there. It is more than ten years since this Passacaglia was composed and surely Mr. Bingham, who is still a young man, must look upon it somewhat as an exercise in composition. The great difficulty in the treatment of the Passacaglia form as it is ordinarily understood lies in making the numerous short episodes appear congruous and relevant. That Mr. Bingham has done this with the same success as, for example, Brahms in the Finale of his Fourth Symphony, cannot be admitted. But his intention appears to have been slightly different; with the deliberate adoption of rhythmic modifications and changes of tonality, the resultant effect is more that of a theme and variations than of a single unified movement. The chief shortcoming of the piece is its frequent thickness, which at times comes perilously near to clumsiness.

"After the Poem of Victor Hugo"—so runs the sub-title of César Franck's "Les Djinns"; and the irreverent will add "a long way after." For a few measures there is a suggestion of the flight of evil spirits, but after the piece is once under way the composer seems more concerned with the technical problem of adjusting and combining the piano and orchestra—one which he worked out far more successfully in his later "Variations Symphoniques." But Franck, even at his feeblest, is always an interesting craftsman, and this Symphonic Poem is not without a certain elegance; it has its moments of effectiveness. Yet on the whole it is sterile music. The more the pity then that Mr. Schmitz should have wasted his art and skill upon it; and, as has already been suggested, it proved for him a rather thankless task. Of the technical excellence and musical beauty of his playing, much might be said. But it is no longer a new story, and the repetition of it may well be deferred until he is heard again in music more worthy of his powers.

After so much that, in one way or another, failed to stir and interest, the French Suite of Roger-Ducasse seemed a veritable masterpiece of modern music—which it actually is not. Nor is it even particularly individual, but it is charming and well made, melodious and brilliantly orchestrated. The Overture has amplitude and stride, and it and the livelier Bourrée and Menuet are strongly rhythmic, while the "Recitatif et Air" is in striking contrast to them. Of all the music of the afternoon, this latter movement, with its pensively haunting measures, made the deepest impression. In the single performance which the Suite received ten years ago by the heavy-handed Mr. Fiedler, the music lost not a little of its lightness and distinction, and yesterday it made a far better impression. The long-credited dogma that only German conductors can properly interpret German music has been pretty thoroughly disproved, yet nowadays we are furnished with abundant evidence that French music receives its fullest and most characteristic voice only at the hands of a Frenchman.

W. S. S.

E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, who is to combine with Reinald Werrenrath in the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, cannot be directly compared with any other pianist. His amazing brilliance and dexterity are combined with his intuitive perception of the inner self. A native of Paris and a winner of the first prize of the Paris Conservatory, he immediately afterwards toured Europe. The genius of much new music in Paris, he instituted and directed the "Symphony Concerts Schmitz," which still bear his name, thus the public appreciation of the piano, orchestral and choral works of Debussy, Ravel, D'Indy, Milhaud, Magnard—even Schoenberg, is due to his tireless effort. Joining the French army at the declaration of war, two wounds and a gas attack at the front confined him to an army hospital for seven months. He still thanks Providence that in this misfortune his hands were spared. Coming to the United States after the armistice, he gave his first concerts in Chicago, and later caused a considerable stir of interest and praise in New York by a series of recitals with preliminary lectures on the "Spirit of Modern Music." Boston has had a foretaste of his fine musicianship in an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring and also in a recital of his own.

SCHMITZ. PIANIST WITH SYMPHONY

The twelfth concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The usual large and appreciative audience attended to hear a program of excellence.

The opening number was a Beethoven symphony, C-Major Symphony, No. 1. This is in four movements. The third "Menuetto; Allegro molto e vivace; Trio" was particularly pleasing in itself for its charm and in the freshness of interpretation with which the orchestra played it.

The second number on the program was "Passacaglia for Orchestra" by Seth Bingham. The composer himself writes "The Passacaglia," differs from those of Bach, Frescobaldi and Brahms in that the theme is modified rhythmically, the tonality and harmonizations are frequently changed and there is some development." The work is one of merit and was given an interesting presentation yesterday.

Mr. E. Robert Schmitz

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

140

Mr. E. ROBERT SCHMITZ was born in Paris, February 8, 1889, of French parents. The father was of an Alsatian family. Mr. Schmitz studied the pianoforte at the Paris Conservatory under the late Louis Diémer. In 1908 he was awarded a first accessit; in 1909, the second prize; in 1910, the first prize for pianoforte playing. He gave concerts in Belgium and in Germany in 1910-11. Having played accompaniments for Mmes. Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mysze-Gmeiner, and others, in 1912 he gave recitals of ultra-modern music in Paris. He founded and conducted in Paris the Association des Concerts Schmitz. He thus brought out orchestral and choral works by Milhaud, P. Le Flem, O. Klemperer, and others. In 1913 he was the first to play Schönberg's music for the "S. M. I." Active as pianist and conductor, associated in his concerts with leading composers and musicians, he joined the French colors August 19, 1914, and served for three years and two months. He was wounded slightly, but, gassed severely, was in a hospital for seven months. After the armistice he came to the United States. At Chicago he taught for a few months, and played in orchestral concerts. Going to New York, where he now lives, he gave his first recital there on April 17, 1919, and has given many since, some with historical and critical comments, introducing many new compositions. He played for the first time in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 13, 1920 (Carpenter's Concertino—first time in Boston). His first recital in Boston was on April 15, 1920.

Mr. Bingham was graduated from Yale University in 1904. He studied music there with Harry B. Jepson; and in Paris with Guilmant, Widor, and Vincent d'Indy. In 1908 he received the degree of Mus. Bac. from Yale, and won the Steinert Prize by his "Pièce Gothique" for organ and orchestra. From 1909 to 1919 he was the instructor of organ-playing at Yale. He has been a church organist in New Haven; Rye, N.Y. Since 1913 he has been organist of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.

He is now instructor in theory and composition at Columbia University.

141

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

THIRTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, AT 8 P.M.

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D minor, op. 70

I. Allegro maestoso

II. Poco adagio

III. Scherzo: Vivace; Poco meno mosso

IV. Finale: Allegro

SCOTT,

TWO PASSACAGLIAS

MOZART,

ARIA, "Ah! lo so," from "The Magic Flute

CHARPENTIER,

AIR, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"

WAGNER,

A FAUST OVERTURE

Soloist:

HULDA LASHANSKA

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Hulda Lashanska Is a Scandinavian Dramatic Soprano. This Season's Appearance Will Be Her First with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Herald Jan. 29, 1921
Two Passacaglias by Cyril
Scott Heard Here
for First Time

MME. LASHANSKA'S SINGING ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2, D minor; Cyril Scott, Two Passacaglias (first time in Boston); Mozart, Air of Pamina, from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis, le jour," from "Louise"; Wagner, A Faust overture. Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang for the first time in this city.

Mr. Scott's Passacaglias, according to Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, Mr. Scott's biographer, were first played in London in 1916. The two melodies that serve as subjects are of Irish origin—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy." The latter song is said to have been often heard in the earlier Georgian period. The Passacaglias are scored for the swollen modern orchestra.

There are two ways of looking at these compositions. One is to regard them simply as curious experiments in harmonization and instrumentation; amusing, in the sense with which this word is used in the jargon of the Parisian studio, but not to be taken seriously. The other way is to accept them as a serious work of a composer, endowed by nature, whose inventive faculty and technical skill are of no mean order; the work of a man who has original views and his own method of expression; a man whose independence and boldness—call it aesthetic arrogance, if you will—are not displeasing. This Englishman has surely fluttered the Academicians and the Doctors of Music in Great Britain.

If there is talk about form, Mr. Scott's Passacaglias are more orthodox in this respect than the one by Mr.

Seth Bingham performed at the last concert. The subject is inexorably maintained; the hearer does not strain ears in detecting it. The structures built upon the two subjects as foundations may often be fantastical, even extravagant; gargoyles may serve at times in the decoration; but there is always the suggestion of native power. The composer does not build at random, he does not fail, or stand aghast at his own work; he knows exactly his purpose; he accomplishes it in his own defiant way.

Does some one, to whom music is a means of exciting a "gentleman-like joy," as an old Greek put it, exclaim in protestation: "But these Passacaglias are noisy"? When there is a tremendous volume of sound, it is not a din. The sound is as well-defined as a thunder-clap. Nor is there a constant orchestral whirlwind; there are variations of ingenious contrast, free from platitudes. Furthermore in each Passacaglia the hearer feels a certain continuity. He does not see Mr. Scott putting down his pen, knocking his pate, and addressing the ceiling: "There, that's done. What in the world should come next?"

Whether the audience was startled from its well-bred and traditional composure; whether, forgetting the soothing charm of conventional music, it frankly enjoyed the music; whether it was hugely amused—this would be difficult to say. The applause was fervent and prolonged. Mr. Scott rose from the guest seat and bowed in a dignified manner, not effusively; and he applauded, as was eminently fitting the brilliant, stirring performance of the orchestra.

Dvorak's Symphony had not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1903. Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for the revival. The symphony shows Dvorak at his best. A master of rhythm and color, a melodist of direct appeal, naive, but not without art; seldom far away from his beloved Bohemian woods, fields, and simple, joyous life; not afraid of suggesting the folk songs and the dances of his country even in a symphonic work, he wrote during the years of his poverty from his heart. In his later years he became sophisticated. When his too-familiar symphony "From the New World"—was new in Boston, we wondered at the late Horatio Parker describing it as pleasing but "meretricious." In comparison with the symphony in D minor, the later one is "meretricious," indeed. It is a pity that to the younger generation Dvorak is known chiefly as the composer of "From the New World" Symphony and a certain "Humoresque" transcribed for

Hulda Lashanska Is a Scandinavian Dramatic Soprano. This Season's Appearance Will Be Her First with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Herald Jan. 27, 1921
Two Passacaglias by Cyril
Scott Heard Here
for First Time

MME. LASHANSKA'S
SINGING ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2, D minor; Cyril Scott, Two Passacaglias (first time in Boston); Mozart, Air of Pamina, from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"; Wagner, A Faust overture. Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang for the first time in this city.

Mr. Scott's Passacaglias, according to Dr. A. Maclelland Hull, Mr. Scott's rapt biographer, were first played in London in 1910. The two melodies that serve as subjects are of Irish origin—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy." The latter song is said to have been often heard in the earlier Georgian period. The Passacaglias are scored for the swollen modern orchestra.

There are two ways of looking at these compositions. One is to regard them simply as curious experiments in harmonization and instrumentation; amusing, in the sense with which this word is used in the jargon of the Parisian studio, but not to be taken seriously. The other way is to accept them as a serious work of a composer endowed by nature, whose inventive faculty and technical skill are of no mean order; the work of a man who has original views and his own method of expression; a man whose independence and boldness—call it aesthetic arrogance, if you will—are not displeasing. This Englishman has surely flattered the Academicians and the Doctors of Music in Great Britain.

If there is talk about form, Mr. Scott's Passacaglias are more orthodox in this respect than the one by Mr.

Seth Bingham performed at the last concert. The subject is inexorably maintained; the hearer does not strain ears in detecting it. The structures built upon the two subjects as foundations may often be fantastical, even extravagant; gargoyles may serve at times in the decoration; but there is always the suggestion of native power. The composer does not build at random, he does not fail, or stand aghast at his own work; he knows exactly his purpose; he accomplishes it in his own defiant way.

Does some one, to whom music is a means of exciting a "gentleman-like joy," as an old Greek put it, exclaim in protestation: "But these Passacaglias are noisy"? When there is a tremendous volume of sound, it is not a din. The sound is as well-defined as a thunder-clap. Nor is there a constant orchestral whiffwind; there are variations of ingenious contrast, free from platitudes. Furthermore in each Passacaglia the hearer feels a certain continuity. He does not see Mr. Scott putting down his pen, knocking his pate, and addressing the ceiling: "There, that's done. What in the world should come next?"

Whether the audience was startled from its well-worn and traditional composure; whether, forgetting the soothing charm of conventional music, it frankly enjoyed the music; whether it was hugely amused—this would be difficult to say. The applause was fervent and prolonged. Mr. Scott rose from the guest seat and bowed in a dignified manner, not offensively; and he applauded, as was eminently fitting the brilliant, stirring performance of the orchestra.

Dvorak's Symphony had not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1903. Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for the revival. The symphony shows Dvorak at his best. A master of rhythm and color, a melodist of direct appeal, naive, but not without art; seldom far away from his beloved Bohemian woodlands, and simple, joyous life; not afraid of suggesting the folk songs and the dances of his country even in a symphonic work, he wrote during the years of his poverty from his heart. In his later years he became sophisticated. When his too-familiar symphony "From the New World" was new to us, we wondered at the late Horatio Parker describing it as pleasing but "meretricious." In comparison with the symphony in D minor, the later one is "meretricious," indeed. It is a pity that to the younger generation Dvorak is known chiefly as the composer of "From the New World" Symphony and a certain "Humoresque" transcribed for the fiddle.

Wagner's overture has sadly aged. Mme. Lashanska has a beautiful voice, which she uses skilfully and emotionally. Her admirable qualities were at once displayed in the pathetic air of Pamina; Mozart's music still remains the supreme test of a singer. She gave a concert version of the air from "Louise," the air itself is not for a symphony concert—and sang it delightfully. Perhaps in a performance of the opera, her interpretation would not be dramatically suited to the situation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 11 and 12 includes these works: Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2; Carpenter, Suite from the Ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, C minor, for piano. Mr. Levitzki will be the pianist.

SYMPHONY IN OLD AND NEW WORKS

Scott's Passacaglias
Given—Mme. Laschanska, Soloist

Post Jan. 29, 1921

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave its 13th programme of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Hulda Laschanska, soprano, was soloist. The orchestral compositions were Dvorak's little known 2d symphony in D minor; Two Passacaglias, Cyril Scott; Wagner's "Faust Overture." Mme. Laschanska sang the air of Pamina from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and the air of Louise from Charpentier's opera of that name.

HEAVILY FORMAL

This second symphony of Dvorak, which was played superbly, is not a work which invites extended discussion. Here and there a melody for a wind instrument, which remains a moment in the memory because of its lovely, characteristic curve, its Slavic tenderness, but for the most part a steady-going, formal symphony in the German manner, heavily conventionally orchestrated.

We would like to hear other symphonies of Dvorak—we have boyhood memories of a pleasureable kind connected with a two-piano performance of the first symphony in D major—but one's suspicion is confirmed by a retrospect of the two compositions that the best of Dvorak, symphonically speaking, is found in the lovely and familiar work penned by a homesick Czech when he sat down, lonely, dreaming of his own country in the new world.

Scott's Passacaglias

Mr. Scott's Passacaglias have brilliant instrumentation, and the two themes he uses, of Irish origin, would make excellent material for passacaglias in the old-fashioned manner, in the manner, let us say, of Brahms. But they certainly do not fit the odd harmonizations which Mr. Scott employs. Let a composer use as strange and ultra-modern harmony as he chooses, but let it fit his material.

Mr. Scott's harmonic scheme does not grow out of his original material, is not implied by it, and the irritating discrepancy is strongly felt almost throughout both compositions. One may except, perhaps, the reckless humor of certain of the variations of the second Passacaglia, but after remembering these, after recalling with pleasure the splash and the glimmer of Mr. Scott's harps, and some fascinating tricks with the woodwind, one cannot avoid, even after a first hearing, when it is well to be cautious, the conclusions that these two works do not rank among the most representative efforts of a gifted composer. This, though the performance by Mr. Monteux was doubtless sympathetic, hospitable to the composer's thought, as it was effective in so far as the music permitted. Mr. Scott, who was present, was called to his feet twice to acknowledge the applause.

Mme. Laschanska's Singing

The concert served to disclose the existence of a singer who is almost alone among her sisters of this generation. Alone in the genuineness, fineness, musicianship of her art of song. Both airs are in different ways severe tests of a singer. But though

Mme. Laschanska was not in the best of vocal conditions, presumably suffering from a cold, she was able to meet these tests in a manner which immediately won the approval of the audience. She never forced her voice. She phrased with a purity of style which a majority of her colleagues may well envy her. The limpidity and the perfection of legato demanded by Mozart's music were hers. She also colored her tones appropriately and with dramatic understanding in Louise's song of youth and of sensuous reminiscence. Saying this, it may be added that a modest and intelligent young artist was perhaps deprived of some measure of her authority and artistic self-possession by the condition of her throat and by the awe, unnecessary and unjustified, which some singers who come here seem to feel of Boston audiences, so that she did not let herself go, and thus sacrificed the sweep of line, the cumulative development, to its climax of Louise's air.

These were either wholly circumstances of the moment, or else it is worth while to Mme. Laschanska to point out that she need not fear to make felt her own individuality, to assume a more confident and subjective attitude in interpretation. For she has a voice of uncommon freshness and beauty, and her accomplishment, both as a musician and a vocalist, is such that she can expect to go very far. Mr. Monteux accompanied admirably.

Wagner's "Faust"

Every time we hear the "Faust" overture we feel the more regret that Wagner did not complete his original conception of a "Faust" symphony. He is as yet the one man in musical history who seems to have had all the qualifications, by his philosophic and dramatic temperament, by the quality of his musical invention and his superb technic, to have composed a symphony of "Faust," which would have been, had he completed it in the years of his maturity, as much a revelation of "Faust" as the fifth symphony is an immortal revelation of Beethoven. This, notwithstanding Schumann, Liszt—aye, and Friedrich Nietzsche, who composed "Faust" music which we once were privileged to hear, and many others. Wagner's introduction is "Faust" himself. Of course there is old-fashioned bunk, of the "Flying Dutchman," Senta period, in his music of Gretchen. But there is also the lament of the dying Tristan, which, transported bodily, becomes warp and woof of the greatest of music dramas; there is the chromatic sigh of the violins in the overture to that opera; there is the Mephistophlean mockery of the Gretchen motive; and a really stupendous mastery of the overture form, and bending of it to dramatic purposes. There is the soul flung on music paper, of the universal character conceived by Goethe. Acknowledge episodes which are now of the past, the hand of a great master is on the music, which could be twice as old-fashioned as it is, and yet, because of his flaming spirit, cause us to thrill and to wonder.

The performance of this work, however, was not one of Mr. Monteux's best. It was ordinary.

Boston Notes

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on January 28. The following was the program: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2 in D minor op. 70; Scott, two passacaglias; Mozart, Air of Pamina from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"; Wagner, a Faust overture. Hulda Laschanska was the soloist.

The revival of Dvorak's second symphony was a happy thought on the part of Mr. Monteux. It added another to the long list of such revivals for which we cannot be too grateful to him. This symphony does not show the lapse of time as much as might be expected. There is a certain freshness and sincerity in the music of Dvorak which will probably cause it to outlast much of the music of his contemporaries who wrote with perhaps more method and seriousness. It is to be regretted that Dvorak's name has so long been associated with the "New World Symphony" only. Many of his other works are quite as worthy of a hearing as yesterday's performance showed. Cyril Scott's two passacaglias, performed for the first time in Boston, are hardly to be taken seriously. This does not mean that they are not delightful music to hear. The orchestral coloring is laid on with a lavish hand and the meagerness of invention is thereby concealed. Although these pieces are not unpleasantly dissonant, they do not excite the desire for an immediate re-hearing. They were enthusiastically received and the composer, who was present, acknowledged the applause which his compositions brought forth. Mme. Laschanska interpreted the aria from "Louise" with much purity of tone and style. The playing of the orchestra throughout the afternoon was brilliant, and remarkable as well for its rare beauty of nuance and rhythm.

Those who attend orchestral concerts for the purpose of hearing sensational interpretations of Beethoven's symphonies; those who enjoy theatrical pianissimos and fortes, those who enjoy a thick, heavy orchestral tone quality will not be satisfied with the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the other hand, those who delight in hearing the masterpieces of the classical repertory and deserving works of our own time interpreted with exquisite taste and skill, without the intrusion of an aggressive personality between them and the music, will find these concerts a never ending source of pleasure and education.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCOTT'S MUSIC IN UNFAMILIAR VOICE

His Two Passacaghas for Orchestra Works of Imagination and Power—The Faded Wagner of "A Faust Overture"—The Fresh Dvorak of a Resurrected Symphony—Mme. Lashanska, Cool and Crystalline Singer

A TRANQUIL Symphony Concert ran agreeable course at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and naught disturbed peace and pleasure unless it was the two Passacaghas of Cyril Scott. Prolific in songs, piano-pieces and the "smaller forms" generally, he has written relatively little for orchestra in his riper years—a Concerto for Piano, a setting of Keats's ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," possibly the music-drama with which gossip credits him, and the two troublesome Passacaghas. These and the Piano-Concerto he brought with him on his present visit to the United States. The Concerto requires the presence of the composer "at the piano"; the powers at Symphony Hall preferred that he should occupy the "guest-seats" and as "the author of their being," acknowledge the applause the persistent Passacaghas won. Not only did the audience hear the composer's music; it also looked upon him; and a pleasure of the lecture-room became a pleasure of the concert-hall.

In more senses than one, persistent is the word for the two pieces. True modernist, Mr. Scott respects the chosen form. That is to say, he preserves "the subject" of each Passacaglia as faithfully as though he were writing in the eighteenth, instead of the twentieth century. An Irish folk-piece—a sombre, moaning "Famine Song"—underlies the first; another folk-tune, "The Poor Irish Boy," that the composer sets beating to lively dance-rhythm, is source of the second. In neither does the ear ever lose clew to these basic measures. Indeed, Mr. Scott drives home the dancing-tune by every rhythmic, harmonic, instrumental device within his power. They are well chosen "subjects"; the lament of "The Famine Song" pierces the ear, haunts the memory; the dance is so gay a tune and so adaptable to "development" that only by inadvertence could Mr. Grainger have overlooked it. The variation of these persistent "subjects" that the making of a Passacaglia prescribes is another thing. Rather, as Mr. Scott writes, it is ingenious and often imaginative manipulation. He leads fragments of his Irish tunes less from key to key than through quickly passing tonalities. He diversifies and contrasts the harmonic and instrumental dress, the rhythmic accent; he impregnates measure after measure with his own fervent moods. Time and again he flickers into vivid harmonic experiment, sometimes easy to catch in the concert-hall, sometimes more graphic on the paper of the score. As often keen play of timbres flashes out of a multitudinous orchestra, lacking only a first shawm and a second sackbut.

At every turn Mr. Scott compasses variety of voice; nowhere does the fabric of the Passacaghas sag or dim; while over both, hiding the processes beneath, is deep, clear glow of creation from the heart as well as the mind, by imagination as well as by reflection. The first Passacaglia rises from dark reiteration, through variations as in individual lament, to a massed and sombre splendor of mourning that endures but is not resigned. The second Passacaglia is apotheosis of the folk-dance, decked with the trappings, gilded with the lights and shadows, spurred by the devices of a more sophisticated music; while, throughout with higher and higher beat, rhythm dances tireless. The celestia tink aerially upon an Irish green; the tripping folk—and chords that are as acid in respectable ears. Not the least of the work of the moderns and the ultra-moderns is to clothe the old forms with new imagery and vigors. Well does Mr. Scott do it in these two Passacaghas, and lo! the second is more akin to the original dance whence the form sprang than twenty similar exercises written in studious, orthodox "closets." From his piano-pieces—the Sonata aside; from his songs, it is easy to label Mr. Scott a composer with fancy and felicity. In these Passacaghas, as in the Sonata and the Quintet for strings, he is composer of imagination and power.

For gentler spice to the afternoon, two elderly pieces contrastingly belied anticipation. Not often in these days does Wagner's "Faust Overture" return to the concert-hall. When it does most of us with his music-dramas at the back of our heads, expect much of it—more than it can yield in these present years of musical grace, more, perhaps, than it yielded when even it was "New: First Time." The truth is that it sounded yesterday as a faded, antiquated romantic music. Hear the dark-course Dvorak was natural rather than some beginning—Faust self-tortured, groping, characterized in tones by a Wagner that in those early forties lagged in such things far behind Liszt and Berlioz. Listen to Gretchen, attended by songful horns and half-sister to simple Senta of "The Flying Dutchman." Observe the lispings, as it were, of the subsequent Wagnerian idiom—"chromatic sighs" and the like. Watch the tentative Wagner, feeling his way to the Mephistophelian mockeries with which Liszt made a division of his "Faust Symphony" coruscate as with blue flame.

No doubt, the composer of "Tristan" and "The Ring" that was to be, but exceedingly thin-voiced. No doubt the approved romantic formulas for such subject-matter in tones—but how far from the graphic energies of Berlioz, the keen strokes of Liszt. No doubt skilful manipulation of a formal overture to delineative ends; but somehow the Weber of "Oberon," "Euryanthe" and "Freischütz" keeps the process fresh and glowing; while dust strews "Eine Faust-Overture." The unquenchable Wagnerians averred that Mr. Montoux was at fault; that he did not animate and glamor the overture as he did the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz a year ago, as Dr. Muck used to do with the lesser tone-poems of Liszt. They had reason, as the French say; but what of a Wagner that cannot keep his feet in merely dutiful performance?

On the other hand a proud afternoon for poor old Dvorak, the despised and forsaken of every truly modern repertory, a happy afternoon for all within ear-shot of his Symphony in D minor, timely resurrected by Mr. Montoux. It has not been wrung out to the last thin drop, like that sop of conductors to audiences, the Symphony, "From the New World." No more does it depend upon rather patchy sonorities like the overtures—"Husitzka," "Carnival," "Othello"—to be heard in occasional revival. In fact, this Second Symphony is no more than Dvorak "warbling his native wood-notes wild"—or rather mild—in his prime therewith and pleasant to hear in the process. Once he is clear of a "scholarly" and so for him rather labored beginning of the slow movement, the melody charms in outline, substance, progress and the color the wind-choir lends to it—a wistful, simple hearted, yet by no means unordered music. By instinct, maybe, Dvorak sang, but he contrived also to be adept in the singing. Bright are the contrasting rhythms of the Scherzo. He has caught them glinting from the folk. Spontaneously, gayly he writes. There is plentiful symphonic flourish in the Finale and it does nowadays sound empty. There are also measures still warm with the strangeness and the glow that is romantic illusion. Not for nothing was Dvorak a Czech who could dream as well write music. Agreed that in the first movement he is no more than following the formulas sonorously; but even there the instinct for the finely set harmony, the warm tint in the instrumental voices, will out. Of course Dvorak was natural rather than some sophisticated composer. Therein is his distinction; thereby his more spontaneous and innocent music, like this Symphony in D minor, keeps vitality, gives pleasure after forty years. It was not until he took thought of the world and wrote "New World" symphonies that he labored and was dull. Yesterday, too, the woodwind choir of our orchestra would have rejoiced him.

Between whiles and for the first time in Boston, Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang—a chastely longing air of Pamina from Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; the sensuous and rhapsodic soliloquy of Louise from Charpentier's like-named music-drama. She is of cool and comely presence—a Galatea, so to say, of the concert-hall. She possesses a cool, clear soprano voice, smooth, rounded, crystalline. As the polished, transparent, glassy sphere in which the "gazer" is about to read the future, holds the eye, so do Mme. Lashanska's tones engage the ear. She sings with a cool and studious skill—the note well shaped, the phrase well moulded, the period well curved and cumulated. Careful is she in the mating of text and tone, of voice with orchestra. She takes mental note of the mood, the sentiment of the music and would discreetly convey it.

Of such resource and mettle, Mme. Lashanska sang Mozart's air so that the duller hearer perceived the flowing beauty of line, the charm of phrase unfolding into phrase, the serene and limpid course of the music, the gentle pathos, gently mirrored. The loveliness, the remoteness (as it seems nowadays) of Mozart in such song were in her tones. A crystal voice sang a crystal music and for the time and place, the manifold Mozart asks no more. To at least one singer of the younger generation, Mme. Sembrich has transmitted a Mozartean technique and poise. The rhapsody from "Louise" is far different of matter, manner, mood. The crystal of the singer's tones faithfully mirrored Charpentier's pages; but no ray of sensuous warmth, no glow of amorous ecstasy, no wild glint of freedom traversed it. Thoughtfully Mme. Lashanska sang Louise's monologue—Louise "happy in her home" and taking tea with "our best people."

H. T. PARKER

148
Mme. HULDA LASHANSKA (Mrs. Harold A. Rosenbaum) was born in New York on March 15, 1892. She was educated at the Normal College. She won a scholarship for pianoforte, singing, harmony, languages, at the Institute of Musical Art. She took pianoforte lessons of Alexander Lambert. Having studied singing with Mme. Frieda Ashforth for four seasons, she sang for the first time in public with the Symphony Society of New York, on November 27, 1910.

She then went to Paris, where she studied French diction for a year under Ponceau. In 1913 she was married. For nearly two years she did not sing in public: she acquired a repertoire, instructed by Mme. Sembrich. She has sung with leading orchestras of this country, in recitals, and in concerts with Mr. Emilio de Gogorza. She now sings for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Scott's father was a Greek scholar; his mother, an amateur musician. The boy showed musical instinct at a very early age, playing by ear when he was five and a half years old, and improvising. At the age of seven he began to practise notation. When he was twelve years old he entered the Hoch Conservatory of Music at Frankfort, where he studied the pianoforte with Uzielli. After a sojourn in England he returned to the Hoch Conservatory, to study composition with Ivan Knorr, whom he left when he was twenty years old. He had composed a symphony, which had been performed at Darmstadt, and some chamber music which later he destroyed. At Liverpool he took up the composition of poetry, encouraged by Charles Bonnier, an enthusiastic admirer of Mallarmé and the modern French school. Richter produced Mr. Scott's "Heroic" suite for orchestra in Manchester and Liverpool, and songs and pianoforte pieces were published. When he was twenty-five he became acquainted with occultism and the mysticism of the East. Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, his biographer, says that "this changed the whole tenor of his inner life, and this new interest made a great impression on his musical tendencies. Under the inspiration of mysticism, he wrote 'Lotus-land,' 'Sphinx,' 'Two Chinese Songs,' and other pieces of a like nature, and he also began to get rid of 'key-tonality,' as it is usually understood. . . . In music his affections seem at first very limited, and as he himself has stated that a man's creative style is largely the outcome of his admirations, it will be instructive to glance at his preferences. They begin with Bach (and Scarlatti to a lesser degree), and then comes a big hiatus until Chopin and Wagner. He confesses that both Mozart and Beethoven do not appeal to him 'except a bar or two here or there.' Neither do Schubert nor Schumann, as a whole, though he prefers these later composers to the earlier ones. Strange as it may sound, Mozart and Beethoven give him an unpleasant sense of childishness." Dr. Hull says that Mr. Scott believes Wagner to have been the Shakespeare of music, "all-satisfying and entirely monumental in his great operas."

149
Symphony Hall.

CYRIL SCOTT, ENGLISH COMPOSER AND PIANIST.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mme. HULDA LASHANSKA (Mrs. Harold A. Rosenbaum) was born in New York on March 15, 1892. She was educated at the Normal College. She won a scholarship for pianoforte, singing, harmony, languages, at the Institute of Musical Art. She took pianoforte lessons of Alexander Lambert. Having studied singing with Mme. Frieda Ashforth for four seasons, she sang for the first time in public with the Symphony Society of New York, on November 27, 1910.

She then went to Paris, where she studied French diction for a year under Ponceau. In 1913 she was married. For nearly two years she did not sing in public: she acquired a repertoire, instructed by Mme. Sembrich. She has sung with leading orchestras of this country, in recitals, and in concerts with Mr. Emilio de Gogorza. She now sings for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Scott's father was a Greek scholar; his mother, an amateur musician. The boy showed musical instinct at a very early age, playing by ear when he was five and a half years old, and improvising. At the age of seven he began to practise notation. When he was twelve years old he entered the Hoch Conservatory of Music at Frankfort, where he studied the pianoforte with Uzielli. After a sojourn in England he returned to the Hoch Conservatory, to study composition with Ivan Knorr, whom he left when he was twenty years old. He had composed a symphony, which had been performed at Darmstadt, and some chamber music which later he destroyed. At Liverpool he took up the composition of poetry, encouraged by Charles Bonnier, an enthusiastic admirer of Mallarmé and the modern French school. Richter produced Mr. Scott's "Heroic" suite for orchestra in Manchester and Liverpool, and songs and pianoforte pieces were published. When he was twenty-five he became acquainted with occultism and the mysticism of the East. Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, his biographer, says that "this changed the whole tenor of his inner life, and this new interest made a great impression on his musical tendencies. Under the inspiration of mysticism, he wrote 'Lotus-land,' 'Sphinx,' 'Two Chinese Songs,' and other pieces of a like nature, and he also began to get rid of 'key-tonality,' as it is usually understood. . . . In music his affections seem at first very limited, and as he himself has stated that a man's creative style is largely the outcome of his admirations, it will be instructive to glance at his preferences. They begin with Bach (and Scarlatti to a lesser degree), and then comes a big hiatus until Chopin and Wagner. He confesses that both Mozart and Beethoven do not appeal to him 'except a bar or two here or there.' Neither do Schubert nor Schumann, as a whole, though he prefers these later composers to the earlier ones. Strange as it may sound, Mozart and Beethoven give him an unpleasant sense of childishness." Dr. Hull says that Mr. Scott believes Wagner to have been the Shakespeare of music, "all-satisfying and entirely monumental in his great operas."

Symphony Hall.

CYRIL SCOTT, ENGLISH COMPOSER AND PIANIST,

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

150

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FOURTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12, AT 8 P.M.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY No. 2 in C major op. 61

- I. Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo
- II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace: Trio 1. Trio 2
- III. Adagio espressivo
- IV. Allegro molto vivace

STRAUSS,

ORCHESTRAL SUITE from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," Opera based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

- I. Overture to Act I. Jourdain the Bourgeois
- II. Minuet
- III. The Fencing Master
- IV. Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
- V. The Minuet of Lully
- VI. Introduction to Act II, (Intermezzo); Dorantes and Dorimeno. Count and Countess
- VII. Entrance of Cleonte
- VIII. The Dinner. Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants
(First time in America)

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO No. 3, in C minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 37

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Largo
- III. Rondo: Allegro

Soloist:

MISCHA LEVITZKI

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

151

Mischa Levitzki, Foremost Among the Younger Russian Pianists, Is No Stranger to Boston, Having Played Here First in 1916. He Has Been Here Several Times Since, Notably with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1918.

14TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Excerpt from Strauss's
Music to Moliere Comedy
Much Applauded

BEETHOVEN WORK BRILLIANTLY GIVEN

Herald — Feb. 13, 1921

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2; Richard Strauss, Orchestral Suite from the music to Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (first time in this country); Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, C minor for piano (Mischa Levitzki, pianist).

The audience was not concerned with the question whether Strauss and Hugo von Hofmannsthal, the librettist, had done Moliere a deadly injury by their comedy-opera-burlesque — produced at Stuttgart in October, 1912. Nor was the audience interested in the fact that "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" section was dropped, like the boy Xury in "Robinson Crusoe" when the revised version was performed at Berlin the next year. It listened to the Suite arranged by Strauss as purely concert music; listened and enjoyed it hugely, applauding enthusiastically after each movement; at the end recalling Mr. Monteux several times and insisting that the orchestra should share in the honor. Seldom has an unfamiliar musical composition been so warmly received in Symphony Hall.

This Suite is interesting in many ways; it bids for immediate popularity. It is curiously scored: 6 violins, 4 violas, 4 violoncellos, 2 double basses; 2 flutes (interchangeable with 2 piccolos), 2 oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons (one interchangeable with double bassoon), 2 horns, trumpet, trombone, piano, kettle-drum, campanella, side drum, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, triangle, harp. With these instruments Strauss performs all manner of agreeable tricks.

As Lully wrote music for the first performance of Moliere's comedy in 1670, Strauss now and then attempts to reproduce the spirit of the ancient music, but he is whimsical in this, and is suddenly ultra-modern. He is reported as having said after he had completed his "Rosenkavalier": "Now I have written an opera in the manner of Mozart," but he could not write in that manner, greatly as he admires the composer of "The Marriage of Figaro"; nor can he content himself with imitating Lully. Would the Florentine recognize "The Minuet of Lully" played yesterday? It is delightful music but not in the 17th century manner.

The overture is sparkling with its pretty closing dance tune; the first Minuet, without any pretence of imitating Lully, is melodious and graceful; the "Entrance and Dance of Tailors" is gay. The more serious movements — if Strauss is ever serious in this Suite — are the charming Intermezzo, and the beautiful measures entitled "The Entrance of Cleonte." The Dinner Music with Dance of the Kitchen servants is the least engrossing portion of the Suite in spite of various musical eccentricities that might have been effective at the performance in Stuttgart. The Courante in the Suite was not played.

There are many measures that recall the "Rosenkavalier," especially the waltzes. As in other late works of Strauss, the comparative poverty of thematic invention is not wholly concealed by skilful juggling with the instruments; common place, even common melodic figures are not authoritatively embellished by strange blendings of instrumental timbers. It is not necessary to inquire whether the various movements suit the action in the theatre; when a Suite derived from stage music is played in a concert hall, the theatre, for which it was composed, no longer exists; it never existed.

The Suite was finely played by the small orchestra. A successful performance of this music demands not only humorous appreciation, spirit, dash, sentiment; it also demands at times a certain appropriate rollicking coarseness; at other times elegance; above all finenesses.

Mr. Monteux gave a spirited, even an exciting reading of Schumann's Allegros and Scherzo, but with the exception of the Introduction to the first movement and the Adagio, in which the romantic dreamer Schumann is revealed — these sections were eloquently performed — the Symphony has aged. And in this symphony more than in the other three the orchestration seems hopelessly crude, ineffective, distressing to the ear, while the musical contents are seldom worthy of a more tasteful dress.

The concert was a long one. Some in the audience were unable to hear the last movement of Beethoven's Concerto. Perhaps they feared that the tea and buttered toast—possibly with muffins—were growing cold. The withdrawal was not courteous to Mr. Levitzky, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, especially as the performance was a brilliant one. Those who did not hear the final Rondo missed an admirable interpretation, conspicuous for crystalline clearness, surprising fleetness, with an ever-present sense of proportion. These qualities with the same musical intelligence in phrasing and in employment of tonal gradations marked the performance of the first Allegro, while the reading of the Largo was emotional without undue emphasis. We read in New York newspapers, when Mr. Levitzky recently played this concerto, that when he was more mature he would show greater depth of feeling. Thus was he patted on the head, as the circus girl by the ringmaster: "She rides well for one so young." But the music itself is not conspicuous for "depth" except to those who have turned the concerto into a fetish inhabited by a spirit. Deep musical emotion was not in fashion in the Vienna of 1800.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week comprises Vaughan Williams's "London" Symphony; Mozart's Concerto No. 6 for violin (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline."

Feb. Boston Notes 13. 1921
Specialty for The Christian Science Monitor

The fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given on February 11, was as follows: Schumann, second symphony, op. 61, in C major; Strauss, orchestral suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann"; Beethoven, concerto for piano and orchestra in C minor.

Strauss' suite was given for the first time in America. The opera from which it is drawn is based on Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The orchestra which Strauss employs is a small and curiously arranged one. The strings are limited to six violins, four violas, four violoncellos, and two double-basses. Each of these plays an individual part. The wind section consists of the usual number of instruments found in the scores of Mozart and Haydn save that the two flutes at times play the piccolo, the second oboe occasionally changes to the English horn and the second bassoon to the double-bassoon. A trombone is also added. The piano has an important part and there are various instruments of percussion. Naturally there is an attempt in the music to suggest the atmosphere of the seventeenth century. The most successful portions of the suite in this regard are the overture and the music to accompany the entrance of Cleonte. However, this music is but an imitation of that of Lully and his contemporaries, and like all imitations it is never so good as the original. One feels that the composer is all the time saying to himself: "I must be simple, I must be naïve, I must be charming."

In consequence this music, in spite of its cleverness and apparent simplicity, gives the impression of a pose assumed for the time being. The music for the Fencing Master scarcely rises above the quality of much of the perfunctory melodramatic music which we are accustomed to hear in the theater. The music designed to accompany the dinner scene is intended, so we are informed by the program notes, to be humorous. Personally we are unable to find anything particularly humorous in a quotation from the "Rheingold" to accompany the fish course and the bleating of the sheep from "Don Quixote" to accompany the mutton. Of course the connection is obvious, but why are not certain other portions of the music explained? There are twitterings of the flute and clarinet which no doubt refer to the game, and other pages which would undoubtedly serve as an accompaniment to a platter of sausages; still one would like to be accurately informed as to these matters in order that a full æsthetic enjoyment of the music might be reached. The performance was wonderfully euphonious. It seems a pity that so much careful rehearsal was wasted on music of so little value. However, the performance served to show the catholicity of Mr. Monteux's taste and his unsparing devotion to the art of music, regardless of school or period. Schumann's symphony was given an inspired reading, in the true romantic spirit. Mischa Levitzki was the pianist in the Beethoven concerto.

SYMPHONY IN LATEST BY STRAUSS

Suite From "Der Burger"
for First Time
in America

Post

Feb. 13. 1921

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from his opera, "Der Bürger als Edelmann," a German corruption, with incongruous frills, by Hugo von Hoffmannsthal, of Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," was performed for the first time in America at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mischa Levitzki was soloist, playing the Beethoven C minor piano concerto. Schumann's C major symphony opened the programme. The symphony is aging, with the exception of the slow movement, aging fast. Mr. Levitzki grows constantly in poise, in technical proficiency and in beauty of tone. This he showed at once, as he also showed a musicianly comprehension of Beethoven's score, for his performance was not merely the performance of a complacent virtuoso.

STRAUSS' CURIOUS BAND

The audience applauded Mr. Levitzki warmly. It applauded with still more warmth the music of Strauss. It applauded until Mr. Monteux made his orchestra rise and bow. This orchestra called for by Strauss was far from the normal strength and proportions of the Boston Symphony. Strauss' orchestra for "Der Bürger als Edelmann" is curiously arranged.

In the string division, which consists of six violins, four violas, four violoncelli and two double basses, each player has an individual part. In addition to the strings there is a woodwind choir consisting of two flutes, one interchangeable with piccolo, two oboes, one interchangeable with English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, one interchangeable with double bassoon. The brass choir asks for a trombone, two horns and a trumpet. There are many percussive instruments, a piano, kettledrums, side drum, bass drum, tambourine, campanella, cymbals, triangle and a harp.

Hoffmannsthal wrote the libretto of "Der Bürger" as he had written the librettos of "Electra" and "Rosen-Kavalier." The libretto of "Der Bürger" is a strained affair. Jourdain, the suddenly rich bourgeois, gives a banquet, to which he invites noble guests. A young composer whom Jourdain patronizes has been asked to compose a short opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," and a farce, to amuse the guests. As the time is passing Jourdain tells his composer that he must perform both works at the same time, and thus they are performed, cheek by jowl, now a little of this one and now a little of that. Strauss said that the thing was symbolic of a young composer of genius at the mercy of capitalists and the like. He composed in various styles, in the manner of Molière's day, in the manner of early Italian opera and in a vein of buffoonery.

In music for the supper scene he indulges in familiar Straussian tricks. Thus, as salmon from the Rhine are placed on the table he quotes the river music from "Rheingold," and when mutton is brought the famous orchestral imitation of the bleating of sheep, from Strauss' own "Don Quixote," is heard. At the first performance of the new opera Strauss hung out signs requesting that the critics should not write about it until it had been given three times. Some critical gentleman then remarked that he supposed this was another joke, a joke about as good as Strauss' quotation of motives by Wagner and himself. Later Strauss revised "Der Bürger," and the new version was heard in 1913.

Inscribed to Boston Symphony

There are eight numbers in this suite arranged from the opera. They are as follows: Overture to Act I.—Jourdain, the Bourgeois; Minuet; The Fencing

156

Master; Entrance and Dance of the Tailors; The Minuet of Lully; Introduction to Act II. (Intermezzo; Dorantes and Dorimene—Count and Countess); Entrance of Cleonte; The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants). Mr. Strauss, very civil in these days to American orchestras, has personally, it appears, inscribed copy No. 21 of this suite to the Boston Symphony. Of more importance is his scoring and the nature of the music.

The scoring is very ingenious. It is probably in response to criticisms of Strauss' heavy, swollen orchestration in other works that he turns around in this one to show what he can do with a comparatively few instruments. He handles them resourcefully. There is no question about that! Frequently the impression is that of a full orchestra. At other times there are opportunities for delicacies and conceits, of which the composer hastens to avail himself.

Very Clever and Very Blase

When all is said and done, however, we cannot, with the best will in the world, admire this music. It is very clever, and also it is at the bottom very blase. It appears to be the music of a composer satiated with success, confronted with the limitations of his own nature, looking eagerly about him for a new idea, freak, amusement. Strauss imitates the idiom of Moliere's period skilfully. But when does he convince? When has one any idea that this is more than a box of tricks? The two minuets are pleasing. There is deliberate vulgarity and buffoonery in other places.

Following the dinner music there is a passage of the melodious and wonderfully well adjusted melody of Strauss which tells. There is at times a suavity that mocks the situations. The spectacle on the stage, with the music, would doubtless help this suite, but we cannot believe that repeated hearings of music from "Der Burger als Ede Edelman" would at all enhance Strauss' reputation with those who admire—and no more than ourselves—the flaming genius which inscribed "Till Eulenspiegel," "Tod und Verklärung," "Zarathustra" and other of the earlier works on music paper. It is too bad. Not only singers, but composers, should stop when they have reached the height of their careers, and not attempt longer to lure the public.

SYMPHONY CONCERT 13, Traus. — Feb. 24, 1921 STRAUSS'S NEW SUITE FOR THE FIRST TIME

Incidental Music to Moliere's Comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Written as He Has Written Nothing Else — Simplicity and Sophistication, Old-Time Suggestion and Modern Flavor in Rare Blend—Schumann and Beethoven for Prelude and Postlude

COMPOSERS are a frugal folk. Having once put music to paper, they are exceeding loth to consign it to oblivion. From operas that speedily failed into oratorios that still endure, went Handel's handiwork. It is the pastime of antiquarians to trace the measures of a matured composer back to a discarded or unfinished page of his youthful days. Fragments of Concertos forgotten somehow slip into Symphonies perennial. If memory holds, there never was a performance of Lalo's opera, "Fiesque"; but in "The King of Ys," "Namouna," and his symphonic pieces many ears have heard much of the music. Scotland and Spain are hardly near neighbors, and Sir Walter Scott and Messieurs Merimée, Meilhae, and Halévy are not exactly close kin; but here and there—the explorers of trifles say—Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth" fed Bizet's "Carmen." And so onward with instance upon instance. No wonder Richard Strauss follows in these well-marked footprints, since if half the gossip of Munich and Berlin run truly, he is of frugal mind in many other matters than music. "Thrift, thrift, Horatio!" Thereby do we gain villas in the Bavarian Highlands and sumptuous apartments in Charlottenburg, publishing our music even after a long war upon wide-margined paper, richly glazed, beautifully engraved, appropriately inscribed.

Nine years ago Strauss wrote incidental music—overture, entr'acte, "entrances," dances, songs—to a German version of Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." He wrote it because he, Hofmannsthal—his usual librettist—and incidentally, Reinhardt, the theatre-director, had agreed to use the play as preface and frame to a short and fantastical opera, "Ariadne on Naxos"—mingling of mythological "lyric drama" in the "grand style" of the seventeenth and eighteenth century with the antics of the Italian Commedia dell'Arte. The two-fold piece was first represented at Stuttgart in the autumn of 1913; elsewhere a few other German theatres reproduced it; Sir H. Tree and Sir T. Beecham even ventured it in London. Nowhere, once the first flush of curiosity had passed, did the hybrid much interest the public. It was soon clear, besides, that since theatres lack singers and opera houses actors, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" plus "Ariadne on Naxos" would be seldom staged. Accordingly Strauss and Hofmannsthal took counsel with prudence, parted play and opera, shaped "Ariadne" into an independent piece. Again it would not be the truth to say that self-contained, it won and held audiences. High and dry, then, lay the incidental music to Moliere's comedy. Not too often is it played on German-speaking stages; not many of them may readily assemble and practice an expert orchestra of thirty-six in Strauss's exacting score, while even before the war, the French preferred Lully, who worked with Moliere, to Strauss, who worked with Hofmannsthal. There was but one salvation, unless these incidental numbers were to go for naught—to assemble from then an Orchestral Suite for the concert-hall. At his leisure Strauss put it together, published it, despatched score and parts to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for first performance in America. Yesterday afternoon it was so played with the conductor, the prescribed band and the audience equally "on edge." All three had no small reward.

157

Nowhere else, seemingly, has Strauss written such music in such manner. His nearest approach to it are the so-called Mozartean passages (like the Trio at the end of the third act) in his "comedy with music" in eighteenth-century Vienna, "Der Rosenkavaller." There, however, the dimensions are larger, the pitch higher. For the incidental numbers to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Strauss reduces the orchestra to thirty-six—sixteen strings, each playing a separate part, paired woodwinds and horns, individual trumpet, trombone and decorative instruments of percussion. Keenest sacrifice to any composer in these days, he actually forswears two harps. Moreover, he uses his ornamental instruments sparingly—for the most part in only one division—while everywhere else he keeps his band at low or middle voice. Throughout, too, he writes with sedulous care of detail as though he were fashioning a fine embroidery in tones upon Moliere's play. He seems not much concerned with the motifs he has invented to characterize one or another salient personage, like Monsieur Jourdain who would do as gentlemen do. In the concert-hall in particular, they come, they go, little impressing the hearer. Like the motifs whence the dances and the more decorative divisions of the Suite spring, they are no more than serviceable.

As usual with the Strauss of middle years, the treatment is everything and upon it he lavishes skill, resource, imagination. The harmonies move in delicate tracery or fanciful suggestion; the low-pitched instrumental voices speak with many tongues; the lightest of hands often sets the rhythms beating. Now, as in the overture, this incidental music runs gayly, smilingly, with little jets of mocking humor, as in the measures for pompous Jourdain. Again, as in the two Minuets, wistful melody, tinged with melancholy, marches to gentle rhythmic beat. The music of the Fencing-Master at play with his foils, glints with the light brilliance, the cut and thrust of trumpet, horns, piano. The Tailor's Journeymen are common folk; their dance shall have like savor, but harmony, instrumental voices and fancy with rhythm shall make it piquant. Leading personages upon the stage, Strauss gains the grave elegance that is the very note of stateliness in the theatre and the music of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries; while with it he charms twentieth-century hearers. It is hard to imagine more adept means, more delicate musical fancy, more felicitous illusion than he gains with his music for Cleonte and for the intermezzo of the Count and the Countess.

At every turn through these seven numbers—one more, a dance, the Courante, was omitted yesterday—the listener receives and enjoys a sophisticated simplicity. How gentle and graceful the melodies, how bright and light the rhythms, how elegant the ornament, how transparent the whole! The courtiers of Louis XIV. highly entertained by "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," might have taken hardly less pleasure in Strauss's decorations—were it not for a play of harmonies, of instrumental timbres that long outstrips their taste and time. Here is the gait, the air, the fancies and pleasantries of their music, but all savored—and so the more piquant—with the modulations, the harmonies, the timbres of quite another way and day. Tour de force is too stout a word for so delicate a thing, yet no other quite so well measures it—and a tour de force of freshness and dexterity, not of decadence or of mere bigness.

The more the pity, then, that the final and the longest division of the Suite falls below the rest. It is the music that accompanies the ceremonious dinner of Monsieur Jourdain and his guests and the dance of the young servants joined by one who has leapt from the omelette on surprise. Again Strauss, as through the whole Suite, gains fine sonorities from his little orchestra; again he makes modulation and dissonance serve the circumstances of a somewhat disturbed meal; the dance goes piquantly enough, but not quite with the animation and the fancy of the tripping tailors. The likelihood is that he is over-occupied with a delineative purpose, that he is too eager for a humor he does not always gain. We must hear Wagner's Rhine-nixies when the salmon is served from that river; the sheep must bleat for a moment out of his own "Don Quixote" when the maitre d'hotel hands the relêve of mutton; as some say, the kitchen youth have heard—and remember—dances in "Electra" and "Salome" and presume (say two hundred years before) to parody them. All this, however, proves to be mere "paper-music," to be read at leisure in the score, but hardly to be heard in the quick commerce of theatre or concert-hall. Straussian taste is not impeccable in these matters; Straussian humor has been known in sundry times and places to seem humorless. As it was, the listener heard yesterday in this "dinner-music" an over-long, over-elaborated, rather mystifying and pedantic piece, written less for the play and the audience than for the composer's own satisfactions. Somehow in a Straussian garden, there must always be a patch of thistles.

The new Suite is not short. For the first time in four years, the Symphony Concerts had opened door for a novel piece from Germany. Strauss still keeps no small prestige as composer; his music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" engrossed and pleased the audience; the flower of the orchestra joined with Mr. Monteux to match finesse with finesse and delicacy with delicacy, to gain everywhere lustre and fragrance. Inevitably the rest of the concert seemed as prelude and postlude. The prelude was Schumann's Symphony in C major, which conductors still take from the shelves, which audiences still hear and applaud because, as the English say, "it is right and proper," so to do. But test this routine and decorum by the actual music and the actual hearing. Seldom has Schumann written more turbidly, repetitiously, monotonously than in the three Allegros. Restlessly he strives, clamorously he insists—and there is no outcome except a flash or two of the beauty of romantic vision and romantic expression that even his struggles with the symphonic form and polyphony could not subdue. Through one movement—the Adagio—he sustains both the vision and the expression. The rest with all Mr. Monteux's pains, is dusty, even dull. Far fresher went the postlude—Beethoven's Concerto for Piano in C minor with Mr. Levitzki's crystalline tone for the solo part, with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra light of hand and smooth of voice, with Beethoven's gentler beauty of song playing out of the Largo, with his stores of fancy darting swift and sure through Allegro and Finale.

H. T. PARKER

Not An

h

MILE DELCOURT.
THE SYMPHONY ORCH-ESTRA, HARPIST

Dances in May,

Steinway

convey a more definite supreme quality than in the musical world.

ert & Sons

land Distributors

STON ST

Richard Strauss

is over-occupied with a delineated pose, that he is too eager for a does not always gain. We may Wagner's Rhine-mixies when the is served from that river; the sh bleat for a moment out of his o Quixote" when the maitre d'hot the relêve of mutton; as some kitchen youth have heard—and r—dances in "Electra" and "Salome" presume (say two hundred years to parody them. All this, however to be mere "paper-music," to be leisure in the score, but hardly heard in the quick commerce of or concert-hall. Straussian taste impeccable in these matters; S humor has been known in sund and places to seem humorless. As the listener heard yesterday in t ner-music" an over-long, over-el rather mystifying and pedantic ple ten less for the play and the audie for the composer's own satis Somehow in a Straussian garde must always be a patch of thistle

The new Suite is not short. first time in four years, the S Concerts had opened door for piece from Germany. Strauss sti no small prestige as composer; h to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" engrossed and pleased the audience; the flower of the orchestra joined with Mr. Montoux to match finesse with finesse and delicacy with delicacy, to gain

MISCHA LEVITZKI was born at Krementschug, Russia, in May, 1898. His father, an American citizen, was there with his family on business. The boy attended the public schools of New York. He had learned to play the piano a little in Russia. Friends in New York placed him at the Institute of Musical Art, where he studied for above five years with Sigismond Stojowski. He was then sent to Berlin, where Erno Dohnányi was his teacher. In March, 1914, Mr. Levitzki gave his first public recital in Berlin. In the spring of that year he gave recitals in Antwerp and Brussels. The war broke out; he returned to Berlin, and in the winter of 1914-15 gave recitals there. Afterwards he gave recitals in Leipsic, Vienna, Budapest, where he played with Dohnányi, smaller cities of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and in Christiania. Returning to New York in April, 1916, he gave his first recital there on October 17 of that year.

His first recital in Boston was on October 19, 1916. He gave recitals here on November 27 of that year and on November 10, 1917. On December 27, 1918, he played Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On April 6, 1920, he played with Messrs. Copeland, Ornstein, and Arthur Rubinstein, at an Ampico Reproducing Piano concert in Symphony Hall.

On the Largo, with his stores of fancy darting swift and sure through Allegro and Finale.

H. T. PARKER

MME. LUCILE DELCOURT.
OF THE SYMPHONY ORCH-ESTRA, HARPIST

Richard Strauss

is over-occupied with a delineation, that he is too eager for a pose, that he does not always gain. We may remember Wagner's Rhine-nixies when the is served from that river; the sh bleat for a moment out of his o Quixote" when the maitre d'hot the relève of mutton; as some kitchen youth have heard—and dances in "Electra" and "Salome" presume (say two hundred years to parody them. All this, however, to be mere "paper-music," to be leisure in the score, but hardly heard in the quick commerce of or concert-hall. Straussian taste is impeccable in these matters; his humor has been known in sundry and places to seem humorless. As the listener heard yesterday in the "ner-music" an over-long, over-elaborate rather mystifying and pedantic piece, ten less for the play and the audience for the composer's own satisfaction. Somehow in a Straussian garden must always be a patch of thistle.

The new Suite is not short. The first time in four years, the Symphony Concerts had opened door for a new piece from Germany. Strauss still has no small prestige as composer; his new to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" engrossed and pleased the audience; the flower of the orchestra joined with Mr. Montoux to match finesse with finesse and delicacy with delicacy, to gain

MISCHA LEVITZKI was born at Krementschug, Russia, in May, 1898. His father, an American citizen, was there with his family on business. The boy attended the public schools of New York. He had learned to play the piano a little in Russia. Friends in New York placed him at the Institute of Musical Art, where he studied for above five years with Sigismond Stojowski. He was then sent to Berlin, where Erno Dohnányi was his teacher. In March, 1914, Mr. Levitzki gave his first public recital in Berlin. In the spring of that year he gave recitals in Antwerp and Brussels. The war broke out; he returned to Berlin, and in the winter of 1914-15 gave recitals there. Afterwards he gave recitals in Leipzig, Vienna, Budapest, where he played with Dohnányi, smaller cities of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and in Christiania. Returning to New York in April, 1916, he gave his first recital there on October 17 of that year.

His first recital in Boston was on October 19, 1916. He gave recitals here on November 27 of that year and on November 10, 1917. On December 27, 1918, he played Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On April 6, 1920, he played with Messrs. Copeland, Ornstein, and Arthur Rubinstein, at an Ampico Reproducing Piano concert in Symphony Hall.

Of the Largo, with his stores of fancy darting swift and sure through Allegro and Finale.

H. T. PARKER

MME. LUCILE DELCOURT.
OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, HARPIST

Richard Strauss

is over-occupied with a delineation of pose, that he is too eager for a result that does not always gain. We may remember Wagner's Rhine-nixies when the shaggy creature bleat for a moment out of his orchestra like Quixote" when the maitre d'hotel served the relêve of mutton; as some kitchen youth have heard—and danced in "Electra" and "Salome"—presume (say two hundred years ago) to parody them. All this, however, is to be mere "paper-music," to be heard in the score, but hardly heard in the quick commerce of the concert-hall. Straussian fastidiousness is impeccable in these matters; Strauss's humor has been known in sundry places to seem humorless. As the listener heard yesterday in the "ner-music" an over-long, over-elaborate, rather mystifying and pedantic piece, ten less for the play and the audience for the composer's own satisfaction. Somehow in a Straussian garden must always be a patch of this.

The new Suite is not short. First time in four years, the Symphony Concerts had opened door for a piece from Germany. Strauss still has no small prestige as composer; his "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" engrossed and pleased the audience; the flower of the orchestra joined with Mr. Montaux to march blucce with blucce and delicacy with delicacy, to gain

MISCHA LEVITZKI was born at Krenn in 1898. His father, an American citizen, was on business. The boy attended the public school. He had learned to play the piano a little. New York placed him at the Institute of Music, where he studied for above five years with Sigmund Liebermann. Then sent to Berlin, where Erno Dohnanyi was his teacher. In March, 1914, Mr. Levitzki gave his first concert. In the spring of that year he gave recitals in New York. The war broke out; he returned to Berlin. In 1914-15 gave recitals there. Afterward, he went to Vienna, Budapest, where he played with the orchestra of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and then to New York in April, 1916, he gave his first concert on October 17 of that year.

His first recital in Boston was on November 27 of that year. On December 27, 1918, he played the G minor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He played with Messrs. Copeland, Ornsby, and others at an Ampico Reproducing Piano concert. Of the Largo, with his stores of fancy darting swift and sure through Allegro and Finale.

H. T. PARKER

MME. L. OF T. ESTA

Richard Strauss

160

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, AT 8 P.M.

WILLIAMS,

A LONDON SYMPHONY

I. Lento Allegro risoluto

II. Lento

III. Scherzo; (Nocturne): Allegro vivace:

IV. Andante con moto; Maestoso alla marcia Allegro; Maestoso alla marcia

Epilogue: Andante sostenuto

(First time in Boston)

MOZART

CONCERTO in E flat major, for Violin (Koechel No. 268)

I. Allegro moderato

II. Un poco adagio

III. Rondo: Allegretto

CHABRIER,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Gwendoline"

Soloist:

JACQUES THIBAUD

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Jacques Thibaud Is Considered One of the Greatest Violinists Now Living. He Was Wounded During the War and, Obtaining Leave of Absence, Visited This Country.

SYMPHONY IN 15TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb. 19, 1921
Vaughan Williams's "London" Played Here for First Time

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony was played here for the first time. The program also included Mozart's concerto, E flat major, for violin (Mr. Thibaud, violinist), and the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

When Mr. Coates came to New York as a "guest conductor" of the Symphony Society of that city, he brought out the "London" symphony (Dec. 30, 31, 1920). A description of the work, signed with his initials, was then published in the Bulletin of that society. It is reasonable to suppose that this description was inspired by the composer, although he was reported as saying when the symphony was first performed seven years ago that various sights and sounds of London may have influenced him, but it would not be helpful to describe them; that the title might run, "A symphony by a Londoner"; that the work must succeed or fail as music, and in no other way. He probably had a change of heart while he was revising his work; or Mr. Coates may have persuaded him to describe the symphony, so that the hearer might not dilate with the wrong emotions or be wholly perplexed.

This description is of a pictorial, geographical, sociological nature. The first movement opens by the "calm and silent" Thames. One might add to Mr. Coates's description: a foggy daybreak, a fog as Dickens saw it; a mysterious river, the one known to Rogue Riderhood. Then there is the noisy London of crowded streets, of shouts and whis-ling; the London of the costermonger; the scene changes to shabby districts. Again the Strand.

The second movement portrays a melancholy region that has seen better days. The night is falling. There is the thought of poverty and squalor. In front of a "pub" an old musician is fiddling. The cry of "Sweet lavender" is heard.

In the third movement Saturday night sounds from the slums are borne across the Thames embankment. In the streets coster-girls are dancing. There is the music of mouth-organ, concertina, hurdy-gurdy. The Thames flows on in the foggy night, and there is silence.

The finale opens with a "Hunger March" of those out of work, pinched with the cold, starving. The former gay scenes of the first movement are now distorted, as viewed by the eyes of the oppressed. There are cruel discords. At last, as in an epilogue, there is "vast and unfathomable London." The symphony ends as it began with the Thames, "the keeper of many secrets, shrouded in mystery."

Mr. Coates's description, which we have greatly condensed, is entertaining reading; but the title, "London," should be enough for one that knows that city, is imaginative and prepared to meet the composer half-way.

The symphony is profoundly impressive, musically, with or without a program. Many of the pages are sinister, even cruel, reminding one of the London through which De Quincey wandered with the poor girl who vanished, and haunted his memory in after years. A stony-hearted London! And even the reckless, vulgar gayety is not the coarse jollity of the happy and unthinking. The introduction is, perhaps, the most poetic portion of the work. It is singularly original, with its impassiveness, its remoteness from everyday life, its absence of everything earthly or spiritual. Almost as fortunate is the reproduction of street life.

It seemed to us that the slow movement steeped in melancholy, say rather utter hopelessness, would have been more effective if it had been performed at a little faster pace; and we should have liked a madder, yes, coarser, performance of the Scherzo. There is no more vulgar mob than that of London. In this Scherzo "Arrie" and "Arriet" should make the welkin ring; the street girls should dance till their hats bob tipsily, till their dishevelled hair streams in the wind. Yet the performance, as a whole, was noteworthy, one that brought out the singular talent of an English musician, whose idiom is his own, whose audacity is tempered by art, who does not see the life of Lonely. for the sake of musical cure, but suffers himself, is one the complaining millions of men." composer that looks on poverty, hunger, loneliness, merely as a novelist in search of copy, without human sympathy, could never have written the last movement.

There is so much native vigor in this music, so much realism that is not photographic; there is so strong an appeal, that chatter about the composer's technical methods, harmonic schemes, orchestral devices and inventions, would be impertinent. The symphony is worthy of the man that wrote "On Wenlock's Edge."

Seldom is such pure, chaste, classic, yet warm and sympathetic violin playing heard in Symphony Hall or any other hall as was heard yesterday. One might add the adjective "elgant" if that word were not sadly abused in these days. Mr. Thibaud played Mozart's music as Mozart would have liked to hear it. There are fiddlers. There are violinists. There are a few great artists that have chosen the violin as a means of imparting, or creating beauty; Mr. Thibaud is of them.

The concert closed with a spirited performance of Chabrier's tempestuous, tumultuous overture.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony, No. 2; Carpenter, Suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time here); Schelling, Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra (Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist).

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on February 18. The program follows: Vaughan Williams, a London symphony; Mozart, concerto for violin in E flat, Jacques Thibaud, soloist; Chabrier Overture to "Gwendoline."

Vaughan Williams' symphony was played for the first time here. Few modern works have made such a favorable impression. In spite of its modernity, the expression is never forced. There is never that searching for novel effects for their own sake so regrettably frequent in other works of our own time. The melodic outline is always graceful and the harmony and orchestration are natural and unaffected, while at the same time interesting and original. The interpretation was sympathetic. Mr. Thibaud's playing is not suited, we are happy to say, to a public taste accustomed to the highly colored, self-assertive, flashy style of a certain school of violin playing often applauded to the echo. Mr. Thibaud is first a musician and after that a violinist of superlative attainments. His playing of Mozart's Concerto was a delight from beginning to end. Beauty of tone, nobleness of style, taste and refinement of expression were its characteristics. Such playing is all too rare and all too little appreciated by the musical public. Chabrier's Overture was brilliantly played. Feb. 19, 1921

WILLIAMS' LONDON SYMPHONY PLAYED

Yelke Feb. 17, 1921
Thibaud, Violinist, Assists
in Mozart Concerto

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" Overture
Also in the Program

"A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams was the chief item on yesterday's Symphony program. It has been played in New York, but never before in Boston, where the composer, an Englishman, is known only by a few songs. Williams was a pupil of both Parry and Stanford, but his radical admirers praise him for having abandoned the dry principles they taught him.

True, his harmony is based not on Mendelssohn but on the modes found in old church music, yet it is seldom exceptionally dissonant. The four movements of his symphony are not constructed according to orthodox formula, but what structure they have seems to be simpler, more like a suite than like Brahms. His orchestration, except for a superabundance of percussion and brass, might be somewhat muddled Tchaikowsky.

The basic defect which should have prevented Williams from attempting anything as ambitious as a symphony is a poverty of melodic invention. He cannot, it would seem, compose a tune worthy to stand beside the strikingly original themes of Debussy.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave what seemed an unusually good performance of this symphony, and of Chabrier's trivial and bombastic overture to "Gwendoline," a piece totally unworthy of the composer of "Espana," which one hopes never to hear again at a Symphony concert.

Jacques Thibaud played the solo part in the violin concerto in E flat which goes by Mozart's name, though a large part of it, as recent investigation has shown, is not by Mozart, but the work of someone who completed it from scattered sketches left by him, as Sussmayer did with the "Requiem." Mr. Thibaud produced an exquisitely lovely smooth, clear tone. His interpretation was fluent and graceful, but Mozart's vivacity escaped him. The audience received him cordially.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. Next week, Moiseiwitsch, the admirable pianist who has hitherto played only once in Boston, will take the solo part in Schelling's "Fantastic Suite." The other numbers are Brahms' Second Symphony and Carpenter's Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta."

ENGLISH MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post Feb. 19, 1921
"London Symphony"
Given—Thibaud's
Artistry as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony" was played for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pierre Monteux conductor, in Symphony Hall. Williams, an Englishman of 49 years, benefitted in his style because of his contact with Ravel and other modern composers, although he is sincere and authentically English in his idiom in this symphony. He has allowed to appear a programmatic explanation of his music.

FEELING AND MOOD

The symphony is in four movements. The first, one finds, may be taken as expressing London at dawn—the flowing of the Thames, the striking of "Big Ben" in Westminster tower, the noises of the Strand, the comparative hush of the Adelphi district, a district aged, run down and full of memories, and again the bustle, yells and racket of the Strand. The second movement is inspired by the thought of Bloomsbury in the foggy twilight of a November day, the Bloomsbury of poverty, of shabby streets and hollow gentility. The third movement, in carnival vein, is Saturday night in a bench of the Temple Embankment. The last movement, in the nature of an apotheosis, speaks of poverty, the march of the unemployed, the tragedy, the poetry, the enigma of London.

There is feeling and mood in this symphony, which is too long and padded. At least it is music by a composer sincere and sensitive to the atmosphere of his town. There is the echo of the din of city streets, the gaiety and vulgarity of the "pub," the smack of folk tune, or rather street cry, here and there, as in the delightful quotation of "Sweet lavender; who'll buy my lavender?"

First Movement Best

The first movement seems by far the best. The introduction is imaginative—the grayness of dawn, the silence of the river, the distant chime of the clock and the pages, following which are weird and exciting. The slow movement has poetic atmosphere, though it is long drawn out. There is animation and vitality in passages of the third movement, but it is patchy, and the last movement peters out. It would have been better, it seemed to us, had Mr. Williams taken his material, condensed it and written a symphonic poem in one movement.

On the other hand, it is recognizable that here, at least is an Englishman with infinitely more consciousness of his locality than that shown by the pinchbeck Londonism of Edward Elgar. And the themes are not merely quoted. They are treated sympathetically, and are often given a special significance. At other times there is mere manipulation and treading of water. Orchestration there is felt the influence of Stravinsky.

Since the Stravinsky of one decade is not the Stravinsky of another because of his incredibly rapid evolution let us be explicit: The Stravinsky of Petrouchka, whose color scheme and rhythmic and instrumental effects haunt Mr. Williams until at times he becomes imitative. The performance was a triumph of fine nuance and brilliant virtuosity, thanks to Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud's Playing

Jacques Thibaud, violinist, gave an unforgettable performance of Mozart's E flat concerto. One is tempted to say that this concerto could not be played with greater art. We shall hesitate to go in to a concert hall when another violinist than Mr. Thibaud performs it. The perfection of line, the classic grace and continency of expression, at the same time, the warm quality of the tone and the expressive singing of lovely melodies constituted a veritable revelation of Mozart. Mr. Thibaud was warmly applauded. The applause should have been frantic in order to be proportionate, when one recalls an occasion not many weeks ago in which a young violinist played in a manner decidedly superficial and received more recalls, longer applause than did Mr. Thibaud yesterday. "Sic transit . . ."

Chabrier's Overture

Chabrier's wild and dramatic overture to "Gwendoline" ended the concert, and its superb performance was exhilarating beyond expression. Chabrier was first a temperament, then a musician, though a very gifted one, to boot. Who makes the orchestra blaze as he? Who evokes from the instruments a nobler tumult, a tumult more elemental as he thinks of the storm-swept coast of ancient Brittany, of the invaders from the north? Then there is the sensuousness and the forbidding and intensity of the love music. And then, alas, there is the atrocious musical parody of Walhalla—the climax where Chabrier not only falls short but falls clean to the ground with the barrel organ ditty which he gives his dying Harold and Gwendoline, as, expiring in the flames, they sing of Walhalla.

It is a caricature of nobility, with a Wagnerian appoggiatura to it which only increases the disgust one would feel—if the whole business were not so stirring that the one who listens can only choke and applaud!

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Feb. 19, 1921
OUTWORN CHABRIER AND MOZART
TRANSFIGURED

The Frenchman's Resounding Overture Feels the Years—Mr. Thibaud as Divining, Transmitting and, for the Hour, Flawless Violinist—The "London Symphony" Evades Mr. Monteux and the Music Suffers Accordingly

THE audience at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon was unusually chary of applause. Only when Mr. Thibaud played the solo-part in a Concerto of Mozart for violin did piece—or rather performance—much stir it. To Vaughan Williams's new "London Symphony"—noted and notable work in kind—it returned only perfunctory even desultory, plaudits and a few zealots, rather than the whole listening company, recalled the conductor at the end and finally brought the orchestra also to its feet. Of old the public of "these concerts" used to rise to Chabrier's Overture to his opera, "Gwendoline"; whereas it now whisked away homeward after a few courteous clappings. Yet the quality of neither music nor performance had materially diminished. The years hardly lessen Chabrier's vehemence when the marauding Danes, shouting and smiting through his first measures ravage the land and the ear. His singing violoncellos may still lay on and spare not with the music of the passion of the Saxon princess for the invading hero. No whit less loudly does Chabrier's Valhalla clang; cheaply theatrical remain the final measures of beatified vision. Chabrier does not smugly imitate Wagner in the manner of a Rabaud; he does not follow literally any of the Wagnerian formulas; yet had there been no "Ring" operas, there would probably have been no "Gwendoline." More and more in the sifting of time, the overture joins the other pseudo-Wagnerian pieces in which Chabrier's generation of French composers was prolific. Being such, it fails to endure. Moreover, nothing but the composer's fire of spirit and energy of workmanship now save motifs and music from frequent commonplace; while lapsing time and changing fashions are kinder to finesse than to force. Before long, the listener to Chabrier's overture suspects, there will be naught left of him in the "active repertory" but his Spanish rhapsody.

So measuring applause, audiences clearly feel these changes of the years and the modes with music, though they may not find words for them. As certainly they perceive and respond to the beauty, the poise, the insight of such violin-playing as Mr. Thibaud's in Mozart's Concerto, for which there are no words at all. In itself, it is no remarkable music. Much of it is no more and no less than workaday Mozart, even though as some say he purposed in his later years to rewrite the piece in the manner of his mature symphonies. The composer was often his own violinist; if not, according to the custom of those days, he left much to the performing virtuoso, who might be finely strung musician as well. The violin-part—and still more the accompaniment—were no more than hints from the composer. The dexterity of the orchestra would fill out his measures; the violinist, according to his degree, would add skill and taste, discernment and beauty. A first movement with two motifs in interplay, "passage-work" for the violinist's plasticity and finesse, songful measures for his sentiment; a slow movement of silken melody, melancholy of mood; a light and glinting finale and the Concerto was done—for a Mozart in perpetual flow of music through an easy-going day.

Such a violinist of Mozartean time, custom, imagination was Mr. Thibaud. His tone glowed with soft lustres; it moved in delicate undulations; it insinuated its own beauty and the beauty of the music into ear, mind, fancy. The "passage-work" of the first movement became a fine tracery of sound, a veritable embroidery upon the air, spun in tone that caught the lightest inflection of the composer, the slightest impulse of the violinist. Even the routine of the sonata-form became at Mr. Thibaud's hands an aerial, iridescent music. There were songful measures as well—in this first Allegretto, in the ensuing Adagio—played in serene and limpid flow, phrase melting into phrase, while here and there ornament ruffled like ripples the shimmering surface. Gentle sentiment played through this song while at every turn Mr. Thibaud gave it that light quiver, that delicate vibration upon air and ear which are life to such music, which are as fine flicks upon the hearer's perception and response. In this tremor—for it is hardly more—is the secret loveliness of such Mozartean song. Few musicians, playing his Concertos, his piano-pieces, singing his songs, divine it. Fewer still may impart it. In high degree Mr. Thibaud does both and in penetrating sensation upon his hearers draws from Mozart a hidden and characteristic beauty.

The violinist passed to the final Rondo, and caprice vied with elegance. Mr. Thibaud made it no "brilliant Finale." Rather, he kept the return of the motifs, the rhythmic élan, the flow of the figures, the little in-takes, as it were, of sustained song in light, fanciful, sportive play. Mozart, like the other composers of his day, would give these Rondos the voice, the air, of gay and adept improvisation—the conjurer in tones in final shake of his magic sack. Mr. Thibaud caught the intent, conveyed the illusion. Throughout the Concerto he was not merely faithful to the composer. He divined him with the keenest of perception, the truest of imagination. He served this divination with means for once free from every technical, every temperamental, infirmity. Mr. Thibaud is wont to pursue an ideal perfection. Through a brief half hour yesterday he caught and held it. In years in the concert-hall he may know no finer achievement, his hearers no deeper delight.

Mr. Williams's "London Symphony" is another, a different matter. With the best will in the world the hearer who has chanced to listen to it elsewhere, who has read the composer's pages with a little imagination for sound, could not escape the impression that the music somewhat evaded M. Monteux. As a whole, it is more rugged, more forthright than he seemed to suspect. It asks bolder phrasing, sharper accents, rougher texture, more emphatic movement, progress, contrast than he chose to give it. There are British directness, even bluntness, in the "London Symphony"; where the mood and speech invite it, there is British heartiness as well. Mr. Williams designed the Symphony largely; he wrote it now with grave intensity; again with vivid imagery; in sober contemplation tinged with melancholy; often he would be sharp, strenuous, even drastic. Mr. Monteux softened him, refined upon him and the music suffered thereby.

The conductor caught the grey mystery, the subdued and haunting voice of the prelude of the river in everlasting flow beside the sleeping city; but it was possible to wish a sharper rhythm, a livelier color in the ensuing measures of morning stir and energetic folk. In the music of dusk and melancholy, of twilight shadows falling upon empty, weary places, Mr. Monteux mistook meditation for mourning. His pace seemed too slow; his phrases too long drawn; his mood too lugubrious. Mr. Williams surely designed his music of the Costers' Saturday Night to run roughshod; with intent he wrote flaringly, robustly. The conductor, as they say of drivers and horses, refused the composer his head.

168

Again in the so-called Hunger March—tone-picturing of the crushed and suffering, the envious and the rebellious—Mr. Monteux softened harshness, subdued tumult, under-accented dissonance. So played the "London Symphony" seemed by no means its true self and made much less than full impression upon an expectant and then disappointed audience. The performance this evening may less dim and weaken a music that lacks neither light nor heat nor strength, and comment thereafter may prove more discerning and just. For the time record suffices—and regret that mischance should have overtaken new music of no small significance and worth—from a "new man," besides, with his English fellows, too little known in America.

H. T. PARKER

Vaughan Williams was educated at Charterhouse (1887–90) and at Trinity College, Cambridge (1892–95). In 1890–92 he was at the Royal College of Music, London, and after taking his degree at Cambridge he spent 1895–96 at the Music College, where he studied composition with Parry and Stanford, the organ with Parratt, the pianoforte with Herbert Sharpe and G. P. Moore. At Cambridge he had studied composition with Charles Wood. In 1897–98 he had lessons in composition from Max Bruch in Berlin. He also took lessons in Paris for two months from Ravel. "When the Frenchman had asked relentlessly, 'But why do you do so and so?' and 'Why should such and such be done?' the Englishman could only rub his eyes and say: 'Well, why indeed? And thank you very much for the hint.' After which he came home and wrote 'Wenlock Edge'." In 1901 Williams received the degree of Mus. D. from Cambridge. From 1896 to 1899 he was organist of South Lambert Church. He has lectured for the Oxford University Extension in Oxford and London. In 1914, at the age of forty-two, he enlisted as a private in the R. A. M. C. As stretcher-bearer and scrubber of floors he served in France and at Salonica. He passed the examination for an artillery commission in 1917 and won special commendation for his place on the list.

169

Mr. JOSEPH JACQUES THIBAUD, violinist, was born at Bordeaux, France, on September 27, 1880. Until he was thirteen years old, he was taught by his father. Entering the Paris Conservatory he took lessons of Martin Marsick and in 1896 was awarded a first prize. (First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Sechiari and Monteux, pupils of Berthelier, and Soudant, pupil of Lefort.) Thibaud's brother, Joseph Charles, born at Bordeaux on February 25, 1875, took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory for piano-playing in 1892. Another brother, Henri Bernard, a violoncellist, and a student at the Paris Conservatory, was born at Bordeaux on July 8, 1877.

In his twelfth year Mr. Thibaud had played in public at Angers. In Paris he had become known by his brilliant solos at the Café Rouge in the rue de Tournon, frequented by Conservatory pupils, who were in the habit of playing there in ensemble and as soloists. He joined Colonne's orchestra in 1897 and in 1898 became the solo violinist of that orchestra. In 1899–1900 he appeared as a virtuoso in towns of France, and at Brussels, Mannheim, and Geneva; in 1901 at Berlin, Amsterdam, Lisbon; in 1902–03 in Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Roumania, Italy, Spain.

His first appearance in Boston was on November 7, 1903, when he played César Franck's sonata with André Benoist, and pieces by Bach, Saint-Saëns, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, and Wieniawski.

A second visit to this country was made in 1913–14 and on December 28, 1913, Mr. Thibaud gave a concert with Mr. Bauer in Symphony Hall. He gave a concert with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, in Jordan Hall, January 31, 1914.

When the war broke out, he went into active service. Late in 1916 he was given leave of absence from the French Army on account of injuries received while on duty in the trenches. He played in Boston with George Copeland in a concert at Symphony Hall, December 24, 1916.

On April 2, 1917, he gave a concert with Mr. Bauer in Jordan Hall.

January 12, 1918, recital in Jordan Hall. March 24, concert with Guiomar Novaes in Symphony Hall, when he played Mozart's concerto in E-flat major. October 27, concert with Mr. Bauer in Symphony Hall.

On April 4, 1919, he played Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor, No. 3, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. On December 4, 1919, January 8, and February 5, 1920, he played with Mr. Bauer the violin sonatas of Beethoven. His last appearance in Boston was with Mr. Cortot, pianist, at the Boston Opera House, January 30, 1921.

168

robustly. The conductor, as they say of drivers and horses, refused the composer his head.

Again in the so-called Hunger March—tone-picturing of the crushed and suffering, the envious and the rebellious—Mr. Monteux softened harshness, subdued tumult, under-accented dissonance. So played the "London Symphony" seemed by no means its true self and made much less than full impression upon an expectant and then disappointed audience. The performance this evening may less dim and weaken a music that lacks neither light nor heat nor strength, and comment thereafter may prove more discerning and just. For the time record suffices—and regret that mischance should have overtaken new music of no small significance and worth—from a "new man," besides, with his English fellows, too little known in America.

H. T. PARKER

Vaughan Williams was educated at Charterhouse (1887-90) and at Trinity College, Cambridge (1892-95). In 1890-92 he was at the Royal College of Music, London, and after taking his degree at Cambridge he spent 1895-96 at the Music College, where he studied composition with Parry and Stanford, the organ with Parratt, the pianoforte with Herbert Sharpe and G. P. Moore. At Cambridge he had studied composition with Charles Wood. In 1897-98 he had lessons in composition from Max Bruch in Berlin. He also took lessons in Paris for two months from Ravel. "When the Frenchman had asked relentlessly, 'But why do you do so and so?' and 'Why should such and such be done?' the Englishman could only rub his eyes and say: 'Well, why indeed? And thank you very much for the hint.' After which he came home and wrote 'Wenlock Edge'." In 1901 Williams received the degree of Mus. D. from Cambridge. From 1896 to 1899 he was organist of South Lambert Church. He has lectured for the Oxford University Extension in Oxford and London. In 1914, at the age of forty-two, he enlisted as a private in the R. A. M. C. As stretcher-bearer and scrubber of floors he served in France and at Salonica. He passed the examination for an artillery commission in 1917 and won special commendation for his place on the list.

169

Mr. JOSEPH JACQUES THIBAUD, violinist, was born at Bordeaux, France, on September 27, 1880. Until he was thirteen years old, he was taught by his father. Entering the Paris Conservatory he took lessons of Martin Marsick and in 1896 was awarded a first prize. (First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Sechiari and Monteux, pupils of Berthelier, and Soudant, pupil of Lefort.) Thibaud's brother, Joseph Charles, born at Bordeaux on February 25, 1875, took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory for piano-playing in 1892. Another brother, Henri Bernard, a violoncellist, and a student at the Paris Conservatory, was born at Bordeaux on July 8, 1877.

In his twelfth year Mr. Thibaud had played in public at Angers. In Paris he had become known by his brilliant solos at the Café Rouge in the rue de Tournon, frequented by Conservatory pupils, who were in the habit of playing there in ensemble and as soloists. He joined Colonne's orchestra in 1897 and in 1898 became the solo violinist of that orchestra. In 1899-1900 he appeared as a virtuoso in towns of France, and at Brussels, Mannheim, and Geneva; in 1901 at Berlin, Amsterdam, Lisbon; in 1902-03 in Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Roumania, Italy, Spain.

His first appearance in Boston was on November 7, 1903, when he played César Franck's sonata with André Benoist, and pieces by Bach, Saint-Saëns, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, and Wieniawski.

A second visit to this country was made in 1913-14 and on December 28, 1913, Mr. Thibaud gave a concert with Mr. Bauer in Symphony Hall. He gave a concert with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, in Jordan Hall, January 31, 1914.

When the war broke out, he went into active service. Late in 1916 he was given leave of absence from the French Army on account of injuries received while on duty in the trenches. He played in Boston with George Copeland in a concert at Symphony Hall, December 24, 1916.

On April 2, 1917, he gave a concert with Mr. Bauer in Jordan Hall.

January 12, 1918, recital in Jordan Hall. March 24, concert with Guiomar Novaes in Symphony Hall, when he played Mozart's concerto in E-flat major. October 27, concert with Mr. Bauer in Symphony Hall.

On April 4, 1919, he played Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor, No. 3, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. On December 4, 1919, January 8, and February 5, 1920, he played with Mr. Bauer the violin sonatas of Beethoven. His last appearance in Boston was with Mr. Cortot, pianist, at the Boston Opera House, January 30, 1921.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SIXTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, AT 8 P.M.

CARPENTER,

SUITE from the Ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta."

I. Introduction. Entrance of the Infanta. Children's Dance
Arrival of the Guests. The Gypsy Dance

II. The Bull Fight

III. Entrance of the Dwarf. The Fatal Dance. The Tragedy
The End.

(First time in Boston)

SCHUMANN,

CONCERTO in A minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 54

I. Allegro appetuoso

II. Intermezzo: Andante grazioso

III. Allegro vivace

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 2 in D major, op. 73

I. Allegro non troppo

II. Adagio non troppo

III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino

IV. Allegro con spirito

Soloist:

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

♦ Benno Moiseiwitsch, Pianist, Has Been Extremely Popular in London. His Appearance in New York Has Always Been Welcomed. He Made a Profound Impression Here Last Season.

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Feb. 26, 1922
Moiseiwitsch, Pianist, Plays
with Orchestra for
the First Time

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, played here with the orchestra for the first time. The program was as follows: Carpenter, Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time here); Schumann, Concerto, A minor, for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

There is music composed originally for a drama or a ballet that is worthy of performance at a Symphony concert, by reason of its contents, its structure, its inherent beauty, its value as absolute music without regard to the stage for which it was written. One hears with pleasure at a concert the "Namouna" Suite of Lalo; Bizet's music for "L'Arlesienne"; ballet music by Rameau or Gretry; even the ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba" or Rubinstein's "Feramors." Other suites could be named, as that derived from Gabriel Faure's music for "Pelleas and Melisande." The list is by no means a short one. Take a recent instance: Mr. Henry F. Gilbert's concert version of his ballet, "Dance in Place Congo," was not out of place at a Symphony concert last season.

However effective Mr. Carpenter's ballet may be in the theatre—and of this we cannot say, for we have not seen the ballet—it has little to recommend it for admission to a symphony concert program. Its possible effect depends chiefly, one is tempted to say wholly, on its association with the situations and the evolutions of the ballet. As concert music, it is disjointed, scrappy, rather common. Regarded solely as music, pure and simple, its worth is slight. There are few pages that are beautiful; few that are impressive; few that are exciting. Nor is the Suite saved by the more or less ingenious juggling with instruments in combination or in solo use. The nearest approach to a purely musical effect is in the closing measures, which accompany on the stage the death of poor Pedro and the exit of the Infanta. Here there is a direct and emotional appeal. Nor does one find adroit characterization in the Gypsy Dance; nor does one find lively suggestion in the movement of the Suite entitled "The Bull Fight."

There are some who say that Schumann's piano concerto has aged; that it is now only for a small hall; that its intimacy is ineffective in a large one. A character drawn years ago by Immermann in a satirical novel said that next to hearing music the most disagreeable thing was the hearing talk about it. We cannot understand the attitude of those objecting to Schumann's concerto, as the choice of a pianist. To us, it is one of Schumann's most romantic works, as fresh today as when he dreamed it. And yesterday it was played romantically, with the finest appreciation of its many beauties, with a tonal charm, with a rhythmic surety, with a poetic feeling, with a varied coloring that heightened the enchantment cast by the music itself. It would be impertinent to dwell on Mr. Moiseiwitsch's great ability as a virtuoso. In this instance the accomplished virtuoso and the poetic interpreter are one and the same.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, "Scotch" symphony; Mozart, overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; Gilbert's "Indian Sketches" (first performance). Alice Nielsen will sing "Deh vieni non Tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Giovanni."

Soloist:

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

✧ Benno Moiseiwitsch, Pianist, Has Been Extremely Popular in London. His Appearance in New York Has Always Been Welcomed. He Made a Profound Impression Here Last Season.

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Feb. 26, 1920
Moiseiwitsch, Pianist, Plays
with Orchestra for
the First Time

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, played here with the orchestra for the first time. The program was as follows: Carpenter, Suite from the ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time here); Schumann, Concerto, A minor, for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

There is music composed originally for a drama or a ballet that is worthy of performance at a Symphony concert, by reason of its contents, its structure, its inherent beauty, its value as absolute music without regard to the stage for which it was written. One hears with pleasure at a concert the "Nimona" Suite of Lalo; Bizet's music for "L'Arlésienne"; ballet music by Rameau or Grieg; even the ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba" or Rubinstein's "Fountains." Other suites could be named, as that derived from Gabriel Fauré's music for "Pelleas and Melisande." The list is by no means a short one. Take a recent instance: Mr. Henry F. Gilbert's concert version of his ballet, "Dance in Place Congo," was not out of place at a Symphony concert last season.

However effective Mr. Carpenter's ballet may be in the theatre—and of this we cannot say, for we have not seen the ballet—it has little to recommend it for admission to a symphony concert program. Its possible effect depends chiefly, one is tempted to say wholly, on its association with the situations and the evolutions of the ballet. As concert music, it is disjointed, scrappy, rather common. Regarded solely as music, pure and simple, its worth is slight. There are few pages that are beautiful; few that are impressive; few that are exciting. Nor is the Suite saved by the more or less ingenious juggling with instruments in combination or in solo use. The nearest approach to a purely musical effect is in the closing measures, which accompany on the stage the death of poor Pedro and the exit of the Infanta. Here there is a direct and emotional appeal. Nor does one find adroit characterization in the Gypsy Dance; nor does one find lively suggestion in the movement of the Suite entitled "The Bull Fight."

There are some who say that Schumann's piano concerto has aged; that it is now only for a small hall; that its intimacy is ineffective in a large one. A character drawn years ago by Immermann in a satirical novel said that next to hearing music the most disagreeable thing was the hearing talk about it. We cannot understand the attitude of those objecting to Schumann's concerto, as the choice of a pianist. To us, it is one of Schumann's most romantic works, as fresh today as when he dreamed it. And yesterday it was played romantically, with the finest appreciation of its many beauties, with a tonal charm, with a rhythmic surety, with a poetic feeling, with a varied coloring that heightened the enchantment cast by the music itself. It would be impertinent to dwell on Mr. Moiseiwitsch's great ability as a virtuoso. In this instance the accomplished virtuoso and the poetic interpreter are one and the same.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, "Scotch" symphony; Mozart, overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; Gilbert's "Indian Sketches" (first performance). Alice Nielsen will sing "Deh vieni non Tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Giovanni."

Soloist:

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

MUSIC OF BALLET BY SYMPHONY

Post Feb. 26, 1921
Moiseiwitsch Recreates Schumann
Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

John Alden Carpenter's music to his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor. The composer was present, and his brilliant score was warmly applauded. Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, played for the first time at these concerts, and gave perhaps the finest, the most romantic performance of the Schumann concerto that has been heard in many years. The last item of the programme was Brahms' second symphony, and this work, too, was very fortunately interpreted by Mr. Monteux.

MUSIC FOR ACTION

Had it not been for the accidental holdup of the train, caused by stormy weather, Mr. Carpenter's ballet would have been given by the Chicago Opera Company on the 6th of last March. This would have placed the music in a more advantageous position than it occupied yesterday afternoon, because this is music for a scene, for action, pantomime, dances. The scene, suggested by Wilde's tale, is an episode of the birthday of the Infanta. In a costume of the period of Velasquez she is entertained by other children and by a spectacle devised for the occasion. There are gypsy dancers, a tight-rope juggler, a bull fight, and what not—all these episodes furnishing Mr. Carpenter opportunity for illustrative music. The crowning feature of the entertainment is the performance of a misshapen dwarf caught in the forest. He dances in a grotesque manner and when the princess throws him her handkerchief he wonders, in his joy, if she loves him. But when he attempts to follow the children into the castle for the cutting of the birthday cake the dwarf sees himself for the first time in a mirror. He knows at last how he looks, he guesses the figure he must cut in the eyes of the princess. He falls brokenhearted and dies. The child princess, discovering his still and prostrate form, draws back in horror to get away, to forget.

Mr. Carpenter's music, designed for the stage, is nevertheless effective in the concert room. He has gone a step farther in his scoring than we have known him to go before. It is a coincidence, perhaps, a mere evidence of the way in which certain ideas are afloat at certain times in the air, that his orchestra, like certain features of the score of the Vaughan symphony last week, remind one again of the orchestra of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." That is a work which haunts the music of today, a work so individual, perhaps, that once heard a modern composer of talent and sensitiveness cannot again be the same. We hear once more the agonizing trumpet, the force and the grotesquerie of primitive rhythms treated with modern resource and ingenuity, and we have effects not merely of rhythm, but of color achieved by pulsatile instruments.

Tragedy Not Felt

As to the originality of this music, which must fit and accentuate the situation on the stage, that is another matter. We do not find in it very much originality of idiom. Nor do we feel the grim tragedy of the end of the dwarf, Pedro, as we do feel the taking off of Petrouchka. This note is absent from the excerpt played yesterday. Very possible it is struck in the score of the whole ballet, of which only selected passages were played. Lacking it, the workmanship, the myriad colors, the expert employment of rhythms and timbres, are astonishing and entertaining. Short of having done a new thing, Mr. Carpenter writes with the acme of brilliancy and style. He appeared personally on the stage in response to the applause and was repeatedly recalled.

Mr. Moiseiwitsch re-created the music of Schumann, and re-created it in the composer's image. The performance was that of a great master, and few, if any, of the pianists now before the public could have equalled it. When slight liberties, as some pedantic people would call them, were taken with tempi or with the shaping of phrases, they made the music all the more spontaneous, free as the air, hot from the composer's heart. One thought of what Wagner said to an orchestra: "Now, gentlemen, we know this music. We are going to interpret it and I am going to stop beating time." Complete authority, complete abandonment to the musical impulse, and complete control characterized Mr. Moiseiwitsch's playing. There was felt the sure pulse of the great beats, and there was also the delightful fluctuation, and ebb and flow which makes music, and rescues it from the pump-handling of time-beaters.

Performance Lyrical

With the exception of the few declamatory passages, or the clanging chords of the principal theme of the finale, the performance was wonderfully lyrical from beginning to end. The piano sang. The intermezzo was deliciously intimate, like an improvisation of piano and orchestra. The finale swept one away with its youthful spirit. It was the undying youth of Schumann. There are pianists who come and go. This one is the earnest and objective interpreter. The other is a virtuoso who excites an audience, if he does not stir it to the depths. Another is an impressionist, and so on. All great artistic qualities which could be called into play by the Schumann concerto were at the command of Dr. Moiseiwitsch and his performance will in all probability long stand, for the writer, as the ideal expression of the composer's thought.

Mr. Monteux caught the idyllic wood of Brahms' symphony, and he also felt what can well be called the respiration of this music. It is music which breathes quietly and deeply, like nature. The melodies of the first movement exfoliate, as it were, before one's eyes. They arrive at their complete fulfillment as inevitably as the full flower bursts from the stalk. Mr. Monteux wove the melodic strands of this movement together with as much as he showed in his observance, at the same time, of every carefully wrought detail of Brahms' form. He interpreted the slow movement with feeling and without logy pretense of profundity. We have seldom heard so much humor in the scherzo, and the vigor of the finale was in the highest degree characteristic. This was the completion of a delightful concert.

Feb. Boston Notes 26.1921

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert on February 25. The program was as follows: Carpenter, suite from the ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta"; Schumann, concerto for piano and orchestra, op. 54; Brahms, symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 73. Benno Moiseiwitsch was the pianist. It is difficult to speak of Mr. Carpenter's suite. As music of the theater it may be effective, but as he allows it to be played in the concert hall, it must, of course, be judged purely as music and its shortcomings cannot be excused on the ground that it is not played in its proper surroundings. Moreover, there is no reason why music, originally conceived for the ballet, should not have value apart from the purpose for which it was originally composed. Delibes, to cite only one example, wrote much charming and original music which is interesting wherever and whenever heard. To return to Mr. Carpenter's suite. As music of the concert hall it is lacking in form. Such themes as there are are not of distinction and often border dangerously on the vulgar and commonplace. The orchestration does not cover up the woeful lack of taste displayed in their selection. One asks: Why did Mr. Monteux, a man so remarkable for his refined taste, select such a composition for performance at a symphony concert? The crashes of brass drum and cymbals, the melodies played on the glockenspiel, the blatant brass are all reminiscent of the music hall. The audience received the work with enthusiasm. This kind of music is undoubtedly grateful to the ears of many but there are places where it is more appropriate than in a symphony concert. The Schumann concerto was poetically played by Mr. Moiseiwitsch and the orchestra. Brahms' D major symphony was excellently read by Mr. Monteux, who again proved himself a master in the interpretation of compositions of the most varied character.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Feb. 25, 1921
FROM CARPENTER BACK TO BRAHMS AND SCHUMANN

A Suite from the American's Ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," Bears New Conditions Well, Reveals No Small Mastery of Rhythm and Color—Mr. Monteux Reanimates a Classic and Mr. Moiseiwitsch Enriches a Concerto

AMERICAN composers are not usually innovators. Ingrained in them, as in the rest of us, is the racial instinct toward uniformity, to the regular thing in the regular way. They are excellent imitators when the model is so well established and generally approved as the newer French music. They work well in any orthodox traces, with never a gall upon their shining coats. To take their own course with their own music is another, a perilous, thing. Mr. Loeffler has dared so to do and is accounted a baffling composer; Mr. Gilbert, doing likewise, is the "eccentric Mr. Gilbert"; Mr. Carpenter, exhibiting the same preference, is an "outsider" who happens to write music. The "best people" in the little world that composes, reviews and debates American music (with not a little gossip along the way) still looks skew-eyed at him. Strange fellow! he does not frequent "musical circles"—possibly under premonition of boredom. He actually conducts a business commonly reported to be profitable; he even elects the life of a cultivated man of the world. And when he writes music, Heaven save the mark! He began symphonically with a fanciful, playful Suite about a baby's "morning-out" in a perambulator. He continued with sportive Concertino—a Concertino with rag-time in it—for piano and orchestra. "Serious" musicians, "right-thinking" American composers, do not choose such courses; while purblind and perverse are those who dare to find a clear American quality in these vagaries.

Even when Mr. Carpenter wrote a Symphony, he distinctly departed from the rules. Certain measures, certain procedures, distinctly suggesting the composers to the Russian Ballet, gave almost as much offence as the tinkling triangle in Liszt's Concerto for piano. Such things were simply "not done"—in respectable symphonic circles. By these signs, Mr. Carpenter was likely to undertake a ballet—and he did, with no better precedent in the whole range of American music than "The Dance in Place Congo" by "the eccentric Mr. Gilbert." Much of that piece in an earlier day had been a symphonic poem; but for the bleak winds of criticism upon "The Birthday of the Infanta," Mr. Carpenter had not so much as such figleaf.

Nevertheless, the piece was actually written; nay, it was mimed and danced in Chicago, in New York, almost in Boston. Any ballet, however—especially one fathered by an exacting and independently minded composer—is bound to be only occasional in American opera houses. Accordingly Mr. Carpenter sought in the music a Suite for orchestra in the concert-hall. For the first time hereabouts that Suite was played at the Symphony Concert yesterday and in disadvantageous circumstance. Few in the audience had actually seen, as well as heard, "The Birthday of the Infanta" in the theatre. Wilde's story, whence the fable comes, is not widely known. Less than half the music could be wisely transferred to the new container. There had been laborious rehearsal and consequent murmuring, while plentiful gossip affirmed that without settings, action and the general glamor of the stage, Mr. Carpenter's ballet, like the chaos of Genesis, was null and void. Yet there was Mr. Monteux holding manfully to his purpose and conducting with the practised instinct for rhythm, for color, for the vivid momentary stroke wherewith he excels in music for the theatre. There also was the orchestra missing none of the composer's flashes or filagree of detail. And there finally was an audience, plainly interested, pleased, and minded to call Mr. Carpenter not once, but twice, to the platform. Strange these perverse ears that somehow prefer pleasure to orthodoxy. Can it be that even in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons, sits a "loose" generation?

Of course, these fragments of "The Birthday of the Infanta" lose appreciably by shift to the concert-hall. If they did not, they would not be the revealing, accentuating, illuding music that they are in the theatre, knit into every detail of the action, a-quiver to every suggestion of mood and atmosphere, yet they remain anywhere an exceedingly adroit, vivid, sustained and individual music. Even in his Symphony, Mr. Carpenter has hardly achieved such an expert, artful, orchestrally fanciful a score. Like the abler and the younger composers of our day, he thinks, feels, writes in the terms of the orchestra. He is becoming more and more sensitive to the individuality, the suggestion of instrumental voices. He gains in ingenious and imaginative manipulation of them, in contrast, in combination, in stark separation, in manifold play of enhancing color. The Suite of yesterday teems with vivid instrumental and harmonic strokes; it abounds no less in felicitous harmonic and instrumental details. Both are audible even in the quick passage of new music upon unprepared ears. Mr. Carpenter writes to be heard in theatre or concert-hall as well as to be read in "the closet."

All this, moreover, is no mere technical virtuosity. It seeks and gains delineative, poetizing, atmospheric ends—achieves them with economy, precision, directness of means. A few measures of introduction suggest the tragic fantasy which is the mood of the whole mimodrama; not so many more measures at the end suffice to summon the dwarf dead of piteous disillusion; the little princess shrinking away in as piteous bewilderment over these blows of fate; the whole descent out of courtly and ornate fantasy into a woful tragedy of inner confusions and self-deceits. The Birthday of the Infanta and gay fetes for the royal child. The birthday of the Infanta and a dwarf who hugs illusions of beauty and of love and pays for them; a girl-princess who learns in such an hour that life is not a pretty, playful, simple thing. So in the music, even in the concert-hall, has Mr. Carpenter wrought the finer illusion of his ballet. The means may be harmonies and color, rhythm and motif, but the source is the imagination, the sensibility, the sustaining will, of the composer.

In theatre or concert-hall, music of fete necessarily abounds in "The Birthday of the Infanta." The children of the court stream into the princess's party; a ceremonious retinue bears the gifts appropriate to the occasion and her state. There are dances of festival before the dwarf comes with dances of the heart. There is even a mimic, but no less haunting, bullfight. In all these "numbers," as the elder ballet-masters would call them, Mr. Carpenter's instinct for rhythm—his best and most characteristic ability—serves him richly and variously. The motifs whence spring say, the capering of the children, the dance of the gypsies, the procession with the gifts, are not remarkable in themselves. They are no more than serviceable material. Yet once Mr. Carpenter has animated them with his vivid and plastic rhythms, once clothed them in his rainbow play of harmonies and timbres, set in a vivid detail here, a shadowy detail there, forthwith comes the illusion that he seeks. In the concert-hall, the listener, with two grains of imagination, feels the occasion, catches the illusion.

That illusion is by no means simple. To and fro goes the bullfight; the ear hears, the eye sees, the feints and the rushes; trumpets flare; red cloths wave; yet somehow the music does remind him that all this is mimic for an Infanta's birthday. Stately indeed are the bearers of gifts; a turn of rhythm, a dash of color and we auditors hear and see them, as Mr. Carpenter heard and saw, a little grotesquely. Of a sudden across the introductory measures, of a sudden, again, across the final bars, falls the dull, distant clang of the great bell of the palace. The rhythm is stark, the notes bare; yet there is omen and there fulfilment of the dwarf's tragedy. It is by the means, the fruitful means of the composers of our day, that Mr. Carpenter achieves this illusion—by imaginative command of rhythm, harmonies, instrumental color, by the divination that is resource glorified. Why reproach him because he discards others with which elder composers have worked; because he is not too fertile in these older inventions and too fertile in these older inventions and means so long as they bring to pass his chosen end. Even in the concert-hall—and three-fold more in the theatre—"The Birthday of the Infanta" works the illusion Mr. Carpenter would compass. Once more he has written an unflagging music.

Two other pieces filled the remainder of the concert with familiar, anticipated pleasure—Schumann's Concerto for Piano, with Mr. Moiseiwitsch playing the solo part, and Brahms's Second Symphony with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra rich-voiced in instrumental song. Once more returned the familiar and unexplained anomaly that French conductors will take German music more slowly than do German leaders; whereas those same Germans similarly stay the pace of French pieces. Otherwise, Mr. Monteux excelled himself with a classical symphony; while at every turn the orchestra gave him back a depth, warmth, suppleness of tone worthy of its best days. No roughness marred the texture of the music, no stiffness impeded its flow. The conductor found, developed, sustained Brahms's melodies, the orchestra gave them life and glow. Not often does a symphony of the nineteenth century, hallowed though it be, yield such an impression of pure and vernal instrumental song as did the first movement, yesterday, of this symphony in D major. The succeeding Adagio renewed such wealth of songful beauty. By ever so little Mr. Monteux seemed to touch the Scherzo with Gallic caprice, especially in the quick, glinting measures that twice return. Thereby Brahms was the gainer, as he was in the same symphony, two months ago, under Mr. Toscanini's Italian intensities. In the Finale, it was exhilarating to hear the rhythms stride, the phrases leap. Mr. Monteux has done the Boston Orchestra and its public many services—not the least when he keeps this, that and the other "classic" a living music, cut free from the bonds of repertory and routine.

Over the Concerto, it is possible to blaspheme, saying that some of us have heard quite enough symphonic Schumann for one musical year. Yet, as always, the Schumann of the piano is not the Schumann of the orchestra, though in this particular piece he joins the two together. Seemingly the piano stimulates his orchestral imagination, and he achieves the lovely Euphonies of the Concerto. Seemingly the piano quickens his sense of form and the music flows unclouded by thick repetition. Again fancy makes flashing play with rhythm as through the syncopations of the Finale. Again out of romantic vision rises melody, as in the first movement and the intermezzo, that returns ever fresh and strange and beautiful. Even for the over-fed the Piano-Concerto renews the transporting Schumann—the Schumann that Mr. Moiseiwitsch served yesterday not merely with inexhaustible technical means, with apt touch and glamoring tone, but with the insight and the imagination that out of rhythm and melody weave the magic of sudden beauty—the spell of romance upon familiar things.

H. T. PARKER

MOISEIWITSCH IN SCHUMANN'S PIECE

4 Col. Feb. 26, 1921
Pianist Revealed Player as of the First Rank

Carpenter Acknowledges Applause of His Ballet Suite

Benno Moiseiwitsch, who played Schumann's piano concerto in A minor at yesterday's Symphony concert, is unmistakably a pianist of the first rank. He is no mere steely-fingered virtuoso but a sensitive and thoughtful musician, who uses his remarkable technique as a means to imaginative ends.

Able seconded by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, Moiseiwitsch put unwonted grace and deftness into music that others have too often made clumsy and tawdry, lending Schumann a plaintive charm, almost an elegance, not commonly associated with his name and work. The applause was genuinely enthusiastic.

John Alden Carpenter, who had come on from Chicago to be present at the first performance here of his suite from "The Birthday of Infanta," was called out to bow his acknowledgments several times before a politely appreciative audience. The music would doubtless be more obviously effective if heard with the ballet for which it was written.

In the concert hall the various excerpts, prettily and cleverly contrived as they are, suffer from a lack of continuity. Mr. Carpenter has not tried in this piece to be especially subtle or profound. He has succeeded in writing light, agreeable, up-to-date music, easy to listen to, but hard to remember afterward. The performance was spirited, but not crisply polished.

The other number was Brahms' Second Symphony, which should, if the old routine of playing each of the four every other season is to be kept up, have been the Third. Rabaud gave us the Second. Monteux has already played the First and Fourth, but no one since Muck has vouchsafed a performance of the Third. It is perhaps a small matter, but those who love their Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart symphonies have in the past expected to hear them in regular rotation at the Symphony concerts.

Mr. Monteux's interpretation made the first movement, ordinarily the finest in this symphony, restless and clogged with little "effects," some of them unintentional slips. The adagio on the other hand, usually rather dull, became as Toscanini made it the other day, songful and poetic. The other two movements, like the first, suffered from lack of precise ensemble.

It seemed to the listener that the conductor did not imagine each movement as a whole, but merely did what he could with each separate section regardless of the cumulative effect. Brahms so carefully seeks to build up. One doubted, too, whether enough pains had been spent on this piece at rehearsals.

Items and Incidents Trans. Feb. 14/21

It is said that the last words written by the late Mr. Honeker for print was the final sentence in a review of a concert in New York by the Boston Orchestra. It ran: "There is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra," and was his emphatic way to note the advance of the band this season under Mr. Monteux's endless pains. Other reviewers agreed with him when it was last heard in New York ten days ago. "Steadily," said Mr. Krehbiel in The Tribune, "it is growing toward the perfection for which the old orchestra stood." And in The Times Mr. Aldrich was not slow to hear the "fine tone" of the Bostonians in Dvorak's Second Symphony or their lightness and crispness in the First Symphony of Beethoven.

Symphony Hall.

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the Russian pianist that will play at the Symphony concerts this week, was born at Odessa on Feb. 22, 1890. He studied the piano at Odessa with Dmitri Klimoff at the Music School of the Imperial Russian Musical Society, taking the Rubinstein Stipendary Prize at the age of 9. He afterward studied with Leschetitzky in Vienna. In 1909 he played in the Queen's Hall, London. Having lived in London since then, he has played repeatedly with British orchestras and given many recitals. He came to the United States in the season of 1919-20. In Boston he has played only once—a recital in Symphony Hall on Feb. 23, 1920. He is ranked among the very first of pianists now living. His wife is Daisy Kennedy, a celebrated English violinist, who, after a tour in Australia with her husband, came to the United States this season.

Mr. BENNO MOISEIWITSCH was born at Odessa, on February 22, 1890. He studied the pianoforte at Odessa with Dmitri Klimoff at the Music School of the Imperial Russian Musical Society, taking the Rubinstein Stipendary Prize at the age of nine. Afterwards he studied in Vienna with Leschetitzky. In 1909 he played in the Queen's Hall, London. He made that city his home, playing repeatedly with British orchestras and giving many recitals. Coming to the United States in 1919 he played for the first time in New York late in that year.

In Boston he has given only one recital, February 23, 1920, in Symphony Hall. His wife is Daisy Kennedy, an Australian and a celebrated violinist, who after a tour last year with her husband, in Australia, came to New York and gave her first recital there on November 29, 1920.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SEVENTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 4, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, AT 8 P. M.

MENDELSSOHN

SYMPHONY No. 3 in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56
I. Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.
II. Vivace non troppo.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.
(Played without pause)

MOZART

OVERTURE to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"

MOZART

ARIA, "Deh Vieni non tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

MOZART

ARIA, "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni."

GILBERT

INDIAN SKETCHES.

I. Prelude.
II. Invocation.
III. Song of the Wolf.
IV. Camp Dance.
V. Nocturne;
VI. Snake Dance
(First Performance)

ALICE NIELSEN

Soloist:

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

All Who Cherish Memories of the Extinct Boston Opera Company Will Fondly Recall Alice Nielsen, the Lyric Soprano Who Took Many Parts.

17TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Eloquent Performance by Conductor Monteux
and Orchestra.

MISS NIELSEN IN SONGS OF MOZART

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Symphony in A Minor, "Scotch"; Mozart, overture to "The Abduction from the Harem"; Gilbert, Indian Sketches (first performance). Miss Alice Nielsen sang "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Batti, batti" from "Don Giovanni."

As the ultra-radical Alfredo Casella astonished his countrymen and others by praising the music of Rossini, so Darius Milhaud, a composer of ultra-modern tendencies, has surprised Frenchmen by stating that Mendelssohn was the greatest classic of the 19th century. The symphony played yesterday—Mr. Monteux and the superb orchestra gave an eloquent performance—is about 80 years old. Hearing it, one can grasp Milhaud's meaning; for Mendelssohn, a stickler for form, yet occasionally a romanticist, observed the orthodox conventions with constant attention to a beauty that had not the strangeness in its nature commended by Bacon in his essay. It was very seldom that Mendelssohn let himself go as he did in "The First Walpurgis Night." He seldom screamed, for screaming would not have been well-bred. He measured carefully his effects; he made his points neatly. Overpraised in his life-time, too long a petish in England, he has since been under-rated. He was the incarnation of musical orthodoxy. His radical feeling, if he had any, is not to be detected in his music. He never exulted in it as Mr. Bloch does today.

Yet, when all is said, this "Scotch" symphony contains beautiful and delightful pages. The work has not aged greatly; it is fresher than many orchestral works written a few years ago.

Only in the sentimental Adagio does one find the weaker Mendelssohn, the composer of many "Songs Without Words." Without using Scottish tunes, he gave the symphony a Scottish character, for he had been impressed by his visit to Holyrood; by the story of Mary and Rizzio; by the melancholy surroundings. The melancholy is gentle, contemplative in his music; the composer was not in doleful dumps; and in the gay and exquisitely scored scherzo the Mendelssohn, constitutionally joyous—joyous always in gentlemanly fashion—is revealed. The performance without pauses, as the composer wished, was an exceedingly fine one. After the great performance of Brahms's symphony last Saturday night, after the performance of Mendelssohn's Symphony yesterday, the doubting Thomases, if there are still a few, who sigh for "a conductor that is in sympathy with German music" and speak disparagingly of the orchestra, which was never in a higher estate, should hold their peace.

Some years ago Mr. Gilbert of Cambridge transcribed for Mr. Curtis's elaborate work, "The North American Indian," melodies and tribal songs from phonographic cylinders. The character of the melodic fragments, their wildness and their rhythmic capriciousness, aroused his enthusiasm. In this Suite of six movements, using phrases as hints, he has endeavored to present various moods of Indian life. He has been eminently successful in portraying these moods and at the same time writing music that holds the attention and stirs the blood without purely ethnological consideration. Of the movements, the Prelude, the Invocation, and the Song of the Wolf, especially the latter two, are the most effective, though the Camp Dance will always probably make the most immediate appeal to audiences in general. The Nocturne has less decided character; it is more conventional in sentiment and expression. Mr. Gilbert has long been recognized as a composer of singular individuality. He does not belong to any school; he does not worship in any chapel. He might say proudly with Walt Whitman, "Solitary, singing in the West, I strike up for a New World." We find in these "Indian Sketches" an advance in the presentation of his musical ideas. His instrumentation is clearer and more varied; his contrasts are more frequent and more effective; what seemed in former works a certain and needless brutality has turned into true virility. There are pages of the "Sketches" that are distinguished by what Henley said with reference to Hazlitt's open letter to Gifford, "splendid savagery." The subject chosen called for this.

The songs of Mozart sung by Miss Nielsen were introduced by an overture of Mozart that had not been played at these concerts since 1895. Miss Nielsen has long been known as an accomplished singer of Mozart's music. To sing this music, which "comes from the air and returns to it," is a singer's severest test. At first Miss Nielsen was apparently nervous, or not wholly "in voice"; but she recovered herself and sang the two songs with the requisite simplicity and smoothness; with an agreeable vocal quality. "Deh Vieni" admits for the sake of melodic continuity, a little faster tempo than was taken; and we should have liked a more marked emotional contrast beginning with "Vieni, ben mio!"

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Weber's overture to "Euryanthe"; Haydn's Concerto in D major for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti); Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, and "Romeo Alone and Ball at Capulet's," from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

GILBERT'S PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Indian Sketches for
First Time—Miss Nielsen Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, played without pause between the movements, as was the intention of the composer, opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Alice Nielsen was soloist. She sang two airs of Mozart, "Deh vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." The orchestra played as prelude to these airs the jocose overture to Mozart's "Elopiement from the Seraglio." Finally, Henry F. Gilbert's "Indian Sketches," six in number, were played for the first time.

FRAGMENT FROM CHANT

These Indian sketches have been evolved from fragments of Indian folk-melody. The process of evolution is clearly and aptly described by the composer, thus quoted in the programme book: "I have in but one instance quoted an Indian melody verbatim. (I have used short phrases of a measure or so from which to develop more extended melodies in the same spirit.) Most of these barbaric chants are to me but potent suggestions pointing in the direction of an unexplored domain of musical color. While comparatively few of these primitive songs have musical value, while a dreamy monotony is one of their frequent characteristics, there are yet scattered here and there through the mass of this material, certain striking and piquant musical phrases which give one a positive and distinct impression of racial color. I have used certain of these phrases as hints; as suggestive musical nubs, which I have developed; striving never to lose touch with the barbaric character of the original melodic germ."

Are Masterpieces

In concentration of expression, in mastery of orchestration, in the establishment of mood by relatively simple means, these sketches are the most advanced and the most finished thing Mr. Gilbert has done. He has employed wider canvasses before. He has called more instruments to his service. But he has never handled his material so well, and has never thought in a stronger, more rugged, more lofty spirit. Of the American composers of today, he is the only one who, on occasion, achieves grandeur. In this music is echoed the stern, barbaric nobility of a dying race.

There is also felt the background of wild and spacious nature—nature, not that of a tropical and sensuous South, but of great reaches, one fancies, of the Northwest.

Mr. Gilbert, in these Indian sketches, has not only come in contact with an unexplored domain of musical color, which would in itself have justified the composition of his remarkable suite, but he has felt and responded to deeper things, which one is prone to believe existent in the nature, in the spiritual fastnesses of the Indian.

Extraordinary Rhythmic Force

It is not possible to discuss in detail these sketches. They are distinguished by extraordinary rhythmic novelty and force; by clear and significant orchestration, with novel use of percussion instruments; by a prophetic vigor, and, on occasion, poetic imagery, which is the composer's own contribution. The sketch which made the quickest impression was that of the "Campfire Dance," with its thudding of Indian drums and its humorous character. This is for the writer the least of them all. The prelude is a masterly building up of a barbaric, misshapen musical phrase which extends itself and rears its head over cross rhythms of percussion instruments. (Percussion instruments are in this suite often used not merely for rhythm but for color.) The "Invocation" has a noble sweep and a fanatical crescendo to its climax. The Song of the Wolf is one of the most haunting passages, the stern cry echoing through exquisite vistas of orchestral color. The nocturne is simple but supremely suggestive in its evocation of mood, and the "Snake Dance" is even more remarkable than the prelude for the wildness and impact of its rude, swinging rhythms.

Strange and Fascinating

This music is not sentimental perspective of the Indian, nor is it, on the other hand, musical photography or inartistic realism. It is the product of a creative nature quick to respond to the excitement of novel material, to sense in this material the spirit of a race and the grand nature from which that race has derived its being. The music is so strong, so uncompromising in its vigor and its directness and logic of expression that it puzzled the audience, which, however, as the performance proceeded, warmed more and more to a strange and fascinating art, and at last recalled the composer several times to the stage.

Miss Nielsen's Singing

Far, indeed, was this from the music of Mozart! Miss Nielsen sang the introductory measures of recitative of the air from "Figaro's Wedding" with exemplary musicianship and fineness of nuance. She has become each year a more thoughtful interpreter. Add to this her inborn qualifications for the interpretation of Mozart. A singer who interprets, for example, the character of Zerlina, with her song of pleading to the discomfited and sorely tried Masetto, must have in her own artistic nature a certain naivete and youthfulness, a spontaneity and innocence of sentiment, which are either felt and present, or else absent, for they cannot be manufactured. In her phrasing and in her sentiment Miss Nielsen was very fortunate. She was, it is true, less spontaneous, less carefree, in her vocalization, than she ordinarily is.

Why do singers betray such accursed caution every time they rise before a Boston Symphony audience? The reservation about Miss Nielsen's singing is this comparative lack of ease and of contagious enthusiasm which is one of the gratifying and distinguishing characteristics of her art. In all probability these things will be in evidence this evening, after the first sight of a motionless audience and the plaster casts frowning down from the niches in Symphony Hall. That is not opera. That is not the stage for which Miss Nielsen is born, but on the other hand she is one of the few opera singers whose performances in the concert room sustain careful and critical examinations, and the audience recalled her repeatedly yesterday afternoon.

+ + +

Dear Nomad—I think one of the strangest sights in Boston is the gathering on the steps of Symphony Hall of people waiting for a chance at the "rush" seats at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. I do not know what they save in money, but it must be at a dreadful risk to their health. Some of them arrive quite early in the forenoon, and I have seen them standing under umbrellas in a cold drizzle, long before the time for opening the doors. If people were obliged to stand under such conditions, outside the doors of a mill, or a railroad station, the Mind-Other-People's Business Club would deluge the papers with letters, and probably go to the Legislature, protesting that the "Interests" were treating the people like "serfs."

It seems paradoxical that people to whom a dollar or two is so important should be willing to take the chance of spending a great many dollars for the expenses of a probable sickness. On the other hand, it seems strange that people who look so comparatively prosperous should have to run special risks. I saw a woman standing out there the other day, wearing a long fur coat. It must have been very heavy after the first hour or so. If she could afford the coat, why couldn't she afford a reserved seat? And how can people to whom a dollar is of such account devote practically a whole working day to a concert? And could not most of them, in the time they spend on those cold steps, earn the money for a reserved seat? They look like people whose time must be worth something. I leave off as I began; it is a strange sight.

Boston, Feb. 26.

Undoubtedly it is. This is only one of a number of things in the world that we have to give up.

+ + +

Boston Notes

The seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on March 4, was as follows: Mendelssohn, Scotch Symphony, op. 56; Mozart, overture to "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"; Mozart, arias from the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni," Alice Nielsen, soloist; Gilbert, Indian sketches.

The performance of Mendelssohn's symphony was a particularly fine one. The music sounded singularly fresh, only in the development section of the first allegro giving evidence of age and other fashions. The whole work was given a new life and meaning by Mr. Monteux's spirited and sympathetic reading. The delicacy of the scherzo and the rich tone of the first violins and cellos in the adagio were noteworthy.

Mr. Gilbert's sketches were played for the first time. To many they will seem rough and uncultured, needlessly uncouth. Yet they are not to be dismissed with a careless word or two. They represent a distinct phase of American music. They are blatantly American. Every page might bear the "Made in America" stamp, and, like them or not, their sincerity must be admitted. This is American music and if you find it crude it is because, when stripped of our foreign musical trappings, we are crude. Mr. Gilbert has a fine courage. He dares to be absolutely himself in his music and there is not one note which does not bear witness to his sturdy independence of thought and freedom from conventional restraint.

These sketches might easily be criticized. There are many things to shock the average listener. The point is, however, in the spirit of their conception, and shortcomings in the execution must be excused. Mr. Gilbert's work, in its graphic realism, national character and, as well, in its often inadequate technical working out, reminds one of the Russian Moussorgsky. Later American composers will reap full harvest from Mr. Gilbert's courageous pioneer work, as did so many of the successors of the great Russian.

An Appreciation

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brockton on Feb. 20, in spite of the storm. The Brockton Times of the 21st voiced the delight of the audience. "The last number was Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, in A major, Op. 11, No. 1, and its last melodious chords mingled softly with sighs of regret from the listeners, who for more than two hours had drifted happily on the sea of soul-stirring music." Mr. Richard Burgin was the soloist. He "exhibited rare skill as the sweet voice of his violin rose and fell in charming interpretations of dreamy, passionate and vivacious phases" (sic). The symphony was Dvorak's "From the New World." "All who understood the technique and sympathetic understanding necessary for successful intonations were impressed with the faultless blending of the violins, violas, flutes, trumpets and other instruments which make up the ensemble of the perfect melody producers."

Toscanini, Monteux, Pizzetti, Gilbert

Double Day of Conductors and Composers, Old and New, with Plenteous and Various Harvest

WITH the usual Symphony Concert in the afternoon and the final concert of Mr. Toscanini and his Milanese orchestra in the evening, Boston fed full, yesterday, of symphonic music. For both occasions there were ample but manifestly different audiences. To Symphony Hall in the afternoon went the company that, half by habit and half by inclination, frequents the matinees of the Symphony Orchestra. Bye and large it is a public that takes much joy of itself—and most things on the stage for granted. Above the usual, it was in that mood on Friday. What stranger within our gates, listening to the faint clapping of hands as Miss Alice Nielsen came to the platform, would have suspected that she had been a conspicuous ornament of the Boston Opera House; that, girl and woman, this town had known her more than twenty years? No wonder that after such chilly greeting her singing of two arias from Mozart lacked the eager impulse with which she sang them—and with no accompanying orchestra—in the same room last May. Barely courteous, moreover, were the listeners when, at the end of the concert and of his new "Indian Sketches," Mr. Gilbert joined Mr. Monteux, to acknowledge exceptionally cool audits. The composer as he has a right to do, may choose his own way in living and music-making; he may not be "quite one of us" and all that sort of nonsense. Yet it is the custom of audiences at the Symphony Concerts to applaud a composer warmly—especially a resident composer—when he is present to hear a first performance of his music, even if that music is more baffling and less meritorious than Mr. Gilbert's happened to be. Seemingly the cold without had also nipped within, and the "Symphony Matinée," as they would call it in New York, was uncommonly "institutional."

Different, indeed, was Mr. Toscanini's audience in the evening. Those whom custom sends to Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons, go not to hear visiting conductors, however eminent and stimulating; but some of those who take eagerly the pleasure of orchestral music, whenever and wherever it is to be had, found themselves capable of two concerts—and enjoyment thereof—within the short space of eight hours. The connoisseurs of music and the performance of music in this town do not miss a concert by Mr. Toscanini and he is sure to attract not a few from the social fringe, so to say, that likes to savor the rarities of the arts. Youth as well abounds at his concerts—exhilarating to see and to feel in this city of middle-aged audiences. Best, of all, men hear Mr. Toscanini gladly, especially the men of his own race. Old and young, rich and poor, in dinner-coats and in worsted sweaters, they abounded last evening in Symphony Hall, alert with attention and quick with applause, kindling like the rest of us at the conductor's largest or finest fires. Yet, as a whole, the concert, "farewell" though it was, lacked a little of the zest of the three preceding it. Perhaps the chosen music was in itself less interesting; perhaps it could not heat Mr. Toscanini's orchestra and audience to highest pitch; perhaps, even, we hearers are becoming accustomed to the conductor and his ways. Strangeness has departed from him, while time has not yet deepened familiarity.

—The Symphony

Plentiful Mozart

As composers went, the day was Mozartean. At the Symphony Concert, Miss Nielsen sang two familiar airs—Susanna's "Deh! Vieni!" from "Figaro's Wedding" and Zerlina's "Batti, Batti!" from "Don Juan"; while for preface Mr. Monteux set the overture to the light opera, "The Abduction from the Harem." (The original German title is nearly as formidable; long since the Italians wisely condensed it into "Il Seraglio.") In turn, in the evening, Mr. Toscanini began his concert with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat.

Unless it be the two airs none of this music is of the perfect Mozart. The habitual music-maker, at the day's work, does creep into the symphony, while certainly the resurrected overture is, as they say in the Middle West, of such "output." There are round reverberant measures in it, as becomes the heartiness of a German "singspiel" such as Mozart designed "Il Seraglio" to be—no better measures, though it be blasphemy to suggest as much, than the despised Nessler set into the overture of his nineteenth-century piece, equally shaped for a "popular" audience, "The Trumpeter of Sakkingen." Nessler, however, writing songfully in his preluding, swims through thick Teutonic sentimentality, whereas Mozart, similarly minded, instinctively writes gracefully, tenderly transparently. These periods preserve the overture in the concert hall, as an air or two—say with a Hempel to sing it—preserves the whole opera. Even so, far enough are they from the long, light, gleaming line, the undulating inflections, the mingled charm of sensuous longing and sensuous melancholy that fills "Deh! Vieni!" with silvery beauty, or the playful, insinuating grace that winds through "Batti, Batti!" and sheds the smile that half mocks over the tear that half entreats. In both goes Mozart, the endlessly fanciful, the superlatively delicate melodist, and the melodist as well who made such song the very voice of character, incident, mood. Often Miss Nielsen, singing, was at one with him; but lack of confidence here and there dulled the soft resonance of her tones; while excess of pains with every lovely coloring or modulation of the music stayed its flow. Yet few in these days sing the airs of Mozart with such transparency, tenderness and taste as does she. Her voice gains the limpidity of the music, her spirit catches its fineness.

It was in the symphony, however, that Mr. Toscanini crowned Mozart. Of old, when Richard Strauss was conductor as well as composer, he so excelled with him; more recently, Dr. Muck touched glorious moments by his side; but neither, as memory recalls him, quite sustained himself at the Italian's level of felicity.

He used as full an orchestra as the score permitted—the whole string choir, the usual doubled winds—yet nowhere did weight of tone stay the pace, stiffen the suppleness of the music, or make angular the lithe and curving progress. Full-throated, but never thickly, sang Mr. Toscanini's orchestra when Mozart would have it so. Yet, on the instant at conductor's and composer's bidding—as delicate as it had been robust—it spun the contrasting arabesques of melody and ornament. The conductor, moreover, has schooled it to phrase this music as a singer phrases song—sensitively, suavely, limpidly, with artful sense of proportion and flow. Mr. Toscanini's wind choir may contain few virtuosos, but from him it gains the aerial quality which is the essence and the glamor of Mozart to us of the twentieth century. Moreover, what the pace, whatever the texture of the music, these wind-voices always "shone through."

Everywhere, too, the conductor was all for a Mozart songful. From him mere "workings-out," as the analysts call them, to fill a form, mere play with figures for the sake of such light sport, gained accent and color of melody. Now in one choir, now in another went this song; sometimes the whole orchestra, again a few instruments, gave it voice. As in the preluding or the Andante it might be pensive; as in the Finale, it might be fleet and gay; as in the first Allegro, it might be now bright, now shadows; but ever under Mr. Toscanini's hand, it sang and as many as the moods were the voices. As clear, light, supple were the rhythms—recall the mingled grace and animation of the Minuet. As unfailing was the elegance, as true the aristocratic note of the performance. Fleet and gay was Mozart in the Finale, yet never did he merely race and caper. Formal he might be until the second melody enters the first movement, but what an air of high-bred workmanship the conductor gave the music! Here was Mozart transfigured—and in his own spirit. Mr. Toscanini's miracles do not begin and end with the moderns.

From Beethoven to Elgar

As the course of the two concerts ran, other classic composers likewise had in-ning. Mr. Monteux has quietly and wisely waived not a few "traditions" of the Symphony Concerts; but he seems still to respect the precedent that once in a musical year ordains a Symphony by Mendelssohn. Last winter he resurrected "The Reformation Symphony" and it gratified an interest of curiosity. Yesterday his choice lighted upon the "Scotch Symphony." Next season, presumably, it will be the turn of the "Italian Symphony." Yet, per-adventure, one or another of Mendelssohn's overtures—"Fingal's Cave" or the sea-piece—would yield as much pleasure as characteristic music, returns none too often to Symphony Hall. Yet the "Scotch Symphony" played as songfully, rhythmically, plastically and warmly as it was yesterday, is still engaging to hear. In Mendelssohn's present, fate was exceptionally kind to him; for his future it was hardly less benignant. It gave him two preservative virtues: the ability to say lucidly, persuasively, what he wished to say and no little mastery over pure work-manship.

It is easy in these days to say that Mendelssohn's musical ideas lack depth; that his musical moods miss fervor; that he neither exalts nor penetrates. Yet, somehow, those ideas remain quite untarnished by the passing years; while the moods keep no less their animation. There are rust-stains even on Berlioz; there are wrinkles and cracks upon Liszt years ago; but the surface of Mendelssohn, the classicist, still shines smooth, bright, mirror-like to whatever is within the music. How well jointed, how well polished a surface it is! Every prescription of form seems to fall into natural place; every detail is as apt as aptness can be; while at every turn falls the little stroke of fancy or of skill. To this day, the harmonic felicity guides them; the matter and the spirit of the music shines through them. A master of style was Mendelssohn, and so smooth, so firm and fine-textured therewith that gnawing time may not gain tooth-hold.

Mr. Toscanini's classics were the third "Leonora Overture" of Beethoven, the "Good Friday Music" from the third act of Wagner's "Parsifal" and, as some Englishmen would mildly but firmly say, Elgar's "Enigma Variations." The overture—it is little exaggeration to say—falls before no conducting, gains only in degree by any conductor. As the part of Hamlet is presumed to be "actor-proof," so is it well-nigh "conductor-proof." Within long memory only Mr. Stokowski has been able to over-cloud and dull it—by incongruous refinements, by excessive finicking with details. For a century and a quarter, it has been essentially tone-poem, music-drama in little, the concentration, the glorification of Beethoven's only opera. Mr. Toscanini—almost needless to say—was quick to release, to enhance the dramatic voice of the music. Often he began low with tonal suspense, expansion, ascent; intense; gathered them, held them for quivering instant; then released them in climax as inevitable as seemed yesterday the first notes of the distant trumpet or the flooding of the orchestra into song of devotion or of exultation. Once within this song, Mr. Toscanini and his orchestra deepened passion, outspread might and splendor.

Those who would have music end with Haydn, Mozart and the early symphonies led it into these evil ways of ecstasy and frenzy and that a whole century of composers have but followed after him. Mr. Toscanini ingrains both with a tonal suspense and surge that runs as fire through stubble—although far from stubble is this epitome become epic.

The chivalric clang of the music or the Grail-Knights passed quickly in the fragment from "Parsifal." It was upon the perdurable loveliness of Wagner's melody of awakening nature under the holy spell of holy day upon which Mr. Toscanini plied his powers that his orchestra might give back fadeless beauty and spiritual evocation. If ever there was music of inspiration, it is these brief measures in which Wagner summons the glow, the tremor, the magic and miracle of awakening spring in light and air upon the earth, to human eye and human heart. For an instant, he interweaves with it the poignant motif of longing that threads through and through "Parsifal," that blessing may still pang. Every one knows Mr. Toscanini's fiery power; such moments as this reveal also his poetizing, visioning, deeply human sensibilities.

For another side, with Elgar's Variations, the virtuoso conductor had deserved fling. There they are—a full fourteen of them and not so much as one or a measure of one was omitted last evening. In the hearing, who cares a penny for the concealed, the enigmatical motif, unheard, but according to the composer lying at the root and in background to the whole piece? The concert hall is not exactly the place for the speculative solution of puzzles. Who also, unless he happens to know Sir Edward's intimate circle can guess at his tonal limning of his friends from variation to variation? Enough for the cynics to say that Lady Elgar must be dull and a certain Mr. Sinclair an exceedingly acrobatic organist. As music for its own abstract sake, audiences must hear and conductors play the music. Possibly they play it because it offers them rich opportunity for characterization and differentiation. When a variation sparkles with fancy and play of harmonies and timbres, they can make it flash the more as did Mr. Toscanini with the "Dorabella" variation. Like him, they can swell the sonorous advance the breadth and the depth of the "Nimrod" variation until the audience cannot resist applause. Or they can set in the dark background to the variation of the singing violoncello; keep the long flow and slow throb of the sea-variation; speed the rhythmical impetuosity of another; enhance the striding pace, the resonant vigors of the Finale. They can also move as quickly as they may past the variations that are mere note-weaving. There are three or four such that left even Mr. Toscanini impotent.

New Music as Well

At either concert, there was also novel music. Loyal to the "new Italian symphonists," in just desert as their music steadily proves—Mr. Toscanini introduced one more of them—the Pizzetti, whom the over-zealous and fantastic d'Annunzio renamed Ildebrando da Parma, quite as though he were mediæval, not modern. The chosen pieces were three numbers set in Suite for concert-usage from the incidental music to the poet's play, "La Pisanella," of the Cyprus of the Crusades—bloody and cruel, plous and lustful, feasting and intriguing, raging and dreaming. One accompanies the rising of the curtain upon a scene by the quayside, with the merchants and the shipmen astir, the gallants observant, lounging, truculent, the serving-men running hither and thither, the sky bright, the throng noisy—and afar and alone the figure, among the bales, of the dumb courtesan banished from Pisa for her beauty. Pizzetti's music, full voiced, full bodied, harmonically rich, instrumentally pungent, catches the diversity, the bustle, the glow of the scene. It is written with an admirable directness, candor and vigor; and when for a while it would evoke the amorous image of the Pisan woman, come the warmth, the pith of Italian song. Yet there is an individual note—again the note of directly imagined and clear-cut music-making.

The grave Dance of the Falconer ensues—a slow, a stately Saraband of an officer of the royal household conscious of his importance, with the briefest of intermezzos wherein his hooded birds seem to shake their bells—stroke of musical skill as well as of delineative imagination. So again the music has individual flavor. The final dance, wherein the Pisan dies smothered under the roses heaped upon her by the vindictive queen—vengeful because her son loved the courtesan and with love returned—proceeds in heavy sensuousness, as though premonition of impending fate weighed down the dancer, then rushes as toward inevitable doom, ends as a music stifled. Again the listener feels Pizzetti's directness of imagination, directness and richness of resource. Here, then, and in music apart from the theatre for which it was destined, is a composer of fibre both fine and stout, of large, quick spirit, of ample and candid means. His impending Sonata should disclose more of him interestingly, gratefully.

Mr. Monteaux's novel numbers were the six "Indian Sketches" of Mr. Gilbert, the origins of which from early studies and early usage of this aboriginal music as supplement to lectures, have already been printed in this place. As they stand now they are work of the composer's ripar years, when he can wield an orchestra in divided or in massed tone, has mastered rugged modulation, learned the secrets of reiterated and broken rhythm, can lay on his harmonic and instrumental color boldly, broadly, in stimulating fierceness of will and outcome. Now and again in his music, Mr. Gilbert's expressive and suggestive means have seemed to fall short of his imaginative and delineative design. He has wrestled and written. In the "Indian sketches, clearly, purpose and accomplishment are better matched, and in three or four of the six, he has fulfilled himself above both the "Comedy Overture" and the Prelude to Synge's peasant tragedy, "Riders to the Sea." One sketch may be dismissed as the inevitable necessity to such a Suite—the number that shall exhale gentle song in pensive mood. Mr. Gilbert calls it a Nocturne, would suggest in it night-paddling upon forest-clad, solitary rivers. Actually, he achieves hardly more than a conventionally musing, a conventionally developed and harmonized melody. At a single hearing it evokes a dutiful composer, but neither night nor solitude, darkling stream or shadowy forest. Another sketch, "The Camp Dance" may also pass as no more than graphic, sportive rhythm—"young barbarians"—and not so barbarous at that—"all at play."

Four more Sketches—a Prelude of "Barbaric Mood," an Invocation, a Wolf-Song and a Snake-Dance—are of another matter and manner. The rhythm drums iterantly, leaps brokenly, strides largely or flings about as in frenzy. The melody is bold and bald. It whines out of the distance in the Prelude; it roughens and deepens; whines away again. In the Invocation, it is sheer piercing insistence. The gods shall hear their vehement servant. In the Wolf-Song, it is clear feat of imagination and power, when it swells from scant Indian suggestion into wildness and weirdness, the massed cry tearing the night, of a whole tribe of wolfings. In the Snake-Dance comes again the note of savagery, less sharp than dull. The rhythm, first, the melody next, is the life, the illusion of all this music, but upon it Mr. Gilbert lays patches of smouldering or flashing harmonic color or bids this instrument or that choir cut fiercely into the music. He only of American composers dares strike this barbarous note. Probably he only can strike it. Tonic and savory it falls upon many an ear. Not all music need be civilized. Not a little of it is too civilized by half. Savages bring something to it—when Mr. Gilbert, standing half-way between, is their prophet.

H. T. PARKER

Symphony Hall.

ALICE NIELSEN, soprano (Mrs. Le Roy R. Stoddard), was born at Nashville, Tenn., in 1876. Having studied singing with Ida Valerga at San Francisco, she sang in public at a very early age. She made her first appearance in operetta as "Yum Yum" in "The Mikado" at Oakland, Calif. For some time she sang at the Tivoli Theatre, San Francisco. In 1896 she joined "the Bostonians," and made her first appearance in Boston on April 27, 1896, at the Tremont Theatre as Annabel in "Robin Hood." She also took the part of Maid Marian in that opera and that of Anita in "A Wartime Wedding" that season. On September 20, 1897, she took the part of Yvonne in Victor Herbert's "The Serenade" at the Boston Theatre. On March 13, 1899, at the head of her company, she appeared at the Boston Theatre as Musette and Irma in Herbert's "Fortune Teller." In 1900 she came to the Boston Museum at the head of her own company and appeared on April 16 as Greta in Herbert's "The Singing Girl." In 1902 she was singing at the Shaftsbury Theatre, London, in "The Fortune Teller." She resolved to study for grand opera. Having prepared herself in London and in Italy, she made her first appearance as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust" at the Bellini Theatre, Naples. Later she sang at the San Carlo, Naples (Violetta), and at Covent Garden, in "Don Giovanni," "Le Nozze di Figaro," "La Bohème," "Rigoletto," etc. In 1906 she made a tour of the United States as prima donna of the Don Pasquale Opera Company.

In 1907-08 she was prima donna of the San Carlo Opera Company and appeared in 1907 at the Park Theatre, Boston, from May 6 to May 15 as Mimi, Norina, Marguerite, Rosina, Gilda. At the Majestic Theatre, Boston, in December, 1907, she appeared with the same company as Gilda, Rosina, Lucia, Violetta.

She was a member of the Boston Opera Company during its existence. She sang at the Boston Opera House in these operas:—

"LA BOHÈME," Mimi: 1909, November 11, 13, 24; 1910, February 14, November 18, December 3; 1911, February 25, March 22.

"DON PASQUALE," Norina. 1909, November 26; 1910, February 9, 19, March 11; 1911, March 17, 21.

"MADAMA BUTTERFLY," Butterfly. 1909, December 8; 1910, February 12, 28, November 30; 1911, January 28; 1914, March 14.

"FAUST," Marguerite. 1909, December 15; 1910, March 5, November 14; 1913, March 15.

are three or four such that left even Mr. Toscanini impotent.

New Music as Well

At either concert, there was also novel music. Loyal to the "new Italian symphonists," in just desert as their music steadily proves—Mr. Toscanini introduced one more of them—the Pizzetti, whom the over-zealous and fantastic d'Annunzio renamed Ildebrando da Parma, quite as though he were mediæval, not modern. The chosen pieces were three numbers set in Suite for concert-usage from the incidental music to the poet's play, "La Pisanella," of the Cyprus of the Crusades—bloody and cruel, pious and lustful, feasting and intriguing, raging and dreaming. One accompanies the rising of the curtain upon a scene by the quayside, with the merchants and the shipmen astir, the gallants observant, lounging, truculent, the serving-men running hither and thither, the sky bright, the throng noisy—and afar and alone the figure, among the bales, of the dumb courtesan banished from Pisa for her beauty. Pizzetti's music, full voiced, full bodied, harmonically rich, instrumentally pungent, catches the diversity, the bustle, the glow of the scene. It is written with an admirable directness, candor and vigor; and when for a while it would evoke the amorous image of the Pisan woman, come the warmth, the pith of Italian song. Yet there is an individual note—again the note of directly imagined and clear-cut music-making.

The grave Dance of the Falconer ensues—a slow, a stately Saraband of an officer of the royal household conscious of his importance, with the briefest of intermezzos wherein his hooded birds seem to shake their bells—stroke of musical skill as well as of delineative imagination. So again the music has individual flavor. The final dance, wherein the Pisan dies smothered under the roses heaped upon her by the vindictive queen—vengeful because her son loved the courtesan and with love returned—proceeds in heavy sensuousness, as though premonition of impending fate weighed down the dancer, then rushes as toward inevitable doom, ends as a music stifled. Again the listener feels Pizzetti's directness of imagination, directness and richness of resource. Here, then, and in music apart from the theatre for which it was destined, is a composer of fibre both fine and stout, of large, quick spirit, of ample and candid means. His impending Sonata should disclose more of him interestingly, gratefully.

Mr. Monteaux's novel numbers were the six "Indian Sketches" of Mr. Gilbert, the origins of which from early studies and early usage of this aboriginal music as supplement to lectures, have already been printed in this place. As they stand now they are work of the composer's ripper years, when he can wield an orchestra in divided or in massed tone, has mastered rugged modulation, learned the secrets of reiterated and broken rhythm, can lay on his harmonic and instrumental color boldly, broadly, in stimulating fierceness of will and outcome. Now and again in his music, Mr. Gilbert's expressive and suggestive means have seemed to fall short of his imaginative and delineative design. He has wrestled and written. In the "Indian sketches, clearly, purpose and accomplishment are better matched, and in three or four of the six, he has fulfilled himself above both the "Comedy Overture" and the Prelude to Synge's peasant tragedy, "Riders to the Sea." One sketch may be dismissed as the inevitable necessity to such a Suite—the number that shall exhale gentle song in pensive mood. Mr. Gilbert calls it a Nocturne, would suggest in it night-paddling upon forest-clad, solitary rivers. Actually, he achieves hardly more than a conventionally musing, a conventionally developed and harmonized melody. At a single hearing it evokes a dutiful composer, but neither night nor solitude, darkling stream or shadowy forest. Another sketch, "The Camp Dance" may also pass as no more than graphic, sportive rhythm—"young barbarians"—and not so barbarous at that—"all at play."

Four more Sketches—a Prelude of "Barbaric Mood," an Invocation, a Wolf-Song and a Snake-Dance—are of another matter and manner. The rhythm drums iterantly, leaps brokenly, strides largely or flings about as in frenzy. The melody is bold and bald. It whines out of the distance in the Prelude; it roughens and deepens; whines away again. In the Invocation, it is sheer piercing insistence. The gods shall hear their vehement servant. In the Wolf-Song, it is clear feat of imagination and power, when it swells from scant Indian suggestion into wildness and weirdness, the massed cry tearing the night, of a whole tribe of wolfings. In the Snake-Dance comes again the note of savagery, less sharp than dull. The rhythm, first, the melody next, is the life, the illusion of all this music, but upon it Mr. Gilbert lays patches of smouldering or flashing harmonic color or bids this instrument or that choir cut fiercely into the music. He only of American composers dares strike this barbarous note. Probably he only can strike it. Tonic and savory it falls upon many an ear. Not all music need be civilized. Not a little of it is too civilized by half. Savages bring something to it—when Mr. Gilbert, standing half-way between, is their prophet.

H. T. PARKER

Symphony Hall.

ALICE NIELSEN, soprano (Mrs. Le Roy R. Stoddard), was born at Nashville, Tenn., in 1876. Having studied singing with Ida Valerga at San Francisco, she sang in public at a very early age. She made her first appearance in operetta as "Yum Yum" in "The Mikado" at Oakland, Calif. For some time she sang at the Tivoli Theatre, San Francisco. In 1896 she joined "the Bostonians," and made her first appearance in Boston on April 27, 1896, at the Tremont Theatre as Annabel in "Robin Hood." She also took the part of Maid Marian in that opera and that of Anita in "A Wartime Wedding" that season. On September 20, 1897, she took the part of Yvonne in Victor Herbert's "The Serenade" at the Boston Theatre. On March 13, 1899, at the head of her company, she appeared at the Boston Theatre as Musette and Irma in Herbert's "Fortune Teller." In 1900 she came to the Boston Museum at the head of her own company and appeared on April 16 as Greta in Herbert's "The Singing Girl." In 1902 she was singing at the Shaftsbury Theatre, London, in "The Fortune Teller." She resolved to study for grand opera. Having prepared herself in London and in Italy, she made her first appearance as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust" at the Bellini Theatre, Naples. Later she sang at the San Carlo, Naples (Violetta), and at Covent Garden, in "Don Giovanni," "Le Nozze di Figaro," "La Bohème," "Rigoletto," etc. In 1906 she made a tour of the United States as prima donna of the Don Pasquale Opera Company.

In 1907-08 she was prima donna of the San Carlo Opera Company and appeared in 1907 at the Park Theatre, Boston, from May 6 to May 15 as Mimi, Norina, Marguerite, Rosina, Gilda. At the Majestic Theatre, Boston, in December, 1907, she appeared with the same company as Gilda, Rosina, Lucia, Violetta.

She was a member of the Boston Opera Company during its existence. She sang at the Boston Opera House in these operas:—

"LA BOHÈME," Mimi: 1909, November 11, 13, 24; 1910, February 14, November 18, December 3; 1911, February 25, March 22.

"DON PASQUALE," Norina. 1909, November 26; 1910, February 9, 19, March 11; 1911, March 17, 21.

"MADAMA BUTTERFLY," Butterfly. 1909, December 8; 1910, February 12, 28, November 30; 1911, January 28; 1914, March 14.

"FAUST," Marguerite. 1909, December 15; 1910, March 5, November 14; 1913, March 15.

are three or four such that left even Mr. Toscanini impotent.

New Music as Well

At either concert, there was also novel music. Loyal to the "new Italian symphonists," in just desert as their music steadily proves—Mr. Toscanini introduced one more of them—the Pizzetti, whom the over-zealous and fantastic d'Annunzio renamed Ildebrando da Parma, quite as though he were mediæval, not modern. The chosen pieces were three numbers set in Suite for concert-usage from the incidental music to the poet's play, "La Pisanella," of the Cyprus of the Crusades—bloody and cruel, pious and lustful, feasting and intriguing, raging and dreaming. One accompanies the rising of the curtain upon a scene by the quayside, with the merchants and the shipmen astir, the gallants observant, lounging, truculent, the serving-men running hither and thither, the sky bright, the throng noisy—and afar and alone the figure, among the bales, of the dumb courtesan banished from Pisa for her beauty. Pizzetti's music, full voiced, full bodied, harmonically rich, instrumentally

"MEFISTOFELE," Marguerite. 1910, February 21, 26, March 2, 24, December 24.
 "LA TRAVIATA," Violetta. 1910, March 19; 1911, January 7.
 "RIGOLETTO," Gilda. 1910, March 21.
 "L'ENFANT PRODIGE," Lia. 1910, November 16, December 2, 5, 31; 1911, February 8, 18.
 "CARMEN," Micaëla. 1910, December 19, 30; 1911, January 25, February 4.
 "THE SACRIFICE," Chonita. 1911, March 3, 8, 13, 18.
 "PAGLIACCI," Nedda. 1912, April 17 (with the visiting Metropolitan Opera Company); 1913, December 20 (Boston Opera Company); 1914, February 2, 13 (Boston Opera Company).
 "DON GIOVANNI," Zerlina. 1913, February 12; 1914, March 11.
 "IL SEGRETO DI SUSANNA," Countess Gill. 1913, March 18, 20, 29; 1914, February 13.
 "MARTHA," Lady Harriet. 1913, March 24, 29.
 "IL BARBIERE DI SEVIGLIA," Rosina. 1914, February 4.
 "ROMÉO ET JULIETTE," Juliet. March 4.

In 1910 Miss Nielsen became a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

She appeared at the Majestic Theatre, Boston, on October 29, 1917, as the heroine in the operetta "Kitty Darlin'," music by Rudolf Friml. The operetta was based on Belasco's "Sweet Kitty Bellairs." In following seasons she toured the United States as a concert singer.

She has sung in Boston often in concert. Her last appearance was at Symphony Hall in a concert with Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist, on May 2, 1920.

Mr. Montaux's novel numbers were the six "Indian Sketches" of Mr. Gilbert, the origins of which from early studies and early usage of this aboriginal music as supplement to lectures, have already been printed in this place. As they stand now they are work of the composer's riper years, when he can wield an orchestra in divided or in massed tone, has mastered rugged modulation, learned the secrets of reiterated and broken rhythm, can lay on his harmonic and instrumental color boldly, broadly, in stimulating fierceness of will and outcome. Now and again in his music, Mr. Gilbert's expressive and suggestive means have seemed to fall short of his imaginative and delineative design. He has wrestled and written. In the "Indian sketches, clearly, purpose and accomplishment are better matched, and in three or four of the six, he has fulfilled himself above both the "Comedy Overture" and the Prelude to Synge's peasant tragedy, "Riders to the Sea." One sketch may be dismissed as the inevitable necessity to such a Suite—the number that shall exhale gentle song in pensive mood. Mr. Gilbert calls it a Nocturne, would suggest in it night-paddling upon forest-clad, solitary rivers. Actually, he achieves hardly more than a conventionally musing, a conventionally developed and harmonized melody. At a single hearing it evokes a dutiful composer, but neither night nor civilized. Not a true... by half. Savages bring something to it—when Mr. Gilbert, standing half-way between, is their prophet.

H. T. PARKER

Symphony Hall.

ALICE NIELSEN, soprano (Mrs. Le Roy R. Stoddard), was born at Nashville, Tenn., in 1876. Having studied singing with Ida Valerga at San Francisco, she sang in public at a very early age. She made her first appearance in operetta as "Yum Yum" in "The Mikado" at Oakland, Calif. For some time she sang at the Tivoli Theatre, San Francisco. In 1896 she joined "the Bostonians," and made her first appearance in Boston on April 27, 1896, at the Tremont Theatre as Annabel in "Robin Hood." She also took the part of Maid Marian in that opera and that of Anita in "A Wartime Wedding" that season. On September 20, 1897, she took the part of Yvonne in Victor Herbert's "The Serenade" at the Boston Theatre. On March 13, 1899, at the head of her company, she appeared at the Boston Theatre as Musette and Irma in Herbert's "Fortune Teller." In 1900 she came to the Boston Museum at the

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

EIGHTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, AT 8 P.M.

WEBER

OVERTURE to "Euryanthe"

HAYDN

CONCERTO in D major for Violoncello

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro.

LISZT

SYMPHONIC POEM No. 4. "Orpheus"

RAVEL

VALES NOBLES ET SENTIMENTALES

- I. Modéré.
- II. Assés Lent.
- III. Modéré.
- IV. Assez animé
- V. Presque Lent.
- VI. Assez vif.
- VII. Moins vif.
- VIII. Epilogue: Lent.

BERLIOZ

"Romeo alone; Grand Fête at the Capulets," from the Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet,"
op. 17

Soloist:

JEAN BEDETTI

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on March 11, was as follows: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe"; Haydn, concerto in D major for violoncello; Liszt, symphonic poem "Orpheus"; Ravel, "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales"; Berlioz, "Romeo Alone and Grand Fête at the Capulets," from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

The outstanding feature of the concert was Mr. Bedetti's playing of the Haydn violoncello concerto. He exhibited an elegance in phrasing, a beauty of tone, a refinement and nobility of style which have seldom been surpassed or even equaled at these concerts. He was particularly happy in the songful adagio and the graceful rondo, where his rare qualities as a musician had ample opportunity for display.

Ravel has apparently formed the habit of orchestrating his compositions originally conceived for the piano. As piano pieces his "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales" (given yesterday for the first time in Boston in their orchestral dress) are amusing and entertaining music. In an orchestral version they lose much of that intimacy wherein lies their charm, and this in spite of the variety of orchestral coloring which the composer has lavishly bestowed upon them. Liszt and Berlioz, the great Romantics, were well represented on the program. It is well to note how much the moderns are indebted to them and occasionally pay tribute to their great and original genius. What a pity that the Handel and Haydn Society or the Cecilia does not give us a performance of the entire "Romeo and Juliet" symphony! The portion played yesterday created a desire to hear more. Mr. Monteux again proved his versatility in conducting music of various schools. The orchestra also should be complimented on the marked improvement which it has made in the last few weeks. In precision and in flexibility it is at the present time well-nigh perfect.

18TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Ravel's "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales" Played Here for First Time

BEDETTI PLAYS HAYDN CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Haydn, Concerto, D major, for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 4 "Orpheus"; Ravel, Valse Nobles et Sentimentales (first time in Boston); Berlioz, "Romeo alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets," from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Ravel wrote his waltzes for the piano and they were played. He then orchestrated them for a ballet, "Adelaide: or the Language of Flowers," which was performed. Mr. Monteux was the first to bring out in Paris (Feb. 15, 1914,) the waltzes as a concert piece, four years after the piano waltzes were composed, two years after the ballet was performed. It is not necessary to discuss the question whether this music suffers by transference from the theatre to the stage; yet it is possible that Ravel thought vaguely of a ballet in the future, as today his "Valse" for orchestra brought out as a concert piece is turned into a ballet for Vienna. Dancers are still "interpreting" music that was never intended for the ballet, and seems singularly inappropriate. Not long ago a daring young woman danced a "Philosophical Ballet," to Cesar Franck's prelude, Choral and Fugue; Debussy's "Nocturnes," Wagner's "Parsifal" and "Tristan" have been "illustrated" by scantily clad maidens skipping about in Paris. It would not be surprising if Miss Duncan's pupils should soon dance to the music of Bach's Passion according to Matthew, sacred dances, of course, yet with the customary prancing and bounding and tossing arms aloft.

When Ravel's "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales" were first played on a piano at a concert where the names of the composers were announced, the program gave the names chosen by Ravel, a saying of Henri de Regnier: "The delightful and always novel pleasure of a useless occupation." M. Cornet then inquired whether this "useless occupation" was in hearing the waltzes or in composing them; a merry quip that probably was not appreciated by M. Ravel. Mr. Rosenfeld speaks of the waltzes as "a slightly ironical and disillusioned, if smiling and graceful and delicate commentary, to the season of love." This sentence may be taken by some as a subtle description; but can music be of itself, without any program or suggestive title, ironical? If one points to the last movement of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony or the Mephistopheles section in Liszt's "Faust," the answer is: Berlioz wrote an elaborate program; Goethe's Mephistopheles was justly celebrated for his irony.

Let us take Ravel's music, as music, without gloss or commentary. Some of the pages are charming, but does not the charm consist chiefly in dexterous instrumentation, in fleeting harmonic moments, not in substantial, or even emotional musical ideas? Is there not a monotony induced by constant piquancy and continual surprises? To some of us the music has the artificiality of the ballroom, though there are suggestions, as in life, of sentimental couples, of amorous words hastily exchanged, of encircling arms for a moment after the music has died away.

The Waltzes were played with the requisite euphony—modern euphony calls for elbowing harmonies and prickling dissonances; they were played with the necessary delicacy and finesse. We have never heard a more eloquent performance of Weber's overture than the one of yesterday: there was grandiose and fiery treatment; there was the stirring expression of Weber's chivalric vein; while the reading of the free fantasia section after the unearthly pianissimo measures—and there was a pianissimo of a nature seldom heard before Mr. Monteux came to us—was singularly impressive. Even the fugato measures, which as a rule seem out of place, if not boresome, were yesterday significant. Brilliant, too, was the performance of the excerpt from Berlioz's symphony, so brilliant that the ball music no longer seemed common; while the oboe, played by Mr. Longy with his accustomed skill, was the very voice of the love-smitten Romeo.

Liszt's "Orpheus" had not been heard at these concerts for 15 years. The neglect is unaccountable, for it is free from the bombast, hifalutin, sawdust pomp that disfigure the more familiar "Tasso" and even portions of too familiar "Preludes." In "Orpheus" Liszt is more truly poetical. One should not read his preface; reading it, one might be disinclined to hear his music. The performance was effective; the different solo passages were beautifully played.

Mr. Bedetti gave a remarkable performance of Haydn's concerto; a performance distinguished for its elegance and taste; for its unostentatious brilliance. The adagio was played with a simplicity and a tenderness of expression that came from the heart of the violoncellist and touched the heart of the hearer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of March 25-26 is as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Transformation Music and Closing Scene from Act I of "Parsifal." The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, which have been trained by Dr. Davison.

SYMPHONY IN MASTER FORM AGAIN

Bedetti, Cellist, Soloist

—Shares Honors
With Monteux

BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most brilliant of the recent concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. We do not remember any performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture so stirring as that given on this occasion, a performance which resurrected the youthful and knightly spirit of Weber, the glow of his romanticism, and the supremely imaginative music—witness the middle part of the overture—which one finds in the midst of the poorest of his scores.

BEDETTI PROVES HIMSELF

Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, was soloist. He played Haydn's D major concerto, and in so doing proved himself, still a young man, not only a gifted and proficient cellist, but really a great musician. It was the afternoon of the orchestra, and Mr. Monteux, who again surpassed himself in the reading of Liszt's "Orpheus," of Ravel's witty and ironical "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales," and in the interpretation of the poignant music which Berlioz wrote in the sections "Romeo Alone; Grand Fete at the Capulets" of the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Ravel's music is more effective—it was originally composed for piano—as arranged by the composer for orchestra. The thought of Ravel is usually made clearer and more striking when he orchestrates it, for his musical thought is intimately connected with other arts than music, and the strongly contrasting, coloristic effects of the orchestra, which he handles with a magic of his own impress, his vision on the hearer as no single instrument could.

Flirting With Flowers

The programme book tells us of the performance of these waltzes in Paris to the ballet arranged for Mme. Trouhanowa, the dancer, in April, 1912. The ballet was called "Adelaide, or the Language of Flowers," "a delightful piece of early 19th century artificiality, in high-waisted frocks and turbans and puce suits and frills. Adelaide and Loredan flirt with delicious affectation in the language of flowers throughout a ball in a violently green and blue drawing room, and fall into each other's arms at last before the balcony opening onto an impossibly blue sea after Loredan, casting at her feet a sprig of cypress to tell his despair, has placed a pistol to his temple without firing it. The same amusing artificiality is in the theme, the staging, the dancing and the music."

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

This outline of the ballet seems to us to furnish a better indication of the spirit of Ravel's "Jeux d'esprit" than any critical or descriptive phraseology.

Berlioz and Liszt, fellow-sinners of a period when exaggeration of an emotional and pictorial kind was evident in all arts, supplemented each other yesterday—Liszt on one side, Berlioz on the other, of the sophisticated badinage of Ravel. Liszt has certainly written one of the best and most coherent tone-poems under the title of "Orpheus," but in moving intensity of utterance, in exquisite poetry, in dramatic blood, the music of Berlioz kindled the imagination the more. And this music could hardly have been given a more eloquent performance.

Haydn's concert was delicious to the ear. It is one of the new 'cello concertos so simple and well made, so brisk, so melodious, that the 'cello does not sound cumbersome and long-winded, or the concerto a bore. Had the music been less interesting, however, Mr. Bedetti would have distinguished it by his masterly playing.

It was playing not only of remarkable technical finish, but playing typical of Haydn's music. It had polish. It did not over-emphasize. Never once did the music, so to speak, step out of its frame. It kept the 18th century manner and the spirit of 18th century art, and we must candidly admit, in these days when all reviewers supposed to know anything speak with condescension of 18th century art, that the art of the 18th century seems to us in many respects more and more wonderful as the years go by. The full beauty, the aristocratic refinement and at the same time the bonhomie of Haydn were delightfully expressed by Mr. Bedetti, who never ceases developing in his art.

We have spoken for the quality of the orchestral performances. They were notable not only for the precision of attack and the brilliancy of the fortissimo, but for something else much more difficult to secure, and not invariably in evidence in concerts of the reorganization period of the Boston Symphony. They were notable for the fineness of the pianissimo passages, the clearness and beauty of the tone in places where it seemed a mere breath of sound, coming from so many instruments that one rubbed one's eyes. In all respects, this concert was an extraordinary tribute to Mr. Monteux's labors and the ever increasing virtuosity of an orchestra three times rebuilt in as many years. The audience testified to its appreciation by its applause.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RAVEL AND THREE CONTRASTING "ROMANTICS"

His Super-Sophisticated Waltzes for the First Time in Boston—Ironic and Mocking Pastime—Weber, Liszt and Berlioz Various and Familiarly—The Orchestra on Its Mettle and Mr. Bedetti, Master-'Cellist

FOR the most part, romantic composers from the first half of the last century engaged Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra and their audience yesterday. Had not Mr. Bedetti's solo-piece—the Concerto for Violoncello by Haydn—intruded, the conductor would have escaped narrowly the "unified" programme of Dr. Muck's day. True, upon it were the "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes" of Ravel, as yet not ten years old, and by no means in the vein or the manner of Weber, Liszt and Berlioz. With those pieces, however, Ravel might have passed as devil's advocate at this canonization, so to say, of the "romantics." The inference is that his title for his music is designedly ironical. Nowhere are the waltzes "noble" either in content or procedure; while the chemist in tones would report hardly "a trace" of "sentiment." On the very title-page, the composer's line from Regnier about "the pleasures of useless occupation" hints mocking purpose toward "nobility" as stock pose and pompous platitude, at sentiment as giddy or treacly gush. They were such in the days when "noble" waltzes were actually written—Schumann, for example, so labels one of the divisions of his "Carneval"—when truly sentimental waltzes abounded in the music-shops and strewed the pages of "ladies' annuals." They will probably remain such until human nature is born again and in new pattern; while artists of Ravel's mind and temperament will as everlastingly gird at them.

The method of this girding is, of course, musical. The habitual maker of "noble and sentimental waltzes," say in Victorian days, sought the flatulent phrase, the pulpy period. In every detail he was pink of propriety. His chest swelled, his eye glowed—or moistened—as he released himself in tones to triple rhythm. Such pieces were Jos. Sedley's music. To this day the attentive ear may hear them echoing from the pages of "Vanity Fair." Beyond mistaking, Ravel is of another mind and manner with his waltzes—in the piano-pieces they originally were, in the version for orchestra played yesterday for the first time in Boston, as the ballet they briefly became in the Paris of 1913. From dry, precise little motifs, etched in the orchestral voices, springs his music. They are too meagre to be "noble," too prosaic to be "sentimental," and so seeming to fulfil his ironic purpose. He makes play with them and, apparently, his one desire is to avoid the resounding platitudes of "nobility," the sugared stream of "sentiment." He develops a motif; for half a moment, the waltz moves straightforwardly enough. Thereafter, at every other turn a peppery modulation, a sub-acid harmonic detail, an instrumental stroke, bitter-sweet; while throughout goes an air of light sport in dexterity and sophistry.

Ravel is never insistent upon this innuendo; to be such would be that foolish thing, the striking of an attitude. He is quite content to insinuate it; and so to achieve the antithesis of "nobility" and "sentiment"—to achieve it, most of all, perhaps, in the theatre when this music as "Adelaide or The Language of Flowers," went hand in hand with a courtesan smelling tube-roses, a noble duke laying his heart and his purse at her feet in other blossoms, a sentimental youth sighing out his amorous soul in sprigs of cypress and bunches of heliotrope. In his waltzes Ravel is dry and thin; in theirs the purveyors of "nobility" and "sentiment" were watery and rotund. They sprawled and slavered when they wrote; he is exact and elegant. They retailed pompous commonplaces of procedure; he chooses to be adroitly piquant. They smiled a large and oily smile out of the sentiment in which they fondly wallowed. He lifts an ironic eyebrow and is amused—even sighs on occasion in the waltzes a pretty tonal sigh of disillusion. Admittedly altogether sophisticated sport of the composing table, of the piano or the orchestra in the concert-hall, pastime of a certain cast of mind and temperament for kindred spirits, "caviare to the general"—and thankfully as Ravel might have whispered to himself with a glint of satisfaction. But it is his custom to assume an audience—or a few in it—as sophisticated as himself and to believe at will in the answering ironic twitch. Besides, adeptness at anything—music-making in our day included—is a pleasing game.

With reason Weber, Liszt, Berlioz seemed large-minded, warm-hearted, outspoken, when they replied with the overture to "Euryanthe," the tone-poem of "Orpheus," the soliloquy and fete from the music of "Romeo and Juliet," to this devil's advocate of super-sophistication. Well at least did two of them bear the sifting years, the change of mental and emotional attitude, the shifting fashions of life and a world that breed Ravels and Ravellian music-making. Weber still strikes fire in the impetuous ardor with which his overture begins and ends, still works fantasmal illusion in the middle measures of ghostly apparition. Heats of imagination, glow of power were in him when he wrote the preludes to his three surviving operas. He knew the brilliant, the direct means. They seem flung off—and how surely!—in a single zestful hour of concentrated creation. Ravels or no Ravels, the clang, the rush, the flare of them quicken ears and stir hearts. They are of the romantic army with banners; and when it halts and Weber would sound the note of romantical strangeness, ghostly tremor still quivers through the apparition. War-horses of the concert-hall may be these Weberian overtures, but war-horses whose manes still toss, whose hoofs yet beat.

Proof against the years, the fashions, the attitudes is also Liszt's tone-poem of "Orpheus." Agreed that the design is soaring romantic convention—Orpheus's song to sound again, the music wherewith he tamed beast, lured bird, conquered Hades, softened stocks, stones and woman's heart. Agreed that Liszt might have written it as "nobly and sentimentally" as the overblown note upon his title-page forebodes. As many of his tone-poems—or at the least many a division therein—suggest, he was quite capable of grandiose pulp and platitude, even rejoiced as he made it. Liszt, however, was far better romantic executant than romantic theorist—no poet in words but once and again poet in tones. In "Orpheus" he invents melody, gains and sustains instrumental song that hardly flag through the whole course of the tone-poem. It may not be song to summon the magic, mystery or might of Orpheus—that, probably, must ever remain aural vision uncaught, super-incarnation of the whole body and spirit of music—but it is song engrossing the ear, touching the heart, awakening illusion, unfolded and diversified in abiding beauty. "Orpheus" dates from Liszt's carnal days; yet the Liszt of "St. Elizabeth" and other pietistic baggage is nowhere so celestial as in this tone-poem of pagan legend. Oftener than some will believe—overhaunted by his pomps and platitudes—Liszt knew inspiration.

Berlioz probably believed he knew it as well, was exercising it, when he wrote his symphony of "Romeo and Juliet." Not too much of the music now survives actively; as the composer said, it is the equivalent of an opera—disembodied in the concert hall; and of those fragments Mr. Monteux played yesterday all but the "Queen Mab" music. Once more, however, "the grand fete" in Capulet's house seemed musically a dull, commonplace, noisy party much needing trappings of the stage to mask it; while even the characteristic melody of Romeo's soliloquy in the garden is losing pith and pungency. The Capulets, according to Berlioz, distinctly lacked fine taste in choice of dance-rhythms; they had clear preference for din; maybe the young Veronese "jazzed"—in a mediaeval manner—at their parties. It is the virtue of Berlioz's melody to be stripped and piercing, a fine and penetrating line. Yet time in this music of Romeo is surely wearing it thin and numb. Irony and workmanship, Ravel might say with his dry smile, getter bear this sifting than romance and exuberance. 1950 may decide.

In all these pieces, from Ravel to Berlioz and back again, conductor and orchestra excelled themselves. The overture to "Euryanthe," though the stage, even in Germany, nowadays hardly knows the opera, is music of the theatre. Therefore Mr. Monteux warmed to it, made it stride, flash and glow at beginning and end, gained in the ghostly measures a quivering, expectant hush worthy of Toscanini himself. Under the conductor's design every detail in Ravel's Waltzes—and they are almost wholly detail—fell into place; while in the playing of the orchestra few passed unnoted, unfelt. Light went the mocking rhythms; there was point in the harmonic innuendo. In turn the Capulets' orchestra considerably excelled the Capulets' music, and it was not the fault of singing wood-wind or of strings throbbing beneath that Berlioz's "Romeo," musically, seemed rather a moon-calf. Best of all, however, was the orchestra in Liszt's tone-poem, since there, for the while, it regained in instrumental song the mellow depths, surface-shimmer, lustrous transparency, mingled warmth and sensibility of an earlier but vividly remembered day. To such quality—and at the cost of what care and pains!—Mr. Monteux can now on occasion bring it. Then in truth only Mr. Stock's Chicagoans rival it in American concert halls.

As Mr. Monteux has worked to this goal, so have his forces worked with him. Of what manner of men most of these hundred are, there was proof yesterday in the quality of Mr. Bedetti, master-violoncellist. Haydn's Concerto might hardly have been played with a graver richness of tone, a serener beauty of simple pensive song than he gained in the slow move ment; with a lighter bow and a brighter tone (as 'cello-tone goes) than he plied in the rhythmic give-and-take of the finale; with more exactness, elasticity and elegance upon the nearly endless figures and ornament of the Allegro. The cadenzas did but heap proof on proof of Mr. Bedetti's abilities as virtuoso. As musician equally he shone out of them since they accorded with Haydn's substance and style; while in the Adagio blended poise and poetry praised him. Not by ability only but by work the more, do these perfections come. Of such is the present spirit of Mr. Montoux's orchestra. H. T. PARKER

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO ABANDON THREE CITIES NO MORE CONCERTS IN PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, WASHINGTON— MORE AND NEW WORK AT HOME— VISITS TO NEW YORK CONTINUE

With the concert of this evening in Philadelphia, with the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Wednesday evening in Washington and Baltimore respectively, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will abandon its annual visits to the three cities. For twenty-five years, more or less, from November through March, it has given a monthly concert in each of them, almost invariably to a large, responsive, established audience. It is now foregoing these visits for three reasons—because it is finding a widening field for concerts in cities nearer Boston—in New England in general and in Massachusetts in particular; because trustees, manager and conductor are planning new ventures at home for next season and the future generally; because present fares on the railroads for a hundred men make the cost of these "Southern trips" no small charge upon the treasury of the orchestra. The circular letter sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore to announce the change, says briefly:

Owing to the increasing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the Orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual series of concerts. In appreciation of a loyalty of long standing, this notice is sent to the regular subscribers so that they may have this information at first hand.

The regular monthly journeys of the Symphony Orchestra to New York will continue as heretofore from November through March, with ten concerts in Manhattan and five in Brooklyn according to long-standing schedule. These, however, require but three working days, instead of the whole working week necessary for visits farther Southward. New York, moreover, remains the musical capital of the United States where the band deserves to be heard and where it has maintained itself through thirty years and more. Before long, the plans for new work by the orchestra at home and in New England will be announced. Surmise, rightly or wrongly, anticipates more concerts in neighboring cities, more Young People's Concerts in Boston, and a resumption of the choral concerts of Dr. Muck's final year.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

EIGHTEENTH PROGRAMME

Mr. JEAN BEDETTI, violoncellist, was born at Lyons, France, on December 18, 1883. At the Lyons Conservatory of Music he took violoncello lessons of his father. He made his first appearance in public at a theatre in Lyons when he was eleven years old, and played Davidoff's concerto. He studied at the Paris Conservatory, where he was awarded a second prize in 1901, and a first prize in 1902, when a first prize was awarded also to Mlle. Clément. Mr. Bedetti's teacher was Jules Loeb.* Mlle. Clément, a pupil of Cros Sainte-Ange, was named first. This action on the part of the jury was severely censured by leading critics. Having played in chamber-music clubs, Mr. Bedetti became the first violoncellist of the Opéra-Comique orchestra in 1904. In 1908 he was appointed first violoncellist of the Colonne Orchestra, playing in turn under Messrs. Colonne, Pierné, and Monteux. He has given recitals in French cities, also in England, Belgium, Spain, and Switzerland. Called to the colors in the French mobilization of August 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for eighteen months. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1919. He played here with this orchestra, Schumann's concerto (January 30, 1920); Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 1 (March 6, 1920); and the violoncello solo in Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, D major, Kogel's edition (April 2, 1920). Since his arrival in Boston he has played in various concerts.

* Jules Léopold Loeb was born at Strasbourg, May 13, 1852. Studying at the Paris Conservatory, he took a first prize in 1872. He became a member of the Opéra orchestra in 1873, and was afterwards the solo violoncellist at the Opéra and at the Conservatory concerts. He was a member of The Marsick Quartet and of Philipp's Society of Wind Instruments and Strings. In 1900 he was appointed Professor at the Paris Conservatory.

Soloist:

JEAN BEDETTI

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

ment; with a lighter bow and a brighter tone (as 'cello-tone goes) than he plied in the rhythmic give-and-take of the finale; with more exactness, elasticity and elegance upon the nearly endless figures and ornament of the Allegro. The cadenzas did but heap proof on proof of Mr. Bedetti's abilities as virtuoso. As musician equally he shone out of them since they accorded with Haydn's substance and style; while in the Adagio blended poise and poetry praised him. Not by ability only but by work the more, do these perfections come. Of such is the present spirit of Mr. Montoux's orchestra.

H. T. PARKER

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO ABANDON THREE CITIES

Trans. — Mch. 14, 1921

NO MORE CONCERTS IN PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, WASHINGTON—MORE AND NEW WORK AT HOME—
VISITS TO NEW YORK CONTINUE

With the concert of this evening in Philadelphia, with the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Wednesday evening in Washington and Baltimore respectively, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will abandon its annual visits to the three cities. For twenty-five years, more or less, from November through March, it has given a monthly concert in each of them, almost invariably to a large, responsive, established audience. It is now foregoing these visits for three reasons—because it is finding a widening field for concerts in cities nearer Boston—in New England in general and in Massachusetts in particular; because trustees, manager and conductor are planning new ventures at home for next season and the future generally; because present fares on the railroads for a hundred men make the cost of these "Southern trips" no small charge upon the treasury of the orchestra. The circular letter sent to subscribers in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore to announce the change, says briefly:

Owing to the increasing demand for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the vicinity of Boston, and the limited time at the disposal of the Orchestra to meet this demand, it has been decided to omit the usual series of concerts. In appreciation of a loyalty of long standing, this notice is sent to the regular subscribers so that they may have this information at first hand.

The regular monthly journeys of the Symphony Orchestra to New York will continue as heretofore from November through March, with ten concerts in Manhattan and five in Brooklyn according to long-standing schedule. These, however, require but three working days, instead of the whole working week necessary for visits farther Southward. New York, moreover, remains the musical capital of the United States where the band deserves to be heard and where it has maintained itself through thirty years and more. Before long, the plans for new work by the orchestra at home and in New England will be announced. Surmise, rightly or wrongly, anticipates more concerts in neighboring cities, more Young People's Concerts in Boston, and a resumption of the choral concerts of Dr. Muck's final year.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

EIGHTEENTH PROGRAMME

Mr. JEAN BEDETTI, violoncellist, was born at Lyons, France, on December 18, 1883. At the Lyons Conservatory of Music he took violoncello lessons of his father. He made his first appearance in public at a theatre in Lyons when he was eleven years old, and played Davidoff's concerto. He studied at the Paris Conservatory, where he was awarded a second prize in 1901, and a first prize in 1902, when a first prize was awarded also to Mlle. Clément. Mr. Bedetti's teacher was Jules Loeb.* Mlle. Clément, a pupil of Cros Sainte-Ange, was named first. This action on the part of the jury was severely censured by leading critics. Having played in chamber-music clubs, Mr. Bedetti became the first violoncellist of the Opéra-Comique orchestra in 1904. In 1908 he was appointed first violoncellist of the Colonne Orchestra, playing in turn under Messrs. Colonne, Pierné, and Monteux. He has given recitals in French cities, also in England, Belgium, Spain, and Switzerland. Called to the colors in the French mobilization of August 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for eighteen months. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1919. He played here with this orchestra, Schumann's concerto (January 30, 1920); Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 1 (March 6, 1920); and the violoncello solo in Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, D major, Kogel's edition (April 2, 1920). Since his arrival in Boston he has played in various concerts.

* Jules Léopold Loeb was born at Strasbourg, May 13, 1852. Studying at the Paris Conservatory, he took a first prize in 1872. He became a member of the Opéra Conservatory concerts. He was afterwards the solo violoncellist at the Opéra and at the Society of Wind Instruments and Strings. In 1900 he was appointed Professor at the Paris Conservatory.

Soloist:

JEAN BEDETTI

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Concerto

202

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

NINETEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 25, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68

- I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; Allegro, ma non troppo.
- II. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
- III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro; in tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
- IV. Shepherd's Song; Glad some and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

LOEFFLER,

POEM, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine)

WAGNER,

Transformation Music and Closing Scene (The Holy Grail) from Act I., "Parsifal"

Assisted by the HARVARD GLEE CLUB and the RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY, trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

203

Charles M. Loeffler
(Photo by Bachrach.)

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Loeffler's Poem Given Between Beethoven and Wagner Yesterday

COLLEGE CHORUS AID IN "PARSIFAL"

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Loeffler, Poem, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Transformation Music and Closing Scene from Act I of "Parsifal." The orchestra was assisted in the performance of Wagner's music by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, which had been well trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison.

There was a remarkably fine performance of the Symphony; the most beautiful, the most appealing we have ever heard. As a rule, this symphony is anticipated with dread: Many conductors take it too seriously, laboriously, lead it with a heavy hand; they are often unfortunate in the choice of tempi, and so the hearer is bored, not yawning visibly out of respect to Beethoven or fearing lest a neighbor may frown on him, regarding him coldly, counting him disrespectful, irreverent, no doubt a disolute person. But yesterday the Symphony was indeed pastoral, light hearted, something more than a fearsome length relieved only by the little ornithological passage in which nightingale, quail, and cuckoo are neatly imitated; at least, it is fair to suppose this: we have never heard the nightingale sing. Jean Cocteau, in his amusing little book, full of aphorisms, designed to make the bourgeois sit up, says that the nightingale sings badly. So we must not be unduly prejudiced by praise of the bird coming from Milton, Matthew Arnold and other poetical enthusiasts. Yesterday there was a thunderstorm, a tempest to use the good country term that has come down from Shakespeare and before him. How admirably Mr. Monteux interpreted this section of the Symphony, which is often a laughable little shower, hardly warranting a spread umbrella or a flight to shelter. How charming the first two movements as played yesterday by the superb orchestra! To borrow the Host's characterization of Master Fenton, the Symphony yesterday smelt April and May.

Singularly euphonic and also eloquent was the performance of Mr. Loeffler's poem, which is truly a poem, whereas certain musical compositions so entitled might be described as vers libre—too free—or as pedestrian prose. It is based, as all know, on a charming little lyric of Verlaine. There is genuine lyrical spirit in Mr. Loeffler's work, there is warmth, there is passion, an abiding sense of beauty; needless to say, mastery of technic is displayed throughout. While the music is generally lyrical there are moments when the composer in his rhapsodic plight leads one to forget the simplicity, the naivete of Verlaine's verse. If there is any adverse criticism to be made, one might say that there is at times over-elaboration; over-conscientiousness in the treatment of details. The audience was fully appreciative of the music and the performance. Mr. Loeffler acknowledged the long-continued applause.

The performance of Wagner's music impressed the audience. To some "Parsifal" is a "sacred" work, on account of the communion scene and the Good Friday Spell. As a matter of fact, the communion scene depends largely for its effect on the stage setting, the stage management and theatrical devices, such as putting the choir of boys aloft, so that their voices come as from high above—celestial voices. In the year of the production at Bayreuth, 1882, this scene was memorable, and so for some years afterward until the Widow Cosima and the ambitious young Siegfried made up their minds that they knew how "Parsifal" should be performed better than the spouse and father. The music, itself suffers necessarily when it is taken from Bayreuth and performed in an ordinary opera house. It suffers still more when it is performed in a concert hall. As a concert performance that of yesterday was creditable. At Bayreuth in 1882 we heard bells out-of-tune, if not jangled, nor was the intonation of the boys in the dome invariably pure.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Chadwick, "Melpomene" overture; Sibelius, Symphony No. 3 (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Piano Concerto in G major, No. 4 (Arthur Rubinstein, pianist).

CHORUSES SING WITH SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Assist in "Parsifal"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave its 19th programme of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony"; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" after Verlaine, and the transformation music and closing scene from act one of Wagner's "Parsifal." This scene was performed with the assistance of a chorus of male and female voices selected from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and coached for this performance by their leader, Dr. Archibald Davison, of the music department of Harvard University.

LEADER APPLAUDS AUTHOR

Astonishing was the appeal made by Beethoven's symphony to the audience. It was applauded for minutes after the performance. After many years a master symphonist's early attempt at impressionism was fresh and eloquent. The performance was sympathetic in spirit and finished in detail. The tempo of the second movement, "Scene by the Brookside," was not too slow, as it often has been. On the other hand, the tempo of the next movement was a trifle too fast.

Only the last movement seemed over-long yesterday. But over all was the great spirit of Beethoven and the very fragrance of nature.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem had also a very enthusiastic reception. From his conductor's stand Mr. Monteux applauded the composer, while the composer from his seat in the audience applauded Mr. Monteux and his men for their excellent performance, and finally rose twice to acknowledge the applause. For us this symphonic poem, after repeated hearings, is too long and too rich in ideas. There is with the musician, as well as the poet, the thought of a certain unusual form. "As the poem of Verlaine"—we quote from the programme book—"is a theme with interruption, so the musical paraphrase may be described as variants of a theme, with corresponding interruptions."

Luxuriance of Detail

This plan is followed out with notable mastery of harmonic and instrumental color, with constant ingenuity and invention, and an exquisite sense of beauty, but for us it makes the music too episodic. If such a composer as Mr. Loeffler cannot follow the form of Verlaine's poem with the most successful results in his musical structure, then we are convinced that this procedure is almost a practical impossibility in the musical art. Inevitably, there is luxuriance, and impediment, of detail. The final climax is anticipated.

The thread of the narrative becomes a little tangled. Directness of development is thus impaired.

With these important reservations—as a matter of personal opinion on the part of the writer—it may be said that Mr. Loeffler's music is of rare beauty and imagination, if not of sufficiently simple and architectural line.

Music From "Parsifal"

The music from "Parsifal" was played with glorious virtuosity by the orchestra and in a devotional spirit on the part of Mr. Monteux. The performance of the singers, while there was not the ideal tonal balance, reflected credit on the work of Dr. Davison and on the earnestness and talent of the chorus. Correct balance would be hard to get under any such circumstances. A foot of difference in the precise distance of the boys' voices—these parts being taken by women's voices—from the stage, would make a change of sonority. The men standing back of the orchestra sang rather too loudly and hence with an inevitable coarseness of tone out of place in this music. In the opera house it would not have been too loud.

The audience liked the performance. Many were deeply moved. They thought of the opera and its mystical name, and of the season of the year, and what was not in the score was in the feelings with which they listened to it. We are writing a reviewer's retrospect of a concert. This reviewer must say, in common honesty, that he has always considered much of "Parsifal" rather poor music. The music has lacked, to him, the force, the beauty, the sincerity, of other of Wagner's music dramas. The religiosity of "Parsifal" does not ring wholly true in his ears. It is too subtle and self-conscious. It is mixed up with too many philosophic qualities, as it was the product of a strangely variegated set of ideas on the part of the composer. Also, to this reviewer, there is an over-use of the same musical motives, tiresome in the concert room. He was glad to hear the last of it.

TIGHT BINDING

In the opera house an extremely impressive scene makes the music expressive if only by association. In the concert hall this music does not belong. The orchestral music of the "Good Friday Spell" would have been a hundred times better and in place.

In the first place, it is more inspired and less worked over and drawn out. In the second place, it sounds to infinitely better advantage in a hall. In the third place, there is not that crazy quilt of motives, repeated to the limit of physical and mental endurance, associated with these personages and principles on the stage. In the fourth place, the concert was too long by half an hour.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ANTICIPATION, BELIED AND ALSO EXCEEDED

Fragments of "Parsifal" Fail Under Unescapable Conditions to Work Illusion—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony Reborn in Fresh Delights—The Paradox of Mr.
Loeffler's Tone-Poem, "La Bonne Chan-son"

AS the run of the Symphony Concert went yesterday afternoon the piece and the performance that had raised expectation fell below it; while the piece and the performance that might have passed as routine excelled anticipation. Rarely is so ample a fragment of an opera by Wagner set in Symphony Hall as the "Transformation-Music" and the "Grail Scene" from the first act of "Parsifal." To the orchestra it added choirs from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, summoned for the first time to a "regular" Symphony Concert; it was boon to an operaless city; it reillumined the halo that for many an ear and imagination still circles Wagner's "consecrational festival-play." With reason, expectation rose high.

It was disappointed because, as soon appeared, such music of the theatre loses illusion under conditions of the concert-hall, however eloquently sung and played there.

On the other hand, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony is a "repertory piece" of as long standing as are the years of the orchestra. Time and again, it has come and gone in relatively routine performance—conductor and band at ease of work, audience at ease of pleasure. Once and again even such comfortable performance has been marred by too willing acceptance of ready-made conventions. It pleased Mr. Monteux to restudy this music with fresh eye and ear; to impart it for itself regardless of "the tradition;" to put the orchestra to its mettle. The outcome of this wisdom and energy was a performance that made the Pastoral Symphony bloom anew. The fanciful listener heard it—it was pleasant to believe—as it sounded a hundred-odd years ago in a Vienna to which it was "new: first time." Between Beethoven and Wagner, Mr. Loeffler, warmly applauded by a public that has long set him high, had place with "La Bonne Chanson," tone-poem to verses of Verlaine, first heard in revised version two years and more ago. Again the music made mixed impression. Not a few measures seemed over-long and over-elaborate for the poet's, if not composer's design; while as many more stirred by beauty of suggestion and power of delineation.

The fragment of "Parsifal" left anticipation unfulfilled because, in large part, the rites of the Grail depend for illusion upon unescapable and untransferable conditions of the theatre. The briefer "Transformation-Music" is, fortunately, more independent of them. It is the orchestral interlude, to which the old knight, Gurnemanz, leads Parsifal from the demesne of the Grail within the sanctuary. Of old it sounded against moving scenery; now, by common consent of opera-houses the world over, that undeceptive background is left to imagination. The music is largely, richly, sonorously written; it moves in grave progress. Within it, mystery, suspense, exaltation rise gradually until it shivers into chime of nearing bells. Throughout it approximates "absolute" music. It was well played yesterday, though Mr. Monteux, absorbed, seemingly, in detail of motif and euphony, might have piled an ampler eloquence.

Of other nature and circumstance is the music of the succeeding rite. The stage discloses the shadowed sanctuary of Holy Cup and Holy Lance, isolated shrine deep within the castle. Gaunt and time-stained frescoes look from the walls; above shines the sunlit azure of the dome; bathed in white glow is the Holy Table. Knights, esquires, boyish servitors defile in long, slow-paced line, threaded with the red and white of their mantles. The bread, the wine, pass become as the body and blood of Jesus. Holy canticles rise from knightly throats; high in the dome boys' voices make ethereal answer. There is music of solemn ceremony, holy hymn, mounting ecstasy, descending benediction. As nearly as he dared, as nearly as he could, Wagner sought and achieved a mystical operative Eucharist.

208

Within the theatre, music, action, picture make the audience like to Parsifal on the stage—moved, mystified, spectator in presence of holy rite and rhapsody. In the concert-hall, only the music engages the company—one element, even if it be the most considerable, in the whole illusion. It is heard, moreover, from an uncovered orchestra; whereas Wagner designed it for an orchestra within an enclosed pit. The change, sensitive as Mr. Monteux was to it, seems to coarsen texture and timbres. The music of ritual tends to become a music of subdued pageantry; the celestial glow, the ethereal tremor, sound less as spiritual aspiration, touched with divine benediction. Upon the stage, again, high in the dome sing youth and boys. In Symphony Hall, these voices were but set behind the platform, sounding on the same plane as the voices of the knightly choir—no doubt an unescapable procedure, yet fatal to illusion of remote and gleaming height. Throughout, the orchestra played with no little beauty and fineness of tone, at moments with loveliness of soft accent and melting euphony. Mr. Monteux was operatic conductor expert with means, sensitive to ends. The visible singers from the Harvard Glee Club, sonorous of tone, ample and rounded of phrase, precise and elastic of rhythm, struck both the chivalric and the churchly note in the canticles of the knights. The invisible singers from the Radcliffe Choral society, still a little abashed by the exacting intervals of the music within the dome, conveyed a measure of its mystical voice of bliss. Both Mr. Monteux and Dr. Davison, as leaders of orchestra and choirs, had evidently done their utmost. Through no fault of theirs enfolding, transporting illusion came not, as it usually comes in the theatre. It was absent because Wagner, to compass it, fused inextricably with the music all the factors of his stage.

Ample amends was the performance of the Pastoral Symphony. Fancy it, of all the symphonies of Beethoven, except, possibly, the Eighth, making new sensation upon a practised audience in March of 1921, a round 112 years after it came first into the world! Far was Mr. Monteux, and far he kept the orchestra, from the routine that needs another symphony of Beethoven, takes down the Pastoral, runs through it once or twice by way of preparation for perfunctory or Stranskian performance. He read it as with brightening eyes; he heard it as with kindling ears; he played it as though the composer had laid it, treasure trove, only the other day, upon his doorstep. Best of all, he comprehended it with sympathetic imagination, transmitted it with true divination.

Monsieur d'Indy may be as solemn as two owls about "the tranquillity of Beethoven's soul in the presence of Nature"; for it is the prime business of his Beethoven to be as much as possible like that same Monsieur d'Indy. Yet what is the beginning of the Pastoral Symphony but a glinting, tripping, gay-spirited operetta-tune—Beethoven lightly glad, sportively merry? Precisely so Mr. Monteux paced, phrased, rhythmized the music, and it was delight again. Lightly he subdued it as the playfulness softens into musing. Into the second movement the conductor carried this sunny, pensive mood. Not once did he cloud it with thick sentimentality; not once did he turn Beethoven, alive with quick-coming fancies, into dawdling moon-calf. The arabesques of the wood-winds smiled on the tonal web; the whole music went limpidly, songfully, in gentle sparkle. Beethoven could be homely and homely were the rhythms, the quality of tone to which the conductor animated and characterized the Scherzo. Stravinsky himself could hardly have made the piping oboe, the grumbling bassoon more individual.

Usually twentieth-century audiences listen to Beethoven's tonal thunder-shower with the smile of sophisticated condescension. Mr. Monteux, penetrating the simplicity of the composer's means, made it ominous, restless, disturbing. As he had made the first movement gay, so once the shepherd's song had been gently sung, he kept the Finale jolly. Scrape away the crust of "tradition," rub away sentimental smear, put by pious posturings—in other words, search Beethoven's score—and is not this Pastoral Symphony of Mr. Monteux the veritable Pastoral Symphony? Back to Beethoven went Mr. Toscanini with the Seventh Symphony, and there was new thrill manifold in the music. Back to Beethoven goes Mr. Monteux with the Pastoral and the music is as full of new delight. Sometimes "the tradition" is as superfluous as it is solemn.

The fifth poem, "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles," of Verlaine's slender volume, "La Bonne Chanson," is a simple little poem. Twenty short lines is the span of it; terse and bare are the words, albeit artfully joined and modulated; as direct is the imagery. The world stirs to the tremors of the dawn; the lover's heart stirs with the tremors of desire. The sun rises; shines also love. Thrice familiar course of French lyric poetry, minded to link the motions and the moods of nature with the stirrings and the sensations of love; thrice familiar inspiration, as well, to Gallic composers and composers of kindred mind and temperament. Upon these simple verses as slender foundation Mr. Loeffler has reared a complex and elaborate tone-poem. The design is the treatment of a single motif—tremor of earth, tremor of longing—in successive variation with digression here and digression there, until the whole music shall concentrate itself into climax of risen sun, into gentler postlude of amorous, expectant ardor. Fulfilling this purpose, Mr. Loeffler writes measure after measure of meditated harmonies, page after page of adroit, imaginative play with instrumental voices. Variant succeeds variant in the progress of the motif through an intricate music. A "bonne chanson" becomes almost a "grande chanson."

209

The censorious might reproach the composer with a prolix, an overweighted music. Enough to repeat that through many a moment, especially in the middle measures, it seems over-long and over-elaborate, a piece of too recondite invention and procedure. Keener upon memory, more characteristic of the Loeffler of other tone-poems, of the symphony, of the memorial string-quartet, are incidental play of imagination, incidental use of inclusive delineative means. The prelude of the tremulous world in the pallor that is interlude between fading night and flushing dawn touches beauty. The postlude of the lover's gentle, deep and quivering desire no less attains it. Flashes of detail, as in the tonal beam through the orchestra in answer to the first beam of the sun; tremors that thread its choirs like flock of morning song or rustle of dewy leaf; transitions from idyllic to amorous mood pierce the hearing ear, cut deep into answering vision or emotion. Mr. Loeffler is no maker of paradoxes, but such parts of his "Bonne Chanson" much outweigh the whole.

H. T. PARKER

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on March 25, was as follows: Beethoven, Pastoral Symphony; Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine); Wagner, Transformation Music and The Holy Grail scene from "Parsifal." The orchestra was assisted in the Wagner number by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Archibald T. Davison, conductor.

Mr. Monteux's playing of the Pastoral Symphony was one of his outstanding achievements of the season. An admirer of the most extreme modernists, playing their music with a supreme understanding, he is yet able to bring to the music of the earlier classicists a sympathy altogether remarkable. Beethoven's music has been for many years the victim of "traditional" readings. So much reverence has been paid these traditions that the real emotional content of the music has often been lost sight of. As a reaction, many conductors have introduced purely personal interpretations and readings, readings which are no more justified by the music itself than those of the traditional sort.

Mr. Monteux, to our thinking, in this interpretation of the Pastoral Symphony has succeeded in pursuing a middle course. He has in a sense restored Beethoven's music to its original state. He has, in other words, made this music live again. He has given it a life and vigor long absent from Boston concert halls. Where so many excellent points in style and interpretation are in evidence it is difficult to become particular, yet the delicate nuances of the first movement which prevented the numerous repetitions of the first subject from ever becoming monotonous, the simple grace of the andante and the piquancy and humor of the scherzo deserve special praise. In short, on hearing the symphony as played yesterday, one instinctively exclaims: "this is truly the Pastoral Symphony as Beethoven conceived it!"

It is difficult to speak of Mr. Loeffler's Poem with enthusiasm. Yet it contains many passages of beauty and true feeling. Does it really express the intimate feeling of the verses by Verlaine from which it draws its inspiration? There is certainly room for a difference of opinion. However, this does not detract from its many excellent qualities, considered as music pure and simple and apart from its literary side.

The scene from "Parsifal" became at times tiresome. In spite of all its orchestral trappings and theatrical effectiveness, it lacks the true religious fervor of Palestrina or Vittoria and their contemporaries. It is, after all, often too obvious in treatment.

Progress Acknowledged

After both the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York last week—the final pair of the season—Mr. Aldrich wrote in The Times a true and timely word about the progress of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux back to its standards before it was twice disrupted. On Friday after he had heard it in Brahms's Second Symphony, Ravel's Waltzes, the Overture to "Euryanthe" and fragments from "Berlioz's music to "Romeo and Juliet," he wrote:

Its playing epitomized the success that Mr. Monteux has had in his work so far to bring the orchestra back toward the superlative excellence it had before disruptive forces struck it. That he has wrought much improvement in its playing is evident, even though he has not yet remodeled it completely.

On Saturday, after the reviewer had listened to Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Liszt's tone-poem, "Orpheus," and Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline," he wrote again:

The orchestra has done well this season, and has gone some distance in winning back the high esteem in which it was held for so many years by its New York public. The improvement in its playing under Mr. Monteux's continued direction has made itself felt, and he and his players have found deserved admiration.

More grudgingly after the concert of Thursday, Mr. Henderson said in The Herald: "The orchestra played better in the latter part of the season than it did in the early days. Possibly it will do still better things next autumn." Strange that neither of these able reviewers noted Mr. Monteux's own progress. Like not a few of his predecessors, he grows with his work.

Items and Incidents

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, Mr. Burgin, the first violin, and Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, will both be heard in solo-pieces from Chaikovsky. They are the outstanding figures of the string choir.

Mr. Burgin, by the way, played the solo-part in Glazunov's Concerto for Violin at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York last Saturday afternoon. The Times said justly of him:

His appearance was unassuming, unpretentious; his playing was that of an unusually excellent musician, not, perhaps, in all respects of a virtuoso—it is not expected that a concert master shall step to the front from his desk and return to it, showing all the characteristics of a player devoted to the brilliancy and bravura of solo performances—but of a master of his instrument in tone and technique, wholly competent to interpret all the difficulties of the composition and quite sympathetic with its spirit. Mr. Burgin won much applause and a number of recalls.

Yesterday afternoon at the final concert for the season of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Damrosch announced the winners of the prizes—$1000 and $500 respectively—offered a year ago by Mr. Henry Harkness Flagler for pieces of symphonic music requiring no more than twenty minutes for performance and written by an American composer. The judges—Messrs. Stokowski, Chadwick, Carpenter, Kneisel and Damrosch—gave the first prize to Louis Grünberg of New York for a tone-poem, "The Hill of Dreams;" the second to Karl McKinley of Hartford for a tone-poem after Shelley, "The Blue Flower." Mr. Damrosch will include both pieces in his programmes next autumn.

Tschaikowsky Programme

A splendid programme, consisting entirely of the music of Tschaikowsky, has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for performances by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 10, at 3:30. The symphony will be the Fifth in E minor by the great Russian master. There will be two soloists at this concert—Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play the first movement of the Violin Concerto, and Jean Bedetti, the illustrious first cellist, who will be head in the Rocco Variations. The remaining orchestral numbers will be the Italian Caprice and the "Marche Slave."

On Thursday evening, with Miss Nielsen as assisting singer, the Symphony Orchestra will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge in the sixth of its current series of concerts. The programme traverses Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Weber's Overture to his Opera, "Euryanthe" and Romeo's orchestral soliloquy and the ball at the Capulets' from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." Miss Nielsen will sing two airs of Mozart—"Deh! Vieni" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti Batti" from "Don Juan."

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Journal. — April 23, 1921.
Philadelphia, the Boston Orchestra and an Attitude—Recent Comment on a Change of Policy—Harrison Potter the Promising—New Choral Pieces Impending from American Composers

SUNDRY newspapers in Philadelphia weep aloud and in public over the abandonment by the Boston Orchestra of monthly visits to that city. At length they recount the virtues and glories of the band "under Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler, Muck," but stop short at any mention of the recuperative work—large, fine and exacting—that Mr. Monteux has done. So calling the roll of conductors, they set down a Fiedler or a Paur and leave him unmentioned, though he excels either on every score, though he has outstripped them in achievement under far more difficult circumstance. Similarly these newspapers extol to the heavens the Higginsonian régime and have not a word to say of the trustees and the guarantors who saved the orchestra first from war-time extinction and then, with Mr. Monteux aiding, from dissolution under desertion. These editorial articles wallow in the "splendid record" of the band thirty, twenty, ten years ago; they string together the "bede-roll"—whatever that Philadelphian bauble may be—of ancient achievement.

In spite of these rhetorical veillings, the purpose is plain and smug and mean—to belittle the present estate, the present conductor of the orchestra. Of such from the final days of Dr. Muck to the present days of Mr. Monteux has been the disposition of many a Philadelphian, especially the Philadelphians of print. Though the orchestra bettered itself monthly in their ears, though Mr. Monteux both held and gradually drew near to the old standards, yet there were none so deaf as those who would not hear. Meanwhile they put to print, as they are putting it now, a strange verbiage, of which only the innuendo was clear, about "the signal artistic lustral period" of the orchestra, when "it meant everything for Philadelphia." With reason—business considerations aside—it is quitting a public so minded. Undisturbed by a new orchestra worthily born of an old, Philadelphia may still sleep snug—and deaf.

H. T. P.

After Many Days

One, Pierre Monteux, Is Discovered in New York as Able Conductor

THE personality of a conductor is not the foundation of an orchestra. The "prima-donna of the baton" is, in plain English, an enemy of orchestral permanence. It is impossible for any one man to keep a public in a state of excitement year after year. Yet the moment the "prima-donna conductor" ceases to excite audiences his occupation is gone. The best conductor for a term of years, as we have already intimated, is the solid and sound technician, equipped with sufficient sensitiveness and insight to give him catholicity of taste and universal sympathy. The ecstatic adorers will not become tired of his stock of revelations. . . .

Meanwhile, the writer of these lines would like to invite the attention of all concerned to the accomplishments of Pierre Monteux. No one has said sharper things about his conducting than the present writer. But only a deaf man could fail to perceive that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played very much better at its last two concerts than at its first two. Was that because Mr. Monteux has suddenly discovered the secret of conducting and become a dangerous rival of the magician from Holland?

Hardly. It meant simply that the prosaic but experienced Frenchman had enjoyed the advantage of a season's work with his orchestra, which had been reorganized in the fall. The men had shaken down into their new relations, the balance had been restored, and the conductor could get what he desired. There has, so far as this writer knows, been no celebration of the triumph of Mr. Monteux, though several old lovers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have expressed their delight. There are many differences betwixt tweedledum and tweedledee and one of them is in the power of réclame. [W. J. Henderson in The New York Herald

212

Harvard Glee Club

DR. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, Conductor

213

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTIETH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 1, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, AT 8 P. M.

KALINNIKOFF,

SYMPHONY No. 1 in G minor

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante commodamente.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro non troppo.
- IV. Finale: Allegro moderato; Allegro risoluto.
(First time in Boston)

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 58

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Rondo: Vivace.

CHADWICK,

DRAMATIC OVERTURE, "Melpomene," in D minor

Soloist:

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Harvard Glee Club

DR. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, Conductor

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTIETH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 1, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, AT 8 P. M.

KALINNIKOFF,

SYMPHONY No. 1 in G minor

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante commodamente.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro non troppo.
- IV. Finale: Allegro moderato; Allegro risoluto.
(First time in Boston)

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 58

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Rondo: Vivace.

CHADWICK,

DRAMATIC OVERTURE, "Melpomene," in D minor

Soloist:

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Arthur Rubinstein, Pianist, Came to Boston Some Years Ago as a Very Young Man and Surprised All Who Heard Him.

20TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Herald — Apr. 2, 1921

Work by Kalinnikoff Is Played for the First
Time in Boston

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN IN BEETHOVEN PIECE

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Kalinnikoff, Symphony No. 1, G minor (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto in G major, No. 4, for piano (Arthur Rubinstein, pianist); Chadwick, Dramatic Overture, "Melpomene."

Kalinnikoff's symphony, which was produced at Kieff in 1897, should have been heard in Boston long before yesterday. Why did the conductors neglect it? Is it too melodious? Is it too "light"? The audience found it most agreeable music, unmistakably Slav in spirit, yet not aggressively nationalistic. Here and there the influence of Tschalkowsky is felt, but there is no servile imitation. On the contrary, Kalinnikoff has much to say for himself. He was very poor in his early years. When he was 27 years old his future was bright; his ability as a composer was recognized; he had an honorable position at Moscow in the Italian Opera House. The next year he was "ordered South." During the remaining years—he died within two days of being 35—he composed in the Crimea and waited for the end.

It is customary to say when a composer is thus fated that his works show a melancholy akin to despair. This has been said of many in various walks of life. The fact remains that some do not thus betray physical weakness and mental perturbation. Beethoven in a most dismal mood wrote a singularly cheerful symphony. Brahms was sometimes musically in doleful dumps when he was enjoying his restaurant life in Vienna, gay in his rude manner with his many friends.

Now in Kalinnikoff's Symphony certain themes and phases of their development are tinged with melancholy, but it is not a personal lamentation, never a wail, never a shriek, as is the case with many pages of Tschalkowsky; there is no suggestion of sullen, morose despair as in pages of Brahms. There is the melancholy that so often characterizes the Russian folk song, though the words of the song may be anything but sombre. Kalinnikoff's themes are often simple, but they make a direct appeal through their honesty of sentiment and expression. He had a sense of grace and beauty. He could be ingenious in harmonic and orchestral treatment without seeming merely a haphazard experimenter. Contriving unusual effects for the Andante and the Trio of the Scherzo, he knew well what he was about. The symphony, finely played, was welcomed yesterday with more than ordinary warmth.

Mr. Chadwick's overture was composed in 1886. To use his own words, it was his purpose to typify in tones "an atmosphere of tragic poetry in general." That he succeeded in doing this is indisputable. There have been iconoclasts, revolutionaries, impressionists, anarchists in music during the last 35 years. There have been works that at the time were furiously applauded, declared "epoch-making"; and where are they today? There have been novel harmonic systems with constant experimentation in orchestral colors; much progress, legitimate and desirable; often merely a vain attempt to impress or startle by superficial means, orchestral juggling, the mere ear tickling or ear stunning of the moment. Mr. Chadwick's overture remains a noble work, nobly planned, nobly executed, with musical ideas that are inherently tragic, deeply emotional. There is Greek feeling in modern expression. In this instance the title of the work does not belie its contents.

Mr. Rubinstein, who played here for the first time with the orchestra, gave an excellent performance of the Concerto. The Andante is one of Beethoven's supreme conceptions. Its very simplicity is a stumbling block to many, the simplicity of Beethoven when he was greatest. Mr. Rubinstein's technical ability, conspicuous as it is, was not ostentatiously displayed; it served gladly the composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major for strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello concerto, No. 1 (Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem, op. 4. (First time in Boston.)

Arthur Rubinstein, Pianist, Came to Boston Some Years Ago as a Very Young Man and Surprised All Who Heard Him.

20TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Herald — Apr. 2, 1921

Work by Kalinnikoff Is Played for the First
Time in Boston

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN IN BEETHOVEN PIECE

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Kalinnikoff, Symphony No. 1, G minor (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto in G major, No. 4, for piano (Arthur Rubinstein, pianist); Chadwick, Dramatic Overture, "Melpomene."

Kalinnikoff's symphony, which was produced at Kieff in 1897, should have been heard in Boston long before yesterday. Why did the conductors neglect it? Is it too melodious? Is it too "light"? The audience found it most agreeable music, unmistakably Slav in spirit, yet not aggressively nationalistic. Here and there the influence of Tchaikowsky is felt, but there is no servile imitation. On the contrary, Kalinnikoff has much to say for himself. He was very poor in his early years. When he was 27 years old his future was bright; his ability as a composer was recognized; he had an honorable position at Moscow in the Italian Opera House. The next year he was "ordered South." During the remaining years—he died within two days of being 35—he composed in the Crimea and waited for the end.

It is customary to say when a composer is thus fated that his works show a melancholy akin to despair. This has been said of many in various walks of life. The fact remains that some do not thus betray physical weakness and mental perturbation. Beethoven in a most dismal mood wrote a singularly cheerful symphony. Brahms was sometimes musically in doleful dumps when he was enjoying his restaurant life in Vienna,

gay in his rude manner with his many friends.

Now in Kalinnikoff's Symphony certain themes and phases of their development are tinged with melancholy, but it is not a personal lamentation, never a wail, never a shriek, as is the case with many pages of Tchaikowsky; there is no suggestion of sullen, morose despair as in pages of Brahms. There is the melancholy that so often characterizes the Russian folk song, though the words of the song may be anything but sombre. Kalinnikoff's themes are often simple, but they make a direct appeal through their honesty of sentiment and expression. He had a sense of grace and beauty. He could be ingenious in harmonic and orchestral treatment without seeming merely a haphazard experimenter. Contriving unusual effects for the Andante and the Trio of the Scherzo, he knew well what he was about. The symphony, finely played, was welcomed yesterday with more than ordinary warmth.

Mr. Chadwick's overture was composed in 1886. To use his own words, it was his purpose to typify in tones "an atmosphere of tragic poetry in general." That he succeeded in doing this is indisputable. There have been iconoclasts, revolutionaries, impressionists, anarchists in music during the last 35 years. There have been works that at the time were furiously applauded, declared "epoch-making," and where are they today? There have been novel harmonic systems with constant experimentation in orchestral colors; much progress, legitimate and desirable; often merely a vain attempt to impress or startle by superficial means, orchestral juggling, the mere ear tickling or ear stunning of the moment. Mr. Chadwick's overture remains a noble work, nobly planned, nobly executed, with musical ideas that are inherently tragic, deeply emotional. There is Greek feeling in modern expression. In this instance the title of the work does not belie its contents.

Mr. Rubinstein, who played here for the first time with the orchestra, gave an excellent performance of the Concerto. The Andante is one of Beethoven's supreme conceptions. Its very simplicity is a stumbling block to many, the simplicity of Beethoven when he was greatest. Mr. Rubinstein's technical ability, conspicuous as it is, was not ostentatiously displayed; it served gladly the composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week is as follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major for strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello concerto, No. 1 (Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem, op. 4. (First time in Boston.)

SYMPHONY RESTORES CHADWICK

Post Apr. 2, 1921
Master Work Heard
After 32 Years
on Shelf

BY OLIN DOWNES

Kalinnikoff's symphony in G minor, played for the first time in Boston; Beethoven's G major concerto, with Arthur Rubinstein as pianist, and George W. Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture, made the programme of the 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Chadwick was present at the concert.

A DELIGHTFUL SYMPHONY

This was the first time Kalinnikoff had figured on a symphony programme. He was born at Woma, Russia, in 1866. He died in 1901. Why the performance of his symphony, which has been heard in many other American cities, and which was first heard in 1897, has been delayed so long, it is difficult to say. For this is a delightful symphony or should be, if the last two of its four movements are representative of the whole.

The form is conventional for the most part, but the ideas are charming. They are genuinely and characteristically Slavic, as witness the theme of the opening movement which recurs in the finale; also the main theme of the slow movement, which likewise recurs; the fascinating middle portion of the scherzo; the racial quality, from the first note to the last, of the concluding section. The symphony sails along, as lucid, dexterous as you like, following established procedure, following it with both ease and sincerity. The composer is pleasantly at home in his form. His instrumentation is clear and brilliant.

Mr. Rubinstein's Playing

Mr. Rubinstein, in turn, gave a delightful performance of Beethoven's most original and romantic composition for piano and orchestra. He was brilliant without being metallic or superficial. He was imaginative, poetic, without losing for a moment that note of underlying virility and force which is felt in the most tender passage of Beethoven. We do not remember a finer performance of the concerto in G major. Mr. Rubinstein was repeatedly recalled.

Then came what is to the writer Mr. Chadwick's greatest orchestral composition, the overture which after 35 years remains in its vein the greatest outstanding achievement of American orchestral composition. It is not merely the sounds of the instruments, as Whitman would say, which move us when we listen to this music. It is the spirit behind the instruments, the genius of the music itself. It has the feeling of Greek drama. There is felt the imminence of destiny, of terrible penalties and atonements. There is the exaltation of the moment when the puny being called man, cleansed, ennobled, majestic through knowledge, suffering and resignation, confronts calmly the high gods of his fate. This overture was written by a young man fresh from his European studies nearly four decades ago. In it are the things the race will not willingly let die.

Remarkable Workmanship

There are remarkable qualities of workmanship which, accompanying the depth and sincerity of feeling, make the music so significant today. The form, though it shows intense devotion to the classic architectural tradition, is not at all a slavish following of rules. It is the characteristic vehicle of original thought, compact but never stiff, inflexible or unsusceptible to dramatic requirements. The musical motives possess that force which impresses the idea on the hearer and engenders heat and additional strength in development. The orchestration seems the one inevitable dress of that musical thought. Nothing but the English horn and oboe could properly intone the motive, ominous and fateful, which sounds over rolling drums.

Later on the sombreness of low registers of the strings and wind instruments is suddenly set off by the wild shrill fanfare of the trumpets. Then recall the passage at the beginning of the coda, if memory serves, in which the basses stalk about with the initial motive of the allegro.

Mr. Monteux's performance was compelling in its eloquence, proportions and sweep. Hearing it, one asked with considerable wonder why this overture has not been more frequently played at the symphony concerts. The last performance at these concerts was in 1902. That is unjustifiable neglect of music which the rising generation cannot do without.

To its invincible sincerity, its loftiness of spirit, its uncompromising pursuit of a great purpose, the deepest respect, the humblest gratitude are due.

Mr. Chadwick, who was present at this performance, may very well congratulate himself on a composition which sets him apart from every other American composer of his period, and which will long remain a monument to his talent and his ideals.

RUBINSTEIN HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Plays in Beethoven's G
Major Piano Concerto

Arthur Rubinstein, the soloist, at yesterday's Symphony concert, was warmly applauded for his playing in Beethoven's G major piano concerto. His phrasing was that of a sensitive and intelligent musician. His technique is adequate, but his chief interest seems to be in giving a faithful and clean cut interpretation of the composer's intention.

The deftness and imagination that made Mr. Rubinstein's performance enjoyable, were conspicuously lacking in the orchestral accompaniment, which was unpardonably ragged and perfunctory, owing, perhaps, to insufficient rehearsal. The slow movement, especially, was marred by the failure of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra to mark and vary the accents in the tragic figure for strings in octaves which recurs at intervals.

The First Symphony of Kalinnikoff, substituted for the Sibelius originally announced, was given a spirited and intelligent performance. If not a supreme masterpiece, it is at least clever and agreeable music. Kalinnikoff at least borrows with discretion from a wide range of sources, adapting to his purpose the styles, rather than the themes, of such composers as Brahms, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The other number was Mr. Chadwick's familiar "Melpomene" overture, with which there is no fault to find except that one would rather listen to Brahms' "Tragic Overture," a far more poignant appeal to the muse of tragedy.

Next week Alwin Schroeder, the veteran cellist, admired here for 40 years as a member of the Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet, will be the soloist, in Saint-Saens' A minor concerto. The other numbers are Schubert's seldom-heard Fourth Symphony; an "Epic Poem" by Vassilenko and Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, in E major.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. Apr. 2, 1921
ONE GRAVE AND TWO EASY-GOING
PIECES

A New Chadwick Looms Large Out of His Old "Melpomene" Overture — A Bright, Eager, Songful, Fanciful Music from the Russian, Kalinnikoff—Arthur Rubinstein, Virtuoso Pianist, According to Type

IN a sense the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was a concert of surprises. It yielded, first, a light, transparent, unlabored, altogether pleasing Symphony—the Russian Kalinnikoff's in G minor—that other publics in America have heard gladly, but that conductors in Boston have hitherto overlooked. And in these days of "cerebration" and the cosmos in tones, a simple and songful symphony is a rare bird that should be promptly netted. Secondly the concert restored in the pianist of the day, Mr. Rubinstein, a virtuoso of a type now nearly vanished—of singular aspect, of individual, if not peculiar, manner, content with his own skill playing over the surface of the chosen piece. Finally, for the surprise of surprises, Mr. Chadwick's overture of the eighties, "Melpomene," was played for the first time in many years. And lo! the Chadwick of those days was composer of large mind and warm imagination, gaining grave beauty, commanding sober power—no tired juggler with new forms, new manners, the commonplace of a later day, as he has seemed too often for his own good in recent tone-poems. With reason a pleased audience gave continuous evidence of its enjoyment. From October through April there are twenty-four pairs of Symphony Concerts. Naturally, properly, many of them bring exacting music. By the same token a few of them should be easy-going. The flexible Monteux knows above most of his predecessors the virtue of variety.

In those days, a full thirty-five years ago, Mr. Chadwick would hymn the Muse of Tragedy, as Greeks and Romans knew the nine sisters, guardians of the arts—the darkling dolorous Melpomene of fate predestined, woes endured, tumults traversed, of heroic resolution and heroic resignation. Hence a music of large design and voice, moving in agitation, somberly colored, keeping always to an austere progress. There is darksome beginning as of overspreading doom and destiny; middle measures of stress, struggle, turbulent vicissitude, noble contention; an end, within the pall of fate again, but now mantle to human fortitude. The bowed heads are still proud and not unlamented. Formally, Mr. Chadwick has achieved a pervading unity of design. He has written an overture according to orthodox prescription—slow introduction, "main body" of changeful matter and mood; due climax; epilogue which is as prologue renewed and transfigured. The purists may not quarrel with him.

Fused as completely within this formal progress is the poetic, the emotional content of the piece—destiny of the high gods, brave human resolution; storm and stress, tumult and torture; fate the invincible, but fate not unilluminated. The champions of matter over manner may rest well content. Always again, Mr. Chadwick's means achieve his ends. The motifs have clear profile, individual substance, bear or develop expressive voice. The note of destiny penetrates, haunts, takes specific mood in the unfolding, at will of the composer. The clash of combat strikes large and full, drives high, shivers against the unconquerable; and, at last, by no small imagination in the transfiguring of motif, fate also pities. Throughout the darksome harmonies shadow, but never cloud, the sombre background; in the measures of strife come modulations that pierce or clang; there are contrasts of timbres—as when resistance pales, shatters upon the inevitable—that were, that remain power. A noble reticence glows through the sombre end.

And ever in the overture thrums the high heroic note. In these days, it seems, Mr. Chadwick might summon and convey deep tone of exaltation. Back to Mozart says this voice among the makers and the commentators of music in these troubled times. Back to Beethoven cries another throat. Since a place upon current programmes is counted Mr. Chadwick's due, why not back to the Chadwick of these earlier pieces—this "Melpomene"; the neglected "Adonais"; and, in another vein, the Symphonic Sketches? They far excel the tone-poems of obligation and the fashion in these, the composer's infertile years. It is the custom nowadays to turn the smile that barely misses sneer upon the "New England group" of elder composers, to count them as inconsequential as though they were Longfellows or Whittiers of minor verse. Yet hardly an American not a New Englander could have compassed the austerities—and the nobilities—of this overture of the Tragic Muse.

Kalinnikov's Symphony is a light and pleasing music. Kalinnikov, it seems, was a Russian of the generation that is now middle-aged. Tuberculosis smote him; he died relatively young; he left behind a considerable baggage—outside this particular Symphony unknown to concert-halls and opera houses in the western world, not too often heard from Russian stages.

Apparently his were the mind and the spirit that go their own independent way; while precarious health compelled him to life apart. He was not of the old Russians taking thought of Glinka and of Dargomyzhsky; he was not of the Russian nationalists, Balakirev and Musorgsky en tête; he was as far from the neurotic and super-saturated Chalkovsky, as he was from the harmonic magnificence, the instrumental splendor, the lush oriental opulence of Rimsky-Korsakov. No more is he semi-Germanized Russian in the manner of Rakhmaninov and Medtner. In a word, he was merely and simply Kalinnikov, putting to paper the music that was in him to make. The prodigious and occasionally pedantic prophets of the programme-books discover a "Russian" physiognomy in his motifs, even in a few measures of his preluding. To one and another casual hearer, yesterday, it was not so apparent. Somehow the impression did persist that any man, anywhere might have written Kalinnikov's Symphony—if he happened to be Kalinnikov.

Throughout, it is a pleasurable Symphony to hear—as clear as the day, as bright as the sunshine with only a little passing cloud, here and there, to cross, shadow and agreeably diversify it. Quickly Kalinnikov's motives flower into melodies that are as pure instrumental song, though by no means so deeply felt, as Schubert's own. He develops them fancifully; adorns them gracefully, conducts them warmly; sets them in unforced contrast; bestows artful little ingenuities upon them like the twitterings of the harp over the first motif of the slow movement, like the sparkling showers of figures dappling more stationary measures; lifts them eagerly through crescendo to climax. Con amore, wrote Kalinnikov through this Symphony; youthful ardors kindle the music; youthful candors release it; from first measure to last it is delightfully free from calculating, brooding, striving self-consciousness. Happily for Kalinnikov and his hearers, the cosmos little interested him. There was music in his heart; he set it free with his mind to guide and choose the way. Yet his were no indiscriminate youthful heats. He is selective with apt means; he is sensitive to moods. It was good to hear again a robust and hoofing, rather than flickering, fleeing Scherzo. Charm exhaled from an Andante, melancholy without Gallie sophistication. And he was very "grand," indeed, as the youngsters say, when he martialed almost all his motifs through the commingled sonorities of the Finale. Young blood is good blood when it flows so eagerly, brightly, honestly as it does through this one and only "opus"—in American concert-halls—of Kalinnikov.

Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, pianist and intermezzo of the afternoon between Symphony and Overture, is none of your professional gentlemen of this hour of Hofmann and Bauer, Kreisler and Spalding, who come to their audiences in business-like aspect and manner and in like fashion give proof of the artistry and the individuality veiled within. Rather Mr. Rubinstein is of an elder, a vanishing, and yet a perennially renewed species of virtuosi. His locks are not as the hair of other men; he wears the frock-coat of Reisenauer, Paderewski, Busoni; his face is a pale oval of singular contours; his manner has idiosyncrasy; with upturned face and closed eyes, he plays through many a measure; or a moment of meditation bows him closer to the keyboard. And all this without a trace of personal flourish, of impression sought upon an audience. Seemingly it is honest second-nature to him, virtuoso second-nature.

As virtuoso Mr. Rubinstein likewise made way through the piano-part of Beethoven's Concerto in G major—the Concerto of the brief slow movement wherein the piano sighs—at first seductive and then resigned—against strings that will not be persuaded out of mutterings. The first division is manipulation, modulation, "passage-work" to satiety, and through it Mr. Rubinstein was adept with limpid and thin, cool and crystalline tone that rippled over figure, twined into arabesque, impassive as pellucid stream. The second division was akin—were it not that Beethoven there asks a sentiment that evaded equally the chiselling Rubinstein and a perfunctory and monotonous Monteux. To the finale of sprightly pattern-weaving the pianist added tonal glint, rhythmic élan, and a lengthy, a paling Concerto was done. Probably in first and last movement there remain now no more than the surfaces Mr. Rubinstein expertly skimmed; but the Andante runs deeper than his virtuoso-shallows, and such quality, quite missed yesterday by both conductor and pianist, is the one and only reason for this Concerto in concert-halls of 1921.

H. T. PARKER

MUSIC

April 2, 1921

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twentieth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on April 1, was as follows: Kalinnikov, Symphony No. 1 in G minor; Beethoven, Concerto No. 4 for piano and orchestra; Chadwick, Dramatic Overture "Melpomene."

Although of agreeable character and containing much of interest, the program as a whole was not striking. Mr. Monteux's programs this season have contained so much that was novel that this slight falling off in interest is for that reason more noticeable. The symphony was played for the first time in Boston. It is not remarkable music. The chief theme of the first movement is characteristically Russian and there are poetic moments in the slow movement. The work as a whole, however, follows German methods of construction almost slavishly. The development of the themes is stereotyped and from the beginning it is a foregone conclusion as to what the composer will do. The symphony gave evident pleasure to a large portion of the audience. Undoubtedly it was a relief to many to listen to a composition written in such a comfortable, straightforward style, so easily understood and taxing the powers of comprehension to such a small extent.

Last week, occasion was found to speak of Mr. Monteux's admirable interpretations of Beethoven. His accompaniment to the G major concerto, as played yesterday, was an additional proof, if any were needed, of his power and authority in this connection. The piano part was played in masterly fashion by Arthur Rubinstein. This concerto has been played in Boston by many pianists in many styles, but to our mind Mr. Rubinstein's conception of the work more nearly approached the true spirit of the piece than any in the past.

Chadwick's overture still is effective music. It induces a really tragic atmosphere and the climax is moving. It was played brilliantly and with a refreshing sincerity seldom accorded an American work by a foreign conductor. Both Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Monteux have revealed to us many hitherto unsuspected beauties in the works of native composers which had been hidden from us by the often perfunctory interpretations of former conductors.

220

Mr. ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN, pianist, was born at Lodz, Poland. When he first came to the United States, in 1906, it was stated that he was then eighteen years old. Asked by a reporter of the New York Times whether he was a relative of Anton Rubinstein, he replied that there were cousins of his father's in Warsaw who were cousins of Anton, but not close cousins; he, Arthur, belonged to the Polish branch, Anton to the Russian. He further said that Lodz was not a town in which there was regard for the best music. "All my people were in trade, in manufacturing mostly, and that was their life." Showing musical instincts at a very early age, he was taken "at the age of three" to Berlin, where Joachim heard him and found that he could "transpose Brahms without the notes." Joachim interested some wealthy persons in the child, who then began the serious study of the pianoforte with Barth. It is said that he also had lessons from d'Albert and Leschetizky; that he played at Berlin at the age of twelve, for the first time in public.

Having played in the leading cities of Europe, he appeared in New York on January 8, 1906, with the Philharmonic Orchestra. He gave a recital in Jordan Hall, Boston, on March 16, 1906, when his programme included Tausig's version of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ; Chopin's B-minor Sonata, and other pieces by Chopin; pieces by Brahms, including the second volume of the Paganini Variations; and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz. A wandering virtuoso in Europe and South America, he was heard again in Boston in company with Messrs. Copeland, Ornstein, and Levitski at an Ampico Reproducing Piano concert in Symphony Hall on April 6, 1920. Early in this season with Edouard Risler he gave concerts of music for two pianofortes in South American cities.

221

A Russian Symphony, as Yet Unheard in Boston and by No Means Taxing, on Mr. Monteux's Programme for Tomorrow—Other Impending Joys

APPARENTLY the Third Symphony of Sibelius is to get no farther in Boston than the rehearsal of last Monday which finally convinced Mr. Monteux of the justice of his predecessors' objections to it. The First Symphony of Vasili Kalinnikov, which has taken its place on the programme of this week's concerts, is a piece of a different order. Kalinnikov has not tried to say something in his own way, and failed, instead, he has written very much in the manner of others, and succeeded. A glance through the score bears out in a general way both the things that have been said in praise of it and the criticisms that have been urged against it—a curious paradox in the face of seemingly opposite opinions. Writing of the first performance of the piece in Munich in 1906, the correspondent of The Musical Courier described it as "fresh, vital, radiant with melody, originality and genius." Yet to Mr. Aldrich of the New York Times, who heard it played the preceding year by the Russian Symphony Society, it was merely "an agreeable work, showing skill and taste but hardly the uncommon gifts that his compatriots seem to attribute to him." The fact is that Kalinnikov has written here with a refreshing sureness and certainty, with a ready command of fluent and even striking melody, with a fine feeling for orchestral effect and with an abundant display of scholarship, and yet one searches the score quite vainly for musical procedures that might be described as distinctly Kalinnikovian—or, for that matter, for any novel or "modernistic" touches. But after all, the symphony is not exactly new; the date of its composition is not at hand, but it was heard in Vienna as long ago as 1898—the composer was then thirty-two—and it may easily have been written some time before.

According to Rosa Newmarch's account of him in Grove's Dictionary, Kalinnikov was born in the Government of Orlov, his father was a police official, and the boy was educated in the Orlovsky Seminary, where for a time he directed the choir. To quote Mrs. Newmarch: "In 1884 he came to Moscow in great poverty, but succeeded in entering the Music School of the Philharmonic Society. He studied the bassoon, and also composition, under Ilyinsky and Blaraberg. Having completed a brilliant course at this school, Kalinnikov was appointed assistant conductor for the Italian Opera, Moscow, for the season 1893-94. Unhappily, the privations he had undergone had told on his health. Symptoms of consumption now began to show themselves, and he was ordered to relinquish work and winter in the Crimea. The remaining years of his life were devoted entirely to composition. There seems no doubt that, but for his premature death, Kalinnikov would have won high place among Russian musicians." Only thirty-five when he died, Kalinnikov left behind him a considerable quantity of music including two symphonies and various smaller orchestral pieces, incidental music to Tolstoi's play "Tsar Boris," a cantata, a string quartet and the usual array of songs and pieces for the pianoforte.

Steinway Pianoforte used

This first symphony runs in four movements. The opening Allegro moderato is orthodox in form even to a repetition of the "exposition," and the two main themes are clear and straightforward—the first with strong suggestion of Russian folk-music. The second movement, an "Andante commovente," begins placidly with a theme that is afterwards to receive a very different treatment in the Finale, while open fifths in the accompaniment impart to it an Oriental flavor, enhanced in an ensuing "Un poco piu mosso." Both themes are then developed and combined with much contrapuntal ingenuity, there is exciting progress to a "climax" and a return to the opening calm. In the Trio of the Scherzo, itself vigorous and straightforward, the music is frankly Eastern—another instance of "scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar." But in the last movement Kalinnikov is again the academic musician, showing his allegiance to the "cyclic form" of César Franck; by way of introduction he repeats in part the initial theme of the first Allegro; and the second theme of the Finale, though not a literal repetition of the songful melody of the first movement, resembles it very closely. At the end, the melody of the Andante is proclaimed majestically by the brass against a figuration derived from the main theme of the Finale itself. In summary, then, it may be said that no one who reads or hears the piece critically could reasonably doubt that Kalinnikov had either the proper upbringing or the proper instincts for a symphonist.

W. S. S.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mr. ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN, pianist, was born at Lodz, Poland. When he first came to the United States, in 1906, it was stated that he was then eighteen years old. Asked by a reporter of the New York Times whether he was a relative of Anton Rubinstein, he replied that there were cousins of his father's in Warsaw who were cousins of Anton, but not close cousins; he, Arthur, belonged to the Polish branch, Anton to the Russian. He further said that Lodz was not a town in which there was regard for the best music. "All my people were in trade, in manufacturing mostly, and that was their life." Showing musical instincts at a very early age, he was taken "at the age of three" to Berlin, where Joachim heard him and found that he could "transpose Brahms without the notes." Joachim interested some wealthy persons in the child, who then began the serious study of the pianoforte with Barth. It is said that he also had lessons from d'Albert and Leschetizky; that he played at Berlin at the age of twelve, for the first time in public.

Having played in the leading cities of Europe, he appeared in New York on January 8, 1906, with the Philharmonic Orchestra. He gave a recital in Jordan Hall, Boston, on March 16, 1906, when his programme included Tausig's version of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ; Chopin's B-minor Sonata, and other pieces by Chopin; pieces by Brahms, including the second volume of the Paganini Variations; and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz. A wandering virtuoso in Europe and South America, he was heard again in Boston in company with Messrs. Copeland, Ornstein, and Levitski at an Ampico Reproducing Piano concert in Symphony Hall on April 6, 1920. Early in this season with Edouard Risler he gave concerts of music for two pianofortes in South American cities.

A Russian Symphony, as Yet Unheard in Boston and by No Means Taxing, on Mr. Monteux's Programme for Tomorrow—Other Impending Joys

APPARENTLY the Third Symphony of Sibelius is to get no farther in Boston than the rehearsal of last Monday which finally convinced Mr. Monteux of the justice of his predecessors' objections to it. The First Symphony of Vasil Kalinnikov, which has taken its place on the programme of this week's concerts, is a piece of a different order. Kalinnikov has not tried to say something in his own way, and failed, instead, he has written very much in the manner of others, and succeeded. A glance through the score bears out in a general way both the things that have been said in praise of it and the criticisms that have been urged against it—a curious paradox in the face of seemingly opposite opinions. Writing of the first performance of the piece in Munich in 1906, the correspondent of The Musical Courier described it as "fresh, vital, radiant with melody, originality and genius." Yet to Mr. Aldrich of the New York Times, who heard it played the preceding year by the Russian Symphony Society, it was merely "an agreeable work, showing skill and taste but hardly the uncommon gifts that his compatriots seem to attribute to him." The fact is that Kalinnikov has written here with a refreshing sureness and certainty, with a ready command of fluent and even striking melody, with a fine feeling for orchestral effect and with an abundant display of scholarship, and yet one searches the score quite vainly for musical procedures that might be described as distinctly Kalinnikovian—or, for that matter, for any novel or "modernistic" touches. But after all, the symphony is not exactly new; the date of its composition is not at hand, but it was heard in Vienna as long ago as 1898—the composer was then thirty-two—and it may easily have been written some time before.

According to Rosa Newmarch's account of him in Grove's Dictionary, Kalinnikov was born in the Government of Orlov, his father was a police official, and the boy was educated in the Orlovsky Seminary, where for a time he directed the choir. To quote Mrs. Newmarch: "In 1884 he came to Moscow in great poverty, but succeeded in entering the Music School of the Philharmonic Society. He studied the bassoon, and also composition, under Ilyinsky and Blaraberg. Having completed a brilliant course at this school, Kalinnikov was appointed assistant conductor for the Italian Opera, Moscow, for the season 1893-94. Unhappily, the privations he had undergone had told on his health. Symptoms of consumption now began to show themselves, and he was ordered to relinquish work and winter in the Crimea. The remaining years of his life were devoted entirely to composition. There seems no doubt that, but for his premature death, Kalinnikov would have won high place among Russian musicians." Only thirty-five when he died, Kalinnikov left behind him a considerable quantity of music including two symphonies and various smaller orchestral pieces, incidental music to Tolstoi's play "Tsar Boris," a cantata, a string quartet and the usual array of songs and pieces for the pianoforte.

Steinway Pianoforte used

This first symphony runs in four movements. The opening Allegro moderato is orthodox in form even to a repetition of the "exposition," and the two main themes are clear and straightforward—the first with strong suggestion of Russian folk-music. The second movement, an "Andante comodo," begins placidly with a theme that is afterwards to receive a very different treatment in the Finale, while open fifths in the accompaniment impart to it an Oriental flavor, enhanced in an ensuing "Un poco piu mosso." Both themes are then developed and combined with much contrapuntal ingenuity, there is exciting progress to a "climax" and a return to the opening calm. In the Trio of the Scherzo, itself vigorous and straightforward, the music is frankly Eastern—another instance of "scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar." But in the last movement Kalinnikov is again the academic musician, showing his allegiance to the "cyclic form" of César Franck; by way of introduction he repeats in part the initial theme of the first Allegro; and the second theme of the Finale, though not a literal repetition of the songful melody of the first movement, resembles it very closely. At the end, the melody of the Andante is proclaimed majestically by the brass against a figuration derived from the main theme of the Finale itself. In summary, then, it may be said that no one who reads or hears the piece critically could reasonably doubt that Kalinnikov had either the proper upbringing or the proper instincts for a symphonist.

W. S. S.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

222

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920--21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 8, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUBERT,

"TRAGIC" SYMPHONY No. 4, in C minor

I. Adagio molto; Allegro vivace

II. Andante

III. Menuetto: Allegro vivace; Trio

IV. Finale: Allegro

FOOTE,

SUITE in E major for String Orchestra, op. 63

I. Prelude

II. Pizzicato and Adagietto

III. Fugue

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for Violoncello and Orchestra in A minor, op. 33

I. Allegro non troppo.

II. Allegretto con moto.

III. Allegro non troppo

VASSILENKO,

EPIC POEM for Orchestra, op. 4
(First time in Boston)

Soloist:

ALWIN SCHROEDER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

223

21ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Program Includes "Tragic" Symphony by Schubert and Vassilenko Epic

VIOLONCELLO PIECE GIVEN BY SCHROEDER

Herald Apr. 9, 1921.
By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; Foote, Suite in E major for strings; Saint-Saens, Violoncello concerto No. 1 (Mr. Schroeder, violoncellist); Vassilenko, Epic Poem for Orchestra, op. 4 (first time in Boston).

The Andante from Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony was for some years a favorite piece in Boston. Theodore Thomas brought it here in 1871 and it was played three times at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra within four years. The symphony was composed in 1816, but the whole of it was not heard in public until George Grove brought a manuscript copy of it from Vienna for performance at the Crystal Palace early in 1860. Yesterday the whole of the symphony was played for the first time in Boston, as far as we are able to ascertain.

Was it worth while to exhume this symphony? To modern ears there is little that is "tragic" in the work, except in the Introduction; otherwise the music is rather amiable; the Andante is frankly sentimental. The symphony is chiefly valuable for its showing a step in the development of the composer. Only in the Introduction does he strike an individual note. The other movements are hardly Schubertian except perhaps the Minuet. He had not yet caught the secret of surprising yet apparently inevitable modulations; the music is free from the peculiar and characteristic melancholy, nor is there the careless spontaneity of the great melodist of the after years. Schubert was only 19 years old when he wrote this symphony, which was beautifully played; one appreciated the performance even when the music seemed commonplace.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for reviving Mr. Foote's Suite. The revival was more than a compliment to a Boston musician; the pleasure in hearing the music was more than parochial pride in the success of a fellow townsman. This Suite would be heard gladly in any city; not merely because it is by an American. The Prelude, skilfully constructed, is in form both classic and romantic, charmingly melodious throughout. Then comes the second movement, Pizzicato, with a tender episode, now wistful, now reassuring, an admirable contrast to the capriciously plucked strings. "Capriciously"? The word may be misleading. There are pizzicato movements in which the composer too evidently aims at surprising the hearers and trapping their applause. Mr. Foote's Pizzicato persuades one that he could not have thought of this music in any other way. After this movement applause was so hearty, so genuine that Mr. Foote was obliged to acknowledge it. The Finale is a fugue, not too scholastic; not too long drawn out; music that holds the attention while it commands respect.

Vassilenko of Moscow supplied no program for his "Epic Poem." A biographer has said that it shows the composer's "taste and talent for mediaevalism which receives support from a profound knowledge of modal and church music." This may all be, but the chief impression made by the Poem is that it pictures hard and desperate fighting. The musical ideas are not striking; the instrumentation is heavy. The Poem, an early work of the composer, who was born in 1872, is middle-class German rather than Russian. As far as it is concerned, Vassilenko's name might be Mueller and Chemnitz or Elsieben his dwelling place.

Mr. Schroeder must have been greatly pleased, deeply affected by the whole-souled tribute paid him by audience, conductor and orchestra after his performance of Saint-Saens's concerto, which still holds a high place in the literature of the violoncello. Mr. Schroeder joined the orchestra in 1891. He has been before the public as a violoncellist since 1875. During all these years he has served his art faithfully and honorably. It is not too much to say, that while his excellent qualities have been appreciated in cities of this country and of Europe, he is here peculiarly at home; he is a Boston institution. Young in heart, receptive, not disturbed or perplexed by changing and novel forms of musical expression, he is still in the stage of artistic maturity. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week comprises Vaughn Williams's "London" Symphony; Arthur Shepherd's Fantasy for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist), and Tschalkowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia.

SYMPHONY RESTORES OLD WORK

Schubert's 4th Played;
Schroeder, 'Cellist,
Soloist

Poet

Apr. 9, 1921

BY OLIN DOWNES

Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony in C minor, No. 4, was played for the first time as a whole in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The two Schubert symphonies which figure in the standard repertory of the orchestra are of course the 9th and the 10th symphonies in C major and B minor. The others are seldom heard and are commonly accounted negligible and immature manifestations of Schubert's genius.

A VERY VITAL WORK

On the contrary, this fourth symphony is a very vital work. First of all, it is much more concise than the great symphony in C major, and although in the early work, developments of ideas are not as rich and as varied as they are in the C major symphony, there is a directness of expression and a coherence of structure fitting well the dramatic and melancholy character of the work.

The symphony is of a piece. It is not a string of four movements put together in a shambling way by a composer whose ideas came out too fast for him to whip them into proper shape, as often happened with Schubert. The instrumentation is somewhat immature, a little blocky, a little of first one group of instruments and then another.

Charm in Melodic Passages

On the other hand, there are inspired places where Schubert uses the one inevitable instrument for an idea, as only he knew how to use it in a way that could not be learned, and always there is adequate sonority and appropriate changes of color for different passages. There are unforgettable melodic passages, as witness the principal melodies of the slow movement and the characteristic charm of the middle section of the minuet, one of the countless pearls of melody always dropping from Schubert's sleeve.

But above all there is the powerful mood of the symphony. The audience greatly enjoyed the symphony. It was moved by this simple, songful work, with an almost childish and naive instrumental scheme, with no idea on the part of the composer that he was doing a wonderful thing.

Mr. Schroeder, the Master

Alwin Schroeder, a veteran of the orchestra, a member of the former Kneisel Quartet, and intermittently of the Boston Symphony since 1891, stepped from his seat in the ranks and played his solo—the Saint-Saëns A minor concerto, played it with the wisdom that years bring, and that nothing else but years and experience of life may bring; with the mental grip and mastery of a master of many great performances, with a rhythm that ruled, with a cantilena never sentimental, yet superbly expressive and capable of transforming trivial passages into expressions of significance.

He was applauded long and loudly, after which he modestly returned to his seat in the orchestra.

Arthur Foote's Suite

It was a pleasure to hear again Arthur Foote's melodious and admirably written E major suite for string orchestra, op. 63. It is music written in a spirit of true modesty, in which ideas are treated felicitously, and not pretentiously, for what they are worth.

The instrumental dress is simple, as befits the substance of the music. The music is artistic in form and finish, in workmanship, and it gave much pleasure.

The composer was several times called to his feet to accept the thanks and appreciation of the audience.

Vassilenko's Epic Poem

An Epic Poem for Orchestra by Sergei Vassilenko was played for the first time here. It has an imposing introduction, like a gloomy medieval castle in a painting by Roerich, in which a thundering old religious chant is heard. This is heroic, sombre, and, on the whole, magnificent. Then there is much orchestral pother, leading to the complete announcement of a savage, war-like theme. One catches now and then a savor of that great wind which blows across the Russian steppes and through the pages, for example, of Gogol's "Taras Bulba." Yes, there is here the germ of a truly epic, medieval Russian symphonic poem.

Unfortunately, the flight is not sustained, and the instrumentation is swollen and almost throughout very noisy. The climax is reached almost at once, therefore there is no climax. Would there were. Would that that grim old chant might have grown upon us and reached its apotheosis through battle music, and gathered force till the very earth trembled under it. But it is not easy to write a symphonic poem. A composer must be as great as his theme. Few composers may match in their scores the spirit of Taras Bulba.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Apr. 9, 1921
BACK TO SCHUBERT; FORWARD TO FOOTE

Sentiment and Music in Mingled Flow—
Mr. Monteux Resurrects a Piece from 1816 and Another, Quite as Ancient, in the Big Bow-Wow of the Nineties—A Parisian and a New Englander for Livelier Pleasure — Compliments to Mr.
Schroeder

SENTIMENT and music flowed freely at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon in pleasant stream of entertainment. There was sentiment for Mr. Foote, the composer, at pause and at the end of his Suite for Strings happily revived by Mr. Monteux. The audience so enjoyed the Pizzicato movement that it called the composer from his seat. It so enjoyed the whole piece that it bade him rise again. In fact, it would not have done until it had brought the orchestra also to its feet. Conductor and string choir had played the Suite well, with bright, transparent, plastic tone; each movement had sounded in characteristic pace, rhythm, quality; often the blended or parted voices had been agreeably shaded. None the less the music was not such as to test the finest mettle of the band any more than was Kalinnikov's Symphony, a week ago, when the audience of Friday insisted upon like tribute to the performance. On both occasions the music had pleased it much; because of that pleasure it seemed to infer that the orchestra had achieved some rare feat of virtuosity; whereas it had done with the piece merely what any band of its abilities should do. It may excel itself, as it has done more than once this season, in novel and highly exacting pieces; but if the music failed to stir hearers, the performance has gone unacknowledged. Some day some one will write a little book, "The Philosophy (sic) of Applause." It should be an amusing monograph—of lively human interest.

Sentiment flowed again over Mr. Schroeder, violoncellist in the orchestra, and usually at the first desk, since 1891, less an occasional interval. For the first time in ten years he was invited to play the solo-part of a Concerto in the regular course of the concerts. Modestly he came from his place to begin; as modestly he returned to it when he had finished. Mr. Monteux set chair for him; Mr. Burgin replaced it; Mr. Bedetti who shares his music-stand, shook him warmly by the hand; the men of the orchestra were quick with sincere friendly applause. Equal was the good will of the listeners, some of whom had known Mr. Schroeder while he was a young man newly come from Germany. It was two or three minutes before the clapping made room for the music; as many were the recalls of reward. Had the violoncellist been no familiar figure, high in the regard of hearers, he would have deserved these plaudits. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor was the chosen piece—a continuous music through which the solo-voice threads in unsentimentalized song, polished "figures," reticent ornament-work of a composer designing clearly, proceeding dexterously and surely, using measure in all things. Discerningly Mr. Schroeder played, pliant of bow and fingers in pattern-weaving; clear, round, flowing and just of tone in sustained song; sensitive of accent, light of stroke always—the performance of virtuoso and musician in whom quiet poise is now the harvest of the years.

As the music of the day went, the elder and familiar composers had much the better of it. Since a Concerto for Violoncello still remains a part of the whole duty of music-making, Saint-Saëns's piece may pass for a model in kind. Writing continuously, he avoids the division into three compartments—one to display the 'cello in expanding motiv and diligent figuration; one to reveal it in sustained melody; one to set it capering—and sometimes squeaking—apace. Writing with discretion, he neither sugars the song nor turns the capering grotesque. Writing lightly, artfully, he does not overtax the form, the instrument, the patience of the audience. Writing elegantly, he is fanciful with motiv and mechanism, apt with euphony and transition, flowing, unobtrusive always. A model Concerto, indeed, full of French discernment of the fitness of things—one that will bear repetition quite as well as Haydn's, Dvorák's, Lalo's, Schumann's. And—to dare boldly—there might be relief from this recurring round. Elgar has lately written a Concerto for Violoncello; it has given pleasure to audiences in England; it can be bought they say—it might be profitably heard as well, in America.

In kind, Mr. Foote's Suite, overpassed for eleven years at the Symphony Concerts, returned similar satisfactions. The design is modest—no more than a brief, concise music for string orchestra in three divisions, with an interlude of quiet song in the midst of pizzicato playfulness. Mr. Foote is simple of form—a Prelude running short course from a single motiv reticently developed; the Pizzicato and the Adagietto aforesaid and as unlabored; a miniature Fugue that ought to be in the handbooks of composition, because it is at once so clear, terse and well-gaited. Everywhere Mr. Foote is economical. He strives not to shape motifs. Fittingly they come at his bidding. He does not exhaust them in development, preferring to choose only the best that his material may yield. A quiet skill plays through the Suite finding the clear means to the desired end, touching it, besides, with a quiet reticent fancy. Charm as well as dexterity please in the shadings of the Prelude; the Pizzicato is playfulness for the sake of sport, not show; the Adagietto has the gentle grace of the like measures in Bizet's music to "L'Arlesienne"—the fragrance of remote things remembered; the Fugue is mirror to happy inventions. Again, like Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene" the other day—though in different quality—a New Englander's music, cool, clear, circumspect, choice.

The younger composers of the afternoon were a certain Franz Schubert, aged nineteen in the Vienna of 1816, and one, Sergei Vassilenko still living in Moscow, as the programme-book noted with the precaution of the interrogation point that might plausibly be the symbol of present Russia. This Franz Schubert had written a Symphony in C minor which "in entirety" was played for the first time at the Symphony Concerts. Often—say on twenty occasions apiece—his Unfinished Symphony and his Symphony in C major have been heard there. Perhaps for that reason, conductors, a little weary of such alternate repetition and believing some of their hearers like-minded, have quested among Schubert's earlier Symphonies. Dr. Muck chose for resurrection the Fifth, in B flat, and over a dozen years recollection still resents the thin, unfertile, uncharacteristic music. Mr. Monteux pitched upon the Fourth in C minor, labelled "Tragic," and for no discoverable reason in the content. Throughout, it is a light, airy, fluent music much more in the manner of Mozart, Haydn—and many a minor Viennese composer—than of Schubert in the masterpieces of the swiftly ripening years.

An Andante, of old played by itself, is presumed to halo and perpetuate this Tragic Symphony. It contains frank, flowing, suave and songful periods; it contrasts with them more restless measures, as a hint of a frequent procedure in the maturer music; occasionally a modulation suggests the imagination that is intuition; occasionally Schubert prefers a vivid instrumental voice to assembled choirs, countering one another. Inevitably the listener hears the Andante retrospectively, fancies he detects these tokens of a later Schubert; yet his reason tells him that he might find almost every one of these omens on the crackling pages of some other Viennese composer, dust these hundred years? Nearly all else in Schubert's Symphony is workaday according to the time and the fashion descended from Mozart and Haydn. The grave sonorities, the large modelling of the introductory measures hark back to the "greater" Mozart. The Minuet, in spite of a few chromatic touches, is Haydn-like in simple tune and contrasts. The two Allegros are quick-spirited, straightforward, deft and smiling music-making in the prevailing mode. In 1921 we read Schubertian touches into them, as in a disposition to modulation or instrumental color not quite conventional. Probably a Viennese audience of 1816, had it heard the symphony, would not have thought twice of either. Yet withal a cheerful music in spite of resurrection, retrospect and other "funeral baked meats."

Vassilenko's "Epic Poem," heard also for the first time in Boston, is as conventional as Schubert's Tragic Symphony, though the particular convention to which it conforms is quite different. The earlier convention prevailed over the end of the eighteenth century into the nineteenth; the later convention stretched, say, from 1890 through 1910. Less rather than more the Russians practised it in comparison with the Germans, the French and other makers of music. Everyone who frequents orchestral concerts was long since saturated with both matter and manner. The largely shaped, deeply voiced beginning; a first division choppy and turbulent; a second division sustained and songful; a third and last division in which these motifs and moods struggle for mastery, ascend to resounding climax, fall away into drab silence. The manner is chromatic; the counterpoint runs in thickly woven strands; the trowel is often an implement of contrast; the instruments move en masse in patches of color and blunt strokes. Set on a cosmic title—"Epic Poem," "The World Well Lost," "From Blackness to Bliss," "The Riddle of Life" and the deed is done. Of course each con-jurer with these conventions makes play with individual tricks, but Vassilenko's are neither many nor salient. Occasionally, in the blending or the parting of the instrumental voices, in a passing harmonic suggestion, he achieves a workmanship of his own. Once at least—in the gaunt and sombre introduction, striding through an ancient chant, come personal imagination and illuding power. They flash only to fade and the rest proceeds in fuss and formula. If Mr. Monteux and many another like the species, by all means let us hear a masterpiece in it—say "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss.

H. T. PARKER

BOSTON NOTES

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-first of this season's programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Friday afternoon, was as follows: Schubert "Tragic" symphony No. 4, in C minor; Foote, suite in E major for string orchestra, op. 63; Saint-Saëns, concerto for violoncello and orchestra in A minor, op. 33; Vassilenko, epic poem for orchestra, op. 4.

The highlight of the afternoon was the spirited performance of Mr. (in Boston)

Foote's suite, which was played by this orchestra for the first time 11 years ago. The suave prelude and adagietto and the neatly-managed pizzicato are interesting enough to deserve more frequent hearing, while the fugue is so admirable in design and (as played with magnificent feeling for the pace of the rhythms and the contour of the phrases yesterday) so exciting in performance that one would not have been astonished if here and there a listener had cried out his delight. A less contained audience, surely, would have done so. As it was, the composer was brought to his feet twice by the heartiness of the applause.

Alwin Schroeder's masterly 'cello playing is an old story now for Boston concertgoers, a story that is yet ever new, for however often one hears the song of his instrument in the orchestra ensemble or in solo passages, one does not cease to rejoice in the taste, flexibility and firmness of his tone. Never, one felt, has he played better than in the Saint-Saëns concerto, music that seeks slight emotional appeal, but which gives large play to the intelligence of player and listener.

The Schubert symphony held a considerable interest for the scholarly in music, at any rate. Whatever one thinks of its intrinsic merits it is right that it should have been at last performed as a whole at these concerts. The Vassilenko poem with its martial sonorities and consistent employment of the whole orchestra was pleasant to hear, and even stirring in the occasional passages that conveyed a hint of inspirational quality. The orchestra, surely, did it full justice.

Soloist:

ALWIN SCHROEDER

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, violoncellist, was born at Neuholdensleben, June 15, 1855. He at first studied the pianoforte with his father Karl, a conductor and a composer of operas (1823-89), and with his brother Hermann; afterwards he took lessons of J. B. André. Later he took violin lessons of de Ahna in Berlin, and lessons in theory with Wilhelm Tappert. In 1871-72 he played viola in the Schroeder Quartet; his three brothers were the other members. He abandoned the violin for the violoncello, which he studied by himself. In 1875 he entered Liebig's Orchestra as first violoncellist. He was a member in like capacity of Fliege's Orchestra and of Laube's in Hamburg. In 1880 he joined the Gewandhaus Orchestra, Leipsic, as the successor of his brother Karl, who went to Sondershausen as chief conductor. He was in Leipsic a member of the Petri Quartet, and he taught in the Leipsic Conservatory of Music.

Mr. Schroeder came to Boston as the solo violoncellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1891; at the same time he joined the Kneisel Quartet. He resigned his position in the orchestra with his Quartet co-mates at the end of the season of 1902-03. With them he afterwards made New York his dwelling-place until the spring of 1907, when he resigned from the Quartet and moved to Frankfort-on-the-Main. His farewell concert in Boston was on April 25, 1907. Returning to the United States late in the summer of 1908, he was the violoncellist of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet until it was disbanded at the end of the season of 1909-10. He rejoined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1910 and left it in the spring of 1912. He joined the orchestra again in the fall of 1918.

E. Hoffmann (Violin); J. Hoffmann (Violin)

(Photographs by Colby)

S. Gerhardt (Viola); G. Gerhardt (Double Bass)

Sons Follow Fathers Into the Symphony Orchestra

By Unusual Coincidence Two Fathers and Two Sons, as Specified Above, Are Playing Together, This Season, at Symphony Hall.
Probably No Other Orchestra in America Contains Two Such Pairs.

232

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 15, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, AT 8 P. M.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, A LONDON SYMPHONY

I. Lento; Allegro risoluto

II. Lento

III. Scherzo (Nocturne:) Allegro vivace

IV. Andante con moto; Maestoso alla marcia; Allegro;
Maestoso alla marcia; Epilogue: Andante sostenuto

SHEPHERD

FANTASIE for Pianoforte and Orchestra
[First time at these Concerts]

TSCHAIKOWSKY

OVERTURE-FANTASIA "Romeo and Juliet."
(after Shakespeare)

Soloist:

HEINRICH GEBHARD

Steinert Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

233

HEINRICH GEBHARD

MODERN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Sheperd's Fantasy for First Time—Gebhard Soloist

Post

Apr. 16, 1921

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vaughn Williams' London Symphony was repeated after a first Boston performance given some weeks ago, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Arthur Sheperd's Fantasy for piano and orchestra was played for the first time in Boston, with Heinrich Gebhard as pianist, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture brought the end.

GENUINE MUSIC OF A CITY

Williams' symphony gains, and does not lose, by repetition. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave a surpassingly brilliant performance. This reviewer was able, not unnaturally, to find more in the work than he found when he first heard it. It is highly original and imaginative. It is genuine music of a city, in that it has both the exterior stir and bustle and the more profound and recurrent pulse of a great centre of life. It has, in addition, a racial melancholy, characteristic, one believes, of the English temperament.

The second movement, which seemed at a first hearing overlong, and perhaps is, has, nevertheless, that which De Quincey felt when he wandered about forlorn and silent streets of London town. Most impressive was the climax of the dramatic final movement, and the epilogue, harking back to the poetic introduction of the dramatic final movement, and the sounds of the city heard from afar off, the flowing river, the striking of Big Ben. Again one notes in this symphony the influence of Strawinsky and of modern Frenchmen, but it is an influence, not a determining factor in the makeup of the work. The composer retains his sincerity and individuality. He is sufficiently master of himself to utilize this and that device in a way to intensify the effect of his ideas.

Sheperd's Fantasy Liked

Mr. Sheperd's fantasy received a very enthusiastic greeting from the audience. There was a hearty and long-continued applause, craning of necks to look at the composer, a composer who neither seeks nor enjoys publicity, and who has shunned at all times in his career the slightest superficiality by which he might have made a quick momentary appeal. The fantasy, as explained in the programme book, is based on three themes, and is roughly after the Dondo form. Of these three themes the third, the most lyrical, has also, in the abominable parlance of professional music-makers, the most "juice." It is poetically employed, and it is matter for a sweeping apotheosis at the end. Also, it is over-orchestrated at this place. The earlier themes are more nimble but also more dry. The humor is to us a little sour—not merely sardonic, fanatical, but sour. The piano part is brilliant, very difficult, and, one would say, not too grateful to the player, and too frequently overbalanced by the orchestra.

Inclined to Academic

At a first hearing the exposition of the first two themes was inclined to the academic. Later the composer lets himself go. Well, he could have begun earlier. There is a certain constraint, a certain feeling of corners. We wish Mr. Sheperd would write more, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say we wish he played more, so that he could gain greater ease and perspective on his own work. We believe that in that case he would throw half this fantasy away, reorchestrate the other half, add a little fresh development to work it of required length, and find himself with a handsome concert piece on his hands.

The "Romeo and Juliet" overture would be worth a journey if only to hear Tschaikowsky's love music. Here is the incomparable expression in tones of the southern passion of Juliet, and it is strangely Shaksperian. The remainder of the overture is rather rank Russian, with the exception of the music of Friar Laurence and the noble requiem at the end.

Tschaikowsky Underrated

But always there haunts the memory that sensuous love theme, and the gorgeous orchestral coloring, the purple and gold with which it is decked out—decked out, as one might say, for the final tragedy. Tschaikowsky, yesterday overrated, is today underrated. He should be heard more often at the Symphony concerts.

It is easy to point to his coarseness, his howling and groaning. Once let him become possessed of an emotion, and there are few modern composers whom he does not leave behind. His intense feeling, his childlike naïveté found their way into his music. Listening to it one forgets its dross; one is moved past politenesses or reservations. One calls this man "brother."

22D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Apr. 16, 1921

Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" Is the Feature of Program

SHEPHERD FANTASY HEARD FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Vaughan Williams, A London Symphony; Shepherd, Fantasy for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist); Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet;" Overture Fantasia (after Shakespeare).

The London Symphony will bear many repetitions. The impression made by it when it was produced here last February was yesterday enlarged and deepened. The music might have been frankly panoramic, it might have been a variant of Elgar's "Cockaigne," but Vaughan Williams, as other music of his has proved, while he is sufficiently realistic in this symphony, while he reproduces the roar and the din of the streets, is imaginative and emotional. The Thames is more to him than a convenient river for commercial purposes; he expresses in tones the loneliness of now shabby, once fashionable and frequented districts, as if he had been inspired by reading "Tales of Mean Streets," his bustling London is also stony-hearted; he hears the bitter cry of outcast London and reproduces it in tones without undue sentimentalism. And he might have put as motto to this most impressive work a sentence from Thomas Decker's apostrophe to the city uttered over three centuries ago: "Thou hast all things in thee to make thee fairest, and all things in thee to make thee foulest." The man that has written the mysterious introduction of this symphony, expressed loneliness and tragic shabbiness in the second movement, the cruelty of the great city in the finale, is more than an accomplished musician; he is a rare poet in tones.

Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy, played at these concerts for the first time, has excellent measures and measures that are ineffectively noisy. The opening arouses pleasurable expectation. The thematic material throughout is salient; but the treatment of it is often confused. The music is modern in its harmonic schemes, but the instrumentation is too often injuriously thick. Nor is there throughout the work a fine sense of proportion in dynamic values, or a due regard for contrasts. Mr. Gebhard played well, as is his habit, but he and the composer's intentions suffered frequently from the crushing orchestration. Mr. Shepherd was in the audience and acknowledged the applause.

We well remember the sensation made by Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" when it was brought out by Mr. Nikisch. It was one of his battle horses. His treatment of the passage in which the horns wall in syncopation against the Love Theme, perhaps the most original and the most emotional measures in the overture, stirred all hearers. He left us; other conductors put the overture on their programs; but not till yesterday, under Mr. Monteux's leadership, did this section give the old thrill. Much of the overture has grown old and seedy; the introduction now seems interminably drawn out; the constant repetition of insignificant phrases—the tossing of them about to various instruments—a favorite trick of Tschaikowsky's—distract the attention of the hearer and break the continuity of the dramatic-musical flow.

The performance of the orchestra throughout was of the highest order. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony; Stuart Mason, Rhapsody on a Persian Air, for orchestra with pianoforte obbligato (first performance); Milhaud, Orchestral Suite No. 2 (first time in America); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

GEBHARD SOLOIST IN SHEPHERD'S FANTASY

Pianist Plays With the
Symphony Orchestra

Williams and Tschaikowsky Pieces
Fill Out the Program

Heinrich Gebhard played the solo part in a new fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra by Arthur Shepherd at yesterday's Symphony concert with the skill and taste which long since won him many admirers in this, his home city. Since Mr. Shepherd was for many years connected as student and teacher with the New England Conservatory, his piece had also a local interest. Friendly applause compelled him to rise in his place in the audience and share the credit with Mr. Gebhard and Mr. Monteux.

The fantasy was originally entitled "Fantaisie Humoresque," a designation fully warranted by the whimsical rhythms of much of the music. It is adroitly written, sprightly and solemn by turns, in an individual modern style. The performance did full justice to the music.

The listener found no reason yesterday to change his previous unfavorable opinion of Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," first played earlier in the season. Its orchestration is clumsy, there is no trace of melodic inspiration, no sign of constructive power. A certain harmonic gift is this composer's entire stock in trade. He has nothing else in common with the true great.

Debussy, Stravinsky and all their great predecessors in the history of music have the gift of inventing new and distinctive melodies. Vaughan Williams, in default of it, is reduced to fragments of street songs and other borrowed or meaningless bits of tune. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra galvanized the huge mass of notes into a semblance of life, and were rewarded for their pains by prolonged applause from about one-tenth of those present.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the other number on an exceptionally uninteresting program, has at least several genuinely original tunes in it, and considerable imaginative power.

It is akin to Verdi rather than to Berlioz, Debussy and Mozart, vigorous without refinement.

For next week, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program of far greater interest. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, novelties by Stuart Mason and Darius Milhaud and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" should make a concert as attractive as most of those under his conductorship have been.

MUSIC

Christian Science Monitor

April Boston Notes 16, 1921.
BOSTON, Massachusetts

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on April 15. The program was as follows: Vaughn Williams, A London Symphony; Arthur Shepherd, Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet."

The "London" symphony was given for the second time this season. This second performance was more than justified for it brought forth many new and interesting points in the symphony. A work of such large conception must be heard many times before an adequate idea of it can be obtained. Curiously enough the parts which created the most striking impressions at the time of the first hearing proved to be the least interesting. The beauty of the work as a whole, however, is undoubted and the selection of any particular parts for praise or blame would be to record impressions which are purely personal. The performance was thoroughly sympathetic.

Arthur Shepherd's fantasy was played for the first time at these concerts. It is difficult to describe music of this character. The composer is quite evidently of serious intent. There are well-constructed pages; occasional happy effects of orchestration; a few moments of lyrical expressiveness. Yet the work as a whole left us cold. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist. He played with evident admiration for the composition and must be praised for his conscientious performance of it.

Mr. Monteux gave an admirable reading of Tschaikowsky's overture. For all its theatricalism it is still appealing when interpreted as it was at yesterday's concert.

238

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Irano. — Apr. 16, 1924

REPETITION, REVIVAL—AND ALSO NOVELTY

Vaughan Williams's Music of London Deservingly Heard and Applauded Anew—
Chaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" After Six Years—The Russian in the Ears of 1921—Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy for Type and Moral

FOR a composer, admittedly out of the fashion and by some called moribund, Chaikovsky has fared well of late with the Symphony Orchestra. Last Sunday his music filled a whole concert; yesterday afternoon the final number was his Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; soon his pieces will dapple the programmes of The Pops. Beyond doubting, the workaday public hears him gladly, though, by more than one sign of Sunday, it may not care for him through two hours on end. As plainly many a frequenter of the Symphony Concerts is not displeased to find a piece by Chaikovsky on Mr. Monteux's lists. That conductor has been more generous to him than either of his immediate predecessors. Mr. Raubaud would have none of the Russian's music; Dr. Muck added to distaste for it, distrust of himself with it. Mr. Monteux, on the other hand, plays Chaikovsky well. Often he seems to visualize the piece in hand; almost always he can find in it tang of the theatre; he takes Chaikovsky at his word in directness, even obviousness, of effect.

The conductor, as he should, spared not in the music of strife and brawl that recurs in the tone-poem of yesterday; he wrung as much as he might out of the love-music, though as voice of passion, it is far inferior to that bestowed by Chaikovsky in another Fantasia upon Paolo and Francesca of Rimini. Mr. Monteux did more, however, than make the obvious emphatic; he caught and conveyed the note of mystery that winds through many a measure as though these loves of Montague for Capulet were as spell predestined and unconquerable, laid upon both by fate. Such fatality touches a transitional passage here and there; Mr. Monteux did not overlook it; while so doing he restored to a fading music, occasional color of imagination. Last Sunday again, he was as penetrating and communicating with the fantasmatic quality of the Scherzo-Waltz in the Fifth Symphony, with the moodiness that makes the Slavic March racial expression as well as racial glorification. And the orchestra—perhaps any orchestra—plays Chaikov-sky zealously. Not for nothing in the Fifth Symphony may the first horn publish the song of the slow movement, or the strings lead it in glowing return. The square-cut sonorities of the Finale are an easy orchestral eloquence; even the snapping rhythms of the Italian Caprice, common as they are, spur the assembled virtuosi. Blessed be effects, designed or spontaneous, so long as they be obvious. Orchestras and audiences both crave them.

The Chaikovsky that has faded and withered wrote many a measure of "Romeo and Juliet." However ears heard it twenty or thirty years ago, bettered taste and widening view have dried the music of strife into commonplace stuff, recurring to weariness. Most Russian composers—Musorgsky excepted—seem repetitious; but while others, like Rimsky-Korsakov, vary the repeating, Chaikovsky renews obvious and sometimes tricky means. To ears, again, of 1921, the love-music neither plumbs the depths nor scales the heights of passion. It is of Chaikovsky, in a limbo of striving, imagining intensities for which he hardly finds full expression, missing the inspiration—there is no other word—which, when it really kindles him, makes him irresistible still. In "Romeo and Juliet," it comes only in the music of a love that is mysterious spell predestined. Then it is at finest; the hearer heeds not the manner of saying; the emotion, the illusion sway him, as, doubtless, they swayed the composer.

To write enduringly Chaikovsky seems to have needed almost a demoniac possession. The slow song of the Fifth Symphony is such outpouring. If ever music was written because it swelled within the composer and swept away every barrier to release, it is this Andante. Hence beauty, power, permanence, recurring human response. So also come into tonal being the bleak and carking desolation, the black and suffocating despair, the sheer spiritual annihilation of the Finale of the Pathetic Symphony. From inspiration, yet again, springs the love-music of the tone-poem of Francesca, Paolo and Dante. In yet other voice, albeit in less degree, it winds through the fantasmatic movements—the Scherzo-Waltz, the Allegro of the ghostly drum-beat—in the Fifth and the Sixth Symphonies. It is such visitation, present or absent, recurring, upspringing, that sets the best of Chaikovsky, as in the cited passages, so far from the worst of Chaikovsky—as in the trumpery street-tunes of the Italian Caprice, the march movement of the Pathetic Symphony. Therein only a frenzy of rhythm, a fury of unloosed sound may save him—and not to all judges—from mere din.

Between these extremes are likewise two Chaikovskys—he who was labored and dul-

239

at mere music-making as in the Rococo Variations for violoncello; he who could summon the power that sends the orchestra striding superbly through the final measures of the Fifth Symphony or that sweeps the piano through the great chords that martial the flaming melody of the familiar Concerto. In turn the melody of the Russian points these contrasts. He may drench it with the beauty of longing as in the Andante aforesaid; he may wing it with power as in the introduction to the Piano-Concerto; he may permeate it with singular and penetrating suggestion—some call it obscenity—as in the first movement of the Pathetic Symphony. Yet again and it is the obvious—sentimentalized, tricked out almost beyond Puccinian powers. No wonder Chaikovsky—so mettled, so enduring the passage of the years, teases conductors, puzzles hearers, sounds antiquated, seems perennial, is neither altogether alive nor quite dead, now holds, again wearies, the public ear. Place, however, he does keep and may long keep on orchestral programmes. Through glowing moments inspiration or something near to it did come to Chaikovsky and down wind blow tricks and triteness.

To this revival from Chaikovsky—"Romeo and Juliet" had not been heard in Boston for six years—Mr. Monteux mated Arthur Shepherd's Fantasy for Piano and Orchestra, hitherto known hereabouts by private performance only and praised as it seemed yesterday, beyond actual desert. Mr. Gebhard played the solo-part, with understanding and sympathy, with impeccable skill and such compass of tone as circumstances permitted him. Mr. Monteux was as well disposed with the orchestral voices. There were plentiful plaudits at the end; the composer, sought by curious eyes, rose to acknowledge them. By these tokens, piece and performance will pass as "successful." Yet, almost steadily, the music left impression of the dryness, the neutrality, the "middle grayness" that beset so many American composers of both the elder and the younger generations. Mediocre may be too harsh a word for them and their music. Lack of individuality better describes—the more because it is a negative phrase—their pervading quality. They miss distinctive imagination, they yield no personal flavor, they almost never depart from those twin bourgeois blessings, safety and sanity; they are too discreet to fall low—or to rise high. Beside them, our few composers with a clear flame of their own—a Loeffler, a Carpenter, a Gilbert, a Bloch—gain by sheer contrast a merit, perhaps beyond their actual and enduring worth. Individuality is the zest of the arts. In them, safety is the dullest of virtues.

To write these things is not to reproach Mr. Shepherd's Fantasy beyond the degree of its kind. It is a well-made piece, articulated in short divisions, each flowing into each and everyone by workmanlike device, maintaining the unity, advancing the cumulation of the whole. The harmonic background sets off and diversifies the progress and the development of motif and melody; the instrumental coloring often gives pleasure, utilizes, without quite embracing, modern ways with tonal speech; sundry thick and unwieldy measures aside, the voices of piano and orchestra are well balanced. Everywhere through the Fantasy plays the schooled skill of a considerate craftsman.

Mr. Shepherd knows the routine of his job; invention, imagination, emotion with it are another thing. With the best will in the world, it is hard to find the three motifs whence the Fantasy springs either interesting or individual. In varying degree, dry they are in statement and dry in progress and amplification. Workmanship interlaces or contrasts them, distributes them between orchestra and piano, draws this, that or the other suggestion from them. But where do they or all this process touch the listening imagination, impart more than obvious mood, stir responsive emotion, hint that Arthur Shepherd, making music, is of other mind, spirit, outlook, than a hundred more makers thereof? Once and again for a passing moment comes a personal stroke, but the rest, the considerable rest, seems neither more nor less than a music of dry competence, no more individual, significant or pleasurable than a working journalist's daily stint when it happens to be a good article. Competence may do the work of the world, but hardly the work of the arts therein.

Deserved repetition of Vaughan Williams's London Symphony, as the outstanding and abiding novel music of the year, filled the other half of the concert—in more eloquent and plastic, if not in more rugged performance than it has hitherto received and at last to eager interest and tense applause. It was good to see an audience so engrossed and stirred, since little symphonic music of recent years is freer from rhetoric and device. The composer works with bare hand, with eye fixed on the object of his vision—the life, the aspects, the spirit of London that have awakened in him sensation and creation. From inner impulse and not from composer's working will seems to spring this London Sympathy. Before music so generated and produced, the hearer takes little thought of method and means. So fused are the matter and the manner, the substance and the form that structure and procedure seem only the flow into expression of thought, mood, sensation. Few modern symphonies begin in such sombre and mysterious splendor; few end in a rarer music of austere brooding. In both there are depths as well as surfaces. Night as well as dawn may brood upon Williams's city. Between goes a manifold London—first in ardent rhythmical and melodic tumult; again in the melancholy and the pity of the gray quarters haunted and shrivelled by decay; once more in the din of jiggling, squeaking, snarling slum only a little mist-softened; finally in the thud and grind, the mockery, the seeming hate of great cities upon those who may not master their way through them. Again not merely surfaces, but also depths. A city has entered into Williams's imagination and possessed it. He pictures its life, he summons its spirit; yet is there a symphony. In our day music has done few such feats.

240

H. T. PARKER

The London Symphony Anew?

Possible Repetition at the Symphony Concerts

AS plausible report goes, Mr. Monteux is considering a repetition of Vaughan Williams's London Symphony in the course of the Symphony Concerts through April. With reason the conductor sets it high in the music of our time; believes that better acquaintance with it only deepens the pleasure that it yields; finds in it matter that new performance and new hearing are sure to ripen. It is safe to say that many frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are like-minded. The London Symphony impressed them beyond any new music of the year. They remember in it much that they would gladly know afresh; they anticipate from a repetition much that at first hearing inevitably escaped them; they trust that Mr. Monteux's present "consideration" will become favorable decision. After all, the public of the Symphony Concerts that welcomes the new things, the fine things, of music in this immediate day deserves—once and again—to be humored.

Arthur Shepherd's New Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow-

Trans. — April 14, 1921

PERHAPS never before in the history of the Symphony Concerts has music by American composers appeared with such regularity as in Mr. Monteux's recent and prospective programmes. Since the first of March compositions by Gilbert, Carpenter, Loeffler, Chadwick and Foote have all been heard, and, now, this week comes Arthur Shepherd and next Stuart Mason. For a while Mr. Monteux seemed indifferent toward our native music, but he has now made ample reparation. Mr. Shepherd's piece is a Fantasia for piano and orchestra, first played two years ago at a concert of the New England Conservatory, with Mr. Lee Pattison as the soloist. It was then rewritten and produced last November by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Shepherd is now the assistant conductor. In Cleveland the piano-part was taken by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, to whom the piece is dedicated, and he will be the soloist in the forthcoming performances here. So far as the prominence of the solo instrument is concerned, it may be said that the Fantasia is not a concerto in the older sense of the word, nor yet is it a piece for orchestra with pianoforte obligato as, for example, d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," or Loeffler's "Pagan Poem."

In other words Mr. Shepherd has found a golden mean between these two extremes. In glancing through the score the prevailing impression is of the composer's economy of musical material. From an introductory motive of ascending fifths, repeated a fourth higher and followed by a cadenza for the solo instrument, is evolved the principal theme which, with a cantabile motif two measures in length, holds sway for the first thirty-two pages. A broad, essentially lyric theme then makes its appearance, first in the orchestra, then repeated by the piano. Music in the character of a Scherzo follows with the lyric theme constantly in the background. There is a return to the first subject, a succeeding slow movement based on the songful theme, a division marked "maestoso molto e ben cantando," in which the same melody predominates. The piece ends with a spirited coda derived from the opening fifths. Mr. Shepherd has written skillfully, but not dryly, his orchestration is well made and effective; the piano part, though difficult and complex, is essentially grateful, and the music as a whole is resourceful, seemingly spontaneous and not without touches of humor.

W. S. S.

241

MR. HEINRICH GEBHARD was born at Sobernheim, near Bingen-on-the-Rhine, July 25, 1878. As a boy, he studied with the leader of a military band. He came to America when he was ten years old, and studied the pianoforte and theory with Mr. Clayton Johns. On April 24, 1896, he gave a concert with orchestra in Copley Hall, when he played Schumann's concerto and other pieces, among them a sonata of his own for pianoforte and violin. In 1896 he went to Vienna, where he studied for three years with Leschetitzky, the pianoforte teacher, and took lessons of Heuberger in composition.

Returning to Boston in the fall of 1899, he made his first appearance as a concert pianist in November, giving recitals in Steinert Hall November 16 and 27, and playing Beethoven's Concerto in C minor with a cadenza of his own at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, in November. Since then he has given many recitals in Boston and other cities. He has played at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston the pianoforte part of the following works:—

- 1901, April 20, Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor.
 - 1903, April 18, Richard Strauss's Burleske (first time here).
 - 1905, January 21, Converse's "Night and Day" (first performance).
 - 1906, February 10, D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air.
 - 1907, November 23, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" (first performance).
 - 1908, March 14, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem."
 - 1912, March 2, Liszt's Concerto in A major, No. 2.
 - 1917, February 9, Franck's Symphonic Variations and Strauss's Burlesque.
 - 1920, March 12, Grieg's Concerto in A minor.
- Mr. Gebhard was for four seasons pianist of the Longy Club (1900-01—1903-04). He has played many times with the Kneisel quartet and other chamber clubs in Boston, New York, and other cities. He has played the pianoforte part of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, with the Pittsburgh Orchestra in Pittsburgh, and the New York Symphony Orchestra in New York. He has assisted in the production of other works besides those mentioned: César Franck's Symphonic Variations (Jordan Hall Orchestral Concerts, Wallace Goodrich conductor, February 28, 1907); Fauré's Quartet in G minor, Op. 45 (Arbos Quartet, March 28, 1904); Loeffler's Deux Rapsodies for oboe, viola and pianoforte (Longy Club, December 16, 1901).

sensation. Few modern symphonies begin in such sombre and mysterious splendor; few end in a rarer music of austere brooding. In both there are depths as well as surfaces. Night as well as dawn may brood upon Williams's city. Between goes a manifold London—first in ardent rhythmical and melodic tumult; again in the melancholy and the pity of the gray quarters haunted and shrivelled by decay; once more in the din of jiggling, squeaking, snarling slum only a little mist-softened; finally in the thud and grind, the mockery, the seeming hate of great cities upon those who may not master their way through them. Again not merely surfaces, but also depths. A city has entered into Williams's imagination and possessed it. He pictures its life, he summons its spirit; yet is there a symphony. In our day music has done few such feats.

H. T. PARKER

The London Symphony Anew?

Possible Repetition at the Symphony Concerts

AS plausible report goes, Mr. Monteux is considering a repetition of Vaughan Williams's London Symphony in the course of the Symphony Concerts through April. With reason the conductor sets it high in the music of our time; believes that better acquaintance with it only deepens the pleasure that it yields; finds in it matter that new performance and new hearing are sure to ripen. It is safe to say that many frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are like-minded. The London Symphony impressed them beyond any new music of the year. They remember in it much that they would gladly know afresh; they anticipate from a repetition much that at first hearing inevitably escaped them; they trust that Mr. Monteux's present "consideration" will become favorable decision. After all, the public of the Symphony Concerts that welcomes the new things, the fine things, of music in this immediate day deserves—once and again—to be humored.

Arthur Shepherd's New Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—

Trans. — April 14, 1921
PERHAPS never before in the history of the Symphony Concerts has music by American composers appeared with such regularity as in Mr. Monteux's recent and prospective programmes. Since the first of March compositions by Gilbert, Carpenter, Loeffler, Chadwick and Foote have all been heard, and, now, this week comes Arthur Shepherd and next Stuart Mason. For a while Mr. Monteux seemed indifferent toward our native music, but he has now made ample reparation. Mr. Shepherd's piece is a Fantasia for piano and orchestra, first played two years ago at a concert of the New England Conservatory, with Mr. Lee Pattison as the soloist. It was then rewritten and produced last November by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Shepherd is now the assistant conductor. In Cleveland the piano-part was taken by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, to whom the piece is dedicated, and he will be the soloist in the forthcoming performances here. So far as the prominence of the solo instrument is concerned, it may be said that the Fantasia is not a concerto in the older sense of the word, nor yet is it a piece for orchestra with pianoforte obligato as, for example, d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," or Loeffler's "Pagan Poem."

In other words Mr. Shepherd has found a golden mean between these two extremes. In glancing through the score the prevailing impression is of the composer's economy of musical material. From an introductory motive of ascending fifths, repeated a fourth higher and followed by a cadenza for the solo instrument, is evolved the principal theme which, with a cantabile motif two measures in length, holds sway for the first thirty-two pages. A broad, essentially lyric theme then makes its appearance, first in the orchestra, then repeated by the piano. Music in the character of a Scherzo follows with the lyric theme constantly in the background. There is a return to the first subject, a succeeding slow movement based on the songful theme, a division marked "maestoso molto e ben cantando," in which the same melody predominates. The piece ends with a spirited coda derived from the opening fifths. Mr. Shepherd has written skillfully, but not dryly, his orchestration is well made and effective; the piano part, though difficult and complex, is essentially grateful, and the music as a whole is resourceful, seemingly spontaneous and not without touches of humor. W. S. S.

MR. HEINRICH GEBHARD was born at Sobernheim, near Bingen-on-the-Rhine, July 25, 1878. As a boy, he studied with the leader of a military band. He came to America when he was ten years old, and studied the pianoforte and theory with Mr. Clayton Johns. On April 24, 1896, he gave a concert with orchestra in Copley Hall, when he played Schumann's concerto and other pieces, among them a sonata of his own for pianoforte and violin. In 1896 he went to Vienna, where he studied for three years with Leschetitzky, the pianoforte teacher, and took lessons of Heuberger in composition.

Returning to Boston in the fall of 1899, he made his first appearance as a concert pianist in November, giving recitals in Steinert Hall November 16 and 27, and playing Beethoven's Concerto in C minor with a cadenza of his own at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, in November. Since then he has given many recitals in Boston and other cities. He has played at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston the pianoforte part of the following works:—

- 1901, April 20, Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor.
 - 1903, April 18, Richard Strauss's Burleske (first time here).
 - 1905, January 21, Converse's "Night and Day" (first performance).
 - 1906, February 10, D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air.
 - 1907, November 23, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" (first performance).
 - 1908, March 14, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem."
 - 1912, March 2, Liszt's Concerto in A major, No. 2.
 - 1917, February 9, Franck's Symphonic Variations and Strauss's Burlesque.
 - 1920, March 12, Grieg's Concerto in A minor.
- Mr. Gebhard was for four seasons pianist of the Longy Club (1900-01—1903-04). He has played many times with the Kneisel quartet and other chamber clubs in Boston, New York, and other cities. He has played the pianoforte part of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, with the Pittsburgh Orchestra in Pittsburgh, and the New York Symphony Orchestra in New York. He has assisted in the production of other works besides those mentioned: César Franck's Symphonic Variations (Jordan Hall Orchestral Concerts, Wallace Goodrich conductor, February 28, 1907); Fauré's Quartet in G minor, Op. 45 (Arbos Quartet, March 28, 1904); Loeffler's Deux Rapsodies for oboe, viola and pianoforte (Longy Club, December 16, 1901).

242

Mr. Shepherd came to Boston in 1892. He entered the New England Conservatory of Music, where he studied the pianoforte with Charles Dennée and later with Carl Faelten; harmony with Benjamin Cutter; counterpoint and composition with Percy Goetschius, later with George W. Chadwick. He was graduated in 1897. Returning to the West, he made his home in Salt Lake City, where he taught the pianoforte and conducted an orchestra in a theatre for six years, also the Salt Lake Symphony Orchestra. In 1906 he won a Paderewski prize with his Overture Joyeuse. Returning to Boston in 1909, he was engaged by the New England Conservatory of Music to teach the pianoforte, harmony, and counterpoint. In 1909 he won with "The Lost Child" (poem by J. R. Lowell) the prize offered for the best song by the National Federation of Music Clubs, and also with his sonata, Op. 4, the prize for the best pianoforte composition. In 1912 he won a prize with a work for chorus and orchestra. In Boston he conducted the Musical Art Society for three years, and in 1917 he was conductor of the Cecilia Society. He left the New England Conservatory in 1920 to make his home in Cleveland, where he is assistant conductor and chorus-master of the Cleveland Orchestra now ending its third season. He also teaches there the pianoforte, harmony, counterpoint, and composition.

243

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 22, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 23, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in C major "Jupiter" (Koechel No 551)

- I. Allegro vivace.
- II. Andante Cantabile.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

STUART MASON,

RHAPSODY on a Persian Air

(First time at these Concerts.)

(Piano part to be played by the Composer.)

MILHAUD,

SECOND ORCHESTRAL SUITE

- I. Ouverture.
- II. Prelude et Fugue.
- III. Pastorale.
- IV. Nocturne.
- V. Final.

(First time in America)

DUKAS,

SCHERZO, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice,") (after a ballad by Goethe)

Chickering Pianoforte used

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Stuart Mason's Rhapsody.

The Disturber of the Peace

(Photograph by The Musical Courier)

Darius Milhaud, Parisian

Whose Bold and Brave Orchestral Suite Was Played for the First Time in America at the Symphony Concert Yesterday

23D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald - Dec. 23, 1921
Delightful Performance of "Jupiter" Symphony
Is Given

MILHAUD SUITE IS INTRODUCED

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, "Jupiter" symphony; Stuart Mason, Rhapsody on a Persian Air (first performance); Milhaud, orchestral Suite, No. 2 (first performance in America); Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after Goethe).

There was a delightful performance of Mozart's Symphony. Especially noteworthy was the manner in which the Andante was sung, while the Finale, which still excites admiration for the marvellous skill shown in the construction, was played with inimitable clearness, sense of proportion in the treatment of the voices, and a brilliance that is now as characteristic of this orchestra as is its euphony.

Mr. Stuart Mason's marked ability was recognized some months ago when his composition for violoncellos was brought out at a concert of the Boston Musical Association. It is not extravagant to say that his Rhapsody on a Persian Air entrances by beauty that is inherent and not merely suggested by the exotic air, which serves as the theme for the many-colored improvisation. Mr. George Moore said in his arrogant, if not impudent, "Confessions of a Young Man," that Thomas Hardy chose country subjects to show how jolly country he could be. Mr. Mason does not attempt to be more Persian than the Persians, nor does he try to portray the Orient in a composition comparatively short. The air itself is certainly oriental, but he does not therefore endeavor to improvise as a Persian might be supposed to do; he improvises as a thoroughly-grounded musician, who, in addition to his technical equipment, is endowed with that rare gift, imagination. Nor does he rely on ear-tickling or surprising use of instruments in combination; his music has substance, as well as "atmosphere," a word abhorred by purists when employed in this connection. The Rhapsody was warmly received by the audience, and Mr. Mason, who played the obligato piano part, was heartily applauded.

We remember that when Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was first performed at a Symphony concert in Boston, it shocked the hearers. A leading critic did not hesitate to characterize Strauss as a madman. We remember that when Cesar Franck's Symphony was first played at a Symphony concert in Boston, Mr. Gerloke was reproached for putting it on a program, and the writer of one indignant letter described the symphony as "immoral." What will be the fate of Milhaud's Suite? Mr. Monteux was courageous in producing it, but we thank him for acquainting us with the work of a man who is the subject of hot discussion. The orchestra showed courage in playing the music. One might add that the audience showed courage in hearing it to the end. Many of the pages in three of the movements were undoubtedly cacophonous, as we all now understand cacophony, but there is method in the madness of Milhaud, if he is really the insane one, and not the hearer. Even in these defiant pages there are moments that compel respect. One of his admirers has said that he wished in one movement to parody the classic fugue. Parodies in music are usually dull, not humorous. This fugue seemed not only dull, but disagreeable. On the other hand, there is genuine beauty in the Pastorale and the Nocturne. The objection to the Suite, if the question of cacophony be waived, is that in its best estate it is characterized chiefly by cleverness, and cleverness in art is not the highest quality. The audience behaved remarkably well during the ordeal, and was the better prepared to enjoy the superb performance of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the season, is as follows: Franck, "Symphony in D minor;" Bloch, "Winter-Spring" (first time here); Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

AMAZING MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post — Apr. 23, 1921
Milhaud's Daring Suite and Mason's Rhapsody Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

The audience which attends the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, on Friday afternoons, is perhaps less demonstrative than a Paris crowd of long-haired musicians, and yet there was a hiss or two when Darius Milhaud's composition, bearing the harmless title, "Second Orchestral Suite" was played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In Paris, when it was first performed, Oct. 24, 1920, there was such an uproar in the galleries that they had to put the disturbers out, but perhaps one hiss in Boston equals many in Paris. Anyhow, there was audible hissing, dead silence by a majority, joyous applause by a minority, among them a critic or two.

DARING AND ADROIT

Darius Milhaud was thus heard for the first time at these Symphony concerts. Works by him for smaller aggregations of instruments than those of the orchestra have been heard in Boston, but they have not seemed so remarkable, so upsetting, at least, as the music heard yesterday. Milhaud is the ring leader of a group of some six in Paris, a group which includes Eric Satie, a group which looks on Debussy and Ravel apparently as masters of an already bygone era.

It was Milhaud who composed the music, based on Brazilian tango tunes, for the one-act farce by Jean Cocteau, "Le Beauf sur le Toit," a human marionette farce which burlesqued dry America, in which a policeman is beheaded with an electric fan, and all performers wear big head masks.

Every Part Significant

Provided with the above information the writer expected nonsense in the music of Milhaud. He must confess that he likes this music very much. No fool could write it. The definiteness and certainty of it is felt all the time. It is not, however, music for the nursery or the too respectably inclined. Its humor is often Rabelaisian. Its originality is engrossing, its daring intoxicating. The potency of every motive is amazing, and only equalled by the potency and significance of every part of the orchestra. For every part of the orchestra is in itself alive, self-engrossed, as it often seems antagonistic to or careless of the other instrument. Yet there is relation. There is basic bombogeneity. Things go sailing along in several keys at the same time. These several keys keep each their parallel distance to each other, the various instrumental groups retaining, as it were, each an individual orbit of its own, while preserving its tonal distance from each of the other groups.

This sounds fantastical, nevertheless it is true. And Milhaud's humor is enough to make the tears roll down your cheeks. Elsewhere a sigh or a howl turns into a laugh. There is often the sensation felt in reading certain tales of de Maupassant or the Russians, reading which tales you choke, not knowing whether to collapse in laughter or dissolve in grief.

Mr. Mason's Rhapsody

Another work was heard for the first time at this concert, and it did not lose interest even in the shadow of the sardonic, revolutionary genius of Milhaud. This was the "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" for orchestra, with pianoforte obbligato by Frank Stuart Mason of this city. He has been intrigued by Persian themes in a collection of Woollett themes which have served Mr. Mason as suggestions for other compositions. He has taken one of these as basis for his Rhapsody, which really smells of the East. At least the East of incense and legends.

This composer has a very keen and exotic sense of color. His music is positively sensorial, as some one once remarked of the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, saying that one tasted it on his tongue. The old Persian theme suggests to Mr. Mason sounds not explained in the text books. It sets his orchestra quivering with 100 old rhythms and haunting sonorities.

Composer at Piano

Some will say that the piece is too kaleidoscopic, that it lacks sufficiency of outline, that occasionally a phrase creeps in not wholly congruous with the prevailing Orientalism of the work, and that there is modern French influence. With the last reservations we partially agree. For the rest—allowing for the fact that Mr. Mason is a young man yet to wholly reveal himself—is it not time that a composer confidently follow his fancy? Does a Persian melody ask for a form after accepted models? We would not have it so. We think the fantastic color and design of this score delightful. It shows, too, Mr. Mason's admirable technical grounding in his art, his instinct for orchestral timbres, his fancy which carries him far from the junction of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues.

The composer played the piano part and was called from the orchestra to acknowledge the applause. Let us be thankful for an American and a Bostonian whose imagination is not confined to his village square.

These compositions made the middle of an exhilarating programme. But the opening performance of Mozart's C-major symphony—of all works to precede such music as that of Mason and Milhaud—cannot be forgotten. It was one of the finest we ever heard. The justness of the tempi, the tonal beauty of the orchestra, the Mozart feeling, could hardly have been excelled, though they were fully equalled in technical brilliance by the wonderful interpretation of Milhaud's music and the fantasy of Mr. Mason.

The concluding performance of Dukas' crackling scherzo, composed only yesterday, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after Goethe's poem, was also a triumph for Mr. Monteux and his men. But how old and commonplace was this music, too, by the side of Milhaud!

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Massachusetts — At the twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the following program was presented on Friday afternoon: Mozart, symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Stuart Mason, rhapsody on a Persian air for orchestra with pianoforte obbligato; Milhaud, Second Orchestral Suite; Dukas, scherzo from "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Mr. Monteux, as conductor, brought all the skill and taste of his mastery of French music to the preparation of the Mozart symphony, with an exquisite performance as the result. The scherzo from "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" glowed with new fires at this performance, so thoroughgoing had been Mr. Monteux's evident restudying of the piece. One is tempted to call the unified shimmering evocation in the first violins of the sound of a rising and falling wind nothing short of marvelous.

The Milhaud suite was at least amusing, but cannot fairly be considered as orchestral music. It is obviously designed to interpret the action of a play, Claudel's "Protée," and, heard apart from the grotesque-pathetic fable on which it is based, it often is unintelligible cacophony, reminding one of Ophelia's "Sweet bells jangled out of tune." The first three movements might be labeled "the authentic cadence stubbornly avoided." But beyond the statement of the obvious in terms of the unexpected, one can discover little in its design or execution from a mere hearing, though it was intermittently possible to imagine action that might go with the music, as a sort of substitute for a detailed program.

Mr. Mason's composition, played at these concerts for the first time, helped give the afternoon an element of sane musical delight to balance the distressing sounds Milhaud asked for in all but the conventional nocturne section of his suite. Not that Mr. Mason's music is a dry, academic product. But, for all its fine fervor, and it is truly a rhapsody, it has firmness of form throughout its six short movements. Within this clear structure the composer exercises the freedom of thematic improvisation in the piano part. Mr. Mason is no mere imitator or adapter in his use of oriental tone color; rather does one feel that he has assimilated typical musical idioms of the East and has given them forth again in terms of self-expression. He played the piano part in the true musician's spirit of inspired impromptu, and at the end was again and again recalled by the applause.

Mr. Mason was graduated with highest honors from the New England Conservatory of Music in 1907. His principal teachers in this country were George W. Chadwick, J. Albert Jeffery, and George Lowell Tracy. He joined the faculty of the Conservatory in 1907. Obtaining leave of absence, he went to Paris in 1908, where he continued his studies with André Gedalge, Isidor Philipp, and Raoul Pugno. He returned to Boston in September, 1910. He has composed chamber music, piano-forte pieces, and songs. His four characteristic pieces for violoncelli were performed at a concert of the Boston Musical Association, Mr. Longy conductor, on December 17, 1919.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Apr. 23, 1921

MOZART, MILHAUD AND SHARP-SET CONTRASTS

The Parisian's Suite as a Discomposed Audience Heard It — A Strange, New Speech in Tones, but One by Which the Composer Gains Imaginative and Impressive Ends—An Individual but Not a Freakish Music — Mr. Monteux and Mozart—Dukas's Hackneyed Scherzo

MOZART and Milhaud were the poles of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon—Mozart with the "Jupiter" Symphony in C major; Milhaud with an "Orchestral Suite," played for the first time in America. Upon both Mr. Monteux and the orchestra bestowed equal pains; but in some respects the conductor was more fortunate with the music of his own time. To Mozart the audience listened with easy, complaisant pleasure. It was hearing a familiar piece; the band was playing it vividly, animatedly; the music lacked neither beauty nor zest. It was all, as the dowagers like to say, "so satisfying." Not so much as a hair of their good gray coiffures was ruffled. The applause seemed the smile of this happy content. A little later—and into this symphonic paradise of Friday afternoon, came the disturber of the peace, the intruder, this Darius Milhaud of Paris, indecently young and "wayward," impudently declining to write "respectable" music. Some would not listen to him at all, preferring the perusal of the programme-book; some heard disdainfully, not unwilling that neighbors should note their scorn; others—the saving remnant of every audience—sought to understand and feel with the composer and so gain the pleasure of new, stimulating ways with music; an appreciable company—as one thereof put it—"just wished that it was over." At the end of the Fugue the snickers of superiority mingled with hearty laughs at Milhaud's burlesque. At the close of the Pastoral and the Nocturne came plaudits that acknowledged and rewarded beauty. Overture and Finale left most hearers quite cold.

Mr. Monteux could hardly have expected more for an adventure that again praises his openness of mind, his regard for the music of our own time, his encouragement to the innovation and experiment which are the ways of progress. Yet the orchestra deserved more, since the preparation of Milhaud's Suite had been arduous. . . . No doubt there were Viennese, who hearing the "Jupiter Symphony" in early days, believed Mozart young and impudent; who tilted scornful brows; who "wished that it was over." The chroniclers of the time hint as much. Not always did responsive audience answer to Mozart or to them who played him. And all this is not to say that Milhaud, a century and a quarter hence, will be a classic or that he will count for more in the course of music than do nowadays, some of Mozart's contemporaries. Even the dictionaries of music may ignore him. After all only the conservatives and the radicals in this amusing world are quite sure of men and things. The rest of us find the siftings of time much more entertaining than certainties.

In itself and for the information it yielded as to the new courses of Paris, Milhaud's Suite amply justified performance. Like or unlike, the music, there is no mistaking its vitality. By every outward sign, the composer writes not because he would, but because he must. He chooses his own matter, method, manner, because to him, for the time, there are no other. As plainly as music may say, the Suite is self-expression, and since Milhaud is much alive, life pulses through it. There are recognizable motifs, warm with beauty in the Pastoral and the Nocturne; springy and gamesome in the Overture and Finale; meet for broad humor in the Fugue. With élan Milhaud sets to his play with them. In the slower movements it takes course in a clear poetry of tones; at beginning and end, it is eager, graphic exercise of young powers and young zest; in the fugal travesty, it is the gusto of rough-and-ready humor.

From this élan, perhaps, proceeds the rhythmic life of the music. Not once does it plod; never is it merely static, waiting. Always there is motion in it, always stir upon the ear and the imagination. The quicker movements tingle upon the perceptive faculties, whipping them like the measures of Stravinsky in parts of "Petrouchka," in the whole of "The Rite of the Spring." The slower divisions are equally vivid and insistent with the mood, the illusion they would convey. The beauty that Milhaud seeks, he feels deeply, would have his hearers receive as intensely. It is, moreover, an individual, a characterized beauty. There is aerial quality in the Pastoral and Nocturne. With all his insistence and reiteration, his use of the higher and more piercing timbres of the orchestra, Milhaud is clearly seeking—and sometimes gaining—a new luminosity, a new undulation of tones. Seemingly he would write a music so supple of motion, so vivid of color, so intense of sensation upon the hearer that it shall seem a more direct and penetrating speech than the older ways with tones often summoned. The mood of the Pastoral, the mood of the Nocturne are not far from the conventions of such music. The one is wistful, musing, fitful; the other broods more deeply. The matter, in a sense, is conventionally appropriate to either. In both it is the treatment that intensifies substance and sensation. The ear hears as the eye sees that which is stark, aglow, with no veils between. Similarly with the grimacing rough and tumble of the Fugue. It is music to the tune of Rabelais's broad, frank, deep-chested, hugely comic jesting.

With like vitality, in equal intensity, Milhaud works upon and with his orchestra. Like most of the innovating composers of our time, he would make as salient as possible the individual quality of each instrument or group of instruments. His band is not an assembly of choirs to be used in unisons, contrasts, complements. It is rather a company of individual voices, to be parted, isolated, joined, overlaid, aligned at will of the composer's imagination and desire, for the passing stroke he would make, for the illusion he would achieve. Hence in the Suite, single voices pierce again and again through the instrumental web; or grouped voices go their own way, seemingly regardless of their neighbors; or some stride bravely forward, while others do but make themselves into a repetitious background. With like intent and in like manner, Milhaud's music sometimes proceeds simultaneously in different keys—so far as it answers at all to such tests—moving in parallel lines as it were, upon the ear, each making distinct, different, yet, at bottom, ordered and studied impression upon it. Hence, sudden and reiterated chords, hence sustained strands of counterpoint, hence a horizontal rather than a vertical music, that indeed generate strange sounds and novel sensations.

In this "poly-toned" procedure, as the prophets of the new dispensation call it; in this cacophony, as it seemed yesterday to many years, lies Milhaud's reputed sin against the light—his youth, his waywardness, his impudence, all the other trite reproaches. It is a new, a strange speech in music, but it is not incomprehensible, as Schönberg's idiom seemed, for remembered example, when Dr. Muck hazarded the "Five Pieces" that provoked more irritation for a passing day than even did Milhaud's Suite. Moreover, the Parisian's speech of tones, even at a single hearing and upon ears only a little prepared, does perceptibly fulfill his purpose. For praise or blame, for mockery or for magic, Milhaud's ways are his own; but there was no mistaking yesterday, the vivid stir, the keen sensation of music in ardent motion, like stripped athlete in race, that rose out of Overture and Finale: the broad and hearty burlesquing of the Fugue, in a humor that music, too refined and too abstract, superfluously disdains; the sharpened beauty piercing from Nocturne and Pastoral. Across the Common, these nights, cuts the sharp gleam of an electric sign advertising a singing-machine. In it the usual intensity of such blaze is many times multiplied. At first it repels the eye; then gradually fascinates it. Somewhat akin were the sensations from Milhaud's Suite.

In retrospect upon Milhaud, though not in actual progress, the rest of the concert passed in relative routine; while in the final item, Dukas's hackneyed Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the routine became absolute. Sorely over-played was this trifle when it was a new and seemed an amusing piece. Now, it is paying the penalty of popularity and familiarity. The measures of mystery and spell at the beginning remain work of imagination. The complementary measures at the end keep like quality. But how obvious between, how rhythmically monotonous, how little varied and quickened by artful, impulsive detail, seems the tone-picturing of the galumphing broom, the frightened apprentice, the flooding water and the other impelliments of the tale. After the manner of humans when they are pleased, we hearers made a "popular classic" out of a passing trifle—and now comes disillusion that even Mr. Monteux's high and graphic humor with the music could not avert.

The conductor was as zealous with Mozart's Symphony and to as eloquent outcome; but it is possible to regret the Olympian adjective that somehow, from somewhere, has long labelled it. Being a "Jupiter Symphony," it must be played—so runs the tradition—in big, broad, large-voiced fashion by the full forces—so far as Mozart's instruments go—of a twentieth-century orchestra. Yet did Mozart design for it any larger band than those for which he wrote many another symphony? True, he set within it many a large phrase and sounding period. True the symphony moves in a noble progress. Yet did he not also write therein with many a finely shaded line, many a darting figure and lightly twining arabesque? Full voiced as he was, he did not forget his suppleness, his fragrance of melody. Mr. Monteux took the big broad way with the Symphony in the first movement and and finale, as it seemed to some ears with many a blur upon the Mozartean pattern. Better and truer was the lighter, more sensitive hand, the gentler voiced orchestra he bestowed upon the manifold song of the Andante, the wistful grace of the Minuet.

H. T. PARKER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-FOURTH PROGRAMME

[Last of the Season]

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, AT 8 P. M.

FRANCK,

SYMPHONY in D minor
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.

BLOCH,

L'HIVER-PRINTEMPS ("Winter-Spring") Two Poems for Orchestra

I. Hiver.
II. Printemps.
(First time in Boston)

STRAUSS,

TONE-POEM, "Tod und Verklärung" ("Death and Transfiguration,") op. 24

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser"

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony.

ventions of such music. The one is wistful, musing, fitful; the other broods more deeply. The matter, in a sense, is conventionally appropriate to either. In both it is the treatment that intensifies substance and sensation. The ear hears as the eye sees that which is stark, aglow, with no veils between. Similarly with the grimacing rough and tumble of the Fugue. It is music to the tune of Rabelais's broad, frank, deep-chested, hugely comic jesting.

With like vitality, in equal intensity, Milhaud works upon and with his orchestra. Like most of the innovating composers of our time, he would make as salient as possible the individual quality of each instrument or group of instruments. His band is not an assembly of choirs to be used in unions, contrasts, complements. It is rather a company of individual voices, to be parted, isolated, joined, overlaid, aligned at will of the composer's imagination and desire, for the passing stroke he would make, for the illusion he would achieve. Hence in the Suite, single voices pierce again and again through the instrumental web; or grouped voices go their own way, seemingly regardless of their neighbors; or some stride bravely forward, while others do but make themselves into a repetitious background. With like intent and in like manner, Milhaud's music sometimes proceeds simultaneously in different keys—so far as it answers at all to such tests—moving in parallel lines as it were, upon the ear, each making distinct, different, yet, at bottom, ordered and studied impression upon it. Hence, sudden and reiterated chords, hence sustained strands of counterpoint, hence a horizontal rather than a vertical music, that indeed generate strange sounds and novel sensations.

In this "poly-toned" procedure, as the prophets of the new dispensation call it; in this cacophony, as it seemed yesterday to many years, lies Milhaud's reputed sin against the light—his youth, his waywardness, his impudence, all the other trite reproaches. It is a new, a strange speech in music, but it is not incomprehensible, as Schönberg's idiom seemed, for remembered example, when Dr. Muck hazarded the "Five Pieces" that provoked more irritation for a passing day than even did Milhaud's Suite. Moreover, the Parisian's speech of tones, even at a single hearing and upon ears only a little prepared, does perceptibly fulfill his purpose. For praise or blame, for mockery or for magic, Milhaud's ways are his own; but there was no mistaking yesterday, the vivid stir, the keen sensation of music in ardent motion, like stripped athlete in race, that rose out of Overture and Finale; the broad and hearty burlesquing of the Fugue, in a humor that music, too refined and too abstract, superfluously disdains; the sharpened beauty piercing from Nocturne and Pastoral. Across the Common, these nights, cuts the sharp gleam of an electric sign advertising a singing-machine. In it the usual intensity of such blaze is many times multiplied. At first it repels the eye; then gradually fascinates it. Somewhat akin were the sensations from Milhaud's Suite.

In retrospect upon Milhaud, though not in actual progress, the rest of the concert passed in relative routine; while in the final item, Dukas's hackneyed Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the routine became absolute. Sorely over-played was this trifle when it was a new and seemed an amusing piece. Now, it is paying the penalty of popularity and familiarity. The measures of mystery and spell at the beginning remain work of imagination. The complementary measures at the end keep like quality. But how obvious between, how rhythmically monotonous, how little varied and quickened by artful, impulsive detail, seems the tone-picturing of the galumphing broom, the frightened apprentice, the flooding water and the other impeliments of the tale. After the manner of humans when they are pleased, we hearers made a "popular classic" out of a passing trifle—and now comes disillusion that even Mr. Monteux's high and graphic humor with the music could not avert.

The conductor was as zealous with Mozart's Symphony and to as eloquent outcome; but it is possible to regret the Olympian adjective that somehow, from somewhere, has long labelled it. Being a "Jupiter Symphony," it must be played—so runs the tradition—in big, broad, large-voiced fashion by the full forces—so far as Mozart's instruments go—of a twentieth-century orchestra. Yet did Mozart design for it any larger band than those for which he wrote many another symphony? True, he set within it many a large phrase and sounding period. True the symphony moves in a noble progress. Yet did he not also write therein with many a finely shaded line, many a darting figure and lightly twining arabesque? Full voiced as he was, he did not forget his suppleness, his fragrance of melody. Mr. Monteux took the big broad way with the Symphony in the first movement and and finale, as it seemed to some ears with many a blur upon the Mozartean pattern. Better and truer was the lighter, more sensitive hand, the gentler voiced orchestra he bestowed upon the manifold song of the Andante, the wistful grace of the Minuet.

H. T. PARKER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

TWENTY-FOURTH PROGRAMME

[Last of the Season]

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, AT 8 P. M.

FRANCK,

SYMPHONY in D minor
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.

BLOCH,

L'HIVER-PRINTEMPS ("Winter-Spring") Two Poems for Orchestra

I. Hiver.
II. Printemps.
(First time in Boston)

STRAUSS,

TONE-POEM, "Tod und Verklärung" ("Death and Transfiguration,") op. 24

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser"

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony.

For Spring Farewell and Autumn Greeting

Pierre Monteux

(Photograph by Garo)

Restorer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE EFFUSIVE

Prolonged Ovation to Monteux at Last
Concert

Post May 1, 1921
BY OLIN DOWNES

When Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct the last Friday afternoon concert of the season, he was given a prolonged and enthusiastic greeting which must have pleased him. At the same time, this was out of all proportion to the applause which followed the last chord of the opening symphony—that of Cesar Franck. Then the audience let itself go in an ovation which has only been accorded this season to one other orchestral leader—Arturo Toscanini.

SIMPLE AND ELOQUENT

The symphony in itself was partly responsible for this, for it is today well understood, as it was not understood when first played in Boston in 1904, and it is perceived to be one of the simplest, one of the most noble and eloquent works in the orchestra repertory.

Mr. Monteux's performance, particularly of the opening movement, was uncommonly effective. It bore testimony to his abilities and it was a reminder as well of the wonderful accomplishment that is his in Boston, where, despite the troubles incidental to the war and a strike, he has successfully re-assembled and remade the Boston Symphony Orchestra three successive times and restored to its traditional artistic excellence the organization which Major Higginson founded and which is world-famous.

Two Bloch Pieces

Franck's symphony was followed by two pieces of Ernest Bloch, not heard here before, "Winter" and "Spring-time." Composed in 1905, in the composer's 25th year, this music is not of the mature Bloch, who is today one of the most representative figures in the modern field. But it is music conspicuous for its sense of nature, for its impressionability, for the naturalness and spontaneity with which, at least in "Winter," the composer finds a tonal language to express himself. So expressing himself, Bloch is much more convincing in his first piece than in his second. Sadness—the thoughts that a gray and wintry day may occasion—these emotions are native to the composer.

He is less convincing to us, as he is less convincing to himself, when he tries to forget melancholy in the thought of laughing spring.

Strauss' Masterpiece

Then the heroic and tragic spirit of the youthful Strauss swept like a fiery wind over the orchestra. Then, hearing his masterpiece, "Death and Transfiguration," perhaps for the 10th or 15th time, the entire audience was confounded by its eloquence. It is always new and always confounding—the manner in which this Strauss dares to write of the flesh riven in twain, and of the spirit, rising, shaking out its wings, in the final ascension. The incredible thing is that he accomplishes so much of what he sets out to do. No wonder the audience was so deeply moved.

By the side of this music, how ineffectually bourgeois, theatrical, noisy and cheap sounded the "Tannhauser" overture. But how well made is this overture, what complete and irresistible mystery in the shaping of the ideas, the welding of the form. Confound this Wagner! Even when he is a cheap, affected player to the gallery he is a genius.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony.

SYMPHONY ENDS ITS 40TH SEASON

Bloch's Tone Poems Played for the First Time in Boston

AUDIENCE SHOWED MARKED ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 40th season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Bloch, Two Poems for Orchestra, "Winter-Spring," Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Mr. Bloch's tone-poems were played for the first time in Boston. When they were performed last season in New York at a concert of the New Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Bloch gave the best possible description of them: "The title is sufficient, I think, to suggest to the audience the atmosphere I intended to create—so far as musical titles are able to represent the content of that language, inexpressible by words. 'Hiver' is sad and hopeless; 'Printenyss' is full of joy and hope. I was 24 when I wrote them." Mr. Bloch was born at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1880. "They are a small part of my personality and of my youth. That is already far away in a past that will not come again. . . . They are neither 'Classical' nor 'Ultra-modern.' The only thing I can tell about them is that they were sincerely written and are the expression of an inward necessity." In other words these pieces were written before Mr. Bloch devoted his indisputable talent to expressing in music the longings, woes and aspirations, the fanatical zeal and the religious fervor of his race.

He certainly succeeded in creating the atmosphere of winter and that of spring in these two poems. They are written in a comparatively simple manner, and for this reason are the more effective.

The melancholy mood and the dreariness of a winter landscape and winter's chill and nipping air are at once brought home to the hearer. The mood is maintained ingeniously, without undue elaboration. There is no vain attempt at photographic realism, the hearer looks out of the window; he is not plodding his way through snow and slush. The poem is short, but the impression made by it, by its simplicity and directness is durable. In admirable contrast is the suggestion of Spring, its fresh breezes, its awakening of life in Nature, its joy of birds, beasts and man. In this poem there is no attempt to portray a tumultuous spring, as one might strive to do with a great orchestra furnished with a battalion of percussion instruments. There is the Spring of the Elizabethan lyricists and of William Blake. The other compositions were all familiar. How gloriously they were played! No wonder that the audience was enthusiastic to a degree seldom observed at an orchestral concert.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" does not wear so well as his "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan." The introduction now seems rather tedious, so that one is impatient for the music of fever and delirium, nor does Strauss allow his hero to apologize gracefully in the manner of Charles II for being so long in dying. The most vital part of the tone poem is the preparation of the grand climax, the transfiguration, and this climax was so superbly reached by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra that the effect was overwhelming.

There are works and there are performances of them that are not to be described in words, nor should one toil in purple phrases to convey to him that did not hear the passion, the nobility, the grandeur of the work itself, or the splendor of the performance. Cesar Franck's symphony is one of the greatest achievements in the history of music since the first pipe was rudely fashioned, since the first man beat upon a drum. Never was the glory of this symphony, with its expression of restless foreboding, its questionings in doubt, its message of reassurance and consolation, its triumphant conclusion, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, the Alleluia of a great multitude, so fully revealed in Boston as it was in the concert of yesterday.

After the spirited and sonorous performance of the "Tannhaeuser" overture, there was a long-continued demonstration of enthusiasm.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

A short review of the season with a few remarks about Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will be published in the Herald of tomorrow.

April Boston Notes 30, 1921
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on April 29, was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Bloch, "Hiver-Printemps"—two poems for orchestra; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

This last program of the present season brought to light nothing new with the exception of Bloch's two poems. They are the expression of two contrasted moods, gracefully written and skillfully orchestrated, the music of an imaginative, sincere musician. They are perhaps too subjectively conceived to attract the attention of the sensation-loving crowd, yet they are all the better for that. The remaining numbers on the program are well known. Mr. Monteux's readings of Franck's symphony and the "Tannhaeuser" overture are familiar. That of Strauss' symphonic poem was sympathetic.

The past season has been one of great artistic merit. Many worthy novelties have had a hearing, many unfamiliar classics have been brought to renewed attention while the more familiar classics have not been neglected. Mr. Monteux's programs have contained the music of all schools. The orchestra, too, has made marked progress, both technically and musically. The musical public of this city has indeed been fortunate in having Mr. Monteux at the head of its most important musical institution. His sincere artistry has been of untold benefit to the musical life of the community.

Post — May 1, 1921
The Boston Symphony season of 1920-21 came to an end last night with a signal triumph for Mr. Monteux and his men. It is good to record a success which has been so richly deserved. Mr. Monteux took the Boston Symphony conductorship under a handicap. He inherited the orchestra's troubles which originated during war time. He then went through all the difficulties of the strike. He has had in all virtually three times to reassemble and perfect the Boston Symphony organization. He has, in the face of all this, achieved wonderful results.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony.

Mr. Monteux has not only assembled and co-ordinated players new and old in very difficult tasks. He has also sensitized the orchestra. As its actual technical standards have improved and returned to traditional excellences the band has become the more subtle and faithful reflection of the ideas of its leader. It would be hard in any one of the last 20 seasons of the orchestra to recall more brilliant performances than have been given during late months.

Also, from the beginning, Mr. Monteux has triumphed as a programme maker. He is so broad-minded, so catholic in his musical tastes that some have exclaimed that he had no individual tastes, no preferences, no partialities to music of any composer. It is a good reputation for a conductor to have. Mr. Monteux has not held aloof from any composer or any school. He has brought to the study of modern works a zeal which burned a little brighter when it encountered a score difficult to understand. The novelties have been in far the greater number worth performing and keeping the repertory, and not merely freak pieces to be played once and thereafter to adorn the Boston Symphony library shelves. They have kept the Symphony audiences well abreast of developments of the day in music. In every way the past Symphony season has been notable. The orchestra has won back its prestige, which for a time was trembling in the balance, thanks to this conductor and to the expert business management of the orchestra. Other orchestras are changing with time, disappearing, welding together, subservient to and very seldom indeed, whatever the occasion, defiant of the dictates of a union. The Boston Symphony has remained by itself, on both business and artistic grounds, and its course has been justified by its fruits. Its financial difficulties are not at an end, but they will be solved and the orchestra's position and permanency made the more sure through Bostonians who have learned the value of the great organization founded by Major Higginson and who will see that it is perpetuated.

256

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Apr. 30, 1921
WARM LEAVE-TAKING ENDS THE SEASON

Conductor and Orchestra as the Work of the Year Has Developed Them—A Ripened Monteux and a Newly Risen Band Well on the Way to Old Perfections—Franck, Strauss and Wagner for the Afternoon in Music of Perennial Glories

ABOVE the usual yesterday, the final concert of the Symphony Orchestra in the current afternoon series was festal. As almost always the audience filled every seat in Symphony Hall; while, contrary to frequent custom, nearly every one remained to the end of the programme, ever lingered thereafter. The applause that welcomed Mr. Monteux to his place, pitched the tune of the day. It was uncommonly hearty and sustained; it waxed longer and louder at the close of Franck's Symphony; it diminished not at all when the concert was done. Then, indeed, the listening company gave the conductor sincerest and warmest token of its regard. If ever an audience hastened homeward, it is the customary audience of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts. The mother (with daughters), who in the Harvard ballad of Class Day passionately seeks the "Pudding Spread," made not more speed than usually do the elect matrons, the attendant demoiselles, toward motor cars, tea-tables, engagements and pastimes. Yesterday, however, they lingered—stayed even until they had twice and thrice recalled the conductor and finally set him within his standing orchestra.

In moments of irritation over the reception of novel and highly individualized music, it is possible to believe this assembly of Friday afternoons timid and close-minded. Yet it has long perceived and yesterday it warmly appreciated the qualities that shine out of Mr. Monteux—his single-minded, single-hearted devotion to his work, and for the work's sake; his zeal for the broadest and the finest standards of the orchestra; his quickness and openness of mind; his catholic sympathies over the whole range of symphonic music and for the music of his own time most of all; his manifold eloquence in manifold performance, never declining into mediocrity, almost never falling into routine, usually revelation of piece in hand, time and again touching beauty, gaining power. Probably, too, at the back of the heads of this applauding company went the notion that at the end of the season of 1921, Mr. Monteux is an abler, more sensitive, more versatile conductor than he was at the beginning of the season of 1919. He is—by clear proof in his work; by clear impression, deepening the winter through, upon his hearers. No conductor may serve the Symphony Concerts and keep to the standards thereof and not deepen, broaden, refine in the process. It was the Monteux so amplified, so sensitized that the audience saluted yesterday.

No less good to hear was the warmth of this applauding company toward the orchestra itself. The clapping appreciably swelled when, at the close of Franck's Symphony, the conductor bade the players to their feet. When he did likewise, after the concert had ended with the Overture to "Tannhäuser," even cries and cheers arose—rarest of sounds within the sober precincts of the Symphony Concerts and from such a Bostonian audience. Seldom have there been like zest, like frank release of honest impulse in a usually prim self-conscious public—or with more reason. The orchestra is not yet the orchestra of the days when neither Europe nor America could match it; nor is it again the almost ideal orchestra that it then was—the more essential standard. As Mr. Monteux said himself the other day: "There is still much to be done." None the less from last October through the present April, progress toward the goal has never flagged. Again the band is a highly responsive instrument, collectively to the conductor and the music in hand, severally choir to choir and man to man. Again a hearty esprit du corps keeps it on edge to its work. Little by little it is achieving the gamut of tone that of old ran from force to finesse and knew every gradation between; regaining the old range of expression that answered to every composer, characterized each piece, summoned brightness or beauty or power or splendor at the conductor's will. The large, warm vigors, the fine precisions of the re-constituted band do not coarsen; while to them the work of the year has added plasticity, transparency, euphony of many-colored voice.

The strings, notably among the second violins, have regained sensitive and unified voice, smooth and shimmering, ardent and incisive, as many-toned as the music it would speak. Yet an additional violoncello or two would better balance the choir; while there is still need of a first viola to companion in quality Mr. Burgin of the violins and Mr. Bedetti of the violoncellos. The wind-choir is unexcelled in any American orchestra—even Mr. Stock's—and probably in any European. Mr. Laurent is master-flutist beyond any of his predecessors;

Mr. Speyer at the English horn and too infrequently at the oboe, has added a signal talent to the orchestra; Mr. Laus with the bassoon, is peer to both. The clarinets are more debatable and upon their quality in the leisure of summer Mr. Monteux may advisedly ponder. Often he seeks the riches of tone that his six horn-players may yield the music. Once and again, the expert listener suspects that the first and the third among them have quite as much to do as is good for their mettle. Agreed that, in cost, able horn-players are articles of luxury and vertu. Yet why not add the two that have been missing from the desirable octet since the Higginsonian days ended? For the rest, Mr. Neumann at the kettle-drums and Mr. Holy and Mme. Delcourt at the harps speak weekly for themselves; Mr. Mager and the trumpets, Mr. Hampe and the trombones know the secrets both of mellowness and flare. A virtuoso of the tuba—for there can be and there has been in the orchestra such a player—it still lacks and again Mr. Monteux may advisedly consider betterment. It is a pity, too, for mere appearance's sake that another player should oscillate between the violas and the instruments of percussion. As for them they have deserved the opportunity that the conductor's fondness for ultra-modern music bestows upon them.

So man by man, choir by choir does the whole orchestra gradually renew the mettle of the old. A little more lightness and plency and sensibility of shading when the elder music is in hand, a little more openness and suavity of tone when the voices are yet moving in mass; a little less muscularity and a deeper richness of tone in broad spread and upswelling climax and the end will be nearly gained. Already resiliency to rhythm, alertness to modulation and transition, color-sense in harmonic background have been reconquered. To these glories regained the new orchestra adds now a new and signal distinction of its own. For the first time in years, and especially in the string choir, it is a young orchestra. And youth or the spirit of youth is the strongest safeguard against routine and formula. It is only the truth to say that Mr. Monteux with the players working with him have so restored the band—not so much in his own image as in the image of its standards. Thank Heaven, they are not a "tradition." For they are still alive and quickening.

As usual at these final concerts, the programme for the most part traversed familiar pieces—Franck's Symphony; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner's overture to his opera, "Tannhäuser." Fortunately for music, composer and hearers, Mr. Monteux had put by for two seasons this over-played Symphony in the days of Rabaud and Muck.

257

Again it came relatively fresh to conductor, orchestra and hearers; and again it stimulated all three by what now seem transparent qualities. If ever there was a mystery in human understanding and appreciation of music, it is the obscurity, the abstruseness, the general "irregularity" with which this Symphony of Franck was of old reproached. The motifs whence it springs come clear to the ear; by unmistakable quality they touch and hold the imagination; again and again they recur to renew character and deepen impression. The form and progress of the music are as vivid and transparent—the long ascent, with occasional recession and recurring striving along the way—from shadow into radiance, out of brooding into gladness. At every turn, through each contrast, up and down gradation and modulation, musical structure and emotional content are as one; while harmonic and instrumental color seem as natural, inevitable vesture. Above all, the passion, the moods, the voice of the music are deeply and immediately human, almost universal. The wonder remains that any hearer could have wilfully misunderstood, obstinately resisted such music. For Franck's Symphony is like to Matthew Arnold's definition of poetry. In it are simplicity and strength, beauty and nobility.

Similarly, heard anew after superfluous war-time banishment Strauss's tone-poem remains a masterpiece in kind. Thus far, the power that germinates, expands, intensifies and culminates into the uttermost splendors of tone, the measures of transfiguration abides the years. Again at their bidding come majesty and might and heavens opened. Still the measures wherein man fights for his faiths and ideals, his life according to his own living, ring with a knightly note unmatched outside the chivalric motif in "Parsifal." Once more the misty passage of childhood memories flickering across the dying mind, wets the eyes with an ineffable beauty. Still do the stark drum-beats of Death the Merciless beat also upon the imagination. Throughout the tone-poem, indeed, goes for some of us and unflagging "the greater Strauss"—not merely the Strauss who is master of delineation in tones, who can mate inextricably and evenly formal progress with emotional and pictorial content, and still walk at ease and eloquently, whose palette glows with every harmonic and instrumental color, mixed with imagination; but the Strauss who for once has searched and known the heart and the will of man; who for once has quested toward the Divine Justice, who has penetrated deep into the strivings the faiths, the glories of man's living and who has charged a universal music as deeply with them. Few as yet may hear "Death and Transfiguration" unstirred.

But, but, whispers the neighboring youngster as Mr. Monteux, at the overture to "Tannhäuser," lifts his stick: "Here is 'old hat' indeed. Give the populace—and the horns—their fling." It is possible to be not so sure. For double and the lengthening years that Strauss's tone-poem has bided, Wagner's overture has endured the teeth of time; and after them all and through the thick accretions of popularity upon the pages, Mr. Lawrence Gilman may still write well and truly in the programme-book of the National Symphony Orchestra: "How much of the thrice-familiar music remains unstated. The wonderful opening measures; the exciting entrance of the Venusberg theme in the violas; the superb and passionate subject for the violins against which the cellos surge in mounting chromatic waves; the enticing song of the clarinet heard through tremolos of the muted strings; the magnificent and thrilling close—which, as Wagner blandly observed in his notes on the performing of "Tannhäuser," can make its intended effect only if the conductor and band expend upon it the utmost energy and force." Both yesterday lavished them. H. T. PARKER

CLUB ORGANIZED FOR FLUTE MUSIC

GEORGES LAURENT

SATURDAY OUTDOES FRIDAY WITH MR. MONTEUX Again Warm Leave-Taking — Back to

AS the audience of Friday afternoon set the pace in leave-taking at the Symphony Concerts, so the audience of Saturday evening kept and sped it, while, incidentally, two familiar customs, for a year or two put by, were renewed. Before the concert began, in the tuning room, Judge Cabot speaking for the trustees, congratulated the orchestra upon the work of the year in such a little speech as Mr. Higginson used to make. By exception, moreover, Mrs. Higginson stood beside him while he spoke, as though to reaffirm, as have other recent works on her part, a continuing interest in the band. Again, the familiar flowers of the final concert stood by the conductor's stand—this time in the colors and the ribbons of France and the United States. When at last Mr. Monteux came to his place, an audience, from which only scattered subscribers were absent, saluted him with round upon round of applause. Still heartier clapping followed the performance of Franck's Symphony, swelling longest and loudest when the conductor stood in the crescent of the risen orchestra. As on Friday, the audience lingered after the concert; would not have done until twice and thrice it had recalled Mr. Monteux, striving to shift a share of these plaudits to the smiling orchestra; until rising, it had again clapped and cheered him. In such earned appreciation, it is pleasure both to give and to receive, and of such, beyond debating, are the deserts of the conductor and the men who are restoring the quality and with it the prestige of the Boston Orchestra. This season the stride has been long and full; on Friday and Saturday the plaudits also spanned it. H. T. P.

On a Sunday afternoon last month about 250 music lovers met in the art gallery of the Boston Art Club. The invitation was from the Boston Flute Players' Club.

Mr. Malcolm Lang, the president of the club, in his informal speech of welcome, outlined the aims and aspirations of this unique organization. He said, in brief, the purpose of the association is to foster love for the flute and its music by performing chamber music that gives the instrument its proper setting; to encourage skill in execution; to create interest in music composed for the flute in combination with other instruments, also the voice.

BLOCH THE LISTENER Timely Word of His Newest Piece Apropos the Return of His Music to the Symphony Concerts

ERNEST BLOCH is one of the few men living who listen. He has the art of hearkening, of hearkening veritably to his proper body. The most of us, musicians, poets, prosemen, do not know how to hear, how to lean attentively over ourselves. We do not know how to pause suspended and give heed to what the blood murmurs. We are outside, adverted, deaf to the fine trickle of song always within the body. We struggle to fit ourselves into forms bequeathed to us. We persuade ourselves we feel, as other men felt, a hundred years ago, fifty years ago; persuade ourselves we hear c-major, march and dance movements, broad sustained chanting melody, a plain, straightforward, unmottled gush of sensation, a melodic line with an accompaniment. Such is the world, we rest assured. Expression is undertaken prejudicially, the matter adjudged, the award bestowed upon the accepted forms. We do not even inquire whether the individuals who thought to hear these patterns heard them indeed, or were deceived. Dead things are produced, and we either do not know at all that they are obsolete, or are entirely unable to account for their uselessness.

But Bloch does that which Bach did, which Wagner did, which Debussy did, which every true musician will ever do. He goes directly for his substance, his form, to the warm, quick of sensation. He permits himself to be guided not by what others have felt, or said they have felt, but by what takes place within his flesh. He is eager to hear that murmurous evanescent thing, to seize it in its immediacy, to fix it in its ineluctable, unfathomable flow, before it escape him and us entirely. He hearkens until his spirit ear becomes sensitive to its wayward flow, till a continuity, a pattern, commences to define itself in the chaos. He hars, always in progress in him, the transformation of pain into pleasure, of pleasure into pain; the unrelenting piling of edifice upon edifice, each superstructure subsiding immediately to make way for the coming one; the melting in the solidification, the retreat in the advance. He hears the pain of the years crystallized into an incandescent moment of pleasure; he hears the drag of hours of depression, the movements in him up and down. He knows what takes place between him and the objects of the city when he goes out;

mark in him; what to meet the ugliness from without on him and carry knows the state of before-dawn light, n, Bloch is aware impulse to embrace great will to say impulse that real- too romantically, is symphony, and life, of men, of chained, weighed and fumbling for here, beneath the melancholy brood- beneath the ape-like, grand, and sor- self upward, lacer- in, till at last the hetic strain stands stammers with ex- the clouds part fore the perform- from the piano- how rare, how re- self-registration, the ut the performance tional Symphony vember thrust the and in thrusting it enetrate even more two versions are which Alfred Stieg- of a single nega- e of differences in ng-paper, are quite r. The pianoforte, suite an intimate rs in place of stat- ie the pleasure of s through another on the other hand, izes the ideas; the 7, fully stated. The i, in consequence, composition, already Indeed, it is pos- for the first time determined orches- rsion for the larger he superior. of Bloch is original is pianoforte style. fruits are held un- d yet it is exceed- pointed. The dyna- seldom called into rs only a few times eless, the orchestra y and power. Both ration are reached; into play at once a less that seem new

But, but, whispers the neighboring youngster as Mr. Monteux, at the overture to "Tannhäuser," lifts his stick: "Here is 'old hat' indeed. Give the populace—and the horns—their fling." It is possible to be not so sure. For double and the lengthening years that Strauss's tone-poem has bided, Wagner's overture has endured the teeth of time; and after them all and through the thick accretions of popularity upon the pages, Mr. Lawrence Gilman may still write well and truly in the programme-book of the National Symphony Orchestra: "How much of the thrice-familiar music remains unstated. The wonderful opening measures; the exciting entrance of the Venusberg theme in the violas; the superb and passionate subject for the violins against which the 'cellos surge in mounting chromatic waves; the enticing song of the clarinet heard through tremolos of the muted strings; the magnificent and thrilling close—which, as Wagner blandly observed in his notes on the performing of 'Tannhäuser,' can make its intended effect only if the conductor and band expend upon it the utmost energy and force." Both yesterday lavished them. H. T. PARKER

CLUB ORGANIZED FOR FLUTE MUSIC

GEORGES LAURENT

SATURDAY OUTDOES FRIDAY WITH MR. MONTEUX Again Warm Leave-Taking — Back to

AS the audience of Friday afternoon set the pace in leave-taking at the Symphony Concerts, so the audience of Saturday evening kept and sped it, while, incidentally, two familiar customs, for a year or two put by, were renewed. Before the concert began, in the tuning room, Judge Cabot speaking for the trustees, congratulated the orchestra upon the work of the year in such a little speech as Mr. Higginson used to make. By exception, moreover Mrs. Higginson stood beside him while he spoke, as though to reaffirm, as have other recent works on her part, a continuing interest in the band. Again, the familiar flowers of the final concert stood by the conductor's stand—this time in the colors of the ribbons of France and the United States. When at last Mr. Monteux came to his place, an audience, from which only scattered subscribers were absent, saluted him with round upon round of applause. Still heartier clapping followed the performance of Franck's Symphony, swelling longest and loudest when the conductor stood in the crescent of the risen orchestra. As on Friday, the audience lingered after the concert would not have done until twice as thrice it had recalled Mr. Monteux striving to shift a share of these plauds to the smiling orchestra; until rising, had again clapped and cheered him. Such earned appreciation, it is pleasant both to give and to receive, and of such beyond debating, are the deserts of conductor and the men who are restoring the quality and with it the prestige of the Boston Orchestra. This season's stride has been long and full; on Friday and Saturday the plaudits also spanned. H. T. PARKER

On a Sunday afternoon last month about 250 music lovers met in the art gallery of the Boston Art Club. The invitation was from the Boston Flute Players' Club.

Mr. Malcolm Lang, the president of the club, in his informal speech of welcome, outlined the aims and aspirations of this unique organization. He said in brief, the purpose of the association is to foster love for the flute and to music by performing chamber music that gives the instrument its proper setting; to encourage skill in execution; to create interest in music composition for the flute in combination with other instruments, also the voice.

itself for a complete and of all the educational by one hand and form whole. Boston College ceptions, and from ever view the general public terest on the working out the same time giving it port, financial and other limits that can be set t civilizing value of such It is interesting to see a fashion the architects each element of the p sufficient variety, explicit ferentiation between the eral buildings, and yet it with notable consistency ture or factor in any c tion which is of greater often neglected or alte than the chapel, because well learned by this time effective education that trated by religion at ever tion and the design of A for Boston College for The scheme itself is of R

HOW TO SAVE

Association for the Promotion of Savings Arrangements
Advice on Budgets at Savings Banks Next Month

Saving, when carried and conscientiously, is as instanced by the savings plans of Benjamin Franklin, anyone of intelligence making a budget, show good results to save, but to obtain a satisfactory reward for his efforts have a plan and carry it out. In this way it might seem too trivial a task as to enable one to save a few cents each month and by expenditures properly, with gradually accumulate and be worth while.

Having these facts in mind for the Promotion of Savings today complete with six Boston saving banks the customers and the plan

what the deeds of men mark in him; what rhythms rise from within to meet the ugliness, what rhythms come from without and insist themselves on him and carry him before them. He knows the state of his life, the submerged, before-dawn light. And always within him, Bloch is aware of the presence of an impulse to embrace all things and men, a great will to say yea. It is perhaps the impulse that realized itself too naively, too romantically, too thoughtlessly, in his symphony, and which the experience of life, of men, of the world, has driven in, chained, weighed to earth. But it is alive, and fumbling for egress. It is always there, beneath the bitterness, beneath the melancholy brooding, beneath the pain, beneath the ape-like joy and tenderness, veiled, grand, and sorrowful. And it forces itself upward, lacerated, woeful, half-broken, till at last the doors give, the old prophetic strain stands free and speaks again, stammers with excess, stands silent while the clouds part in the light of dawn.

One already knew, before the performance of the orchestral, from the piano-version, how sheer, how rare, how remarkable a piece of self-registration, the Bloch viola suite is. But the performance of the piece by the National Symphony Orchestra early in November thrust the fact in on one again, and in thrusting it a second time, made it penetrate even more profoundly. For the two versions are like two of the prints which Alfred Stieglitz sometimes makes of a single negative and which, because of differences in the quality of the printing-paper, are quite distinct from each other. The pianoforte, of course, makes the suite an intimate thing; adumbrates colors in place of stating them. It gives one the pleasure of hearing orchestral hues through another medium. The orchestra, on the other hand, both swells and subtilizes the ideas; the colors are boldly, shrilly, fully stated. The differences of medium, in consequence, made one to hear the composition, already familiar, quite afresh. Indeed, it is possible that one heard it for the first time entire, for Bloch is determined orchestral writer, and the version for the larger instrument is perhaps the superior.

The instrumentation of Bloch is original and daring beyond his pianoforte style. It is exceedingly such; fruits are held under one's nostrils. And yet it is exceedingly neat and dry and pointed. The dynamics of the band are seldom called into play; the sign ff appears only a few times in the score. Nevertheless, the orchestra is heard in its entirety and power. Both the extremes of coloration are reached; the Bloch score calls into play at once a shrillness and sombreness that seem new however, of the green the darker timbres and that of Debussy and alto and the soprano wns and purples and e deeper, than those Debussy's. The bass the old gold of the te. Furthermore, the mission demanded by sic a sharpness and ussy's. He uses the ively as does Strav-orable passage in the used of a melancholy over curious dry taps A small wooden box z bands, is employed, ne celesta, with whip-st movement.

one recognized the ork. The Viola Suite most powerful of s neither the grandi-the Psalms, nor the lence of the String first of his composi-ed and executed since merica, and the diffi-t to the life of the itably somewhat re-mparative smallness Bloch is ripening idly; it may be he a little in order to over his style. Still, les that make it in al improvement over written. The Suite one who has him-id. It is a capital on. There are no nt spots in it. It and yet always a lves relentlessly, and eptible stages; it is persistently in pro-The four movements f a single cube, and l.

s the sense that the ree, entirely at ease; naturally and richly. Bloch does succeed the heights attained the Psalms, he will achieve work com-ormally harder even ses the achievement f the masterwork he in the more circum-for Ernest Bloch at-rhaps no other living [Paul Rosenfeld in

But, but, whispers the neighboring youngster as Mr. Monteux, at the overture to "Tannhäuser," lifts his stick: "Here is 'old hat' indeed. Give the populace—and the horns—their fling." It is possible to be not so sure. For double and the lengthening years that Strauss's tone-poem has bided, Wagner's overture has endured the teeth of time; and after them all and through the thick accretions of popularity upon the pages, Mr. Lawrence Gilman may still write well and truly in the programme-book of the National Symphony Orchestra: "How much of the thrice-familiar music remains unstated. The wonderful opening measures; the exciting entrance of the Venusberg theme in the violas; the superb and passionate subject for the violins against which the cellos surge in mounting chromatic waves; the enticing song of the clarinet heard through tremolos of the muted strings; the magnificent and thrilling close—which, as Wagner blandly observed in his notes on the performing of "Tannhäuser," can make its intended effect only if the conductor and band expend upon it the utmost energy and force." Both yesterday lavished them. H. T. PARKER

CLUB ORGANIZED FOR FLUTE MUSIC

GEORGES LAURENT

SATURDAY OUTDOES FRIDAY WITH MR. MONTEUX Again Warm Leave-Taking — Back to

AS the audience of Friday afternoon set the pace in leave-taking at the Symphony Concerts, so the audience of Saturday evening kept and sped it, while, incidentally, two familiar customs, for a year or two put by, were renewed. Before the concert began, in the tuning room, Judge Cabot speaking for the trustees, congratulated the orchestra upon the work of the year in such a little speech as Mr. Higginson used to make. By exception, moreover, Mrs. Higginson stood beside him while he spoke, as though to reaffirm, as have other recent works on her part, a continuing interest in the band. Again, the familiar flowers of the final concert stood by the conductor's stand—this time in the colors of the ribbons of France and the United States. When at last Mr. Monteux came to his place, an audience, from which only scattered subscribers were absent, saluted him with round upon round of applause. Still heartier clapping followed the performance of Franck's Symphony, swelling longest and loudest when the conductor stood in the crescent of the risen orchestra. As on Friday, the audience lingered after the concert would not have done until twice as thrice it had recalled Mr. Monteux striving to shift a share of these plaudits to the smiling orchestra; until rising, had again clapped and cheered him. Such earned appreciation, it is pleasant both to give and to receive, and of such beyond debating, are the deserts of conductor and the men who are restoring the quality and with it the prestige of the Boston Orchestra. This season's stride has been long and full; on Friday and Saturday the plaudits also spanned. H. T.

On a Sunday afternoon last month about 250 music lovers met in the gallery of the Boston Art Club. The invitation was from the Boston Flute Players' Club.

Mr. Malcolm Lang, the president of the club, in his informal speech of welcome, outlined the aims and aspirations of this unique organization. He said in brief, the purpose of the association is to foster love for the flute and music by performing chamber music that gives the instrument its proper setting; to encourage skill in execution; to create interest in music composed for the flute in combination with other instruments, also the voice.

Itself for a complete and of all the educational by one hand and form whole. Boston College ceptions, and from ever view the general public terest on the working out the same time giving it port, financial and other limits that can be set t civilizing value of such It is interesting to see a fashion the architects each element of the r sufficient variety, explicit ferentiation between the eral buildings, and yet it with notable consistency ture or factor in any tion which is of greater often neglected or alt than the chapel, because well learned by this th effective education that trated by religion at eve tion and the design of A for Boston College for The scheme itself is of R

HOW TO SAVE

Association for the Promotion of Savings Arrangements
Advice on Budgets at Savings Banks Next Month

Saving, when carried and conscientiously, is as instanced by the accomplishments of Benjamin Franklin, anyone of intelligence making a budget, show good results to save, but to obtain a reward for his efforts have a plan and carry it out systematically. In this way might seem too trivial as to enable one to save or each month and by expenditures properly, with gradually accumulate and be worth while.

Having these facts in mind for the Promotion of Savings today complete with six Boston saving banks the customers and the p to secure free advice music. In spite, however, of the green Miss S. Agnes Donflames of the flutes, the darker timbres tary of the department prevail. The difference between the or- association. Miss Dechestration of Bloch and that of Debussy each weekday in Mass. much between the alto and the soprano Suffolk Savings Bank, voice. There are browns and purples and days, 11 A. M. to 2 golds in Bloch's lyre deeper, than those Boston Five Cents S that appear in any of Debussy's. The bass street, Tuesdays, 9 tones of the harps, the old gold of the Home Savings Bank, nesdays, 9 A. M. to solo viola, predominate. Furthermore, the Franklin Savings Bank, days, 9 A. M. to instruments of percussion demanded by Union Institution for Bloch give his music a sharpness and street, Fridays, 9 briskness alien to Debussy's. He uses the Charlestown Five Cent snare-drum as effectively as does Strav- son square, Saturdinsky; there is a memorable passage in the

The association which banks as one of its makes plain that p tions are such as t ing and systematic man, woman and not only to help the the Government, to lated savings that ing and make work same time it is po must not be carried good living, educat amount of pleasure a well-rounded life. savings, but saving may be more abund individual advice h make these points - sist those who call the apportionment c Bank officers, sa becoming more an budgets as a mean tematic saving amo discouraging unwise ing. Many of the sections of the count and budget experts d tions such as the S Cleveland, the North Chicago and the Trust Company of have proved not on public but good bus savings departments banks, as well as M that whatever encour and systematic ad incomes will event vestment houses, al community developm and will make the standard of living al The idea behind

As in the past, the more various and in The Dial

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 21, AT 3.30

^{37th}
Thirty-fourth Concert for the Benefit of the Orchestra's

PENSION FUND

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME

Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"
(after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") Opus 35
I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar-Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to pieces against a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

Saint-Saëns Symphonic Poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule"
("The Youth of Hercules")

Liszt Concerto for Pianoforte in E-flat, No. 1

Wagner Overture to "Rienzi"

SOLOIST
GUY MAIER, Pianist

CHICKERING PIANO USED

Tickets at Symphony Hall Box Office. $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, no tax.

37TH PENSION FUND CONCERT

Vivid Performance of the "Scheherazade" Suite Is Orchestral Triumph

GUY MAIER SHOWS POWER AT PIANO

Herald — Nov. 22, 1920

In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony orchestra gave its 37th Pension Fund concert, the first of this season.

The program was: "Scheherazade," symphonic suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff; "The Youth of Hercules," symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; concerto in E-flat No. 1, for piano and orchestra, Liszt; "Rienzi" overture, Wagner. Guy Maier, pianist, was soloist.

The hall was filled. The orchestra was on its mettle. The conductor was in his best mood to take advantage of the skill and the special aplomb of his men. The audience was keenly curious to see how Mr. Monteux and the musicians would play the "Scheherazade" suite, as they were to give it for the first time together. Spontaneous enthusiasm greeted the suite at every break in its course. The concert was a splendid success.

A dominant note ran through the whole program—spectacular and glorious employment of conquering might. It was as if the selections had been made for the celebration of some great triumph. Perhaps Mr. Monteux and his men are mainly Republicans and took the chance to glorify the sweep of Nov. 2. At any rate, the whole program and the playing of it sounded like that from the surging victory of the sea over Sinbad's ship, shattered against the rock on which the bronze warrior stood, through the suggested power of young Hercules, in the triumphal strains of the concerto and down to the blaring pomp of "Rienzi."

The interspersed lyric beauties that served by contrast to make the impression of glory more vivid were exquisitely portrayed by Mr. Burgin in Scheherazade's tale-telling, by the orchestra and by Mr. Maier in the concerto.

The pianist and his characteristic manner fitted perfectly the general scheme of the concert. He seemed the animating centre of the whole machine. He played with all there was in him and with his whole body. Head, neck, shoulders, arms, legs, feet took part in the rhythm and the feeling. Mr. Maier is a two-fisted pianist and holds nothing in reserve. It is not posing. He just means everything he does. And he does it all superbly.

GUY MAIER

Herald — Nov. 14, 1920

No musician of Boston has made a more distinguished name for himself in recent years than Guy Maier, the pianist, who is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Pension Fund concert next Sunday afternoon. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals, not only here but in New York and other cities. Together with Lee Pattison, he has specialized in concerts of music for two pianos, and the two young men, by their combined talents, have created a fresh interest in music in this form.

At the declaration of war Mr. Maier went to France and took an important part in the work with our army there. He helped in the organization of the great "leave centres" behind the front, and delighted wounded soldiers by his concerts in many encampments. In Paris he also attracted considerable attention by his recitals. Last year, several concerts for young people, with preliminary talks on the music to be played, afforded some of the delightful musical events of the season.

At this concert he will perform Liszt's brilliant concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will make the afternoon exceptionally interesting by rendering Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," based upon tales from the Arabian Nights. Perhaps no score could display the individual talents of a virtuoso orchestra more strikingly than this colorful and pictorial masterpiece. Its notable violin solos will afford a special opportunity to hear the talents of the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin, as a virtuoso. The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Post.
Guy Maier Soloist With
Symphony Orchestra

Herold — 20: 22. 1930

An appropriate acclamation to the boisterous entrance of winter was the Pension fund concert given for and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Brilliance, dash, dramatic power and heroic energy adorned each of the four numbers on the programme, and in each the orchestra had ample opportunity to blaze forth, collectively and individually in all the glory and perfection of its technique and temperament. It seemed attuned to the raging storm outside, and in sonorous and magnificent passages translated the elements into the melody of strong emotions. The audience which entirely filled the house, was thoroughly appreciative, judging from the prolonged applause which recalled M. Monteux and the soloists many times, and was acknowledged by the entire orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" was given a wonderful performance, with its splendid underlying ring of the sea—now calmly rolling, now menacing and angry, finishing in the breathlessly dramatic wrecking of Sinbad's ship "against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior." It will be remembered that M. Monteux conducted the first ballet adaptation of this piece as Diaghileff's company performed it. Some very fine violin solo passages in this number were rendered by Richard R. Burgin, the new concert master. In fact this was his first important solo work with the Symphony Orchestra.

The symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," by Saint-Saens, although possessing its dramatic moments, and an undercurrent of buoyant strength, was much more quiet than the exuberant Russian piece.

A happy addition to the programme was the Liszt concerto in E flat, played by Guy Maier, with the orchestra. In his brilliant and sympathetic execution of this characteristic Liszt concerto, which runs the gamut of practically all human emotions, he has added further laurels to his name. Clear and bell-like in the lighter passages, magnificently abandoned in the heavy parts, his touch shows as great a sensitiveness as his technique. The orchestra supported him with perfect sympathy.

The last number was one which is always a favorite at the Pops, but was doubly glorified with the augmented winter orchestra. Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" set an emphatic and brilliant period to a rarely fine and nicely balanced concert.

"Scheherazade" and Supplements

The first purpose of a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the profit of its Pension Fund is to increase the income benevolently and deservingly disbursed. The second is to display the quality of the orchestra that sustains the fund and is the gainer by it. The third is to give to the assembled audience the pleasure of music and performance. By experience of the past a concert of Wagner's music best serves these three ends. Chaikovsky is useful to them, especially with his "Pathetic Symphony." An eminent "assisting artist," is also worth the while. Departures from routine waken discoverable interest as when Dr. Muck set Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz on such a programme, or when the Harvard Glee Club twice added choral pieces to the orchestral numbers. The dependable choice, however, is a "Wagner Concert." It fills Symphony Hall, puts conductor and band on their mettle, yields music that next to never in these days do we Bostonians hear in the opera house. Why not, then, return to such programmes for the Pension Fund? A miscellany like that of yesterday and of similar concerts within easy recollection takes a long chance. The orchestra was fortunate in the numbers of the audience on Sunday, though perceptible seats stood empty. Not yet, seemingly, does the town, by and large, know the renewal virtue of the band, while some have still to discover that usually Mr. Monteux is an interesting director.

Much more than such was the conductor in the principal piece of yesterday afternoon, Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite of the Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade." Through and through he knows the music, since time and again he has led in it in the version that suited the needs of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet. In itself, moreover, it quickens his best powers. The tonal texture is sumptuous and splendid, glowing with harmonic and instrumental color in mass, in contrasts, in strands finely spun. Throughout rhythm beats high and modulation tingles upon the ear. Climactic surge of progress alternates with pungent sensuous loveliness. As in a theatre of the imagination the ear may hear and the eye see the imagery of the music. Here Scheherazade herself speaks seductively to her listening lord. There drones the Kalendar at his wondrous tale. In the solitary garden the young prince and the young princess—"moons of their age"—whisper and dream and fondle. The revels of Baghdad swirl through the night. The great sea tosses Sinbad's ship from wave to wave. When Mr. Monteux can so visualize a music, so set it, as it were, within a theatre, he is invariably eloquent. Moreover, there is magic in "Scheherazade"—the magic of Rimsky-Korsakov's imagination when he would evoke the storied East; the magic of music when melody and modulation, rhythm and color, the matter within, the manner without, unite in deep and illusory sensation: upon any and all hearers. Mr. Monteux would not be the conductor that he is did he not stir to such conjuring.

Yesterday, besides, the orchestra caught sparks from director and composer. Familiarly "Scheherazade" has been displayful music for the virtuosi that strew the band. It was so again when Mr. Laus at the first bassoon began the tale of the Kalendar-Prince; when Mr. Sand sang upon his clarinet; when Mr. Holy added the color of his harp; when Mr. Burgin made the voice of Scheherazade upon his violin cajoling enough to win twenty Sultans. (In the orchestra he gains a beauty of penetrating tone, a warmth of expression that evaded him, the other day, as "solo-violinist" in a miscellaneous concert.) As signal were the virtues of the several choirs. The strings shimmered in the episode of the garden, or elsewhere set edge to Rimsky-Korsakov's modulations or again, sang deep and full in his sea-measures. The wood-winds and the horns were voice to the opulence, the glow of the whole music. The brass lent power and richness to its sonorities. The whole orchestra pulsed with rhythm. Hardly before in its new estate, has it seemed at once so puissant and sensitive an instrument. With the suite so played, both the tonal and the imaginative splendor of "Scheherazade" drenched those that heard. When the music was done, the listeners could say to themselves as they do after "Carmen" or "Tristan": "Our sons shall hear and know and delight in this as well as we."

As the fortunes of the afternoon went, the second part of the concert was far less interesting and impressive in the quality of both music and performance. No doubt Saint-Saens's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," has merits—appropriate motifs, smooth jointure, felicitous workmanship, a painstaking imagination. When Mr. Rabaud revived the piece, after years of neglect, the listener half-believed in it. Yesterday, however, the sensuous dalliance and the manly readiness, between which the young Hercules must choose, sounded equally dull. Virtue and vice at Saint-Saens's varnishing hands wizened into tonal platitude. The music smelt equally of the composer's study-table and of a large and fashionable Parisian audience. Nor did it receive exactly a polished and subtly accented performance. Since even working hours have their limits, Mr. Monteux could not prepare everything as he had "Scheherazade."

Liszt and Wagner filled the remainder of the programme—Liszt of the concerto for piano in E flat, Wagner of the overture to "Rienzi." Mr. Guy Maier played the solo part in the concerto, with a tone that seemed dry and hard, a stiff progress, an impassive mood, until he reached the scherzo-like measures. Then he lightened his touch, warmed his voice, relaxed his fingers and through the finale caught in measure the verve and glint of the music. Throughout, however, he remained literal, gaining neither the sweeping ardor nor the jewelled workmanship that are the two ways with Liszt of the concertos. As for the accompaniment—even the Symphony Orchestra may now and then fall away to "scratch performance." Far better went the overture to "Rienzi." Mr. Mager, indeed, made the trumpet passages at the beginning sound as though the Wagner of the golden prime had written them; while Mr. Monteux, as the music warrants, laid on and spared not, whether it was galumphing sound and fury or songful paste and fustian. Mr. Gilman, writing of this overture to "Rienzi" in a recent programme-book of the National Orchestra, remarked that it was "near-Mayerbeer." At the least, Mr. Monteux raised the alcoholic contents to something more than two and seventy-five hundredths per centum.

266

267

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 6, at 3.00 o'clock

Thirty-eighth Concert for the Benefit of the Orchestra's

PENSION FUND

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAMME:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Overture to "Tannhäuser" and Bacchanale
(Paris Version)
(With Chorus of Women's Voices)

Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walküre"

Prelude to the Third Act of "Tristan and Isolde" (With English Horn Solo)
Excerpts from "Der Ring des Nibelungen"
Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock;
("Siegfried," Act III, Scene 2)
Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine
Journey ("Götterdämmerung," Prologue)

Tickets now on sale at Symphony Hall Box Office. $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, no tax

WAGNER PROGRAM AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Plays
to Capacity Audience

People's Orchestra Wins Vigorous
Applause in Convention Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the second of its three concerts in aid of the pension fund yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The capacity audience and enthusiastic applause were partly a tribute to Wagner, excerpts from whose music dramas filled the entire program. It was a tradition for some years before the war to play a Wagner program at one of the pension fund concerts. It was also a tradition that the orchestra should be on its mettle on such occasions and better if possible the high standard of performance set at the regular concerts.

Yesterday the orchestra played much as though it were a "special Wagner night" at the Pops, where many rehearsals are an impossibility. Those skeptical listeners who have not heard such excellent recent performances as that of Beethoven's First Symphony on Jan 21 must have formed the impression that the absolute precision and euphony in ensemble which were a chief glory of the old Symphony Orchestra are absent in the present band.

The brass section were the most obvious offenders. The chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Agide Jacchia, sang its few measures off stage acceptably.

268

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 6, at 3.00 o'clock

Thirty-eighth Concert for the Benefit of the Orchestra's

PENSION FUND

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAMME:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Overture to "Tannhäuser" and Bacchanale
(Paris Version)
(With Chorus of Women's Voices)

Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walküre"

Prelude to the Third Act of "Tristan and Isolde"

(With English Horn Solo)

Excerpts from "Der Ring des Nibelungen"
Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock;
("Siegfried," Act III, Scene 2)
Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine
Journey ("Götterdämmerung," Prologue)

Tickets now on sale at Symphony Hall Box Office. $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, no tax

WAGNER PROGRAM AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Plays
to Capacity Audience

People's Orchestra Wins Vigorous
Applause in Convention Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the second of its three concerts in aid of the pension fund yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The capacity audience and enthusiastic applause were partly a tribute to Wagner, excerpts from whose music dramas filled the entire program. It was a tradition for some years before the war to play a Wagner program at one of the pension fund concerts. It was also a tradition that the orchestra should be on its mettle on such occasions and better if possible the high standard of performance set at the regular concerts.

Yesterday the orchestra played much as though it were a "special Wagner night" at the Pops, where many rehearsals are an impossibility. Those skeptical listeners who have not heard such excellent recent performances as that of Beethoven's First Symphony on Jan 21 must have formed the impression that the absolute precision and euphony in ensemble which were a chief glory of the old Symphony Orchestra are absent in the present band.

The brass section were the most obvious offenders. The chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Agide Jacchia, sang its few measures off stage acceptably.

268

269

SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 10, at 3.30 o'clock

Thirty-ninth Concert for the Benefit of the Orchestra's

PENSION FUND

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME

Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64

- I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
- II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
- III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
- IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

Allegro moderato from the Concerto for Violin in D major, No. 2, Op. 35

Soloist, RICHARD BURGIN

Italian Caprice, Op. 45

Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violon-cello with Orchestral Accompaniment,
Op. 33

Soloist, JEAN BEDETTI

Marche Slave, Op. 31

Tickets at Box Office, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00 (no tax)

270

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Herald — Nov. 16, 1921
Program of Exceptional Merit Receives Warm Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 39th concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted. The hall was well filled and an appreciative audience listened to the rather long program, which was made up of works by Tschai-kowsky.

The first half of the program was his symphony in E minor. Even with its finale of tremendous force, this symphony largely gives the impression of sombre and plaintive melody. The second half was in strong contrast, and the violin concerto in D major gave Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, a rare opportunity for the display of his excellent technic and emotional expression. Mr. Burgin was recalled four times to receive the applause of the audience.

The "Italian Caprice" brought out the full strength of the orchestra. Jean Bedetti, first cellist, played the "Variations on a Rococo Theme" with orchestral accompaniment, and he also returned several times to acknowledge the hearty plaudits which his playing justified.

The "Marche Slave," with its strongly marked Russian characteristics, was a fitting ending to a program of exceptional merit.

271

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

Two Hours of Chaikovsky Nov. 16, 1921

The Symphony Orchestra is generous to the public of the concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund. Many such hearers—conductor and manager seem to believe—seek it only on these occasions. To them accordingly it would return full measure. Hence programmes two hours long and programmes as often as not of the music of a single composer. Even Beethoven has so served a good cause; these many years Wagner has been prop and pillar to it; and next to Wagner, Chaikovsky. Usually, it has been the Chaikovsky of the Pathetic Symphony, the Nutcracker Ballet, or both. Yesterday, however, Mr. Monteux, as his frequent way is, departed from precedent. "All-Chaikovsky," as the patrons of the concert-hall puts it, was to be the programme; but by will of the conductor it traversed his Fifth Symphony, his Italian Caprice, his Slavic March, his Rocco Variations for Violoncello and Orchestra, the first movement of his Concerto for Violin. As frequenters of the regular Symphony Concerts know, Chaikovsky has there been in long eclipse. Dr. Muck disliked his music and mistrusted himself as conductor in it; Mr. Rabaud accepted unquestioned parochial Parisian scorn of it; only Mr. Monteux—and of late—has been open-minded to it and by no means unresponsive under the tests of actual performance. The more the pity then that no larger audience came to the well-spread board of yesterday. Possibly a casual public begins and ends with the Chaikovsky of the Pathetic Symphony and the Nutcracker Dances. Possibly a superior public dislikes the Slavic March or the Italian Caprice because they are played at the Pops. Yet they are not less inspiring pieces in kind; while for many years in many cities, the Russian's Fifth Symphony has borne many sons of scrutiny.

There was no mistaking either the pleasure that this music yielded or the just desert that it received in such restoration to the active repertory. The Rococo Variations may be as intricate, ornate and long-spun as the title implies; the violoncelist may for instant stumble, as did Mr. Bedetti on Sunday; yet in his tone the songful measures do not lack sensuous beauty nor the ornate measures fluent grace, nor the pattern-weaving piquant intricacy. A fragment of the Concerto for Violin remains a fragment, but in it Mr. Burgin did feats of virtuosity in the weaving of the cadenza, caught not a little of Russian fire and bite in the transitions, sounded the sensuous fullness of Chaikovsky's melody. Too finely in the cadenza he sometimes drew his tone, but elsewhere it warmed the ear. Agreed that the Italian Caprice is no match for Rimsky-Korsakov's similar Spanish adventure in instrumental and harmonic dress and in artful play with rhythms. But the very candors of Chaikovsky speak for him in the drenched Italian dance-tunes, the rhythmic vigors, the high colors, the broad strokes of a music designed to blaze and crackle. And the Slavic March is a march of racial moods as well as of racial hymn.

Yet it was the Symphony that brought Chaikovsky, conductor and orchestra fullest deserving. Theorize about the composer and his music as the doubter may "in the closet," pose as some of us do over both when we are in the company of the superior, yet in the concert-hall and in this Fifth Symphony, there is no resisting him. Hear again the sombre introduction; follow the tumults of the first movement; catch the mood of the half-sensuous, half-sentimental, full-throated, amply paced melody, and illusion begins. The long song of the Andante from the instant that the horn sounds it through the instant in which the violins resummon it makes of illusion emotion. The Waltz that is Scherzo is music of Chaikovsky haunted and fantasmal. The dark beginnings, the thrust into riotous turbulence in the Finale may be no more than routine Chaikovsky; but the splendors, the vigors, the proclamation of the will to live and the joy of living, flame at the end with power. Chaikovsky like Puccini may not abide the contacts of the study. The one, the other needs the contacts of concert-hall or opera house. For in their music, above all shortcomings, is human voice to as human emotion.

H. T. P.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the Symphony

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

FORTIETH SEASON, 1920-1921

OPENING CONCERT

Thursday Evening, October 14

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

HAROLD BAUER

PIANO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

Schumann, Mr. Bauer and Others

Save in one item, the programme of the Symphony Orchestra's concert in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last evening was derived from those of last week's and this week's concerts in Boston. From the former came Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Liszt's "Tasso," and from the latter Berlioz's Overture to his opera "Benvenuto Cellini." But while the soloist of today, Mr. Bauer, was heard last night, his chosen piece was Schumann's concerto, not Brahms's. Doubtless many would have appreciated the substitution of Lekeu's Fantasia for the "Tasso," but Mr. Monteux evidently desired the grandiloquent close which Liszt's symphonic poem affords. As we learn from the programme-book, an orchestra of truly modern proportions played the Eighth Symphony when it was first heard, and in a hall that accommodated three thousand people, yet there is no gainsaying that like the symphonies of Haydn, which it resembles at least in spirit, the piece sounds to better advantage in Sanders Theatre than in a larger auditorium. It is possible to find this "little symphony," as its composer called it, the most engrossing of the nine. In certain of the others Beethoven scaled of the Eighth Symphony is readily understandable.

Had Berlioz been content to write according to the models of his time instead of anticipating the manners and methods of fifty years hence, he would have escaped the suggestion of amateurishness which is not infrequently found in his music. On the other hand he would have given us no excuse for the wonder which he must inevitably feel when we listen to it with a thought for its historical surroundings. In this overture as elsewhere Berlioz is weakest when he attempts sustained melody. He was following a sure instinct when he strove to get away from the square-cut periods of the classical school, but he failed to find a satisfactory substitute. The cantilena near the beginning of the piece is amorphous, and the broken chord accompaniment, on which Berlioz generally relied in such situations, is as bald as anything in Donizetti.

Once that is over with, the overture is a succession of fascinating episodes, and for sheer dazzling brilliance its instrumentation is still unparalleled. How different this brilliance from the blatancy of Liszt's musical flag-raising at the end of "Tasso"—not without its stimulation to the audi-

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

FORTIETH SEASON, 1920-1921

OPENING CONCERT

Thursday Evening, October 14

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

HAROLD BAUER

PIANO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

Schumann, Mr. Bauer and Others

Save in one item, the programme of the Symphony Orchestra's concert in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last evening was derived from those of last week's and this week's concerts in Boston. From the former came Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Liszt's "Tasso," and from the latter Berlioz's Overture to his opera "Benvenuto Cellini." But while the soloist of today, Mr. Bauer, was heard last night, his chosen piece was Schumann's concerto, not Brahms's. Doubtless many would have appreciated the substitution of Lekeu's Fantasia for the "Tasso," but Mr. Monteux evidently desired the grandiloquent close which Liszt's symphonic poem affords. As we learn from the programme-book, an orchestra of truly modern proportions played the Eighth Symphony when it was first heard, and in a hall that accommodated three thousand people, yet there is no gainsaying that like the symphonies of Haydn, which it resembles at least in spirit, the piece sounds to better advantage in Sanders Theatre than in a larger auditorium. It is possible to find this "little symphony," as its composer called it, the most engrossing of the nine. In certain of the others Beethoven scaled

of the Eighth Symphony is readily understandable.

Had Berlioz been content to write according to the models of his time instead of anticipating the manners and methods of fifty years hence, he would have escaped the suggestion of amateurishness which is not infrequently found in his music. On the other hand he would have given us no excuse for the wonder which he must inevitably feel when we listen to it with a thought for its historical surroundings. In this overture as elsewhere Berlioz is weakest when he attempts sustained melody. He was following a sure instinct when he strove to get away from the square-cut periods of the classical school, but he failed to find a satisfactory substitute. The cantilena near the beginning of the piece is amorphous, and the broken chord accompaniment, on which Berlioz generally relied in such situations, is as bald as anything in Donizetti.

Once that is over with, the overture is a succession of fascinating episodes, and for sheer dazzling brilliance its instrumentation is still unparalleled. How different this brilliance from the blatancy of Liszt's musical flag-raising at the end of "Tasso"—not without its stimulation to the audi-

274

tory nerve, but yet so trumpety. Aside from the rhetorical melancholy of the opening, which is still impressive, and the soaring melody of the cellos which follows, "Tasso" has little to commend it. The episode of the poet at the court of Ferrara is not without a certain charm, but it is almost forgotten in the empty din of the end. In adding two more movements to his "Allegro Affetuoso," to make his piano-concerto, Schumann descended somewhat from the level of his first inspiration, and the piece as a whole has no such unity as the first division would have had, did it stand alone. Nevertheless we should be grateful for the beauties that these added movements contain, particularly the melody for cellos and violas in the Intermezzo. And while the finale has the least to offer of any, it furnishes the excitement without which no concert-piece is supposed to be complete. Nowhere else in his symphonic music does Schumann write with such sustained eloquence—and such coherence—as in this Allegro Affetuoso. Moreover, to no pianist of our times is it given to play that entrancing passage which begins the "development" as Mr. Bauer plays it. Here for an instant is the very soul of beauty. For that matter the whole concerto seems to be peculiarly Mr. Bauer's own. The performances of other pianists, however praiseworthy, only serve to enhance the recollection of his. And last evening he was once more wholly in the vein. Throughout he brought to Schumann's music the beauty of tone and warmth of imagination that is its meed. In his hands the melodies of the first movement sang, the phrases of the Intermezzo were lightly carved and flung aside, and the passage-work of the finale ran with due speed and never with haste. And always there was abundant feeling for the poetic quality that sets the piece apart from other concertos. W. S. S.

275

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

SECOND CONCERT
Thursday Evening, November 11

FORTIETH SEASON, 1920-1921

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

EVA GAUTHIER

Soprano

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

EVA GAUTHIER IN NEW LIGHTS AT CAMBRIDGE

Donizetti, Chinese Mother-Goose and the Symphony Orchestra — George Fergusson, Better with Programme Than Song — A Young Italian in Chicago—Mozart and Mme. Hempel—"Petrouchka" from Mr. Montoux—Other Impending Pleasures

TWO pieces by American composers stood on the programme of last evening's Symphony Concert in Cambridge—Edward Burlingame Hill's "The Fall of the House of Usher," recently played in Boston and New York, and Bainbridge Crist's set of songs from the Chinese Mother Goose, sung by Mme. Eva Gauthier. In the many comments that have been made on Mr. Hill's new tone-poem there appears to have been nearly unanimous opinion that he has failed to communicate in his music the exact spirit of Poe's tale, that he has been unable to translate into tone its atmosphere of bod- ing and horror. But in all justice to Mr. Hill, could he do otherwise than fail? It has more than once been said that the function of music is to idealize and trans- figure, that the expression of evil is inim- ical to its very nature. We know that Wagner, failed with Mime and Verdi with Iago. Certain terrifying effects are pos- sible in music—especially in opera, where the action necessarily aids—but they are achieved through specific "shuddery" ef- fects—string tremolos, dissonant harmony, chromatic scales, muted horns, ominous beatings of the bass drum, and similar paraphernalia. As proof that the atmos- phere of horror can be thus created and sustained we have only to turn to the second act of "Tosca." But a symphonic piece cannot be moulded from such ma- terial, and Mr. Hill is too good a musician to attempt such a thing. His music seizes on whatever in Poe's story is really avail- able for its purpose and gives it fitting expression. For the rest, the tale and the music remain distinct and apart.

In their original version for voice and piano, Mr. Crist's quaintly fanciful settings of these Chinese rhymes have been made known to us by Mr. Werrenrath and others.

tory nerve, but yet so trumpety. Aside from the rhetorical melancholy of the opening, which is still impressive, and the soaring melody of the 'cellos which follows, "Tasso" has little to commend it. The episode of the poet at the court of Ferrara is not without a certain charm, but it is almost forgotten in the empty din of the end.

In adding two more movements to his "Allegro Affetuoso," to make his piano-concerto, Schumann descended somewhat from the level of his first inspiration, and the piece as a whole has no such unity as the first division would have had, did it stand alone. Nevertheless we should be grateful for the beauties that these added movements contain, particularly the melody for 'cellos and violas in the Intermezzo. And while the finale has the least to offer of any, it furnishes the excitement without which no concert-piece is supposed to be complete. Nowhere else in his symphonic music does Schumann write with such sustained eloquence—and such coherence—as in this Allegro Affetuoso. Moreover, to no pianist of our times is it given to play that entrancing passage which begins the "development" as Mr. Bauer plays it. Here for an instant is the very soul of beauty. For that matter the whole concerto seems to be peculiarly Mr. Bauer's own. The performances of other pianists, however praiseworthy, only serve to enhance the recollection of his. And last evening he was once more wholly in the vein. Throughout he brought to Schumann's music the beauty of tone and warmth of imagination that is its meed. In his hands the melodies of the first movement sang, the phrases of the Intermezzo were lightly carved and flung aside, and the passage-work of the finale ran with due speed and never with haste. And always there was abundant feeling for the poetic quality that sets the piece apart from other concertos. W. S. S.

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

SECOND CONCERT
Thursday Evening, November 11

FORTIETH SEASON, 1920-1921

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

EVA GAUTHIER

Soprano

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

EVA GAUTHIER IN NEW LIGHTS AT CAMBRIDGE

Donizetti, Chinese Mother-Goose and the Symphony Orchestra — George Fergusson, Better with Programme Than Song — A Young Italian in Chicago—Mozart and Mme. Hempel—"Petrouchka" from Mr. Monteux—Other Impending Pleasures

TWO pieces by American composers stood on the programme of last evening's Symphony Concert in Cambridge—Edward Burlingame Hill's "The Fall of the House of Usher," recently played in Boston and New York, and Bainbridge Crist's set of songs from the Chinese Mother Goose, sung by Mme. Eva Gauthier. In the many comments that have been made on Mr. Hill's new tone-poem there appears to have been nearly unanimous opinion that he has failed to communicate in his music the exact spirit of Poe's tale, that he has been unable to translate into tone its atmosphere of boding and horror. But in all justice to Mr. Hill, could he do otherwise than fail? It has more than once been said that the function of music is to idealize and transfigure, that the expression of evil is inimical to its very nature. We know that Wagner failed with Mime and Verdi with Iago. Certain terrifying effects are possible in music—especially in opera, where the action necessarily aids—but they are achieved through specific "shuddery" effects—string tremolos, dissonant harmony, chromatic scales, muted horns, ominous beatings of the bass drum, and similar paraphernalia. As proof that the atmosphere of horror can be thus created and sustained we have only to turn to the second act of "Tosca." But a symphonic piece cannot be moulded from such material, and Mr. Hill is too good a musician to attempt such a thing. His music seizes on whatever in Poe's story is really available for its purpose and gives it fitting expression. For the rest, the tale and the music remain distinct and apart.

In their original version for voice and piano, Mr. Crist's quaintly fanciful settings of these Chinese rhymes have been made known to us by Mr. Werrenrath and others.

Last season Mme. Gauthier sang them in an arrangement for "chamber-orchestra," according to the present fashion. If we are not mistaken, the performance was the first in which a full orchestral accompaniment was used. At first blush it might seem that here was an invasion of the traditional dignity of the Symphony Concerts, but the audience received the songs with open arms. Mr. Crist's music was its own justification, and Mme. Gauthier is to be thanked for her courage in singing it. Two numbers of the set, a little more broadly farcical than the others, were omitted. Last night we had "Lady-Bug," "Baby is Sleeping," "What the Old Cow Said," "Of What Use Is a Girl?" and "The Mouse." Mr. Crist's instrumentation enhances the point and wit of his musical settings; there is an ingenious use of Oriental coloring. The reference to the North Wind in the song of the Cow gave the composer opportunity for a miniature tempest in which the voice of the singer was for a moment lost, but the air soon cleared. Mr. Crist was fortunate in such an interpreter for his songs as Mme. Gauthier; they were sung musically and tactfully, yet with full appreciation of their humor.

Was it to prove that her devotion to the moderns does not debar her from singing music of the old Italian school that induced Mme. Gauthier to sing an aria from Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia"? If it was, she gained her point. Her performance of this antiquated piece was brilliant in the extreme and conspicuous for tonal beauty. It was a bit of a shock to hear in the opening measures of the aria the first phrase of Rossini's "Quis est Homo." But whether or not Rossini stole it, he improved upon it. Mr. Runciman once wrote of the "stream of brackish water that daily flowed from Donizetti's pen." If the other music of "Lucrezia Borgia" is as glaringly inappropriate to the dramatic situation, let us hope that the opera will not be revived for Mme. Galli-Curci.

Pieces from recent Boston programmes filled the remainder of the concert—for beginning Sibelius's vivid and vital Symphony in E minor, for conclusion Beethoven's puissant Overture to "Leonore," No. 3. The comment of Mr. Paul Rosenfeld, quoted in the programme book, that Sibelius "has written music innocent of roof and inclosure, music proper indeed to the vasty open, the Finnish heaven under which it grew," seemed singularly apt last evening. In the smaller auditorium the symphony seemed cramped and constrained. If ever music suggested space and cries for it, it is this. W. S. S.

TODAY CONTINUOUS FROM 5:00 to 10:30
MARGUERITE CLARK in "A Named Mary." CONSTANCE BIN in "Erstwhile Susan."
Fenway Symphony Orchestra

MON., TUES. & WED.
TOM MEIGHAN
in "The Prince Chap
CHARLIE CHAPLIN
in "The Adventurer"

THURS., FRI. & SAT.
WILLIAM FARNUM
in "Drag Harlan"
BILLIE BURKE
in "The Frisky Mrs. John"

LOEW'S COLUMBIA Waih. Mott
12 to 10:30
MON., TUES. & WED.
ALL-STAR
VAUDEVILLE
TOP-LINE PHOTO PRODUCTION
"THE SAPHIRE"
with an All-Star Cast
ALMA HANLON
in "The Mystic Hour"

THURS., FRI. & SAT.
COMPLETE CHANGE
NEW VAUDEVILLE
MRS. SESSUE HAYAKAWA
in "The Breath of the Gods"
ANNA O. NEILSON

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

THIRD CONCERT
Thursday Evening, December 16

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

RICHARD BURGIN

Violin

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

The Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge with Mr. Burgin Playing Glazunov's Concerto for Violin—Louis Bennett, a Singer at Beginnings.

These are busy days for Mr. Richard Burgin; in three successive concerts, last evening in Cambridge, today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall, he must not only discharge his duties as concert-master of the orchestra, he must also appear as "assisting artist." According to the original plan he was to prepare but one concerto, that of Brahms, for all three occasions; but that there might not be both a symphony and concerto by Brahms in a single programme, he substituted yesterday Glazunov's Concerto in A minor. Like most of the Russian's music, the concerto is agreeable to hear and grateful to play, but of no particular importance. In retrospect, between Brahms's E-minor Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," it seems no more than a few pretty tunes for the solo instrument, interlarded with the customary passage-work, and set against a discreet and decorous orchestral accompaniment. The true measure of Mr. Burgin's ability will be revealed in the more exacting music of Brahms. It might almost be taken for granted that he has the technical proficiency and the general musicianship that Glazunov's piece requires; and it need only be said that his performance of it met expectations. Mr. Burgin's tone is pleasing to the ear, if not remarkable either for richness or brilliance. There is, moreover, an earnestness and self-effacement in his playing, of which his work in the orchestra has already given more than a hint. It is easy to believe from the warmth of the reception accorded him last evening that he has already made a firm place for himself in the esteem of his fellow-players and of the subscribers to the concerts.

Of the symphony and the tone-poem there is little to be said at this late date, either as to the pieces themselves, or Mr. Monteux's and the orchestra's work in them. They have been played many times since they were heard in Boston a few weeks ago, and in both it is possible to note a greater smoothness and a certain polishing of details. There is little need to wonder at the distrust with which Brahms's friends regarded his Fourth Symphony, or at his own readiness to

Last season Mme. Gauthier sang them in an arrangement for "chamber-orchestra," according to the present fashion. If we are not in the first instance, that is, that her dignity and her position for her of the than we have. "What is a Gauthier of his lions uence to Cow g. miniat the sir air soc in suc as Mr cally a tion of Was modern music duced Donize she ga of this the ex beauty in the first ph But w

Eva Gauthier,

Improved upon it. Mr. Kuchman once wrote of the "stream of brackish water that daily flowed from Donizetti's pen." If the other music of "Lucrezia Borgia" is as glaringly inappropriate to the dramatic situation, let us hope that the opera will not be revived for Mme. Galli-Curci.

Pieces from recent Boston programmes filled the remainder of the concert—for beginning Sibelius's vivid and vital Symphony in E minor, for conclusion Beethoven's puissant Overture to "Leonore," No. 3. The comment of Mr. Paul Rosenfeld, quoted in the programme book, that Sibelius "has written music innocent of roof and inclosure, music proper indeed to the vasty open, the Finnish heaven under which it grew," seemed singularly apt last evening. In the smaller auditorium the symphony seemed cramped and constrained. If ever music suggested space and cries for it, it is this. W. S. S.

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

THIRD CONCERT
Thursday Evening, December 16

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

RICHARD BURGIN

Violin

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

The Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge with Mr. Burgin Playing Glazunov's Concerto for Violin—Louis Bennett, a Singer at Beginnings

Trans. — Dec. 17, 1920
These are busy days for Mr. Richard Burgin; in three successive concerts, last evening in Cambridge, today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall, he must not only discharge his duties as concert-master of the orchestra, he must also appear as "assisting artist." According to the original plan he was to prepare but one concerto, that of Brahms, for all three occasions; but that there might not be both a symphony and concerto by Brahms in a single programme, he substituted yesterday Glazunov's Concerto in A minor. Like most of the Russian's music, the concerto is agreeable to hear and grateful to play, but of no particular importance. In retrospect, between Brahms's E-minor Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," it seems no more than a few pretty tunes for the solo instrument, interlarded with the customary passage-work, and set against a discreet and decorous orchestral accompaniment. The true measure of Mr. Burgin's ability will be revealed in the more exacting music of Brahms. It might almost be taken for granted that he has the technical proficiency and the general musicianship that Glazunov's piece requires; and it need only be said that his performance of it met expectations. Mr. Burgin's tone is pleasing to the ear, if not remarkable either for richness or brilliance. There is, moreover, an earnestness and self-effacement in his playing, of which his work in the orchestra has already given more than a hint. It is easy to believe from the warmth of the reception accorded him last evening that he has already made a firm place for himself in the esteem of his fellow-players and of the subscribers to the concerts.

Of the symphony and the tone-poem there is little to be said at this late date, either as to the pieces themselves, or Mr. Monteux's and the orchestra's work in them. They have been played many times since they were heard in Boston a few weeks ago, and in both it is possible to note a greater smoothness and a certain polishing of details. There is little need to wonder at the distrust with which Brahms's friends regarded his Fourth Symphony, or at his own readiness to share in it. Except in the first two movements, the piece is far less genial than its predecessors. The gaiety of the scherzo is forced and clumsy, and perhaps the very choice of the Passacaglia as form for the Finale was an admission on the part of the composer that he could not again duplicate the sweeping and sustained last movements of the other symphonies. Almost inevitably patchy, the Finale of the fourth, despite the skill with which it is welded together, and in listening interest flags and revives by turns. But in the first movement, and to a less degree in the second, there is a certain grave, autumnal beauty, that sets them apart from other music. One of the curious tricks of musical chronology is found in the brief span of ten years which separated this symphony from Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." As the two pieces sound today, it might have been fifty.

278

279

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

FOURTH CONCERT
Thursday Evening, January 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

KATHARINE GOODSON

Piano

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

The Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Goodson at Cambridge—Notable Playing of Grieg's Piano-Concerto and Debussy's "Sea-Pieces"—Mme. Szumowska Reappears as Pianist with Many a Polish Piece Upon Her Programme

AS originally announced, the programme of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening was to have concluded with the overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys," but to the greater entertainment of most of those who were there, Debussy's symphonic sketches, "La Mer," were played in its stead. The rest of the concert proceeded according to the initial plan. It began with Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni"; the symphony was Schumann's in D minor; and Katherine Goodson played the solo part in Grieg's concerto for piano and orchestra. After the recent exciting interlude, it was good to hear once more the round, full-bodied, satisfying tone of our own orchestra. And with all due respect to those whose brains are still afire with the recollection of a certain sensational afternoon and evening of the week just passed, it may be said that it was also good to hear orchestral pieces as they probably sounded in the mind of the composer, and not necessarily as they may happen to sound in the mind of a highly gifted, though nevertheless somewhat erratic, conductor. Last evening the performance of overture, suite and symphony was each in its way highly effective. While Dr. Muck frequently found a place on his programme for Debussy's "La Mer," he made no secret of the fact that he did not like it; and it was easy to discern in Mr. Monteux's reading of it a greater sympathy with the composer's means and intentions. There was a greater plasticity, a more poetic quality; and seldom have the instrumental voices sounded so luminous and their progress so lucid. And never, too, has Debussy's orchestral palette presented such a variety of tints and half-tints, or, at times, of glowing and garish colors. As is usual when the music in hand tempts their better powers, the orchestra displayed genuine virtuosity. Already time has begun to winnow Debussy's music; much of it now seems to be no more than a following of formulas, even though they were formulas that Debussy himself created. But "La Mer" must unquestionably be classed with his more enduring things, by reason of its melodic share in it. Except in the first two movements, the piece is far less genial than its predecessors. The gaiety of the scherzo is forced and clumsy, and perhaps the very choice of the Passacaglia as form for the Finale was an admission on the part of the composer that he could not again duplicate the sweeping and sustained last movements of the other symphonies. Almost inevitably patchy, the Finale of the fourth, despite the skill with which it is welded together, and in listening interest flags and revives by turns. But in the first movement, and to a less degree in the second, there is a certain grave, autumnal beauty, that sets them apart from other music. One of the curious tricks of musical chronology is found in the brief span of ten years which separated this symphony from Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." As the two pieces sound today, it might have been fifty.

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

FOURTH CONCERT
Thursday Evening, January 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

KATHARINE GOODSON

Piano

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

The Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Goodson at Cambridge—Notable Playing of Grieg's Piano-Concerto and Debussy's "Sea-Pieces"—Mme. Szumowska Reappears as Pianist with Many a Polish Piece Upon Her Programme

AS originally announced, the programme of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening was to have concluded with the overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys," but to the greater entertainment of most of those who were there, Debussy's symphonic sketches, "La Mer," were played in its stead. The rest of the concert proceeded according to the initial plan. It began with Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni"; the symphony was Schumann's in D minor; and Katherine Goodson played the solo part in Grieg's concerto for piano and orchestra. After the recent exciting interlude, it was good to hear once more the round, full-bodied, satisfying tone of our own orchestra. And with all due respect to those whose brains are still alive with the recollection of a certain sensational afternoon and evening of the week just passed, it may be said that it was also good to hear orchestral pieces as they probably sounded in the mind of the composer, and not necessarily as they may happen to sound in the mind of a highly gifted, though nevertheless somewhat erratic, conductor. Last evening the performance of overture, suite and symphony was each in its way highly effective. While Dr. Muck frequently found a place on his programme for Debussy's "La Mer," he made no secret of the fact that he did not like it; and it was easy to discern in Mr. Monteux's reading of it a greater sympathy with the composer's means and intentions. There was a greater plasticity, a more poetic quality; and seldom have the instrumental voices sounded so luminous and their progress so lucid. And never, too, has Debussy's orchestral palette presented such a variety of tints and half-tints, or, at times, of glowing and garish colors. As is usual when the music in hand tempts their better powers, the orchestra displayed genuine virtuosity. Already time has begun to winnow Debussy's music; much of it now seems to be no more than a following of formulas, even though they were formulas that Debussy himself created. But "La Mer" must unquestionably be classed with his more enduring things, by reason of its melodic harmonic, and orchestral beauty, its highly imaginative quality, and its structural strength.

For a much longer period this process of sifting has been at work with the compositions, small and large, of Robert Schumann. It now seems that of the four symphonies, this one in D minor has the greatest vitality, the freshest appeal. For all their obvious unsuitability for symphonic treatment, its themes have a vigorous directness that is still appealing, nor is the thickness of the orchestral writing wholly inappropriate to the lusty spirit of the music. Though it is less true in music than in the other arts, there are times when the idea matters more than the form in which it is cast. Only thus can we account for the survival of Schumann's symphonic writing. On merely technical grounds it should have perished long ago.

It would not be easy to think of Grieg as the composer of symphonies; fortunately he never tried. The nearest he came to it, saving an early and discarded attempt, was to write this concerto for the piano. As with Schumann the themes are not too well suited to their purpose; they do not lend themselves readily to development, and they receive little enough of it, in the accepted sense of the word. Also as with Schumann, the music is short-breathed, patchy, and episodic, although there is far more skillful handling of the orchestra. But once again it is the quality of sheer inspiration, the ability to invest salient and individual ideas that saved the situation, and this concerto is fresher after its fifty-two and a half years than much that was put on paper the day before yesterday. Perhaps a little of the credit for the effect of the piece last evening should be laid to the performance, not only of Mme. Goodson, but of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, who were evidently caught up and carried along by the amazing eloquence and vividness of her playing. It was several years ago that Mme. Goodson played the concerto here for the first time, but from last evening it might have been a new and exciting experience for her. In these days of refinements and super-refinements it is refreshing to hear—and see—a pianist "cut loose." Especially when, as was the case, it is done without any sacrifice of the finer and more exacting qualities of performance.

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

FIFTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, February 10

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

280
harmonic, and orchestral beauty, its highly imaginative quality, and its structural strength.

For a much longer period this process of sifting has been at work with the compositions, small and large, of Robert Schumann. It now seems that of the four symphonies, this one in D minor has the greatest vitality, the freshest appeal. For all their obvious unsuitability for symphonic treatment, its themes have a vigorous directness that is still appealing, nor is the thickness of the orchestral writing wholly inappropriate to the lusty spirit of the music. Though it is less true in music than in the other arts, there are times when the idea matters more than the form in which it is cast. Only thus can we account for the survival of Schumann's symphonic writing. On merely technical grounds it should have perished long ago.

It would not be easy to think of Grieg as the composer of symphonies; fortunately he never tried. The nearest he came to it, saving an early and discarded attempt, was to write this concerto for the piano. As with Schumann the themes are not too well suited to their purpose; they do not lend themselves readily to development, and they receive little enough of it, in the accepted sense of the word. Also as with Schumann, the music is short-breathed, patchy, and episodic, although there is far more skillful handling of the orchestra. But once again it is the quality of sheer inspiration, the ability to invest salient and individual ideas that saved the situation, and this concerto is fresher after its fifty-two and a half years than much that was put on paper the day before yesterday. Perhaps a little of the credit for the effect of the piece last evening should be laid to the performance, not only of Mme. Goodson, but of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, who were evidently caught up and carried along by the amazing eloquence and vividness of her playing. It was several years ago that Mme. Goodson played the concerto here for the first time, but from last evening it might have been a new and exciting experience for her. In these days of refinements and super-refinements it is refreshing to hear—and see—a pianist "cut loose." Especially when, as was the case, it is done without any sacrifice of the finer and more exacting qualities of performance.

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

FIFTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, February 10

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

SIXTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, March 24

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALICE NIELSEN, Soprano

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

BEETHOVEN AND MR. MONTEUX AT CAMBRIDGE

Trans. — Mch. 25, 1921

THE most interesting incident of the Symphony Concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening, was the performance—the first that Mr. Monteux has given here—of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. The remaining numbers were culled from recent Boston programmes, even to the two arias of Mozart sung by Miss Alice Nielsen. In its one hundredth and thirteenth year of existence the Pastoral can be variously appraised. Thematically and structurally—in short, as absolute music—it falls below all the other symphonies of Beethoven, save the first and perhaps the second, but its programme, naive as it seems in these days of descriptive and delineative music, gives it a borrowed interest, and for the most part the piece makes diverting entertainment. Only the introductions to "Die Walküre" and "Otello" have surpassed in effectiveness, and even in realism, the storm-music and this, and the movements of gaiety and rejoicing which precede and follow it are today the freshest portion of the symphony. Both the serene and reflective opening and the succeeding "Scene by the Brook-side"—once rated a masterpiece of naturalistic music—now seem monotonous and over-long. Each clings too closely to its "centre key" and its characteristic figuration. Mr. Monteux's "reading" of the symphony is admirable. He avoids dangerous slowness of pace in the Andante, he makes the tempest vivid and dramatic and the music as a whole luminous and supple.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and "Romeo Alone; Grand Fête at the Capulets" from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," completed the purely orchestral part of the concert, and Miss Nielsen's songs were the Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Juan." Last evening Miss Nielsen's voice seemed tired, her tones at times a little "edged," but she sang with her accustomed skill, with the purity of style that Mozart's music demands. As to the songs themselves, the former, one of the most beautiful of Mozart's melodies, has best withstood the years; heard dispassionately, "Batti, Batti"—famed though it is and widely popular—seems now over-ingenuous, almost insipid and as inappropriate to the words that prompted it as anything in Donizetti. No doubt there are many who still take pleasure in this Overture of Weber with its sonorous and effective instrumentation, its rhetoric, its "fat" tune, its measures of unearthly quietness. At least Weber knew what he wished to do, and he accomplished his end unhesitatingly. But Berlioz, more richly endowed and less thoroughly, less severely schooled, daring greatly, dreaming ecstatically, sometimes struck fire and sometimes lost himself in mere fritterings and empty clatter. There are better things in his "Romeo and Juliet" than this music of the hall and of the solitary Romeo.

W. S. S.

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

SIXTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, March 24

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALICE NIELSEN, Soprano

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

BEETHOVEN AND MR. MONTEUX AT CAMBRIDGE

Review, March 25, 1921

THE most interesting incident of the Symphony Concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening, was the performance—the first that Mr. Monteux has given here—of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. The remaining numbers were culled from recent Boston programmes, even to the two arias of Mozart sung by Miss Alice Nielsen. In its one hundredth and thirteenth year of existence the Pastoral can be variously appraised. Thematically and structurally—in short, as absolute music—it falls below all the other symphonies of Beethoven, save the first and perhaps the second, but its programme, naïve as it seems in these days of descriptive and delineative music, gives it a borrowed interest, and for the most part the piece makes diverting entertainment. Only the introductions to "Die Walküre" and "Otel'o" have surpassed in effectiveism, and even in realism, the storm-music and this, and the movements of gaiety and rejoicing which precede and follow it are today the freshest portion of the symphony. Both the serene and reflective opening and the succeeding "Scene by the Brook-side"—once rated a masterpiece of naturalistic music—now seem monotonous and over-long. Each clings too closely to its "centre key" and its characteristic figuration. Mr. Monteux's "reading" of the symphony is admirable. He avoids dangerous slowness of pace in the Andante, he makes the tempest vivid and dramatic and the music as a whole luminous and supple.

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and "Romeo Alone; Grand Fête at the Capulets" from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," completed the purely orchestral part of the concert, and Miss Nielsen's songs were the Aria, "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Figaro's Wedding" and "Batti, Batti" from "Don Juan." Last evening Miss Nielsen's voice seemed tired, her tones at times a little "edged," but she sang with her accustomed skill, with the purity of style that Mozart's music demands. As to the songs themselves, the former, one of the most beautiful of Mozart's melodies, has best withstood the years; heard dispassionately, "Batti, Batti"—famed though it is and widely popular—seems now over-ingenuous, almost insipid and as inappropriate to the words that prompted it as anything in Donizetti. No doubt there are many who still take pleasure in this Overture of Weber with its sonorous and effective instrumentation, its rhetoric, its "fat" tune, its measures of unearthly quietness. At least Weber knew what he wished to do, and he accomplished his end unhesitatingly. But Berlioz, more richly endowed and less thoroughly, less severely schooled, daring greatly, dreaming ecstatically, sometimes struck fire and sometimes lost himself in mere fritterings and empty clatter. There are better things in his "Romeo and Juliet" than this music of the hall and of the solitary Romeo.

W. S. S.

Alice Nielsen

(Photograph by Mishkin)

SANDERS THEATRE

CAMBRIDGE

SEVENTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, April 7

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ANTONIO GERARDI, Violin

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

Mendelssohn Prevails

Not Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" nor Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," but the Scotch Symphony of one Felix Mendelssohn, was the freshest music of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening. It has been the custom hereabouts—and probably elsewhere to take the "Scotch Symphony" from its shelf once in every five or ten years, dust it politely, perform it dutifully and replace it with pious satisfaction. Not long ago Mr. Monteux took it upon himself to give the piece its occasional hearing, but somehow the condescension and tolerance with which it has been the fashion to regard it were turned into frank and out-spoken enthusiasm. Possibly Mr. Monteux's undeniably excellent performance has worked this change in us, or perhaps the scales have fallen from our eyes. Tradition has told us that the symphonies of Schumann, for example, are much greater than those of Mendelssohn, that Mendelssohn, though a very pretty fellow in his time, has been much over-rated and that however charming certain of his overtures may be, his symphonies, even The Scotch—admittedly the best of them—are decidedly second-rate. Yet Mr. Monteux has been most assiduous with these same symphonies of Schumann and some of us have been wondering how we could so long have overlooked their ineptness, their short-breathed, unsymphonic themes, their clumsy orchestration. Then, after its customary silence, came this symphony of Mendelssohn's and it was found to be replete with atmosphere, its melodies salient, arresting, its instrumentation unfailingly felicitous—in short, an example of perfect craftsmanship, of the art which conceals itself. Granting the taint of sentimentality in the Adagio and a hint of something dangerously close to bathos in the final Allegro maestoso, the Scotch Symphony has proven capital entertainment in two concerts of a single season.

From his desk among the first violins, where he has sat these nine years, Mr. Antonio Gerardi came forward last evening and played the solo part in Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Mr. Gerardi's task was a hard one, not alone because of the difficulty of the music but because of the strangeness of his position. It was not surprising that at first he should show signs of nervousness, but he soon recovered himself and throughout the rest of the piece played with technical ease, ample feeling for the peculiar elegance of the music and—especially in the Andante—a warm flowing tone.

Of itself Lalo's music sounded a little faltering and ineffectual after the refreshing sureness of Mendelssohn's and in its turn Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" seemed somewhat labored and manufactured, derivative rather than essentially creative and original. Yet it is interesting, at times even exciting, to hear and the title finds its justification in a certain largeness, a bardic quality, that pervades it—due partly to the massive, brassy instrumentation. This music has plangency and pomp, yet not a little of it is emptily noisy, nor are the themes particularly striking, though the broad melody of which the composer seems so fond has a certain impressiveness, and it lends itself well to the sonorous treatment it receives.

W. S. S.

SANDERS THEATRE : : CAMBRIDGE

LAST CONCERT THIS SEASON

Thursday Evening, April 28, at 8

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST:

FÉLIX FOX

Piano

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

288

Strauss, Chalkovsky and Beethoven
the Symphony Orchestra in Cambri
Ruth Bernard for New and Well-Sch
Pianist

Trans. — Apr. 29, 1911

THOSE who attended the Sym-
Concert in Cambridge last ev-heard two pieces that have not given at the regular subscription cor-
in Boston since the days of Dr. M.
the Fifth Symphony of Chalkovsky
Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death Transfiguration." The former was course, played at a recent concert for Pension Fund, and Strauss's piece was on Mr. Montoux's programme for afternoon and tomorrow evening.
an interesting, profitable and ofttime
appointing experience to come back
a few years to music that when last powerfully stirred and affected. The
the first movement this Fifth Sym-
still grips; the themes are salient, treatment truly symphonic and the
also has a propulsive power not too encountered. But as for the once-Andante, it is only necessary to know
the opening theme has been fitted religious words and included in a munity" song-book to realize where music stands. The melody that follo-more truly expressive and when it sway the music is still eloquent. After that, what is there? The Waltz is trivial and there are odious things in the Finale—
the "oom-pah," "oom-pah" of the trombones and tympani, and the reiterated
scale passage so suggestive of the "wedding bells" refrain, cherished by the writers of popular songs. Of course there is no denying the power, fervor and passion of much of the Symphony, but how often it is marred by the triteness and vulgarity of the material.

After Chalkovsky's coarseness it was refreshing to hear the opening measures of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for the piano, which was placed between the symphony and the tone-poem. The classic restraint and temperate orchestration
soothed—but only for a time. For this Concerto has aged—not from inherent banality but from inherent dryness. Yet it has its moments of charm, and the Andante of dialogue between the piano and orchestra is one of the most original
and poetic of Beethoven's inspirations.
Some day, perhaps, we are to be relieved of Beethoven's concertos, but for the present they are much with us. The solo-

FELIX FOX

part last evening was played—and beautifully—by Mr. Felix Fox. His performance characterized by technical finesse,
tonal charm and musicianly insight.

Then came the long-awaited "Tod und Verklärung." For the most part it is still a mighty thing, nor should the composer
bear all the blame for those moments
when the music seemed to fall a little flat.
Eloquent as was the performance as a whole there were times when a greater forcefulness, even brutality, was needed.
Perhaps today with ampler space and greater confidence in music presumably new to him, Mr. Montoux will gain them.
But the glorious unfolding and upbuilding
of the motive of transfiguration was beautifully done, as was the lovely episode of childhood reminiscence. After all, but two composers, Wagner and Strauss, have realized the full scope and possibilities of the orchestra. Where else but in the music-dramas of the one and the tone-poems of the other is to be found such tonal might and splendor, and for the hearer an equal intoxication and excitement?

W. S. S.

SYMPHONY HALL

YOUNG PEOPLES' CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Tuesday, December 7, Thursday, December 9
and Friday, December 10, at 4 o'clock

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

Programme for December 7, 9 and 10

- Rossini . . . Overture to the Opera, "The Italian in Algiers"
(with oboe solo)
- Bach . . . Dances from the Suite in B minor
a. Bourrée.
b. Polonaise.
c. Badinerie.
(with flute solo)
- Dvořák . . . Movements from the Symphony, "From the New World"
Largo (with English horn solo).
Scherzo.
- Rimsky-Korsakoff . . . Second Movement from the Symphonic Suite,
"Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand
Nights and a Night")
The Story of the Kalandar-Prince
(Solos by Violin, Harp, Bassoon, Oboe,
Trombone, Trumpet, Clarinet, French Horn)
- Bizet . . . Farandole from the Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2

All tickets for the concerts on December 7th and 9th are being apportioned through the schools and settlements of Boston.

No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by one or more children.

Prices for all these concerts, 25c., 35c., 50c. No tax.

Strauss, Chaikovsky and Beethoven
the Symphony Orchestra in Cambr
Ruth Bernard for New and Well-Sch
Pianist

Trans. — Apr. 27, 1911
THOSE who attended the Sym
Concert in Cambridge last ev
heard two pieces that have not given at the regular subscription cor
in Boston since the days of Dr. M
the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky
Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death Transfiguration." The former was course, played at a recent concert fo Pension Fund, and Strauss's piece s on Mr. Monteux's programme for afternoon and tomorrow evening.
an interesting, profitable and ofttime
appointing experience to come back
a few years to music that when last powerfully stirred and affected. Th
the first movement this Fifth Sym
still grips; the themes are salient,
treatment truly symphonic and the sic has a propulsive power not too encountered. But as for the once-f Andante, it is only necessary to know
the opening theme has been fitted ligious words and included in a munity" song-book to realize wher
music stands. The melody that follo
more truly expressive and when it sway the music is still eloquent. After that, what is there? The Waltz is trivial
and there are odious things in the Finale—
the "oom-pah," "oom-pah" of the trom-
bones and tympani, and the reiterated
scale passage so suggestive of the "wedding bells" refrain, cherished by the writers of popular songs. Of course there is no denying the power, fervor and passion of much of the Symphony, but how often it is marred by the triteness and
vulgarity of the material.

After Chalkovsky's coarseness it was refreshing to hear the opening measures
of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for the piano, which was placed between the symphony and the tone-poem. The classic
restraint and temperate orchestration
soothed—but only for a time. For this Concerto has aged—not from inherent banality but from inherent dryness. Yet
it has its moments of charm, and the Andante of dialogue between the piano
and orchestra is one of the most original
and poetic of Beethoven's inspirations.
Some day, perhaps, we are to be relieved
of Beethoven's concertos, but for the present they are much with us. The solo-

FELIX FOX

part last evening was played—and beautifully—by Mr. Felix Fox. His performance characterized by technical finesse,
tonal charm and musicianly insight.

Then came the long-awaited "Tod und Verklärung." For the most part it is still a mighty thing, nor should the composer
bear all the blame for those moments
when the music seemed to fall a little flat.
Eloquent as was the performance as a
whole there were times when a greater
forcefulness, even brutality, was needed.
Perhaps today with ampler space and
greater confidence in music presumably new to him, Mr. Monteux will gain them.
But the glorious unfolding and upbuilding
of the motive of transfiguration was beautifully done, as was the lovely episode of childhood reminiscence. After all, but two composers, Wagner and Strauss, have realized the full scope and possibilities of the orchestra. Where else but in the music-dramas of the one and the tone-poems of the other is to be found such tonal might and splendor, and for the hearer an equal intoxication and excitement?
W. S. S.

SYMPHONY HALL

YOUNG PEOPLES' CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Tuesday, December 7, Thursday, December 9
and Friday, December 10, at 4 o'clock

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

Programme for December 7, 9 and 10

- Rossini . . . Overture to the Opera, "The Italian in Algiers"
(with oboe solo)
- Bach . . . Dances from the Suite in B minor
a. Bourrée.
b. Polonaise.
c. Badinerie.
(with flute solo)
- Dvořák . . . Movements from the Symphony, "From the New World"
Largo (with English horn solo).
Scherzo.
- Rimsky-Korsakoff . . . Second Movement from the Symphonic Suite,
"Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand
Nights and a Night")
The Story of the Kalandar-Prince
(Solos by Violin, Harp, Bassoon, Oboe,
Trombone, Trumpet, Clarinet, French Horn)
- Bizet . . . Farandole from the Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2

All tickets for the concerts on December 7th and 9th are being apportioned through the schools and settlements of Boston.

No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied
by one or more children.

Prices for all these concerts, 25c., 35c., 50c. No tax.

Strauss, Chaikovsky and Beethoven from the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge—Ruth Bernard for New and Well-Schooled Pianist

Trans. — Apr. 24, 1921

THOSE who attended the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening heard two pieces that have not been given at the regular subscription concerts in Boston since the days of Dr. Muck—the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The former was, of course, played at a recent concert for the Pension Fund, and Strauss's piece stands on Mr. Monteux's programme for this afternoon and tomorrow evening. It is an interesting, profitable and oftentimes disappointing experience to come back after a few years to music that when last heard powerfully stirred and affected. Through the first movement this Fifth Symphony still grips; the themes are salient, the treatment truly symphonic and the music has a propulsive power not too often encountered. But as for the once-famed Andante, it is only necessary to know that the opening theme has been fitted to religious words and included in a "community" song-book to realize where the music stands. The melody that follows is more truly expressive and when it holds sway the music is still eloquent. After that, what is there? The Waltz is trivial and there are odious things in the Finale—the "oom-pah," "oom-pah" of the trombones and tympani, and the reiterated scale passage so suggestive of the "wedding bells" refrain, cherished by the writers of popular songs. Of course there is no denying the power, fervor and passion of much of the Symphony, but how often it is marred by the triteness and vulgarity of the material.

After Chalkovsky's coarseness it was refreshing to hear the opening measures of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for the piano, which was placed between the symphony and the tone-poem. The classic restraint and temperate orchestration soothed—but only for a time. For this Concerto has aged—not from inherent banality but from inherent dryness. Yet it has its moments of charm, and the Andante of dialogue between the piano and orchestra is one of the most original and poetic of Beethoven's inspirations. Some day, perhaps, we are to be relieved of Beethoven's concertos, but for the present they are much with us. The solo-

FELIX FOX

Who Froz for clear erate part last evening was played—and beautifully—by Mr. Felix Fox. His performance characterized by technical finesse, tonal charm and musicianly insight.

Then came the long-awaited "Tod und Verklärung." For the most part it is still a mighty thing, nor should the composer bear all the blame for those moments when the music seemed to fall a little flat. Eloquent as was the performance as a whole there were times when a greater forcefulness, even brutality, was needed. Perhaps today with ampler space and greater confidence in music presumably new to him, Mr. Monteux will gain them. But the glorious unfolding and upbuilding of the motive of transfiguration was beautifully done, as was the lovely episode of childhood reminiscence. After all, but two composers, Wagner and Strauss, have realized the full scope and possibilities of the orchestra. Where else but in the music-dramas of the one and the tone-poems of the other is to be found such tonal might and splendor, and for the hearer an equal intoxication and excitement?

W. S. S.

SYMPHONY HALL

YOUNG PEOPLES' CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Tuesday, December 7, Thursday, December 9 and Friday, December 10, at 4 o'clock

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

Programme for December 7, 9 and 10

- Rossini . . . Overture to the Opera, "The Italian in Algiers" (with oboe solo)
- Bach . . . Dances from the Suite in B minor
 - a. Bourrée.
 - b. Polonaise.
 - c. Badinerie.
 (with flute solo)
- Dvořák . . . Movements from the Symphony, "From the New World"
 - Largo (with English horn solo).
 - Scherzo.
- Rimsky-Korsakoff . . . Second Movement from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night")
 - The Story of the Kalandar-Prince
 - (Solos by Violin, Harp, Bassoon, Oboe, Trombone, Trumpet, Clarinet, French Horn)
- Bizet . . . Farandole from the Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2

All tickets for the concerts on December 7th and 9th are being apportioned through the schools and settlements of Boston. No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by one or more children.

Prices for all these concerts, 25c., 35c., 50c. No tax.

GIOACCHINO ROSSINI (1792-1868) was the son of the town trumpeter and a baker's daughter in Pesaro, Italy. As a small boy of ten he found himself able to relieve the family poverty by his musical talents, for his voice and his aptitude for the violin brought him engagements with travelling opera troupes. The hard school of experience enabled him to write one act comic operas with an eye to popular favor and profit which soon brought him fame. He was only twenty-one when he composed the opera buffa "L'Italiana in Algeri." From that time onward, by his sociability, his remarkable wit in conversation and his effervescent sparkle in composition, he became the idol of society wherever the opera was in vogue. In Vienna there was such a Rossini craze that the works of two other composers of the day—Beethoven and Schubert—were for the time being ignored. Perhaps it is because Rossini was so fashionable then that he sounds so old-fashioned now.

The OBOE (the players of which sit in the third row from the back) was known in early English as the "hautboy." On account of its rich, reedy tone, composers usually use it when imitating a shepherd's pipe. No other wood wind instrument has such melodic eloquence.

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH (1685-1750) belonged to the largest family in musical history. He had nineteen children, and even more remarkable were the number of his forebears. His great, great grandfather, Veit Bach, was a miller-musician, and from Veit can be traced some 400 Bachs through the space of 250 years. Of these, most of the men were distinguished musicians. The Bachs were domestic and clannish, and a family gathering would always lead to a fireside concert. In those towns of Thuringia where they were most numerous, all musicians were referred to as "Bachs." "The Bachs," says an old town record, "are gifted with good understanding, with art and skill, which make them respected and listened to in the churches, schools, and all the township, so that through them the Master's work is praised."

Indeed, Johann Sebastian wrote more church music than anything else. But when as a young man of thirty-three he became Chapel Master to Prince Leopold of Cöthen, the inadequate organ and choir of that noble household swerved his efforts to clavier and concerted music. It was for his Prince that Bach wrote this suite.

It is interesting to note the difference between the conception of an orchestra at this time (two centuries ago) and now. The orchestra was then almost a new invention, and the symphony as we know it had not yet come in. Bach treated the different instruments simply as so many voices, making them fit in to his scheme of structure and counterpoint. The composers of later generations made more and more effort to bring out the individual tone quality or "color" of each kind of instrument. Dvořák, and Bizet, and Rimsky-Korsakoff were of this sort.

ANTON DVORÁK (1841-1904), the Bohemian composer, was a champion of folk music and always tried to breathe the spirit of his race into his symphonies and other works. The music of the American negroes also fascinated him, and when he came to this country in 1890, he studied it carefully. The result was the symphony which he named "From the New World." There was much discussion as to whether he used actual negro tunes. Probably the themes are entirely his own, although the melodic and rhythmic character of the negro dances and spirituals are evident. At any rate, this "American" symphony has been steadily popular with our public during the twenty-eight years between that time and this. The Largo has been said to voice the feelings of the homesick Czech in a world new to him, while others claim that it describes Hiawatha's wooing. It makes little difference—all that really matters is the lament itself, with its purely musical beauty.

The ENGLISH HORN is a close relative of the oboe, of more recent origin, with a deeper range. It has a bulb-like end, which distinguishes it from the oboe's bell-shaped or "spread" opening and gives it the dulcet, melancholy quality which fits it for a special mood in music such as this.

NICOLAS RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF (1844-1908), a foremost composer of Russia, was particularly fond of setting fairy tales to music. He thus prefaced the score of "Scheherazade":—"The Sultan Schahriar, persuaded of the falseness and the faithlessness of women, has sworn to put to death each one of his wives after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting him in tales which she told him during one thousand and one nights. Pricked by curiosity, the Sultan put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up entirely his bloody plan. Many marvels were told Schahriar by the Sultana Scheherazade. For her stories the Sultana borrowed from the poets their verses, from folk-songs their words; and she strung together tales and adventures."

Of the "colorists," Rimsky-Korsakoff was the most highly colored. He was scarcely concerned with "structure." He did not care to manipulate many voices at once in several-directions. He knew some counterpoint, as every composer must, but did not aim to be a master of it. His scheme was rather to give themes to one solo instrument after another, each solo entirely fitted to bring out the particular beauties of the instrument which plays it. The scoring is thus "thin" and without "texture." But the result is so magnificent that counterpoint is no longer much needed, nor is it greatly missed.

The music to be played is worth following carefully. It opens with a violin solo, accompanied only by chords from the harp. The violin represents Scheherazade, the beautiful consort of the Sultan, beginning still another tale. The voice seems to be saying "Once upon a time..." Immediately, the bassoon solo (the long, gruff-toned wood-wind instrument in the second row from the back) begins the story itself, until the oboe solo takes up the melody. This leads to music for a fuller orchestra and then a trombone solo fanfare alternates with a trumpet solo. This dialogue brings some splendid passages and ere long the clarinet solo is heard in a fine, rippling figure, soon transferred to the bassoon. Just before the close there is a beautiful solo for the French horn (the coiled, brass instrument in the back row).

GEORGES BIZET (1830-1875) was always fond of subjects from the south which gave opportunities for "local color." The noted composer of "Carmen" wrote incidental music to Daudet's play, from which this dance is chosen. The plot tells of a young farmer who is infatuated with a beauty of Arles on account of her remarkable grace in dancing the Farandole.

Symphony Hall.

The Symphony Orchestra Plays to Young People Happily Chosen Pieces—Three Dances or Casella Tamed—Mr. Kreisler Surprises an Audience—Amended Programmes

Trans. — Dec. 8, 1920

AN adroit maker of programmes is Mr. Monteux, but in the matter of finding suitable music for the Young People's Concerts he has had to learn his trade afresh. For the first, which took place a year ago, he followed the most obvious course. The concert was primarily educational, hence he would play an overture by Beethoven and a symphony by Schubert; these pieces must have less serious music for foil and contrast, and for that purpose he selected ballet music by Delibes. His second list, which included pieces by Weber, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Grieg and Berlioz, was at once less taxing and more stimulating to youthful minds and ears. Yesterday afternoon there befell the first of the Young People's Concerts of the present season, and it will be repeated without change of programme on tomorrow and Friday afternoons. As it is to be presumed that the audiences, although there are three and not one, will include many of those who heard the concerts of last year, Mr. Monteux has had once more to seek new music. And this time he has chosen wisely. He has wholly avoided the classical symphonies; for an overture he has turned to the spirited, tuneful and tingling music with which Rossini prefaced his early opera, "The Italian in Algiers"; from the "great masters," he has chosen not from Beethoven or Schubert, but three dances by Bach, who is often fresher and more modern than either; and from the composers nearer our own time he has picked three who excelled in the writing of highly colored, strongly rhythmed music—Dvorak, Rimsky-Korsakov and Bizet. Moreover, in order that the youngsters might learn with their eyes as well as with their ears, he selected each piece with a view to displaying some solo instrument, the nature of which is duly explained in the programme. In Rossini's overture it is the oboe; in the dances by Bach, the flute; in the Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, the English horn; in the second movement of "Scheherazade," a whole array—violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, trombone, trumpet, clarinet and French horn. If there was no reference to any specific instrument in the Scherzo from Dvorak's symphony; or in Bizet's Farandole, in both the drummers had much to do, and the youngsters were quick to observe it.

It is indeed a pity that more of those to whom the future of music, and of the Symphony Orchestra, is a real and vital thing, cannot be privileged to attend one of these concerts. The first sight of Symphony Hall, filled with school-children, is like a visit to the George Junior Republic. It seems curiously as though they belonged there, they are so obviously masters of the situation. And what a pleasure it is to witness their alertness to what is going on, their delight in the things that their experienced elders take so much for granted. Does Rossini interrupt a pronounced pianissimo with a crashing chord, and from the audience there is a ripple of laughter which spreads even to the orchestra. Does Rimsky-Korsakov employ that most jaded and hackneyed device, a muted trumpet, and there is laughter again. Does Dvorak begin his Largo with solemn, organ-like harmonies for the brass, and there is much pricking up of ears and craning of necks—and so on throughout the concert. After all, these young people came and are coming to hear, not only music, but an orchestra, and it is right that they should hear the composers who used the orchestra "for all it was worth," and even Rossini, subject to the technical limitations of his day, did that. And thrice happy was Mr. Monteux in his choice of Rimsky-Korsakov, the master magician and master story-teller of them all.

The management of the Orchestra has requested that the following information about the concerts be here set forth. The tickets for those of yesterday and tomorrow were distributed through ninety schools and ten settlements of Greater Boston. Yesterday's audience was chiefly made up of pupils who are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs, and of pupils who are receiving credit in the schools for their outside musical study. The concert of Friday is designed to accommodate pupils from schools not in the original allotment and also pupils of the various private schools, and to this end tickets for it, priced from twenty-five to fifty cents, are on sale at the box office of Symphony Hall. W. S. S.

counterpoint, as every composer must, but did not aim to be a master of it. His scheme was rather to give themes to one solo instrument after another, each solo entirely fitted to bring out the particular beauties of the instrument which plays it. The scoring is thus "thin" and without "texture." But the result is so magnificent that counterpoint is no longer much needed, nor is it greatly missed.

The music to be played is worth following carefully. It opens with a violin solo, accompanied only by chords from the harp. The violin represents Scheherazade, the beautiful consort of the Sultan, beginning still another tale. The voice seems to be saying "Once upon a time..." Immediately, the bassoon solo (the long, gruff-toned wood-wind instrument in the second row from the back) begins the story itself, until the oboe solo takes up the melody. This leads to music for a fuller orchestra and then a trombone solo fanfare alternates with a trumpet solo. This dialogue brings some splendid passages and ere long the clarinet solo is heard in a fine, rippling figure, soon transferred to the bassoon. Just before the close there is a beautiful solo for the French horn (the coiled, brass instrument in the back row).

GEORGES BIZET (1830-1875) was always fond of subjects from the south which gave opportunities for "local color." The noted composer of "Carmen" wrote incidental music to Daudet's play, from which this dance is chosen. The plot tells of a young farmer who is infatuated with a beauty of Arles on account of her remarkable grace in dancing the Farandole.

Symphony Hall.

The Symphony Orchestra Plays to Young People Happily Chosen Pieces — Three Dances or Casella Tamed—Mr. Kreisler Surprises an Audience—Amended Programmes

Trans. — Dec. 8, 1920
AN adroit maker of programmes is Mr. Monteux, but in the matter of finding suitable music for the Young People's Concerts he has had to learn his trade afresh. For the first, which took place a year ago, he followed the most obvious course. The concert was primarily educational, hence he would play an overture by Beethoven and a symphony by Schubert; these pieces must have less serious music for foil and contrast, and for that purpose he selected ballet music by Delibes. His second list, which included pieces by Weber, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Grieg and Berlioz, was at once less taxing and more stimulating to youthful minds and ears. Yesterday afternoon there befell the first of the Young People's Concerts of the present season, and it will be repeated without change of programme on tomorrow and Friday afternoons. As it is to be presumed that the audiences, although there are three and not one, will include many of those who heard the concerts of last year, Mr. Monteux has had once more to seek new music. And this time he has chosen wisely. He has wholly avoided the classical symphonies; for an overture he has turned to the spirited, tuneful and tingling music with which Rossini prefaced his early opera, "The Italian in Algiers"; from the "great masters," he has chosen not from Beethoven or Schubert, but three dances by Bach, who is often fresher and more modern than either; and from the composers nearer our own time he has picked three who excelled in the writing of highly colored, strongly rhythmical music—Dvorak, Rimsky-Korsakov and Bizet. Moreover, in order that the youngsters might learn with their eyes as well as with their ears, he selected each piece with a view to displaying some solo instrument, the nature of which is duly explained in the programme. In Rossini's overture it is the oboe; in the dances by Bach, the flute; in the Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, the English horn; in the second movement of "Scheherazade," a whole array—violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, trombone, trumpet, clarinet and French horn. If there was no reference to any specific instrument in the Scherzo from Dvorak's symphony; or in Bizet's Farandole, in both the drummers had much to do, and the youngsters were quick to observe it.

It is indeed a pity that more of those to whom the future of music, and of the Symphony Orchestra, is a real and vital thing, cannot be privileged to attend one of these concerts. The first sight of Symphony Hall, filled with school-children, is like a visit to the George Junior Republic. It seems curiously as though they belonged there, they are so obviously masters of the situation. And what a pleasure it is to witness their alertness to what is going on, their delight in the things that their experienced elders take so much for granted. Does Rossini interrupt a pronounced pianissimo with a crashing chord, and from the audience there is a ripple of laughter which spreads even to the orchestra. Does Rimsky-Korsakov employ that most jaded and hackneyed device, a muted trumpet, and there is laughter again. Does Dvorak begin his Largo with solemn, organ-like harmonies for the brass, and there is much pricking up of ears and craning of necks—and so on throughout the concert. After all, these young people came and are coming to hear, not only music, but an orchestra, and it is right that they should hear the composers who used the orchestra "for all it was worth," and even Rossini, subject to the technical limitations of his day, did that. And thrice happy was Mr. Monteux in his choice of Rimsky-Korsakov, the master magician and master story-teller of them all.

The management of the Orchestra has requested that the following information about the concerts be here set forth. The tickets for those of yesterday and tomorrow were distributed through ninety schools and ten settlements of Greater Boston. Yesterday's audience was chiefly made up of pupils who are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs, and of pupils who are receiving credit in the schools for their outside musical study. The concert of Friday is designed to accommodate pupils from schools not in the original allotment and also pupils of the various private schools, and to this end tickets for it, priced from twenty-five to fifty cents, are on sale at the box office of Symphony Hall. W. S. S.

PUPILS ENJOY FIRST CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Gives
Numbers Emphasizing
Solo-Instruments

YOUNG LISTENERS SHOW APPRECIATION

Herald Dec. 8, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The first of the young people's concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, overture to "The Italian (woman) in Algiers," Bach, Bourree Polonaise and Badinerie from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, Largo and Scherzo from the symphony "From the New World;" Ronsky-Korsakoff, "The Story of the Kalandar Prince" from "Scheherazade;" Bizet-Guiraud, Farandole from the suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 2. For the concert of yesterday and the one tomorrow afternoon all the tickets were distributed through 90 schools and 10 settlements of Greater Boston.

The audience yesterday was especially musical, for the first preference was given to the pupils that are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs; also, to pupils that are studying music outside of the schools but are being credited for it in the schools.

The program was arranged so as to acquaint in a measure the young listeners with the quality of several solo instruments. Thus in the odd and once popular overture of the light-hearted Rossini the florid passages for oboe were played delightfully by Mr. Longy. Mr. Laurent's skill and taste were displayed in the movements from Bach's suite, while the English horn solo in Dvorak's largo was played by Mr. Mueller. The movement from "Scheherazade" brought into prominence solos by violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, clarinet, horn, trumpet, trombone played by the admirable virtuosos of the orchestra.

The young listeners were greatly interested and pleased. They were warmly appreciative. They watched the players attentively and heard them intelligently. When they talked, the subject was the music of the orchestral instruments.

These concerts will do much to arouse and maintain genuine interest in good music, music that is melodious and strongly rhythmed, whether it be by an Italian, Frenchman, Russian, German or even an American. Mr. Monteux arranged, as he did last season, an excellent program for the purpose; he conducted and the full orchestra played as if the concert were in the regular subscription series.

In order that students of the schools that did not come in the allotment may have an opportunity to hear the orchestra, a third concert will be given the afternoon of Dec. 10, for which tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are now being sold at the Symphony Hall box office. This concert will also accommodate pupils of the various private schools. Adults will be admitted only as escorts.

SYMPHONY HALL

YOUNG PEOPLES' CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Tuesday, March 29, and Thursday, March 31

at 4 o'clock

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

Saint-Saëns	March from the "Algerian Suite"
Haydn	Andante from the Symphony in G major, "Surprise"
Grieg	Three Norwegian Dances
Tschaikowsky	Andante Cantabile from the String Quartet Op. 11
Mozart	German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride"
Rossini	Overture to "William Tell"

No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by one or more children

Prices: 25, 35, and 50 cents (no tax)

PUPILS ENJOY FIRST CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Gives
Numbers Emphasizing
Solo Instruments

YOUNG LISTENERS SHOW APPRECIATION

Herald Dec. 8, 1920
By PHILIP HALE

The first of the young people's concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, overture to "The Italian (woman) in Algiers," Bach, Bourree Polonaise and Badinerie from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, Largo and Scherzo from the symphony "From the New World;" Ronsky-Korsakoff, "The Story of the Kalender Prince" from "Scheherazade;" Bizet-Guiraud, Farandole from the suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 2. For the concert of yesterday and the one tomorrow afternoon all the tickets were distributed through 90 schools and 10 settlements of Greater Boston.

The audience yesterday was especially musical, for the first preference was given to the pupils that are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs; also, to pupils that are studying music outside of the schools but are being credited for it in the schools.

The program was arranged so as to acquaint in a measure the young listeners with the quality of several solo instruments. Thus in the odd and once popular overture of the light-hearted Rossini the florid passages for oboe were played delightfully by Mr. Longy. Mr. Laurent's skill and taste were displayed in the movements from Bach's suite, while the English horn solo in Dvorak's largo was played by Mr. Mueller. The movement from "Scheherazade" brought into prominence solos by violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, clarinet, horn, trumpet, trombone played by the admirable virtuosos of the orchestra.

The young listeners were greatly interested and pleased. They were warmly appreciative. They watched the players attentively and heard them intelligently. When they talked, the subject was the music of the orchestral instruments.

These concerts will do much to arouse and maintain genuine interest in good music, music that is melodious and strongly rhythmed, whether it be by an Italian, Frenchman, Russian, German or even an American. Mr. Monteux arranged, as he did last season, an excellent program for the purpose; he conducted and the full orchestra played as if the concert were in the regular subscription series.

In order that students of the schools that did not come in the allotment may have an opportunity to hear the orchestra, a third concert will be given the afternoon of Dec. 10, for which tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are now being sold at the Symphony Hall box office. This concert will also accommodate pupils of the various private schools.

Adults will be admitted only as escorts.

SYMPHONY HALL

YOUNG PEOPLES' CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF
Tuesday, March 29, and Thursday, March 31

at 4 o'clock

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

Saint-Saëns	March from the "Algerian Suite"
Haydn	Andante from the Symphony in G major, "Surprise"
Grieg	Three Norwegian Dances
Tschaikowsky	Andante Cantabile from the String Quartet Op. 11
Mozart	German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride"
Rossini	Overture to "William Tell"

No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by one or more children

Prices: 25, 35, and 50 cents (no tax)

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS (1835-).

MILITARY MARCH FROM THE ALGERIAN SUITE

Saint-Saëns is the oldest of French composers, and the most productive. In his eighty-sixth year he is living, flourishing, and composing in Paris, and can boast of having shaken hands with such composers as Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, and Brahms—now in their graves these thirty years. He can write serious music or light music such as this march almost at will. A dozen operas, operettas, symphonies large and small, symphonic poems, suites, concertos, piano music and chamber music for almost every imaginable combination—such is his list of works.

But his cleverness extends far beyond composing. He has written poems and plays, he has dabbled in the sciences, he has delighted his friends by acting the part of Marguerite in "Faust," for a joke, and demolished his enemies with a sharp and sarcastic pen. In addition to this, he has travelled from one end of the world to the other and is correspondingly full of anecdotes. His violent likes and dislikes towards other composers are proverbial, and so is the rapidity with which he changes his mind on artistic matters.

JOSEF HAYDN (1732-1809).

ANDANTE FROM THE SYMPHONY IN G MAJOR, "SURPRISE"

Watch your neighbor jump when the "Surprise" in this symphony comes after the first soft measures of the theme. Haydn was very fond of putting jokes into his music, and some one claimed that, writing this symphony on his visit to London, he wanted to arouse the sleeping English matrons in the audience. This Haydn denied—he was never impolite—but such was the effect, nevertheless. The joke sounds a little old-fashioned now, since the symphony was written nearly one hundred and fifty years ago, and the composers of to-day do things far more startling. However, absent-minded people have jumped at the sudden loud chord from that day to this. The rest of the movement is a series of variations. There is a delightful portion in which the theme is changed from the major to the minor mode.

Josef Haydn spent most of his life as composer to Prince Nikolaus Esterházy, a Hungarian noble, who did everything on a large scale. His chest blazed with diamonds, and he called himself "Nikolaus the Magnificent." After visiting Versailles, he erected "Esterház," an even more splendid palace and estate, on a bleak swamp, miles from civilization. Esterház had an orchestra and concert-hall, and Haydn was engaged to take complete charge and to compose operas and symphonies and perform them on special occasions when guests were expected.

So Haydn, almost in the position of a servant, composed most of his music for his Prince and patron. Since the symphony was then an entirely new form, the people of the time found the music disturbingly different from what they were used to, but so sociable and delightful was Haydn's musical style that it was bound to be popular. Also, he sugar-coated his pills with many a joke, such as this. For instance he wrote a "Bear" symphony, a "Clock" symphony, and a "Toy" symphony, in which the orchestra imitated the horns and rattles of a country fair. His "Farewell" symphony was a hint to the Prince that he and the musicians of the orchestra were tired of the seclusion of "Esterház." According to the directions of the score, one after another of the musicians blew out his candle and left the hall until no one was left but the conductor—Haydn himself. The Prince took the hint and granted them all a vacation in Vienna.

EDVARD HAGERUP GRIEG (1843-1907) . . THREE NORWEGIAN DANCES

Among those peoples where the musical instinct is strong there have come into being, no one can say just how, the songs and dances which are called "folk-music." From their merrymaking have come the folk-dances which in Norway are particularly vigorous and rhythmic. Grieg, the Norwegian composer, was fascinated by the folk-dances of his people—so much so that he set these for a large orchestra, and indeed most of his music is tinged with them.

Probably these dances were unrecorded until Grieg heard them on some village green and wrote them down in notation. For folk-music, like the old legends, is remembered and preserved only by ear, and so handed down from father to son.

PETER TSCHAIKOWSKY (1840-1893).

ANDANTE CANTABILE FROM THE STRING QUARTET, OP. 11

Russia has been as rich in folk-music as any country in the world, and indeed all the Russian composers have used it in their scores. Tchaikowsky did not do so as often as others. But the melody of this slow movement is a full-fledged folk-song—a lament born of the suffering of an oppressed people. Such a song is as different from an "art-song" as a wild violet from an orchid. A wild flower is not planted, nor is a folk-song made by some clever musician with an eye to fame. It is as spontaneous as nature itself, and you could no more tell where it came from than you could tell where the seed of the wild flower came from. And it cannot be so surely said that the simple beauty of these songs is improved upon in the cultivated kind.

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART (1756-1791).

GERMAN DANCE, "THE SLEIGH RIDE"

The wealthy nobility of Vienna was never more dance-crazed than in the eighteenth century—the age of periwigs, when Mozart lived and composed. The Viennese must have slept by day, for they danced night after night until the broad daylight, streaming through the shuttered windows, drove them home. Mozart, the most illustrious young composer of the time, became official musician to Emperor Josef of Austria in 1787. Although he wrote his finest symphonies in this period, nothing so serious was expected of him at court, and new minuets and German dances (waltzes) for each Imperial Ball suited frivolous Vienna very well. His salary was miserably small. "Too much for what I do," he remarked bitterly,

"too little for what I can do." Not that Mozart was adverse to social gayety. He was extremely fond of revelry, and would often dance to his own measures.

This dance with its post horn and bells is supposed to represent the famous sleigh processions which were then in high vogue, and in which Mozart no doubt eagerly took part. Michael Kelly, a noted Irish tenor, was visiting Vienna at the time and describes these functions thus: "Another favorite amusement, going forward at this period of the year, is a 'course des traîneaux,' or procession of sledges. These sledges are richly ornamented, and carved with figures of all kinds of monsters, and inlaid with burnished gold, etc. A vast number of carrettas and carts, on the day previous to this singular spectacle, gather snow, and distribute it along the principal streets of Vienna, in order that the sledges may be drawn with perfect security. The effect at night, by torchlight, is like enchantment. I have seen forty or fifty sledges drawn up, one behind the other; in every sledge was a lady seated, covered with diamonds, in furs and pelisses: behind each was a gentleman, as magnificently dressed, driving; before every sledge were two running footmen having long poles with knobs of silver at their ends. The Hungarian Prince Dietressteen, the Grand Master of the Horse, was always the first to lead the traîneaux. The immense velocity with which these things are drawn is perfectly astonishing: they go on for three or four hours, and the procession, at its close, draws up before the Emperor's palace. The running footmen have costly liveries, and the horses are caparisoned with rich trappings, and large plumes of milk-white feathers; and the spectacle, upon the whole, is magnificent."

GIOACHIMO ROSSINI (1792-1868).

OVERTURE TO THE OPERA "WILLIAM TELL"

No composer in the history of music started more humbly and rose to a higher pinnacle of fame in his own time than Rossini. A poor boy in a small town of Italy, he found engagements with travelling opera troupes, and, using what musical knowledge he had been able to pick up, wrote comic operas which met with immediate favor. Composing always in the popular vein, his music soon became the rage throughout Europe. Opera after opera aroused a furore of enthusiasm everywhere, and not the least of his successes was "William Tell." The overture seems to describe the serenity of nature in the Alps, interrupted by one of the sudden and violent thunder-storms peculiar to Switzerland. Underlying this is felt the struggle for political freedom, which is the theme of the legend.

When he composed this masterpiece, Rossini was a young man of thirty-seven. Then a surprising thing happened. Although he reached a ripe old age, he never wrote another opera. When asked why, he shook his shoulders and said, "I would rather be a sausage-maker than be a composer." Just what brought this sudden change will never be known. Some call it the inborn laziness of the man, and others claim that he was disgusted with the easiness and shallowness of fame. In any case, his portrait reveals a chin with several folds and a paunch of goodly size.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

GIVES CONCERT FOR THE YOUNG

Symphony Orchestra Aids
Development of Musical
Taste in Children

PROGRAM RECEIVES CLOSE ATTENTION

By PHILIP HALE

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Monteux, gave a concert for young people of Boston's schools and settlements; for the pleasure of the young and as an aid in the development of musical taste. The older generations of Bostonians have apparently lost interest in a large measure in choral music, except when noteworthy soloists assist; they have little curiosity to become acquainted with visiting pianists, singers and violinists who give recitals. The older generations are still faithful to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but for the general interest in music for the future dependence must be put upon the young. And from the young, of course, irrespective of the ward in which they happen to live, will come the future musicians of this city.

Last season, and in December of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave concerts of this nature to the great joy of the young who packed Symphony Hall. The programs were well selected. Compositions were chosen of a melodious or strongly rhythmical nature that at once attracted and held the attention. They were by composers of high rank. It is a good thing to disabuse the young of the idea that because a composer has a great name, his music is therefore beyond their comprehension. Nor should music that is popularly classed as "light" be avoided in the arrangement of programs for these concerts. When Theodore Thomas began his work of developing a taste for orchestral music in the United States, he gave the audience a waltz by Johann Strauss, or a stirring march, in addition to symphonic movements and symphonic poems.

At the concerts of last December pieces were chosen to show in a practical manner the character of various instruments; oboe, flute, English horn, etc. Yesterday the program had no specific purpose, but it was attractive, pleasing to children, young and old. The concert began with the stirring French Military March from Saint-Saens's "Algerian" Suite. Then came the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, followed by Grieg's Three Norwegian Dances. Tschalkowsky was represented by the Andante, which first made his name known in Boston, the Andante from his first String Quartet, written in 1871. The Andante is still beautiful and haunting. When Tolstoi visited Moscow late in 1876 Nicholas Rubinstein arranged a concert in his honor. This Andante was then played. Tolstoi during the performance burst into tears. "Never in the whole course of my life," wrote Tschalkowsky in his diary, "did I feel so flattered, never so proud of my creative power, as when Leo Tolstoi, sitting by my side, listened to my Andante while the tears streamed down his face." This Andante is based on a Russian folk song, which was sung by a workman at Kamenka in the summer of 1869.

The program also included one of Mozart's Germany dances, popularly known as "The Sleighride," on account of its Trio. In Mozart's time a procession of richly ornamental sleighs was seen winter nights by torchlight in Vienna. The women, men and horses were sumptuously dressed, there were running footmen, and a Hungarian Prince led the procession. The concert ended with Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which is heard gladly at any concert.

The hall was completely filled with a most interested and appreciative audience. The concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

"too little for what I can do." Not that Mozart was adverse to social gayety. He was extremely fond of revelry, and would often dance to his own measures.

This dance with its post horn and bells is supposed to represent the famous sleigh processions which were then in high vogue, and in which Mozart no doubt eagerly took part. Michael Kelly, a noted Irish tenor, was visiting Vienna at the time and describes these functions thus: "Another favorite amusement, going forward at this period of the year, is a 'course des traîneaux,' or procession of sledges. These sledges are richly ornamented, and carved with figures of all kinds of monsters, and inlaid with burnished gold, etc. A vast number of carrettas and carts, on the day previous to this singular spectacle, gather snow, and distribute it along the principal streets of Vienna, in order that the sledges may be drawn with perfect security. The effect at night, by torchlight, is like enchantment. I have seen forty or fifty sledges drawn up, one behind the other; in every sledge was a lady seated, covered with diamonds, in furs and pelisses: behind each was a gentleman, as magnificently dressed, driving; before every sledge were two running footmen having long poles with knobs of silver at their ends. The Hungarian Prince Dietressteen, the Grand Master of the Horse, was always the first to lead the traîneaux. The immense velocity with which these things are drawn is perfectly astonishing: they go on for three or four hours, and the procession, at its close, draws up before the Emperor's palace. The running footmen have costly liveries, and the horses are caparisoned with rich trappings, and large plumes of milk-white feathers; and the spectacle, upon the whole, is magnificent."

GIOACHIMO ROSSINI (1792-1868).

OVERTURE TO THE OPERA "WILLIAM TELL"

No composer in the history of music started more humbly and rose to a higher pinnacle of fame in his own time than Rossini. A poor boy in a small town of Italy, he found engagements with travelling opera troupes, and, using what musical knowledge he had been able to pick up, wrote comic operas which met with immediate favor. Composing always in the popular vein, his music soon became the rage throughout Europe. Opera after opera aroused a furore of enthusiasm everywhere, and not the least of his successes was "William Tell." The overture seems to describe the serenity of nature in the Alps, interrupted by one of the sudden and violent thunder-storms peculiar to Switzerland. Underlying this is felt the struggle for political freedom, which is the theme of the legend.

When he composed this masterpiece, Rossini was a young man of thirty-seven. Then a surprising thing happened. Although he reached a ripe old age, he never wrote another opera. When asked why, he shook his shoulders and said, "I would rather be a sausage-maker than be a composer." Just what brought this sudden change will never be known. Some call it the inborn laziness of the man, and others claim that he was disgusted with the easiness and shallowness of fame. In any case, his portrait reveals a chin with several folds and a paunch of goodly size.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1920-21

GIVES CONCERT FOR THE YOUNG

Symphony Orchestra Aids
Development of Musical
Taste in Children

PROGRAM RECEIVES CLOSE ATTENTION

By PHILIP HALE

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Monteux, gave a concert for young people of Boston's schools and settlements; for the pleasure of the young and as an aid in the development of musical taste. The older generations of Bostonians have apparently lost interest in a large measure in choral music, except when noteworthy soloists assist; they have little curiosity to become acquainted with visiting pianists, singers and violinists who give recitals. The older generations are still faithful to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but for the general interest in music for the future dependence must be put upon the young. And from the young, of course, irrespective of the ward in which they happen to live, will come the future musicians of this city.

Last season, and in December of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave concerts of this nature to the great joy of the young who packed Symphony Hall. The programs were well selected. Compositions were chosen of a melodious or strongly rhythmized nature that at once attracted and held the attention. They were by composers of high rank. It is a good thing to disabuse the young of the idea that because a composer has a great name, his music is therefore beyond their comprehension. Nor should music that is popularly classed as "light" be avoided in the arrangement of programs for these concerts. When Theodore Thomas began his work of developing a taste for orchestral music in the United States, he gave the audience a waltz by Johann Strauss, or a stirring march, in addition to symphonic movements and symphonic poems.

At the concerts of last December pieces were chosen to show in a practical manner the character of various instruments; oboe, flute, English horn, etc. Yesterday the program had no specific purpose, but it was attractive, pleasing to children, young and old. The concert began with the stirring French Military March from Saint-Saens's "Algerian" Suite. Then came the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, followed by Grieg's Three Norwegian Dances. Tchaikowsky was represented by the Andante, which first made his name known in Boston, the Andante from his first String Quartet, written in 1871. The Andante is still beautiful and haunting. When Tolstol visited Moscow late in 1876 Nicholas Rubinstein arranged a concert in his honor. This Andante was then played. Tolstol during the performance burst into tears. "Never in the whole course of my life," wrote Tchaikowsky in his diary, "did I feel so flattered, never so proud of my creative power, as when Leo Tolstol, sitting by my side, listened to my Andante while the tears streamed down his face." This Andante is based on a Russian folk song, which was sung by a workman at Kamenka in the summer of 1869.

The program also included one of Mozart's Germany dances, popularly known as "The Sleighride," on account of its Trio. In Mozart's time a procession of richly ornamental sleighs was seen winter nights by torchlight in Vienna. The women, men and horses were sumptuously dressed, there were running footmen, and a Hungarian Prince led the procession. The concert ended with Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which is heard gladly at any concert.

The hall was completely filled with a most interested and appreciative audience. The concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Caught Young Trans. Mich. 30. 1921

Is it not possible that Mr. Monteux and the men of the Symphony Orchestra take a keener pleasure in the fresh, unspoiled and generally eager and responsive audiences of the Young People's Concerts, than they do in the more staid, more sophisticated—though more outwardly demonstrative—companies of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings? It seemed, for example, at the concert yesterday that all concerned, went about their work with an unusual zest and a corresponding brilliance and effectiveness in their performance. Comparisons are reputedly objectionable, but how easy is it to think of Dr. Muck on his mettle before an audience of school children? By token of the attentiveness with which the concert was heard Mr. Monteux's latest programme is the most successful of the four that he has set before his youthful listeners. There was nothing in it so exacting as the dances by Bach, the movement from "Scheherazade" or the Largo from the "New World" Symphony, of the preceding series. The most serious number was the popular Andante Cantabile from Chaikovsky's first string quartet, and the only symphonic piece, the Andante—of the explosive chord—from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. For the rest there was the tuneful, deftly orchestrated March from Saint-Saëns's "Algerian Suite," three Norwegian Dances by Grieg, Mozart's German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride," and the Overture to "William Tell."

As might have been expected, Haydn's little joke "brought down the house." Though the delightfully written programme-notes had warned them, the youngsters were perceptibly startled and vastly amused. Mr. Monteux has at times seemed unduly rigid with Haydn's music, he was far from it in the fragment of yesterday. And how fortunate was his choice of Mozart's dance with its compelling rhythm and its charming accompaniment of tuned and jingling sleighbells! Such a piece as this or the dances of Grieg have little place in a symphony concert, which must concern itself with weightier things. Yet they were good to hear. Only at a "Pop" concert are we likely to encounter such music—or Saint-Saëns's march or Rossini's overture—but there it would be played with less care, with accompanying distractions, and by a smaller orchestra. By so much the young people have an advantage over their elders. The performance of the "Tell" overture was unusually brilliant, and, needless to say, the children took great delight in the "clap-trap" thunderstorm and the excitements of the end.

W. S. S.

SEASON OF POP CONCERTS OPEN

Herald — May 3, 1921
Symphony Hall Audience
Shows Keen Appreciation of Program

ORCHESTRA PLAYS WITH USUAL SKILL

Though still under the spell of a certain melancholy that has enveloped them since the old popping days, the Pop concerts opened last night in Symphony Hall. The house was crowded and the throng had a more cosmopolitan appearance than ever. All parts of Boston seemed represented and a sizable part of the rest of the world also.

The program containing pieces by Wagner, Suppe, Tschalkowsky, Debussy, Dvorak and Grieg made a wide appeal that evidently had a thorough response. There were four selections by Slavonic composers and it was noticeable that these roused the most strenuous enthusiasm among the audience. One reason for this was that 200 seats had been provided for delegates attending a fraternal convention now in session in Boston and that a large proportion of the members are Russians.

The orchestra under the leadership of Agide Jacchia played with all its accustomed artistic skill, vim and vividness of expression. The musicians were generous in response to the acclaim of their hearers and an extra number was added after each regular selection. A fantasy based on Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" particularly took the people's fancy and in keeping with the Slavic predominance of the evening an arrangement of the Volga Boatman's song done by Mr. Jacchia was given. This called forth such a storm of approval that it was repeated.

Even without the old fizzing accompaniments of bygone days, the Pops are plainly as popular as ever and there can be no doubt that one of the most successful seasons in their long history was begun last night.

re

292 Caught Young J. J. M. B. 1921

Is it not possible that Mr. Monteux and the men of the Symphony Orchestra take a keener pleasure in the fresh, unspoiled and generally eager and responsive audiences of the Young People's Concerts, than they do in the more staid, more sophisticated—though more outwardly demonstrative—companies of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings? It seemed, for example, at the concert yesterday that all concerned, went about their work with an unusual zest and a corresponding brilliance and effectiveness in their performance. Comparisons are reputedly objectionable, but how easy is it to think of Dr. Muck on his mettle before an audience of school children? By token of the attentiveness with which the concert was heard Mr. Monteux's latest programme is the most successful of the four that he has set before his youthful listeners. There was nothing in it so exacting as the dances by Bach, the movement from "Scheherazade" or the Largo from the "New World" Symphony, of the preceding series. The most serious number was the popular Andante Cantabile from Chalkovsky's first string quartet, and the only symphonic piece, the Andante—of the explosive chord—from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. For the rest there was the tuneful, deftly orchestrated March from Saint-Saëns's "African Suite," three Norwegian Dances by Grieg, Mozart's German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride," and the Overture to "William Tell."

As might have been expected, Haydn's little joke "brought down the house." Though the delightfully written programme-notes had warned them, the youngsters were perceptibly startled and vastly amused. Mr. Monteux has at times seemed unduly rigid with Haydn's music, he was far from it in the fragment of yesterday. And how fortunate was his choice of Mozart's dance with its compelling rhythm and its charming accompaniment of tuned and jingling sleighbells! Such a piece as this or the dances of Grieg have little place in a symphony concert which must concern itself with weightier things. Yet they were good to hear. Only at a "Pop" concert are we likely to encounter such music—or Saint-Saëns's march or Rossini's overture—but there it would be played with less care, with accompanying distractions, and by a smaller orchestra. By so much the young people have an advantage over their elders. The performance of the "Tell" overture was unusual brilliant, and, needless to say, the children took great delight in the "clap-trap" thunderstorm and the excitements of the end.

W. S. S.

Premonition of Pleasure

POPS

SYMPHONY HALL

EVERY NIGHT EXCEPT SUNDAY

OPENING MAY 2

The Pops in Epitome

New Poster for the Concerts Drawn by Gluyas Williams

SYMPHONY HALL

THE POPS

(36th Season)

Orchestra of Symphony Players

AGIDE JACCHIA, Conductor

Opening Night, Monday, May 2

PROGRAMME

1. MARCH from "Tannhäuser" Wagner
2. OVERTURE, "Tantalusqualen" Suppé
3. "BY MOONLIGHT" Bendel
4. FANTASIA, "Eugene Oniegin" Tchaikowsky
5. FROM THE "PETITE SUITE" Debussy
 - a. En Bateau
 - b. Cortège
6. SLAVONIC DANCE NO. 3 Dvorák
7. "SPRING" Grieg
8. FINALE, "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
9. FANTASIA, "Manon Lescaut" Puccini
10. WALTZ, "Rêve au Champagne" Vollstedt
11. "PROCESSION OF THE SARDAR" Ippolito-Ivanoff

SEATS NOW ON SALE

1531

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last night. It has been a brilliant one, one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra, which was never in a higher state than it is today. Mr. Monteux once said: "An orchestra is what the conductor makes it." Mr. Monteux, having fine material to work with, virtuosos who were willing, yes, eager, to unite in ensemble without undue thought of their own individuality, has now an orchestra that for euphony, plasticity and brilliance, is unsurpassed. As James Huneker said in the last review he wrote for the New York World: "After all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Not only has Mr. Monteux brought the orchestra to its high state by means of his technical skill as a disciplinarian, he has revealed himself as an interpreter to whom no school, ancient or modern, is foreign. His reading of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Brahms' second symphony, Liszt's "Orpheus," Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, will long be remembered. We mention these readings in particular, for there are a few moss-backed conservatives who still think that only a German can interpret "German" music; as if music were parochial, and could not make a universal appeal. They might as well say that only a German audience can understand and appreciate the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart. No, the compositions of the Englishmen, Bax and Vaughan Williams, of the French and the Russians, of the Italians and the Americans are not to Mr. Monteux written in an unknown tongue.

What a pleasure it is to see a conductor at the head of this orchestra who is modest in his bearing, yet courageous in bringing out music in an unfamiliar idiom, without thought of immediate popular favor, believing it his duty to acquaint the audience with even the most extreme modern tendencies, a conductor who respects his audience and his orchestra; a conductor who is courteous to soloists and rejoices in their individual success.

And in his arduous work he has been loyally and intelligently supported by the sound advice and encouragement of the experienced manager, Mr. William H. Brennan, assisted by Mr. G. E. Judd.

The programs of the 40th season were conspicuous for their interest and catholicity. Many unfamiliar compositions were heard, while the classics were not neglected.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME

- Bingham: Passacaglia for orchestra, Jan. 21, 1921.
 Gilbert: Indian Sketches, March 4, 1921.
 Hill: Poem: "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after Poe), Oct. 28, 1920.
 Mason, Stuart: Rhapsody on a Persian Air, April 22, 1921.
 Strube: Four Preludes, Nov. 12, 1920.
WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN AMERICA
 Bax: "In the Faery Hills," symphonic poem, Dec. 17, 1920.
 Malipiero: "Impressioni dal Vero," Suite No. 1, Dec. 23, 1920.
 Milhaud: Suite No. 2, April 22, 1921.
 Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Nov. 19, 1920.

Here in Boston

At the end of the week Mr. Monteux will take ship for Le Havre to remain in Europe until September, in part taking holiday, in part seeking recent music and new players for the Symphony Concerts next season. Ten or twelve others from the orchestra, for the most part the leaders of the several choirs, are also departing for a summer in Europe and almost on the same day.

Ropartz: Divertissement, Oct. 22, 1920.
 Strauss: Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," Feb. 11, 1921.
 *Had Vassilenko's "Epic Poem" been played in the United States before April 8, 1921?
WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

- Symphonies, Symphonic Poems, Etc.
 Balakireff: "Islamey" (orchestrated by Casella), Dec. 17, 1920.
 Bloch: "Hiver" and "Printemps," April 29, 1921.
 Carpenter: Suite from the Ballet "The Birthday of the Infanta," Feb. 25, 1921.
 Franck: Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue (orchestrated by Pierne), Oct. 8, 1920.
 d'Indy: "La Queste de Dieu," from "La Légende de Saint-Christophe," Dec. 23, 1920.
 Kalinnikoff: Symphony No. 1, G minor, April 1, 1921.
 Lekeu: Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-songs of Anjou, Oct. 8, 1920.
 Ravel: Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, March 11, 1921.
 Respighi: "Fontane di Roma," Nov. 12, 1920.
 Schubert: "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4, O minor (as a whole), April 8, 1921.
 Scott: Two Passacaglias, Jan. 28, 1921.
 Vassilenko: Epic Poem, April 18, 1921.
 Williams: A London Symphony, Feb. 18, 1921.

SONGS

- Mason, D. G.: "Russians," Op. 18 (Reinold Werrenrath, baritone), Nov. 19, 1920.

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS

- Franck: "Les Djinns," symphonic poem for piano and orchestra, after Hugo, E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, Jan. 21, 1921.
 Mozart: Air of Pamina from "The Magic Flute" (Mine, Hulda Lashanska), Jan. 28, 1921.
 Concerto in E flat major for violin (Jacques Thibaud), Feb. 18, 1921.
 Shepherd: Fantasy for piano and orchestra (Heinrich Gebhard, pianist), April 15, 1921.
 Wagner: Transformation Music and closing scene of Act I, "Parsifal," March 23, 1921.

A glance at the list of composers whose works were played will give an idea of Mr. Monteux's catholicity, to which we have referred.

Summary

The following composers were represented at these concerts for the first time: Bax, Bingham, Kalinnikoff, Lekeu, Mason, D. G., Mason, S., Milhaud, Respighi, Scott, Shepherd, Vassilenko, Williams.

Balakireff	1	Loeffler	1
Bax	1	Malipiero	1
Beethoven	7	Mason, D. G.	1
Berlioz	2	Mason, S.	1
Bingham	1	Mendelssohn	2
Bloch	1	Milhaud	1
Brahms	4	Mozart	9
Bruch	1	Ravel	2
Carpenter	1	Respighi	2
Chabrier	1	Roger-Ducasse	1
Chadwick	1	Ropartz	1
Charpentier	1	Saint-Saëns	2
Debussy	1	Schubert	8
Dellus	1	Schumann	1
Dukas	1	Scott	1
Dvorak	1	Scrinabin	1
Enesco	2	Shepherd	1
Footé	1	Sibelius	1
Franck	3	Strauss	3
Gilbert	1	Stravinsky	1
Griffes	1	Strube	1
Haydn	2	Tchaikowsky	2
Hill	1	Vassilenko	1
d'Indy	1	Wagner	4
Kalinnikoff	1	Weber	1
Lalo	1	Williams	12
Lekeu	1
Liszt	2	Total	91

*Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" was played twice.

†Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony" was played twice.

Of these composers, Bingham, Carpenter, Chadwick, Footé, Gilbert, Griffes, Hill, D. G. Mason, S. Mason, Shepherd were born in this country. Add to the list Messrs. Loeffler and Strube, Americans by their long residence and musical activity in this country—12 in all.

Fifty-four composers were represented. There has been trifling, foolish talk about French propaganda. Of these composers only 12 were French by birth. Franck, a Belgian, was a naturalized Frenchman; Lekeu was a Belgian; Enesco was a Roumanian.

The soloists were as follows:

- Sopranos: Mmes. Lashanska and Nielsen... 2
 Baritone: Mr. Werrenrath... 1
 Pianists: Messrs. Bauer, Gebhard, Gralinger, Levitzki, Maier, Moiseiwitsch, Pattison, Rubinstein... 8
 Violinists: Messrs. Burgin and Thibaud and Miss Menges... 3
 Violoncellists: Messrs. Bedetti and Schroeder... 2

Mmes. Lashanska and Menges appeared for the first time in Boston.

Messrs. Maier, Moiseiwitsch, Pattison and Rubinstein played for the first time at these concerts. Miss Nielsen and Mr. Werrenrath sang for the first time at these concerts.

The Symphony Orchestra

Boston has come to the parting of the ways in the matter of the maintenance of the Symphony Orchestra. Our city has been favored above all others in the record up to this time of this famous band. The story of the public-spirited work of Major Henry L. Higginson is known to everybody. Our city has greatly benefited not only in high æsthetic enjoyment, but in honor and general reputation, even business reputation, from the control and patronage of this great enterprise by Major Higginson. Higginson is gone; others have worthily carried on his work at great cost to themselves; but the expense of the maintenance of the orchestra has risen enormously, and the time has come when the whole musical public must consider whether it will take up the duty and the honor and continue the record of our city, by meeting now a deficit of $150,000 incurred this season in the running of the orchestra—at the same time, let us say, that it faces the larger duty and opportunity of providing an endowment fund of $3,000,000 to make the work of the orchestra perpetual.

The appeal of the trustees for fresh guarantees for the orchestra goes forth not merely to men and women of wealth, but to all citizens who love music and who are proud of their city's reputation. It is possible that the literary sceptre has passed from us, but there is no reason why the artistic preëminence afforded by the fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should pass. That may well remain within our grasp, if our people appreciate the situation. On the other hand, if they do not, and if they fail to support the enterprise worthily, the consequence to our city's reputation may indeed be serious. The subject is worthy of every citizen's thought. The efforts of the trustees thus far to maintain the orchestra with full credit to the city have indeed been most creditable, and they have been justified from every point of view. The response to their appeal should convince them, and the whole world, that Boston's star is not waning.

FUND FOR THE SYMPHONY

Trans. Apr. 22, 1921

Trustees Ask the Public for Fresh Guarantees

Private Subscriptions No Longer Adequate

Rising Salaries Main Item in Yearly Expenses

Pledges of $150,000 Annually Now Sought

Today the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have posted to the subscribers to its concerts a circular-letter, setting forth the income and the outgo of the band since they have controlled it, noting the deficits incurred each season, and asking contributions to meet the difference, approximately $150,000 between revenue and expenditure for the current year. They further propose that these contributions be continued from season to season until the orchestra is finally provided with an Endowment Fund. Thus $150,000 would be annually at the disposal of the trustees to meet a deficit, practically unescapable.

By the tables appended to the circular-letter, it appears that the deficit for the musical year 1918-19 was $93,000. It was paid by some hundred guarantors privately gathered. The deficit for the succeeding season, 1919-20, was $83,000. Again these guarantors paid it. For the current season, 1920-21, the deficit is estimated at $131,000—a sum exceeding by $50,000 the pledges of the guarantors. Hence the present appeal for additional subscriptions from the public of the concerts. Moreover, these private guarantees, made in 1919 for three seasons, have but one more year to run.

Past, Present, Future

The circular-letter notes the transfer of the control of the orchestra from the late Henry L. Higginson to the trustees, their assumption of the annual deficit and the pledging of a guarantee fund which covered the losses for the season of 1918-19 and provided "about $83,000" for like purpose through the seasons of 1919-20, 1920-21, 1921-22. The letter then proceeds:

Last year the deficit fell below the amount of the guarantee fund, and the unused portions of the subscriptions for that year were returned to the subscribers. This year it is evident that the deficit will far exceed the guarantee fund. Substantial increases in the musicians' salaries and in nearly all the other necessary expenses are swelling the deficits in all orchestras; in other cities than Boston they are credibly reported to stand at $200,000 and $300,000.

The trustees find themselves confronted with the necessity of securing approximately $50,000 beyond the fund guaranteed for this year's deficit, and a substantial increase in the amount pledged for next year. They must similarly obtain adequate provision for subsequent years, pending the establishment of the eventually needed endowment fund of at least $3,000,000. From time to time they have considered the organization of a definite campaign for the raising of this fund, but have not yet been convinced that the time is ripe for it. The foundations for the fund have nevertheless been laid, through subscriptions to the amount of about $150,000.

The trustees believe that their efforts to continue the Orchestra have been amply justified, both through the satisfaction of lovers of music and through the preservation of a local institution of the highest significance and benefit to the whole community. They have faith that their belief is shared by many besides those who have been giving their financial support to the orchestra. They believe that in addition to the comparatively small number of the friends of music who, in an emergency, have been the annual guarantors, there are many persons who so value the concerts as vital elements in their own lives and in the life of the community that they will welcome the opportunity to contribute.

To sustain the orchestra, contributions are necessary to make up an annual sum estimated to be $150,000. All those who make annual subscriptions will, so long as they continue to do so, be designated "Sustaining Subscribers." All those who subscribe $5000 or more specifically to be added to the permanent endowment fund, the income to be used in accordance with the terms of that fund for current expenses of the orchestra, will be designated as "Endowing Subscribers." If in any year the available subscriptions exceed the deficit, the over-subscriptions may, in the discretion of the trustees of the orchestra, be applied to any other annual deficit or be added to the permanent endowment fund, the growth of which will diminish the total amount needed for annual subscriptions.

The permanence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a musical and civic institution must ultimately depend upon public support. The trustees now confidently appeal for tangible expression of this support. They invite all concert-goers to fill out the enclosed blank, as liberally as their several resources will permit, and mail it to the treasurer, Ernest B. Dane, 6 Beacon Street, Boston, and thereby assure the required sum of $150,000 a year. Subscriptions to meet the deficit for this year will be particularly welcome.

From the Account Books

Appended tables for the three seasons in which the trustees have administered the affairs of the orchestra, set the gross receipts for the musical year 1918-19 at $414,707. The gross expenditures in that year, of which $194,828.76 was paid in salaries to the orchestra, were $508,029.99, leaving a deficit of $93,322.99. For the musical year 1919-20, the gross income was $522,600.70, and the total outgo $577,532.53, of which $229,748.14 was expended in salaries to the musicians. The resulting deficit was $54,931.83. For the musical year 1920-21, now ending, the receipts, partly estimated, are set down at $519,527.24 and the expenditures, again partly estimated, at $650,816.47. The item that materially swells this outgo is the increase in the salaries of the orchestra to $300,298.67. Thus, the present deficit rises to $131,289.23. Accordingly the trustees need $150,000 as the annual guarantee necessary to security in future.

SYMPHONY'S DEFICIT FOR YEAR $131,289.23

A deficit of $131,289.23, exceeding by more than $75,000 that of last year, is shown in the financial report for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1920-21 season. It cost $650,816.47 to run the orchestra, and receipts totalled only $519,527.24.

The trustees of the orchestra attach to the report an appeal for public contributions to make up the deficit, and suggest that 1500 friends of the orchestra pledge annual subscriptions of $100 each to provide a fund which may be counted on regularly.

REPORT OF THE TRUSTEES

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INC.

When the Symphony Concert season of 1917-18 was nearly ended, Major Henry L. Higginson, who had maintained the Orchestra since he established it in 1881, announced that he himself could no longer be responsible for its continuance. The organization would then have been dispersed but for immediate action, which took the form of incorporation under a board of nine, subsequently ten, trustees, who have now managed the affairs of the Orchestra for three seasons.

They were aware on assuming this responsibility that an annual deficit, previously met by Major Higginson, must be faced. The country was then at war, and at that time it was obviously unwise to make a general appeal for the support of the Orchestra. Accordingly a guarantee fund to cover the deficit for a single year was sought and obtained, and similar pledges, to the amount of about $83,000 annually, were secured for three years more, from about one hundred guarantors.

Last year the deficit fell below the amount of the guarantee fund, and the unused portions of the subscriptions for that year were returned to the subscribers. This year it is evident that the deficit will far exceed the guarantee fund. Substantial increases in the musicians' salaries and in nearly all the other necessary expenses are swelling the deficits in all orchestras; in other cities than Boston they are credibly reported to stand at $200,000 and $300,000.

The accompanying table of figures sets forth the situation here. The trustees find themselves confronted with the necessity of securing approximately $50,000 beyond the fund guaranteed for this year's deficit, and a substantial increase in the amount pledged for next year. They must similarly obtain adequate provision for subsequent years, pending the establishment of the eventually needed endowment fund of at least $3,000,000. From time to time they have considered the organization of a definite campaign for the raising of this fund, but have not yet been convinced that the time is ripe for it. The foundations for the fund have nevertheless been laid, through subscriptions to the amount of about $150,000.

The trustees believe that their efforts to continue the Orchestra have been amply justified, both through the satisfaction of lovers of music and through the preservation of a local institution of the highest significance and benefit to the whole community. They have faith that their belief is shared by many besides those who have been giving their financial support to the Orchestra. They are accordingly sending this report to all the season-ticket holders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. They believe that in addition to the comparatively small number of the friends of music who, in an emergency, have been the annual guarantors, there are many persons who so value the concerts as vital elements in their own lives and in the life of the community that they will welcome the opportunity to contribute.

To sustain the Orchestra, contributions are necessary to make up an annual sum estimated to be $150,000.

It is obvious that subscriptions from 1,500 persons averaging annually $100 each will make the needed yearly sum of $150,000; yet to obtain this average from friends of the Orchestra making subscriptions in accordance with their several abilities, subscriptions in many instances must be substantially larger than $100.

All those who make annual subscriptions will, so long as they continue to do so, be designated Sustaining Subscribers.

All those who subscribe $5,000 or more specifically to be added to the permanent endowment fund, the income to be used in accordance with the terms of that fund for current expenses of the Orchestra, will be designated as Endowing Subscribers.

If in any year the available subscriptions exceed the deficit, the over-subscriptions may, in the discretion of the trustees of the Orchestra, be applied to any other annual deficit or be added to the permanent endowment fund, the growth of which will diminish the total amount needed for annual subscriptions.

The permanence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a musical and civic institution must ultimately depend upon public support. The trustees now confidently appeal for tangible expression of this support. They invite all concert-goers to fill out the enclosed blank, as liberally as their several resources will permit, and mail it to the treasurer, Ernest B. Dane, 6 Beacon Street, Boston, and thereby assure the required sum of $150,000 a year. Subscriptions to meet the deficit for this year will be particularly welcome.

ALFRED L. AIKEN.
FREDERICK P. CABOT.
ERNEST B. DANE.
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE.
JOHN E. LODGE.
FREDERICK E. LOWELL.
ARTHUR LYMAN.
HENRY B. SAWYER.
GALEN L. STONE.
BENTLEY W. WARREN.

April 20, 1921.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

RECEIPTS AND EXPENSES FOR THREE YEARS

	RECEIPTS
	1918-19	1919-20	1920-21
Boston Concerts.....	$205,156.84	$252,214.16	Partly estimated $291,432.69
All other Concerts.....	112,315.05	149,312.02	113,385.00
Programmes.....	22,999.55	36,471.81	36,159.55
Miscellaneous.....	736.74	1,452.07	550.00
	$341,208.18	$439,450.06	$441,527.24
Symphony Hall Rentals.....	73,498.82	83,150.64	78,000.00
	$414,707.00	$522,600.70	$519,527.24
Deficit	93,322.99	54,931.83	131,289.23
	$508,029.99	$577,532.53	$650,816.47

	EXPENSES
	1918-19	1919-20	1920-21
Orchestra Salaries.....	$194,828.76	$229,748.14	Partly estimated $300,298.67
General Salaries: Manager, Assistant Manager, Assistant Treasurer, Clerks, etc.....	24,274.66	26,140.00	37,405.11
Programmes.....	20,819.85	36,583.52	30,339.30
Rentals and other expenses, Boston Symphony and Pop Concerts,	106,597.74	78,374.62	87,033.84
Expenses, all other Concerts.....	72,806.98	109,940.56	97,550.01
New music, insurance, miscellaneous.....	7,775.87	8,293.88	18,846.61
	$427,103.86	$489,080.72	$571,473.54
Symphony Hall: heat, light, maintenance, interest, etc.....	80,926.13	88,451.81	79,342.93
	$508,029.99	$577,532.53	$650,816.47

NOTES: The Corporation's year ends with the conclusion of the Summer Pop season in July.

The figures for the current season, 1920-21, are partly estimated.

Boston, Mass. 1921

IN consideration of the undertaking of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., to continue further to maintain a symphony orchestra, and for the purpose of contributing to the success of that undertaking, the undersigned promises to pay to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., at the office of Old Colony Trust Company, 17 Court Street, Boston, Mass., for the Expenses of the Concert Seasons designated below, the following sums.

Season 1920-1921	dollars on or before July 1, 1921
Season 1921-1922	dollars on February 1, 1922
Season 1922-1923	dollars on February 1, 1923
Season 1923-1924	dollars on February 1, 1924

And Authorizes the Application of any part of the foregoing to any other Annual deficit or to the permanent Endowment Fund.

Name

Address

Please return to

ERNEST B. DANE, Treasurer
6 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

SYMPHONY HALL

41st Season

1921-1922

24 FRIDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS
24 SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS
BEGINNING OCTOBER 7-8, 1921

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

WITH DISTINGUISHED SOLOISTS

SUBSCRIPTION INFORMATION

This year's subscribers for the series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts have an option until May 1 to retain their seats for the following season of 1921-22.

Applications from new subscribers are now being received and their names placed on the waiting list. These applications will be filed in order of receipt and seats allotted as near the desired location as possible shortly after May 1.

Season Tickets for 24 concerts, $65, $53, $40, $27, $18.
No tax.

Address all communications to

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

Symphony Hall, Boston

REDUCTION

RATIO

19x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 1.1 1.25 1.4 1.6 1.8 2.0 2.2 2.5 2.8 3.2 3.6 4.0 4.5 5.0 5.6 6.3 7.1 8.0 9.0 10.0

1.0 mm 1.5 mm 2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

3.5 mm

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

The Personality of the Concert Conductor Is Indicated in the Choice of His Baton

DR. HANS VON BULOW, WHO WOULD SING THE SCORE TO
THE ORCHESTRA

ARTHUR TOSCANINI—
CARICATURED BY CARUSO
Courtesy LA FOLIA di NEW YORK

WILLIAM MENDELBERG—
GUEST CONDUCTOR WITH THE NATIONAL SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

They All Laughed One Hundred Years Ago When Louis Spohr First Conducted the London Philharmonic With a Stick—But He Set the Fashion

By Frederic Dean

ONE hundred years ago Louis Spohr went to London from Frankfurt to conduct the Philharmonic Society. At his first concert he pulled out of his pocket a small stick about as long as a marshal's baton and with it proceeded to guide his men through the programme. Heretofore the leader of the orchestra had sat at the piano and by beating upon the keys had indicated the time, or the first violinist had tapped upon the floor with his toe or waved his violin bow to designate the marks of expression in the music.

Spohr's innovation, frowned upon by the concertmaster, was praised by the public, and gradually came to be the recognized method of conducting orchestras and choral bodies. Rossini, who went to Covent Garden to conduct his "Barber of Seville," insisted upon sitting at the piano, as he and his associates had been accustomed to do for years, but the majority of conductors followed Spohr's example.

In a drawer of my study I have a bundle of batons that have been used by various conductor generals of the music world in their orchestral campaigns. Some are long, some short; some thick and heavy, others—noticeably the one used by Karl Muck when he played "The Star-Spangled Banner" for the first time—but a trifle larger than an average lemonade straw.

Years ago, when as a boy I listened to the opera down at the old Academy, I used to watch Arditi's stick more than I did the singers. This seemed to be the moving force—the verb—of the musical sentence. To study the white-gloved hand that guided it was the most fascinating of games. One evening I mustered up courage and asked for it, and after the performance was over—Patti sang that night—it was put into my hand.

A Demon of Rehearsals

Theodore Thomas was at that time conducting the Thomas Orchestra. His stick was of an entirely different build and was used in an entirely different manner. Arditi's had a leather thong, which held it to his wrist; Thomas dropped his upon the rack when not wanted. Mr. Thomas wore no gloves while conducting, but held his baton in the daintiest manner between his thumb and forefinger. It had none of the Latin gesticulations of the Arditi stick, but expressed in graceful movements the philosophy of a well-mannered gentleman. Adolf Hartdegen was the solo cellist of the orchestra. I spoke to him one day about the quiet Thomas baton. "Come to rehearsal," said he, "and see it in action." I did. There I discovered quite a different stick. Now, securely grasped in an energetic palm, it shot out in every conceivable direction—came down upon the stand with a sharp snap, sang to the violins, growled at the double basses, and shouted to the trumpets and drums.

Dr. Leopold Damrosch was at that time conductor of the Oratorio Society. Emma Thursby made her debut in oratorio in "The Messiah." She had sung in concert and had been successful, but in "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" she quavered, stopped, and sat down. Dr. Damrosch fanned her with his programme and finally succeeded in getting her to try again. This time the voice never shook, the singer returned to her best form, and the aria was finished in noble style. Afterwards Miss Thursby admitted that "it was the Doctor's little stick that pulled me through."

Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore used a good-sized stick of heavy white wood, very tapering at the point, which was waved over an orchestra of two thousand and a chorus of twenty thousand. The most gaudily painted stick in my collection was used by Xaver Scharwenka. It is a very long stick, with an elaborate color scheme of blues, greens, purples, yellows, and reds—a scholarly stick despite its coloring.

On February 14, 1837, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its first

New York concert in Steinway Hall, under Wilhelm Gericke. The most striking number on the programme was the "Largo" of Mendel, played in unison by sixteen first violins, standing in front of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke, always metronomic, was the best drill master the orchestra ever had and brought his men to a point of perfection seldom equalled. His stick is of medium length, with a pronounced protuberance where the palm grasped it, and this hold was never for a moment relinquished. It was the hold he had upon the men under him—firm, despotic, disdaining anything but flawless, impeccable adherence to his rule.

Arthur Nikisch, who followed him, used the same kind of a stick, but his baton felt and expressed his own Magyar spirit—as imperious as was Gericke's, but wilder, more impetuous, and vehement. When Nikisch returned with the London Symphony Orchestra in 1912 he had an entirely different stick—one of the longest batons ever seen in this country—which was used decorously and with great precision and safety of purpose. There was a tinge of gray in the maestro's beard and a touch of gray in his baton.

The Poetry of Seidl

On the evening of November 23, 1885, Anton Seidl stepped to the conductor's desk in the Metropolitan. "Lohengrin" was the opera presented, but an entirely different "Lohengrin" from the one to which New Yorkers had been accustomed at the hands of Arditi and Italo Campanini, and different from the "Lohengrin" of Adolf Neuendorf and Dr. Damrosch. The stick used by Seidl is heavy and long and as full of poetry as was the soul of the Bayreuth master.

In 1891 Tchaikovsky came to this country to open Carnegie Hall. At his first concert he noticed that the first violins were not at their best and, turning his back upon the rest of the musicians, he brought his baton down sharply over the backs of the astonished players, whose instruments before long were singing a new song. This stick is an elegant affair, quite in keeping with the gentleman in whose hands it was placed. Devoid of ornamentation, it is made of cedar wood and kept immaculately clean for immaculate fingers.

Hans von Bulow had an entirely different baton. Very small, very light, it seemed far too delicate for the man who wielded it. When at his first rehearsal Von Bulow met the men of the orchestra he leisurely took off his gloves and asked what symphonies they played. Brahms was the composer they were at the time studying, and one of the symphonies was chosen. "All right," said Von Bulow. And without a sheet of music in front of him he sketched the entire work, telling the men at the sixteenth bar such an instrument "sings" such and such a song; at the twenty-seventh bar the time is indicated with such and such a mark.

Sousa is always picturesque. After the death of President McKinley he gave a band concert in the Metropolitan. During the first part he dressed in black and wore black gloves. The concluding number of this part was a funeral march. Between the parts Sousa changed his raiment and appeared in white, with white gloves. His stick is of gray wood, highly polished, and weighs less than some of the smaller ones.

Last spring, at his final concert of the season, Alfred Hertz presented a programme with his San Francisco Orchestra, concluding with the "Eroica." The hall was packed and the symphony was listened to with a religious silence. I felt as if I had been to mass. The baton with which Hertz performed the miracle—changing the hearers from pleasure-lovers to worshippers—is heavy, stocky, evenly balanced and almost as large at the tip as at the handle end.

The Luck of Preparedness

When Puccini was here a few years ago a cycle of his operas was given—including "Tosca." Tosca was Emma Eames's pet rôle. One evening Lina Cavalleri heard her. Scanning the house bill, the Italian discovered that the opera was announced to be given on the following Friday week. The next morning she purchased the score and engaged the coach of the Metropolitan to perfect her in the heroine's part. On the day set for the opera she moved her wardrobe to the theatre and waited. At noon a sign was posted announcing that owing to the illness of Mme. Eames the opera would be changed. Going to the manager's office, Cavalleri said: "I have come to sing 'Tosca' to-night. It will not be necessary to change the bill. My costumes are in that trunk." Puccini, Caruso, and Toscanini were hastily called and a rehearsal was had. That night "Tosca" was given as originally announced—with the new singer. Toscanini's baton is bound with heavy leather to keep his nervous fingers from slipping, and the tip is broken off—due to the excitement at rehearsal.

In 1891 the German Emperor made his famous visit to Grandmama Victoria in London. He brought with him dozens of changes of costumes and but one manner. No more insolent prince was ever entertained at a foreign court. A concert was arranged for him. It was given in St. James's Hall. Joseph Barnby conducted and Nordica sang. When the royal party entered Barnby played the German national anthem and everybody rose to greet the young ruler, who pushed his way to the front of the royal box and frowned. Barnby's stick is long and white, straight and clean—a typical English affair, looking as if, when properly attired in a Prince Albert coat and top hat, it could take its place placidly with the rest of the well-dressed pedestrians.

Artur Bodanzky counts his stick a tool of trade. "To be properly equipped," he says, "a conductor must have a baton of just the right length, just the right weight, and just the right thickness. Once, when Gustav Mahler was in Vienna, he forgot to bring his bag of batons and tried to use a borrowed one. Nothing was right. The rehearsal dragged, the musicians played fensively, the singers floundered. After the attempted rehearsal the town was scoured for a proper baton, but not until a quarter hour before the performance was the right stick found."

Temperamental Sticks

Leopold Stokowski is as graceful as Bodanzky is scholarly. His wrist is like those of the señoritas of Seville—every movement of his baton is one of poetic grace. At the conductor's stand he is like an exultant faun, rioting in the music that is surging, leaping about him from pure joy at the opportunity to come at his call. When Richard Strauss was here his musical audacity was pictured in the movements of his stick, which seemed to poke about the instruments of his huge orchestra with an exorbitant, excessive, disproportioned insistence for immoderate and unreasonable noise and clatter. It is a long, heavy stick, a bit unbalanced at the end and made of tough ash, with an ugly twist in the grain.

An entirely different kind of baton is the one used by Camille Saint-Saëns when he was here in 1906. Like the man and like his music, this stick is smooth and light. Saint-Saëns never wrote a discordant passage of musical notes, and you would know it from the stick he uses. Engelbert Humperdinck's is a stick of more temperament and less beauty. It is coarser, but more humorous.

Wassil Safonoff, the batonless conductor, was blessed with eloquent hands, with which he weaved sounds from his instruments into arabesques unthought of by his confreres. During the five years that he took charge of the New York Philharmonic he was constantly astonishing with unusual effects; the well known instruments seemed to speak with special enchantment. The Philharmonic is the most respectable of musical organizations. It has a dignity to uphold, a special character to maintain, but this Russian dragged from its bassoons and double basses, from its kettle drums and its tubas, its flutes and cellos tones that had been deemed unseemly coming from such an old establishment and conventional body of players.

Expressive Variation

Pietro Mascagni wielded a massive stick, with which he wove his men into Italian dynamics; Mascagni was content with a thin baton that seemed to be made of steel; Hans Richter used a of bamboo bent with the rain; D. Albert was as particular as was Van der Stucken careless in the choice of a baton, but the pianist-conductor was inclined to be abrupt and metronomic, while Van der Stucken was never insensible to the voluptuous beauty of his French programmes.

The two Felixes—Mottl and Weingartner—are extremely sensitive to the touch of the sticks they used; Josef Stransky makes demand for a rugged bit of hardwood, and Modest Altschuler, at the head of his Russian choir of instrumentalists, holds a medium-weighted wand that guides his men through the sad plaints of Tchaikovsky and his fellow Slavs with true reverence.

Two new guest conductors and an old friend are to be heard during the present season—Arthur Coates of London, who comes to assist Walter Damrosch, with the Symphony Society; Willem Mendelberg, hailing from Holland, who will conduct concerts of the National Symphony, and Arthur Toscanini, former conductor at the opera, who will give concerts with his new orchestra "of the best players of Italy." Their batons will be watched with interest, for they promise ultra-modern bits of revolutionary music, with colorful bits of orchestral mosaics and new rhythmic cadences. For all this—and more—is possible when the baton is grasped by the hand of a master.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

100 mm

A4

A5

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

~~ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ~~

OCT 28 1921

OCT 28 1921

CONTINUED
ON NEXT REEL